It is by the employment of melodies of this stamp that Loewe shows one of the elements of his superiority to Schumann as a ballad writer; the very thing which gave Schumann his wonderful mastery over the more concise and condensed form of the "Lied," his conspicuous power of making every melodic phrase reflect exactly and specifically the emotional contents of the particular words to which it is sung, the intimate connection which exists between his melody and the emotional essence of the text, militated against his gaining an equal mastery over the more extended narrative form of the ballad. Whenever Schumann was brought face to face with a poem, his instinct as a composer led him toward the most immediate and specific expression of the text; and the development of the ballad is too extended to admit of its being set to music with this constant, minute regard for following out every varying shade of emotion, sentence by sentence, and at the same time preserving a firmly knit and coherent musical form. Now Schumann was no Wagnerian, and "infinite melody" of the Wagnerian sort, was not what he aimed at; in his eyes, musical form was to the full as important as truth of expression. He must have perceived clearly enough that, to compose a ballad all through, (durchcomponiren,) with constant regard for the music's reflecting every shade of emotion in the text, and, at the same time, to impart to his composition a finely organized and coherent musical form, would inevitably result in inflating that form to quasi-symphonic proportions, necessitating a repetition and re-repetition of words utterly out of keeping with the simplicity of the ballad. Consequently, not being willing, or perhaps not able, to abandon constant specific musical expressiveness, he too often took refuge in a style of writing half-way between arioso and recitative, which doubtless has the virtue of expressiveness, often of a rather dramatic sort, but has also the vice of lacking simplicity and musical vivacity, and of seeming singularly at variance with the true ballad spirit. He, at times, almost becomes turgid, and one has a too besetting sense of effort. There is a general lack of homeliness and naïveté. To our mind, Schumann has been far more successful in striking the right key-note in some of the most profoundly philosophical meditations in his "Faust" than in such ballads as his "Belsazar," or "Die Löwenbraut." In "Die beiden Grenadiere," he falls more nearly into the real ballad style: here the martial briskness of the principal theme, repeated, as it is, at the beginning of successive stanzas, gives a musical consistency to the whole, while the arioso portions have more definiteness of musical outline than we find in similar parts of "Belsazar." Then, too, the closing climax, with the "Marseillaise," rounds off the whole with a glorious outburst of pure, popular melody. Still, even here, we are far enough from the simple homeliness of narrative style of Loewe's "Erlkönig" or "Archibald Douglas." Just try to imagine Schumann setting Uhland's "Roland Schildtrager" to music! Loewe would have done it to perfection,—indeed, he may have done so, for ought we know.

"Die Vätergruft" is the first ballad we have ever heard by Liszt; it is, in a certain sense both worse and better than Schumann. Worse, from the portentous means (harmonic and otherwise) Liszt has employed; better—superficially, at least—from a certain brilliant theatricality in treatment, which might pass muster, for the nonce, as dramatic power." Mr. Henschel's own "Jung Dietrich" struck us as admirable; here we have once more the true ballad spirit. The thing is simple in treatment, full of energy and enormously effective. Upon the whole, it is laid out rather upon Loewe's lines. Of Mr. Henschel's singing of all five ballads it can only be said that it was superb as ever.

Mrs. Henschel was delightful in the two groups of three little songs each, and in Brahms's "Schlummerlied." But "Des Mädchens Fluch" seemed physically beyond her; it is a positively terrific song, one that demands enormous vocal force, and an amount of demonic magnetism in the singer such as would fit her to sing Wagner's Kundry, in the scene in the second act, in Klingsor's laboratory. The several duets were given beyond reproach.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-second concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture to "Sakùntala."
Paine: Symphony No. 2, in A major, "In the Spring."
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont."

Once more a symphony concert without a solo; for which much thanks! Goldmark's "Sakuntala" is not precisely a novelty—indeed, we believe it was given no less than six times the first season it was brought out here, by the Harvard Musical Association, under Mr. Zerrahn—neither is it the strongest work in the world. We remember being lately in a company of musicians who all agreed that the "Sakuntala" marked about the lowest point attainable by a composition that one would care to listen to more than once. Still, it is not disagreeable in thematic material, and is really gorgeous in orchestration. We have often thought that a tolerably high pitch of human well-being might be reached by listening to this overture, while looking at the old "Black Crook" prismatic fountain, and thinking of nothing at all. Its oriental sensuousness would set off that shifting play of bright color to fine advantage. But at a concert, with nothing more poetic than a lot of electric lights staring you out of countenance, you do begin to tire of it especially after having heard it numberless times. Yet it was made interesting, and even exciting last Saturday evening by the incomparably superb way the orchestra played it under Mr. Nikisch. He takes it very differently from Mr. Gericke; and we are fully persuaded that Mr. Gericke, as an old and intimate friend of Goldmark's, took it just the way the composer intended it to go. But this does not trouble us in the least; it is a work of no earthly importance, and it sounds for better as Mr. Nikisch takes it. There is no question of right or wrong in the matter. We enjoyed it to the top of our bent.

Mr. Paine's "Spring" symphony has not been heard here in some years. It is eminently characteristic of the composer's second manner, the individual style he developed after his earlier pianoforte and organ works, and his "Mass in D." Indeed, Mr. Paine seems to stand almost alone among American composers, in that he distinctly has an absolutely individual style and accent of his own; no doubt, there are in this symphony certain things which recall devices employed by other composers before him. For instance, those four half-notes (E, D, B, D) that become eight quarter notes, then sixteen eighth notes, and at last thirty-two twittering sixteenth notes, at the beginning of the first Allegro ma non troppo, smack strongly of Beethoven. But this is only a device, a trick of rhythm, of which Beethoven may have been fond, but for which no composer could take out a copyright. Mr. Paine's themes, their melodic character, and often their rhythm, are essentially his own, and very seldom recall any other composer; you are free to like them or not, as the case may be, but their thoroughly personal and individual cut is indisputable. There is much genial beauty in this symphony, much that is strong and forcible, side by side with a good deal that seems obscure and rather far-fetched. The Scherzo, with its lovely Trio, seems to us the most wholly fine of the four movements; but there is great beauty, too, in the first movement, and the opening theme of the Finale is delightful. The grandiose second theme of this Finale we like less, although it would be hard to say exactly what in it fails to satisfy us. The symphony was admirably played and loudly applauded.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was grandly given, although we cannot like the very moderate tempo, especially the over-moderate beginning, of the Coda. Look at the matter in what light we may, we cannot but feel that a Beethoven Allegro con brio, at the close of a brilliant overture, ought to go with more headlong impetuosity. And then, that beginning the climax slow, and gradually increasing the speed as it goes on, it is utterly needless; we want to feel the kettle boiling from the first three beats. No doubt it may be claimed that Mr. Nikisch's tempo gives more dignity to this glowing peroration; but Beethoven had that of the ancient Greek in him that he was, at times, willing to throw dignity to the dogs, as in the last Prestissimo of the Ninth Symphony, which is sheer tossing up of caps and shouting; and it seems to us that this Coda of the "Egmont" overture is one of those times. We are sorry to differ with Mr. Nikisch so often on this matter of "reading;" there are even moments when we heartily wish that Wagner had never written that infernal pamphlet "Ueber das Dirigiren," much good as there is in it, too.

The next programme is: D'Albert, symphony in F major, op. 4; Handel, aria from "Alessandro;" Henschel, suite from the music to Shakspeare's "Hamlet" (conducted by the composer); Massenet, aria from "Hérodiade;" Weber, overture to "Oberon." Mrs. George Henschel will be the singer.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13.

Adamowski Quartet Concert.

The third and last concert of the Adamowski quartet took place at Union Hall last evening. For some reason the audience was very small, but made up in enthusiasm.

The first number was a quartet in G minor, No. 4, by Bazzini, consisting of Allegro giusto, Andante con moto quasi allegretto, Tempo di gavotte Allegro con fuoco. This charming quartet was given for the first time here. It abounded in melody from beginning to end, which was most happily expressed in the second movement.

The second number, "Two movements from quartet," was composed by Mr. C. M. Loeffler of the Symphony orchestra, and like the previous number was presented for the first time. It was made up of two movements Andante con variationi, Menuetto (canon l'octave), Pii presto.

The concert concluded with Beethoven's quartet, op. 18, No. 4, Allegro ma non tanto, Andante scherzo quasi allegretto, Menuetto, Allegro (finale). This final number was played with dash and spirit, and was a pleasing termination to an exceedingly enjoyable performance.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st Violin.
A. MOLDAUER, 2d Violin
MAX ZACH, Viola.
J. ADAMOWSKI, Violoncello.

FOURTH SEASON--1891-92.

THIRD SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

IN

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 12.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 104.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13, 1892.

Third of the Adamowski Quartet Concerts of the Season.

The third and last of the season's series of concerts by the Adamowski quartet was given at Union Hall last evening, and had an especial interest, by reason of the novelties included in the programme.

The hearing, for the first time, of two movements of a quartet by Mr. C. M. Loeffler of the Boston Symphony orchestra, made a prominent feature of the evening, and aroused much appreciation of the work among those present.

The movements are an "Andante con variationi" and "Menuetto (canon a l'octave)" and a "Piu presto," and both were admirably played by Mr. Adamowski and his associates. The first movement is the work of an accomplished musician rather than that of an inspired composer, the graceful phrases which form its basis being worked out, elaborated and ornamented with the skill of a master, but with all this it fails to leave much satisfaction because of its fragmentary characteristics. In the second movement Mr. Loeffler has worked in a freer style, and the results are shown in a tuneful theme admirably treated and made vastly interesting. The two examples created, on the whole, an excellent impression and a desire to hear the completed work.

A quartet by Bazzini in G minor, No. 4, was also given its first performance here at this concert, and proved well worth a hearing, its movements being delightfully tuneful, clear and logical at all times, and worked out with excellent taste and skill. It was given a very finished performance, and created quite a good impression.

A well prepared performance of Beethoven's quartet, op. 16, No. 4, brought the concert to an end.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN—APRIL 12, 1892.

M. D'Albert's Recital.

The musical public of Baltimore had another opportunity of hearing Mr. Eugene D'Albert last evening. His piano recital took place at Albaugh's Lyceum Theater at 8 P. M., was largely attended. His program, which was arranged in perfect chronological order, as regards the dates of the different composers, excepting that Liszt, was placed after Raff, probably for climsatic effect, consisted of prelude and fugue, D major, Bach; sonata, opus 109, Beethoven; Variations Serieuse, opus 54, Mendelssohn; Nocturne in B major and Grande Valse in A flat major, Chop; in suite by Raff, concluding with three pieces by Liszt—Sonetta de Petrarca, "Feux Follets" and Rhapsodie Espagnole.

The fugue in D major has been transcribed for the piano by Mr. D'Albert, and is a piece of great difficulty. The Beethovan and Mendelssohn pieces displayed his deep musicianly feeling, and his wonderful rendition of Chopin, especially the very brilliant and familiar A flat Valse, was a revelation. The Raff suite is a very beautiful composition in the fascinating style of the "Lenore" Symphony.

Boston Post

WEDNESDAY MORNING, APR. 13, 1892.

Adamowski Concert.

The third and last subscription concert by the Adamowski Quartet took place in Union Hall last evening. Those who were not present missed an evening of pleasure for the programme of three numbers was artistic and presented two novelties in the form of Bazzini's quartet in G minor. No. 4 and two movements from C. M. Loeffler's quartet; the familiar Beethoven quartet, Op. 18, No. 4, was a fitting close to a delightful entertainment.

Bazzini's composition contains frequent suggestions of Haydn and, like Haydn's music is interesting throughout.

Loeffler's quartet is clever, exceedingly clever, and one could but regret its brevity. It is well built, and repeats the good points of his suite heard here earlier in the season.

The Beethoven Quartet received the best rendition of any number on the programme. Possibly its familiarity made its interpretation more satisfactory, but it brought out the best points of this quartet of musicians. They have done excellent work in all their concerts, work to be commended for its nicety of tone, blending and its shading—both of which qualities are not easy of attainment with so small a number of instruments.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, TUESDAY, APRIL 12, 1892.

Two Hours with Eugen D'Albert.

To have an entire recital by Eugen D'Albert, two hours of music by this wonderful player in a programme as varied as it was excellent was indeed a privilege. The Lyceum Theatre was well filled last night, and by a representative audience, whose applause was readily merged into enthusiasm as the evening wore on. The pianist began his recital in tremendous style, playing his own transcription of Bach's "Prelude and Fugue," in D major, in such a way as to make the work stand out as a colossal monument to the genius of composer and player. Nothing could have been finer than the style in which he attacked the masterly work, overcame its difficulties and filled it with the fire and immensity of a soul whose lofty thoughts could find no expression so satisfactory as in the abstract power and grandeur of music. Compared with this great achievement how charming a contrast was presented by the performance of the Chopin numbers, as beautiful in the delicacy and sentiment as was the more rugged strength of the heavier work in its solidity and massiveness. Then the Beethoven sonata and the Raff suite—what language but music itself could desribe the thousand little touches, the ever-increasing power, the marvelous technique that opened up new delights, new beauties in each measure—nay almost in each note. Qualities that in usual performances seem not to have existed before in the unresponsive instrument, spring suddenly into being and create within it new power at D'Albert's touch and obey his bidding as if the piano were a part of the player. D'Albert presented a lengthy programme, which included, besides the works mentioned, Mendelssohn's "Variations Serieuses," Liszt's "Sonetta di Petrarca," "Feux Follets" Etude and "Rhapsodie Espagnole."

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 11, 1892.

Meionaon: The Henschel Recitals.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave the last of their four vocal recitals in the Meionaon on Saturday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

Duet, O toi le digne appui d'un père, from "Joseph." ..... Méhul
Duet, from "Richard Cœur de Lion" ..... Grétry
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
If thou thy heart bestowest ..... Giovannini
Le Portrait ..... Pacini
La charmante Marguerite ..... Old French
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballad, Die Vätergruft ..... Liszt
Ballad, Jung Dietrich ..... Henschel
Mr. Henschel.
Schlummerlied, from "Die schöne Magelone;"
Des Mädchens Fluch ..... Brahms
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballad, Archibald Douglas ..... Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Duets, Ici les tendres oiseaux; Viens! Une flute invisible ..... Saint-Säens
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Dov' è la sorella? ..... Henschel
The Little Red Lark ..... Old Irish
May Song ..... Hervey
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballads, Belsazar; Die beiden Grenadiere ... Schumann
Mr. Henschel.
Duet, Gondoliers ..... Henschel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

Mr. Henschel is giving us a good deal of the German ballad, but not too much; the form has not been very familiar here, and what little we know of it we owe almost entirely to him. In earlier days August Kreissmann, the only song-singer of real importance we have had before Mr. Henschel, used to confine himself almost wholly to the Lied; we cannot remember his singing the Schubert, Schumann, or Loewe ballads. Of those Mr. Henschel has sung here, those by Carl Loewe must be recognized as standing head and shoulders above the others; Loewe had just the right gifts to make him an almost ideal ballad writer; a facile melodic invention, a well-sustained vivacity of style, above all, the power of doing things simply and directly.

If we look into the matter a little more deeply, we find that the natural gifts which make a man a ballad composer, to the manner born, correspond in a sense to those which make a poet a good ballad writer. The easy melodic invention which marks the ballad composer is intimately related to the facile handling of rhyme and rhythm that belongs to the ballad-writing poet. A certain simple homeliness is common to both. And note here one prevailing trait of Loewe's melody; its general cut, especially its rhythm, may connect it ideally with some prominent feature in the poem he is setting to music; thus its general character may be martial or rustic, light or serious, suggestive of the dance or the chase. In a word, it is almost invariably pertinent to the occasion. But mark this: it is simply and purely a melody per se; it is a bit of pure musical invention, a melody schlechtweg, as the Germans would say. It does not present itself, like the Wagnerian Leitmotiv, as the musical expression of any particular line or sentiment in the poem, but its emotional expressiveness is—as Hanslick says that of every pure melody is—absolutely vague and indeterminate. It is, so to speak, a melody of all-work; one which will be serviceable at any juncture in the ballad, and to which any expression you please may be given, by changes of tempo, dynamic force, rhythm, or vocal inflection. It is the musical counterpart of the usually persistent and unchanging rhythm of the poetic ballad.

It is by the employment of melodies of this stamp that Loewe shows one of the elements of his superiority to Schumann as a ballad writer; the very thing which gave Schumann his wonderful mastery over the more concise and condensed form of the "Lied," his conspicuous power of making every melodic phrase reflect exactly and specifically the emotional contents of the particular words to which it is sung, the intimate connection which exists between his melody and the emotional essence of the text, militated against his gaining an equal mastery over the more extended narrative form of the ballad. Whenever Schumann was brought face to face with a poem, his instinct as a composer led him toward the most immediate and specific expression of the text; and the development of the ballad is too extended to admit of its being set to music with this constant, minute regard for following out every varying shade of emotion, sentence by sentence, and at the same time preserving a firmly knit and coherent musical form. Now Schumann was no Wagnerian, and "infinite melody" of the Wagnerian sort, was not what he aimed at; in his eyes, musical form was to the full as important as truth of expression. He must have perceived clearly enough that, to compose a ballad all through, (durchcomponiren,) with constant regard for the music's reflecting every shade of emotion in the text, and, at the same time, to impart to his composition a finely organized and coherent musical form, would inevitably result in inflating that form to quasi-symphonic proportions, necessitating a repetition and re-repetition of words utterly out of keeping with the simplicity of the ballad. Consequently, not being willing, or perhaps not able, to abandon constant specific musical expressiveness, he too often took refuge in a style of writing half-way between arioso and recitative, which doubtless has the virtue of expressiveness, often of a rather dramatic sort, but has also the vice of lacking simplicity and musical vivacity, and of seeming singularly at variance with the true ballad spirit. He, at times, almost becomes turgid, and one has a too besetting sense of effort. There is a general lack of homeliness and naïveté. To our mind, Schumann has been far more successful in striking the right key-note in some of the most profoundly philosophical meditations in his "Faust" than in such ballads as his "Belsazar," or "Die Löwenbraut." In "Die beiden Grenadiere," he falls more nearly into the real ballad style: here the martial briskness of the principal theme, repeated, as it is, at the beginning of successive stanzas, gives a musical consistency to the whole, while the arioso portions have more definiteness of musical outline than we find in similar parts of "Belsazar." Then, too, the closing climax, with the "Marseillaise," rounds off the whole with a glorious outburst of pure, popular melody. Still, even here, we are far enough from the simple homeliness of narrative style of Loewe's "Erlkönig" or "Archibald Douglas." Just try to imagine Schumann setting Uhland's "Roland Schildtrager" to music! Loewe would have done it to perfection—indeed, he may have done so, for ought we know.

"Die Vätergruft" is the first ballad we have ever heard by Listz; it is, in a certain sense both worse and better than Schumann. Worse, from the portentous means (harmonic and otherwise) Liszt has employed; better—superficially, at least—from a certain brilliant theatricality in treatment, which might pass muster, for the nonce, as dramatic power. Mr. Henschel's own "Jung Dietrich" struck us as admirable; here we have once more the true ballad spirit. The thing is simple in treatment, full of energy and enormously effective. Upon the whole, it is laid out rather upon Loewe's lines. Of Mr. Henschel's singing of all five ballads it can only be said that it was superb as ever.

Mrs. Henschel was delightful in the two groups of three little songs each, and in Brahms's "Schlummerlied." But "Des Mädchens Fluch" seemed physically beyond her; it is a positively terrific song, one that demands enormous vocal force, and an amount of demonic magnetism in the singer such as would fit her to sing Wagner's Kundry, in the scene in the second act, in Klingsor's laboratory. The several duets were given beyond reproach.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-second concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture to "Sakûntala."
Paine: Symphony No. 2, in A major, "In the Spring."
Beethoven: Overture to "Egmont."

Once more a symphony concert without a solo; for which much thanks! Goldmark's "Sakuntala" is not precisely a novelty—indeed, we believe it was given no less than six times the first season it was brought out here, by the Harvard Musical Association, under Mr. Zerrahn—neither is it the strongest work in the world. We remember being lately in a company of musicians who all agreed that the "Sakuntala" marked about the lowest point attainable by a composition that one would care to listen to more than once. Still, it is not disagreeable in thematic material, and is really gorgeous in orchestration. We have often thought that a tolerably high pitch of human well-being might be reached by listening to this overture, while looking at the old "Black Crook" prismatic fountain, and thinking of nothing at all. Its oriental sensuousness would set off that shifting play of bright color to fine advantage. But at a concert, with nothing more poetic than a lot of electric lights staring you out of countenance, you do begin to tire of it especially after having heard it numberless times. Yet it was made interesting, and even exciting last Saturday evening by the incomparably superb way the orchestra played it under Mr. Nikisch. He takes it very differently from Mr. Gericke; and we are fully persuaded that Mr. Gericke, as an old and intimate friend of Goldmark's, took it just the way the composer intended it to go. But this does not trouble us in the least; it is a work of no earthly importance, and it sounds for better as Mr. Nikisch takes it. There is no question of right or wrong in the matter. We enjoyed it to the top of our bent.

Mr. Paine's "Spring" symphony has not been heard here in some years. It is eminently characteristic of the composer's second manner, the individual style he developed after his earlier pianoforte and organ works, and his "Mass in D." Indeed, Mr. Paine seems to stand almost alone among American composers, in that he distinctly has an absolutely individual style and accent of his own; no doubt, there are in this symphony certain things which recall devices employed by other composers before him. For instance, those four half-notes (E, D, B, D) that become eight quarter notes, then sixteen eighth notes, and at last thirty-two twittering sixteenth notes, at the beginning of the first Allegro ma non troppo, smack strongly of Beethoven. But this is only a device, a trick of rhythm, of which Beethoven may have been fond, but for which no composer could take out a copyright. Mr. Paine's themes, their melodic character, and often their rhythm, are essentially his own, and very seldom recall any other composer; you are free to like them or not, as the case may be, but their thoroughly personal and individual cut is indisputable. There is much genial beauty in this symphony, much that is strong and forcible, side by side with a good deal that seems obscure and rather far-fetched. The Scherzo, with its lovely Trio, seems to us the most wholly fine of the four movements; but there is great beauty, too, in the first movement, and the opening theme of the Finale is delightful. The grandiose second theme of this Finale we like less, although it would be hard to say exactly what in it fails to satisfy us. The symphony was admirably played and loudly applauded.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was grandly given, although we cannot like the very moderate tempo, especially the over-moderate beginning, of the Coda. Look at the matter in what light we may, we cannot but feel that a Beethoven Allegro con brio, at the close of a brilliant overture, ought to go with more headlong impetuosity. And then, that beginning the climax slow, and gradually increasing the speed as it goes on, it is utterly needless; we want to feel the kettle boiling from the first three beats. No doubt it may be claimed that Mr. Nikisch's tempo gives more dignity to this glowing peroration; but Beethoven had that of the ancient Greek in him that he was, at times, willing to throw dignity to the dogs, as in the last Prestissimo of the Ninth Symphony, which is sheer tossing up of caps and shouting; and it seems to us that this Coda of the "Egmont" overture is one of those times. We are sorry to differ with Mr. Nikisch so often on this matter of "reading;" there are even moments when we heartily wish that Wagner had never written that infernal pamphlet "Ueber das Dirigiren," much good as there is in it, too.

The next programme is: D'Albert, symphony in F major, op. 4; Handel, aria from "Alessandro;" Henschel, suite from the music to Shakspeare's "Hamlet" (conducted by the composer); Massenet, aria from "Hérodiade;" Weber, overture to "Oberon." Mrs. George Henschel will be the singer.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13.

Adamowski Quartet Concert.

The third and last concert of the Adamowski quartet took place at Union Hall last evening. For some reason the audience was very small, but made up in enthusiasm.

The first number was a quartet in G minor, No. 4, by Bazzini, consisting of Allegro giusto, Andante con moto quasi allegretto; Tempo di gavotte Allegro con fuoco. This charming quartet was given for the first time here. It abounded in melody from beginning to end, which was most happily expressed in the second movement.

The second number, "Two movements from quartet," was composed by Mr. C. M. Loeffler of the Symphony orchestra, and like the previous number was presented for the first time. It was made up of two movements Andante con variationi, Menuetto (canon l'octave), Pii presto.

The concert concluded with Beethoven's quartet, op. 18, No. 4, Allegro ma non tanto, Andante scherzo quasi allegretto, Menuetto, Allegro (finale). This final number was played with dash and spirit, and was a pleasing termination to an exceedingly enjoyable performance.

THE ADAMOWSKI QUARTET,

T. ADAMOWSKI, 1st Violin.
A. MOLDAUER, 2d Violin
MAX ZACH, Viola.
J. ADAMOWSKI, Violoncello.

FOURTH SEASON--1891-92.

THIRD SUBSCRIPTION CONCERT

(LAST OF THE SEASON.)

IN

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 12.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 104.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13, 1892.

Third of the Adamowski Quartet Concerts of the Season.

The third and last of the season's series of concerts by the Adamowski quartet was given at Union Hall last evening, and had an especial interest, by reason of the novelties included in the programme.

The hearing, for the first time, of two movements of a quartet by Mr. C. M. Loeffler of the Boston Symphony orchestra, made a prominent feature of the evening, and aroused much appreciation of the work among those present.

The movements are an "Andante con variationi" and "Menuetto (canon a l'octave)" and a "Piu presto," and both were admirably played by Mr. Adamowski and his associates. The first movement is the work of an accomplished musician rather than that of an inspired composer, the graceful phrases which form its basis being worked out, elaborated and ornamented with the skill of a master, but with all this it fails to leave much satisfaction because of its fragmentary characteristics. In the second movement Mr. Loeffler has worked in a freer style, and the results are shown in a tuneful theme admirably treated and made vastly interesting. The two examples created, on the whole, an excellent impression and a desire to hear the completed work. !

A quartet by Bazzini in G minor, No. 4, was also given its first performance here at this concert, and proved well worth a hearing, its movements being delightfully tuneful, clear and logical at all times, and worked out with excellent taste and skill. It was given a very finished performance, and created quite a good impression.

A well prepared performance of Beethoven's quartet, op. 16, No. 4, brought the concert to an end.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN–APRIL 12, 1892.

M. D'Albert's Recital.

The musical public of Baltimore had another opportunity of hearing Mr. Eugene D'Albert last evening. His piano recital took place at Albaugh's Lyceum Theater at 8 P. M., was largely attended. His program, which was arranged in perfect chronological order, as regards the dates of the different composers, excepting that Liszt, was placed after Raff, probably for climatic effect, consisted of prelude and fugue, D major, Bach; sonata, opus 109, Beethoven; Variations Serieuse, opus 54, Mendelssohn; Nocturne in B major and Grande Valse in A flat major, Chop; in suite by Raff, concluding with three pieces by Liszt—Sonetta de Petrarca, "Feux Follets" and Rhapsodie Espagnole.

The fugue in D major has been transcribed for the piano by Mr. D'Albert, and is a piece of great difficulty. The Beethovan and Mendelssohn pieces displayed his deep musicianly feeling, and his wonderful rendition of Chopin, especially the very brilliant and familiar A flat Valse, was a revelation. The Raff suite is a very beautiful composition in the fascinating style of the "Lenore" Symphony.

Boston Post

WEDNESDAY MORNING, APR. 13, 1892.

Adamowski Concert.

The third and last subscription concert by the Adamowski Quartet took place in Union Hall last evening. Those who were not present missed an evening of pleasure for the programme of three numbers was artistic and presented two novelties in the form of Bazzini's quartet in G minor. No. 4 and two movements from C. M. Loeffler's quartet; the familiar Beethoven quartet, Op. 18, No. 4, was a fitting close to a delightful entertainment.

Bazzini's composition contains frequent suggestions of Haydn and, like Haydn's music is interesting throughout.

Loeffler's quartet is clever, exceedingly clever, and one could but regret its brevity. It is well built, and repeats the good points of his suite heard here earlier in the season.

The Beethoven Quartet received the best rendition of any number on the programme. Possibly its familiarity made its interpretation more satisfactory, but it brought out the best points of this quartet of musicians. They have done excellent work in all their concerts, work to be commended for its nicety of tone, blending and its shading—both of which qualities are not easy of attainment with so small a number of instruments.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, TUESDAY, APRIL 12, 1892.

Two Hours with Eugen D'Albert.

To have an entire recital by Eugen D'Albert, two hours of music by this wonderful player in a programme as varied as it was excellent was indeed a privilege. The Lyceum Theatre was well filled last night, and by a representative audience, whose applause was readily merged into enthusiasm as the evening wore on. The pianist began his recital in tremendous style, playing his own transcription of Bach's "Prelude and Fugue," in D major, in such a way as to make the work stand out as a colossal monument to the genius of composer and player. Nothing could have been finer than the style in which he attacked the masterly work, overcame its difficulties and filled it with the fire and immensity of a soul whose lofty thoughts could find no expression so satisfactory as in the abstract power and grandeur of music. Compared with this great achievement how charming a contrast was presented by the performance of the Chopin numbers, as beautiful in the delicacy and sentiment as was the more rugged strength of the heavier work in its solidity and massiveness. Then the Beethoven sonata and the Raff suite—what language but music itself could desribe the thousand little touches, the ever-increasing power, the marvelous technique that opened up new delights, new beauties in each measure—nay almost in each note. Qualities that in usual performances seem not to have existed before in the unresponsive instrument, spring suddenly into being and create within it new power at D'Albert's touch and obey his bidding as if the piano were a part of the player. D'Albert presented a lengthy programme, which included, besides the works mentioned, Mendelssohn's "Variations Serieuses," Liszt's "Sonetta di Petrarca," "Feux Follets" Etude and "Rhapsodie Espagnole."

[180]

UNION HALL, 48 BOYLSTON STREET.

THIRD CONCERT.

TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 12, AT 8.

PROGRAMME.

QUARTET IN G MINOR, No. 4. (FIRST TIME.) BAZZINI

ALLEGRO GIUSTO.—ANDANTE CON MOTO QUASI ALLEGRETTO.—
TEMPO DI GAVOTTA.—ALLEGRO CON FUOCO.

TWO MOVEMENTS FROM QUARTET. (FIRST TIME.) C. M. LOEFFLER

ANDANTE CON VARIATIONI.—MENUETTO (CANON A L'OCTAVE).—
PIU PRESTO.

QUARTET, OP. 18, No. 4. BEETHOVEN

ALLEGRO MA NON TANTO.—ANDANTE SCHERZO QUASI ALLEGRETTO.—
MENUETTO.—ALLEGRO (FINALE).

---

his superiority to Schumann as a ballad writer; the very thing which gave Schumann his wonderful mastery over the more concise and condensed form of the "Lied," his conspicuous power of making every melodic phrase reflect exactly and specifically the emotional contents of the particular words to which it is sung, the intimate connection which exists between his melody and the emotional essence of the text, militated against his gaining an equal mastery over the more extended narrative form of the ballad. Whenever Schumann was brought face to face with a poem, his instinct as a composer led him toward the most immediate and specific expression of the text; and the development of the ballad is too extended to admit of its being set to music with this constant, minute regard for following out every varying shade of emotion, sentence by sentence, and at the same time preserving a firmly knit and coherent musical form. Now Schumann was no Wagnerian, and "infinite melody" of the Wagnerian sort, was not what he aimed at; in his eyes, musical form was to the full as important as truth of expression. He must have perceived clearly enough that, to compose a ballad all through, (durchcomponiren,) with constant regard for the music's reflecting every shade of emotion in the text, and, at the same time, to impart to his composition a finely organized and coherent musical form, would inevitably result in inflating that form to quasi-symphonic proportions, necessitating a repetition and re-repetition of words utterly out of keeping with the simplicity of the ballad. Consequently, not being willing, or perhaps not able, to abandon constant specific musical expressiveness, he too often took refuge in a style of writing half-way between arioso and recitative, which doubtless has the virtue of expressiveness, often of a rather dramatic sort, but has also the vice of lacking simplicity and musical vivacity, and of seeming singularly at variance with the true ballad spirit. He, at times, almost becomes turgid, and one has a too besetting sense of effort. There is a general lack of homeliness and naïveté. To our mind, Schumann has been far more successful in striking the right key-note in some of the most profoundly philosophical meditations in his "Faust" than in such ballads as his "Belsazar," or "Die Löwenbraut." In "Die beiden Grenadiere," he falls more nearly into the real ballad style: here the martial briskness of the principal theme, repeated, as it is, at the beginning of successive stanzas, gives a musical consistency to the whole, while the arioso portions have more definiteness of musical outline than we find in similar parts of "Belsazar." Then, too, the closing climax, with the "Marseillaise," rounds off the whole with a glorious outburst of pure, popular melody. Still, even here, we are far enough from the simple homeliness of narrative style of Loewe's "Erlkönig" or "Archibald Douglas." Just try to imagine Schumann setting Uhland's "Roland Schildtrager" to music! Loewe would have done it to perfection—indeed, he may have done so, for ought we know.

"Die Vätergruft" is the first ballad we have ever heard by Listz; it is, in a certain sense both worse and better than Schumann. Worse, from the portentous means (harmonic and otherwise) Liszt has employed; better—superficially, at least—from a [illegible] brilliant theatricalness in treatment, which might pass muster, for composer; you are free to like them or not, as the case may be, but their thoroughly personal and individual cut is indisputable. There is much genial beauty in this symphony, much that is strong and forcible, side by side with a good deal that seems obscure and rather far-fetched. The Scherzo, with its lovely Trio, seems to us the most wholly fine of the four movements; but there is great beauty, too, in the first movement, and the opening theme of the Finale is delightful. The grandiose second theme of this Finale we like less, although it would be hard to say exactly what in it fails to satisfy us. The symphony was admirably played and loudly applauded.

Beethoven's "Egmont" overture was grandly given, although we cannot like the very moderate tempo, especially the over-moderate beginning, of the Coda. Look at the matter in what light we may, we cannot but feel that a Beethoven Allegro con brio, at the close of a brilliant overture, ought to go with more headlong impetuosity. And then, that beginning the climax slow, and gradually increasing the speed as it goes on, it is utterly needless; we want to feel the kettle boiling from the first three beats. No doubt it may be claimed that Mr. Nikisch's tempo gives more dignity to this glowing peroration; but Beethoven had that of the ancient Greek in him that he was, at times, willing to throw dignity to the dogs, as in the last Prestissimo of the Ninth Symphony, which is sheer tossing up of caps and shouting; and it seems to us that this Coda of the "Egmont" overture is one of those times. We are sorry to differ with Mr. Nikisch so often on this matter of "reading;" there are even moments when we heartily wish that Wagner had never written that infernal pamphlet "Ueber das Dirigiren," much good as there is in it, too.

The next programme is: D'Albert, symphony in F major, op. 4; Handel, aria from "Alessandro;" Henschel, suite from the music to Shakspeare's "Hamlet" (conducted by the composer); Massenet, aria from "Hérodiade;" Weber, overture to "Oberon." Mrs. George Henschel will be the singer.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13.

Adamowski Quartet Concert.

The third and last concert of the Adamowski quartet took place at Union Hall last evening. For some reason the audience was very small, but made up in enthusiasm.

The first number was a quartet in G minor, No. 4, by Bazzini, consisting of Allegro giusto, Andante con moto quasi allegretto, Tempo di gavotte Allegro con fuoco. This charming quartet was given for the first time here. It abounded in melody from beginning to end, which was most happily expressed in the second movement.

The second number, "Two movements from quartet," was composed by Mr. C. M. Loeffler of the Symphony orchestra, and like the previous number was presented for the first time. It was made up of two movements Andante con variationi, Menuetto (canon l'octave), Piu presto.

The concert concluded with Beethoven's quartet, op. 18, No. 4, Allegro ma non tanto, Andante scherzo quasi allegretto, Menuetto, Allegro (Finale). This final number [illegible]

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 104.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13, 1892.

Third of the Adamowski Quartet Concerts of the Season.

The third and last of the season's series of concerts by the Adamowski quartet was given at Union Hall last evening, and had an especial interest, by reason of the novelties included in the programme.

The hearing, for the first time, of two movements of a quartet by Mr. C. M. Loeffler of the Boston Symphony orchestra, made a prominent feature of the evening, and aroused much appreciation of the work among those present.

The movements are an "Andante con variationi" and "Menuetto (canon a l'octave)" and a "Piu presto," and both were admirably played by Mr. Adamowski and his associates. The first movement is the work of an accomplished musician rather than that of an inspired composer, the graceful phrases which form its basis being worked out, elaborated and ornamented with the skill of a master, but with all this it fails to leave much satisfaction because of its fragmentary characteristics. In the second movement Mr. Loeffler has worked in a freer style, and the results are shown in a tuneful theme admirably treated and made vastly interesting. The two examples created, on the whole, an excellent impression and a desire to hear the completed work.

A quartet by Bazzini in G minor, No. 4, was also given its first performance here at this concert, and proved well worth a hearing, its movements being delightfully tuneful, clear and logical at all times, and worked out with excellent taste and skill. It was given a very finished performance, and created quite a good impression.

A well prepared performance of Beethoven's quartet, op. 16, No. 4, brought the concert to an end.

BALTIMORE AMERICAN–
APRIL 12, 1892.

M. D'Albert's Recital.

The musical public of Baltimore had another opportunity of hearing Mr. Eugene D'Albert last evening. His piano recital took place at Albaugh's Lyceum Theater at 8 P. M., was largely attended. His program, which was arranged in perfect chronological order, as regards the dates of the different composers, excepting that Liszt, was placed after Raff, probably for climsatic effect, consisted of prelude and fugue, D major, Bach; sonata, opus 109, Beethoven: Variations Serieuse, opus 54, Mendelssohn; Nocturne in B major and Grande Valse in A flat major, Chop; in suite by Raff, concluding with three pieces by Liszt—Sonetta de Petrarca, "Feux Follets" and Rhapsodie Espagnole.

The fugue in D major has been transcribed for the piano by Mr. D'Albert, and is a piece of great difficulty. The Beethovan and Mendelssohn pieces displayed his deep musicianly feeling, and his wonderful rendition of Chopin, especially the very brilliant and familiar A flat Valse, was a revelation. The Raff suite is a very [illegible] composition in the fascinating style of the "Lenore" Symphony.

Boston Post

WEDNESDAY MORNING, APR. 13, 1892.

Adamowski Concert.

The third and last subscription concert by the Adamowski Quartet took place in Union Hall last evening. Those who were not present missed an evening of pleasure for the programme of three numbers was artistic and presented two novelties in the form of Bazzini's quartet in G minor. No. 4 and two movements from C. M. Loeffler's quartet; the familiar Beethoven quartet, Op. 18, No. 4, was a fitting close to a delightful entertainment.

Bazzini's composition contains frequent suggestions of Haydn and, like Haydn's music is interesting throughout.

Loeffler's quartet is clever, exceedingly clever, and one could but regret its brevity. It is well built, and repeats the good points of his suite heard here earlier in the season.

The Beethoven Quartet received the best rendition of any number on the programme. Possibly its familiarity made its interpretation more satisfactory, but it brought out the best points of this quartet of musicians. They have done excellent work in all their concerts, work to be commended for its nicety of tone, blending and its shading—both of which qualities are not easy of attainment with so small a number of instruments.

THE SUN.

BALTIMORE, TUESDAY, APRIL 12, 1892.

Two Hours with Eugen D'Albert.

To have an entire recital by Eugen D'Albert, two hours of music by this wonderful player in a programme as varied as it was excellent was indeed a privilege. The Lyceum Theatre was well filled last night, and by a representative audience, whose applause was readily merged into enthusiasm as the evening wore on. The pianist began his recital in tremendous style, playing his own transcription of Bach's "Prelude and Fugue," in D major, in such a way as to make the work stand out as a colossal monument to the genius of composer and player. Nothing could have been finer than the style in which he attacked the masterly work, overcame its difficulties and filled it with the fire and immensity of a soul whose lofty thoughts could find no expression so satisfactory as in the abstract power and grandeur of music. Compared with this great achievement how charming a contrast was presented by the performance of the Chopin numbers, as beautiful in the delicacy and sentiment as was the more rugged strength of the heavier work in its solidity and massiveness. Then the Beethoven sonata and the Raff suite—what language but music itself could desribe the thousand little touches, the ever-increasing power, the marvelous technique that opened up new delights, new beauties in each measure—nay almost in each note. Qualities that in usual performances seem not to have existed before in the unresponsive instrument, spring suddenly into being and create within it new power at D'Albert's touch and obey his bidding as if the piano were a part of the player. D'Albert presented a lengthy programme, which included, besides the works mentioned, Mendelssohn's "Variations serieuses," Liszt's "Sonetta di Petrarca," "Feux Follets" [illegible]

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13, 1892.

The Last Concert of the Adamowski Quartette.

The third concert of the Adamowski Quartette was given last evening in Union Hall. It was the last one of the season. The programme was as follows:

Quartette in G minor, No. 4 (first time)	Bazzini
Two movements from quartette (first time)	C. M. Loeffler
Quartette, op. 18, No. 4	Beethoven

Bazzini is an Italian who, although he studied carefully German composers, is not unfaithful to his country. Sgambati and other men of the radical modern Italian school fashion their works after the ultra-modern patterns that are found in Germany, and they seem to disdain the pure and flowing melody that is the birthright of the Italian musician. But Bazzini combines graceful melody with German thoughtfulness. The quartette played last evening for the first time is a spontaneous and delightful work. The themes of the first movement are fresh, and they are worked out in a modernized Haydn spirit. The second movement is particularly grateful to the first violin, but it does not degenerate into a solo with accompaniment. The movement that follows, in the tempo of a gavotte, is artfully simple, and in the passages of imitation there is no trace of the pedagogue. The finale is the weakest part of the quartette, and there is nothing striking in the themes or the development; but it is well made and thoroughly respectable. Bazzini in this quartette does not spin out his thoughts. He knows when he is through speaking—a rare talent in these days of manufactured music. Mr. Adamowski is to be heartily thanked for the introduction of this melodious, carefully considered work; a work that was thought out for a string quartette, not thumped at a pianoforte and then arranged for strings.

Two movements from an unpublished quartette, by Mr. C. M. Loeffler of the Symphony Orchestra, were also heard for the first time. The andante and the variations show scholarship and fine taste. The theme is of the character of plain-song; the variations suggest the thought that they were written when the composer had not entirely escaped from contrapuntal studies on a cantus firmus in one of the old modes. They are exercises, in a certain sense, and exercises that are creditable to the author.

The playing of the members of the quartette was a marked improvement on the work done by them at the first and the second of these concerts. The intonation was more pure, although Mr. Joseph Adamowski occasionally strayed from the true pitch. The attack was more precise; the dynamic marks were more carefully observed, and the ensemble was the work of four players who were willing to subordinate self. There was a repose that in former concerts was sadly missed. Mr. Timothy Adamowski has made rapid strides as a solo player during the last two years. It is a pleasure to add that in the concert of last evening he showed a willingness to be one of four, and he refrained from any attempt at individual display. The Bazzini quartette and the Loeffler movements were well played; and in the andante of the Beethoven quartette the advance made by the players was perhaps most clearly seen.

PHILIP HALE.

THE MORNING HERALD

Baltimore

TUESDAY, APRIL 12.

D'ALBERT RECITAL.

A Very Difficult Programme and Several Recalls.

The recital of Eugen D'Albert in the Lyceum last night can well be termed the musical event of the season in this city. Paderewski had a larger audience, but it was neither as critical nor as enthusiastic as that of last night. This was the third visit of the artist to Baltimore, but the first wherein he appeared the sole performer.

The programme was a substantial one from beginning to end, and the way it was rendered gained for the famous pianist an ovation. D'Albert can only be compared to D'Albert. He is a hard worker and shews it in every movement, but so great is the power and technique of the man that he appears as fresh when finished as when he begun.

Bach's famous prelude and fugue for organ transcribed by D'Albert for piano was the opening number, and was given with that fire and impetuosity so characteristic of the performer and by which he gained the title of the Little Giant. Beethoven's sonata, Opus 109, with its three quaint movements and so rarely taken in its proper tempos, was played in a like superb manner. Mendelssohn's "Variations Serieuses," a comparative novelty to Baltimore audiences, perhaps on account of its difficulties, followed, and at its conclusion the performer was thrice recalled, and responded by playing the Strauss-Tansig waltz, "Man Lebt Nur Einmal."

When here with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last month D'Albert played a concerto by Chopin, and was criticised by some, who asserted that he displayed a lack of the poetry so necessary in these compositions, but the manner in which he gave Chopin's Nocturne No. 3 and Valse Opus 42 last night proved that he has ample poetic feeling. In Raff's Suite Opus 91, the fifth number, the artist was seen at his best. The four movements of this work bring in almost every technical difficulty.

The programme concluded with three gems by Liszt, and hardly had the last notes of the Spanish rhapsodie died away before the audience broke forth into a storm of applause and demanded another selection. D'Albert accommodatingly resumed his seat at the piano and played the Chopin Berceuse, the only one this composer ever wrote. D'Albert's style of playing is in some instances very much like that of Paderewski. He has the Kullak movement and the same peculiar sweeping touch.

1892 Dispatch - Pittsburg Pa

THE MUSIC WORLD.

Apr. 10

Concerts of the Mozarts to Take the Place of a May Festival.

QUALITY INSTEAD OF QUANTITY.

Paderewski Found America Rather Too Much for His Strength.

A BUDGET OF GENERAL NEWS ITEMS

Although no May Festival of the regulation pattern is scheduled for Pittsburg next month, the season of 1891–92 will not lack a finale of the very highest artistic quality, and of quite sufficient quantity. The three festival concerts to be given by the Mozart Club at Old City Hall, May 12, 13 and 14, will afford as extensive a feast of the best music as even an enthusiastic music lover really cares, or ought to digest, in one week.

Pittsburg's own crack chorus will again be assisted by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, everywhere conceded to be the finest body of players in the country, with Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor. It will be the first time that the Mozart Club has given a series of three concerts with a complete orchestra. The out-of-town soloists will be: Mr. Eugen D'Albert, whose right to rank as one of the best, if not the very best, of living pianists has lately been proven in Pittsburg; Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, two of the most delightful singers of the day, famous throughout the musical world; Miss Adelaide Foresman, whose rich contralto has twice found favor here, and Mr. Gardner Lamson, of Boston, a bass enjoying high repute in the East. Besides, there are several world-famous artists in the orchestra—such as Mr. Franz Kneisel and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, for instance—whom we may hope to hear in solo numbers.

On Thursday evening will come the symphony concert, in which Mr. Nikisch and his peerless band will be assisted by Mr. D'Albert. Friday evening will open with a brief miscellany supplied by Mr. Henschel and the orchestra, closing with Gade's massive choral cantata, "Zion," with chorus, orchestra and Mr. E. H. Dermitt, baritone soloist. Saturday evening will be devoted to Mendelssohn's great oratorio, "Elijah," in which the chorus and orchestra will be aided by Mrs. Henschel, Miss Foresman, Mr. Paul Zimmerman and Mr. Lamson.

It is altogether probable that the Mozart Club will also arrange for a chamber music matinee on Friday, May 13, at the club's rooms, by the Kneisel quartet, which enjoys the same supremacy among string quartets that is held among orchestras by the body to which these four artists belong. They are: Franz Kneisel, first violin; L. Snecenski, second violin; Otto Roth, viola, and Alwin Schroeder, violincello. In its own way such a performance will be just as welcome, upon artistic grounds, as that of the orchestra itself.

Considering also the probability that one of those uniquely delightful song recitals by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will be given here about the same time, it will be seen that this season need not be ashamed to compare its finale with any of its predecessors. Indeed, it is doubtful if Pittsburg has ever before had a bunch of concerts and recitals so fully representative of the best in musical art, and each so clearly entitled to its superlative among others of the kind.

⁂

Music From Uuder the Sea.

Among last night's London cablegram's to THE DISPATCH came the following:

The negotiations which have been proceeding for some time between D'Oyly Carte and Signor Lago have now been abandoned. There is no likelihood of the Royal English Opera being reopened in England at present, and Carte's magnificent building will continue to be a white elephant upon his hands. Sir Arthur Sullivan's illness will also probably retard for a long time the new comic opera upon which he has been engaged. Some portion of this work has already been completed, but it is not at all improbable that the work may have to be abandoned entirely. Sir Arthur Sullivan's illness is of a mysterious nature that has not up to the present been understood.

OF Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel's third and supplementary song recital in New York, the Musical Courier says: "The public were so charmed with these artists' incomparable interpretations that they could have sung double the quantity and yet the audience would not have had enough."

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 105.

THURSDAY, APRIL 14, 1892.

The Commemorative "Messiah" by the Handel and Haydn.

The 150th anniversary of the original production of Handel's "Messiah" was commemorated last evening by a performance of the oratorio at Music Hall by the Handel and Haydn Society, the work having its 85th presentation by the society on this occasion.

The chorus were assisted in this performance by Mrs. Genevra Johnstone Bishop, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. Myron W. Whitney, bass; Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor, and Mr. B. J. Lang, organist.

Possibly the art of season characteristics (the Messiah and Christmas having come to be synonymous) of the performance may have added to its effect, but certain it is that the popular old oratorio has not had a more all-round enjoyable hearing in many years than on this occasion, the chorus simply surpassing their best work, and the quartet of soloists proving to be well chosen.

The singers of the society rallied with almost unbroken ranks, and the greeting given their veteran conductor, Mr. Zerrahn, seemed at the outset to inspire the chorus to its best work and to sustain its efforts throughout the evening. Such chorus singing was well calculated to make the tried and true conductor happy, and he appeared to enjoy the splendid fruits of his work in the rehearsals quite as keenly as the audience.

The spirited work done by the society has not often been responded to more quickly than in last evening's performance, and the applause which followed the "For Unto Us" and the great "Hallelujah" was most worthily bestowed.

In the work of the soloists, Mrs. Bishop easily took the prominent place, and she gave a most satisfying interpretation of the several numbers of the soprano role. Her rarely intelligent and artistic delivery of the recitative, "There Were Shepherds," first arrested the attention of her audience, and the pleasant anticipations aroused by the singer in this number were fully realized in all her subsequent work. The "Rejoice Greatly" was sung with admirable taste, and in the great aria, "I Know That My Redeemer," Mrs. Bishop gave an exhibition of dramatic singing that quite captivated her audience.

Mrs. Alves proved a thoroughly conscientious artist, and the beauty and purity of her tones gave especial pleasure in all her work. While her voice is lacking in dramatic power, it is used with such admirable skill and good taste that it gives a rare degree of satisfaction. The great test aria, "He Was Despised," was given a fine, artistic delivery in every way, and well merited the applause gained by the singer at its conclusion.

Mr. Lloyd begun his evening's work very badly, but ended in a blaze of vocal glory that well nigh removed all thoughts of his ill success in the opening numbers. His voice at first was throaty and disagreeable, despite the perfection of art shown in its use. Even in the recitative "Thy Rebuke," there were unpleasant evidences of a recent experience with London fog, but the "Behold and See" showed a gradual mastery of the difficulty, and when he sung "Thou Shalt Break Them," his voice rang out with such bell like tones that he found himself at its conclusion between two waves of enthusiasm, the chorus and orchestra vieing with the audience in their demonstrations of delight.

Mr. Whitney was the same solid, reliable, artistic and otherwise enjoyable singer as ever, and when he came to the favorite, "Why Do the Nations," the audience gave vent to its pent-up enthusiasm over his work, and rewarded him most generously for the pleasure caused by his singing.

With the symphony men led by Mr. Kneisel and with Pierre Muller as trumpeter, there was no exception to be taken to the work of the orchestra.

The reappearance of D'Albert at Music Hall next Monday afternoon will make a most interesting event. He is to play his famous Beethoven recital programme, which has created such an impression in other cities. Single recital seats are now on sale at Music Hall.

Patrons of the public rehearsals of the Symphony concerts will do well to remember that this week's rehearsal occurs this afternoon instead of on Friday, as usual. Schumann's first symphony is to be played in place of that by D'Albert announced, the delay in the delivery of the parts for the new work having necessitated this change.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING APRIL 14, 1892.

"The Messiah" Given by the Handel and Haydn Society.

Last evening was the 150th anniversary of Handel's original production of his oratorio, "The Messiah." The Handel and Haydn Society celebrated the event by giving a memorial performance of the work in Music Hall, with the assistance of Mrs. Genevra Johnstone Bishop, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. Myron W. Whitney, bass; Mr. B. J. Lang, organist, and an orchestra of players picked from the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The work of the society was specially good in the choruses "For Unto Us a Child is Born," and "All We Like His Sheep." The florid passages in these numbers were sung with excellent precision and effect.

The other choruses were sung in the traditional style of the society. Many of the tempos were too slow, however, and not only was this true of the choruses, but in the contralto air, "He Shall Feed His Flock," the larghetto was changed to a decided adagio, a change which was a detriment to the character and effect of the number; this was also noticeable in "I Know That My Redeemer Liveth." Of the soloists, Mrs. Alves seemed to retain the best general balance of artistic excellence throughout the evening, and her work was cordially received and approved by the audience. She is a very faithful, conscientious singer, is thoroughly musical and intelligent in her rendering of the score and is withal a worthy artist. Mrs. Bishop was rather disappointing in many ways. Her phrasing was not always artistic, and she possesses an uncertainty of intonation and a fault of feeling for the upper notes that detracts from the general effects. She is also unfortunate in her overuse of the portamento. Mr. Whitney sang in his usual style, his best work being done in the air, "Why do the Nations Rage?"

Mr. Lloyd sang as if he had succumbed to the treacherous east winds of Boston; his voice was rather hoarse and cloudy during the early part of the evening, but in the aria, "Thou Shalt Break Them," he seemed to throw off this feeling and sang with a nerve and spirit that woke the audience to a high pitch of enthusiasm. It was by far his best work of the evening. After hearing Handel's oratorios given with all the modern improvements of mammoth chorus, and enlarged orchestras one sometimes longs to hear them performed once with a small chorus of perhaps 30 voices, accompanied by a small orchestra. These were the conditions imposed upon Handel so far as we have any means of knowing, and it was under these conditions that he wrote. Would it not be a profitable experiment to give us a performance of the "Messiah" under these conditions? It seems as though the result would be gratifying in the extreme to many of the musical people of Boston.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, APRIL 14.

"THE MESSIAH."

Eighty-fifth Performance of Handel's Great Oratorio by the Handel and Haydn Society.

On the 13th of April, 1742, Handel produced his immortal work, "The Messiah," in Dublin, and last evening a commemorative performance of the oratorio was given in Music Hall by the Handel and Haydn Society.

The performance was an extra one, the great work having been given in this city on Dec. 20, 1891. The solo talent engaged for last evening made the production specially memorable, the singers being: Mrs. Genevra Johnstone Bishop, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, contralto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; and Mr. Myron W. Whitney, bass.

The veteran leader, Carl Zerrahn, was the conductor. Mr. B. J. Lang was in his accustomed place in the organ loft, and the orchestra was composed of Boston Symphony men.

The hall was crowded, and the soloists, chorus, leader and orchestra were warmly applauded for their fine interpretation of Handel's masterpiece. The performance was much better than that given in December.

The work of the chorus and the orchestra showed a decided improvement on the last presentation. The accompaniments to the solos were not marred by careless playing, and the "Pastoral Symphony" was most delicately given by the strings, narrowly escaping an encore.

Mr. Lloyd sang the tenor numbers with the skill of a rarely sympathetic artist, although his opening recitative and solo sounded somewhat harsh and unmusical. His numbers in the second part, though, redeemed his first shortcoming, and the aria, "Behold and see!" was sung with grand effect, his voice being pure, and his intonation and phrasing all that could be desired.

Mrs. Johnstone Bishop made a very favorable impression, and sang exceedingly well. The famous "I know that my Redeemer liveth" was delivered with dramatic fervor and without exaggeration.

Mrs. Alves' execution was very satisfactory, and her fine contralto voice was used with excellent results. "He Was Despised" would have been more enjoyable without the tremolo, which was quite noticeable when her voice was forced.

Mr. Whitney's work was as ever, grand. His voice was in excellent condition, and his solo, "The People Walked in Darkness," was the best vocal effort of the evening.

Tomorrow evening, Good Friday, Bach's "St. Matthew Passion Music," 162d anniversary of the original production at Leipzig. Soloists: Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mrs. Amalie Joachim, Edward Lloyd, George J. Parker and Gardner S. Lamson. April 17, Easter, "The Creation;" Mme. Emma Albani, Edward Lloyd and Myron W. Whitney.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, APRIL 14, 1892.

"THE MESSIAH."

Its First Performance in Dublin 150 Years Ago.

The Men and Women Singers That Took Part.

Dramatic and Musical Notes and Gossip of Interest.

The first public performance of "The Messiah" took place in the New Music Hall, in Fishamble street, Dublin, Tuesday, the 13th day of April, 1742. The anniversary, or the mind-day, of this event was celebrated last evening in Music Hall by the Handel and Haydn Society. To speak in detail of the merits of a work that is so familiar would be an impertinence to the reader. Nor is it necessary to enter into a minute description of the performance of last evening. Let us rather turn our attention to the circumstances that attended the production of the oratorio in Dublin.

⁂

In 1741 Handel bade farewell to the stage. In 1737 he was a ruined man financially; he was attacked by paralysis, accompanied by nervous prostration; and although in the following year he recovered in a measure from his financial loss, he saw that his career as an operatic composer was finished. He was tired out by the rebellion of Italian artists, the rivalry with other managers, and the fickleness of popular taste. He could say with the jaded Preacher of Jerusalem: "I gat me men singers and women singers, and the delights of the sons of men, as musical instruments, and that of all sorts; and behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun." The success of the "Beggars' Opera" was a deadly blow to composers of the Italian school. It became the fashion to decry the works of Handel. Even as late as the appearance of "Tom Jones" we find allusions to this fashion. "It was Mr. Western's custom every afternoon, as soon as he was drunk, to hear his daughter play on the harpsichord; for he was a great lover of music, and perhaps, had he lived in town, might have passed as a connoisseur; for he always excepted against the finest compositions of Mr Handel." But Fielding adds that Sophia would never willingly have played any music but Handel's.

⁂

"Diidamia" was his last Italian opera, and after its production in January, 1741, Handel devoted himself chiefly to sacred music. Some time in this year he was invited to Ireland by the Duke of Devonshire, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, "for the entertainment of the nobility and gentry." There was also correspondence between Handel and the governors of three benevolent institutions in Dublin: the Charitable Musical Society for the Relief of Imprisoned Debtors, Mercer's Hospital and the Charitable Infirmary. "The Messiah" was composed and brought out for the benefit of these charities. It was written in London between the 22d of August and the 12th or 14th of September, 1741.

⁂

Horatio Townsend, Esq., a barrister-at-law, wrote an entertaining account of the visit of Handel to Dublin, and the few gaps in the story of the first performance of the oratorio have been filled by Prof. Dowden's discovery in 1891 of the word book of "The Messiah," printed by George Faulkner in 1742, and sold for a sixpence. Before this discovery, it was universally believed that there was no copy of the libretto in existence.

⁂

According to Townsend, the condition of prisoners in Irish jails was similar to the wretched plight of the prisoners in England and Scotland at the same time. A man was unable to pay a trifling debt. He was cast into prison; there he was without medical aid, and often without food. Appeals to charity were frequent. Cases of death from starvation were recorded. To carry out the plans of the Charitable Musical Society, some of the members subscribed for the building of the Music Hall, which Handel described as "a charming room." This hall was first opened about four weeks before he set out on his journey from London, Nov. 4, 1741. He stopped at Chester, and Dr. Burney, then a boy, watched him curiously as he smoked a pipe "over a dish of coffee." Detained by adverse winds, he arrived in Dublin Nov. 18. Faulkner's Journal of the next week announced the arrival of "Signiora Avolio, an excellent singer, who comes to this Kingdom to perform in Mr. Handel's musical entertainment." Mrs. Cibber must have appeared about the same time, for she was seen early in December at the Theatre Royal.

⁂

Handel gave concerts in December, January, February and March. Without examining the nature of these concerts, let us inquire into the character of the chief singers and the chorus that took part in "The Messiah." The principal performers were Mrs. Cibber and Mrs. Avolio. Of the latter little is known. Handel wrote Jennens, "She pleases extraordinary." She sang in his oratorios in London in 1743. At the first performance of "The Messiah" she sang "Rejoice Greatly." "I know that my Redeemer liveth" was sung by Mrs. Maclaine, the wife of Handel's organist.

⁂

The contralto was Susanna Maria Cibber, the sister of Dr. Arne, the wife of that squinting blackguard, Theophilus Cibber. The sad story of her marriage is known to all that are acquainted with the history of the drama. "Her beauty did not so much consist in regularity of feature as in variety and power of expression; with this, she had symmetry of form." As an actress she was regarded as unapproachable in Ophelia. As a singer, she moved by the unaffected pathos of her delivery; her voice was of limited range and of moderate power. When Delaney heard her in Dublin in "The Messiah," he exclaimed, "Woman, thy sins be forgiven thee." More sinned against than sinning in life, she now lies buried in the cloisters of Westminster Abbey.

⁂

The male singers were all choral singers at the two cathedral churches, Christ Church and St. Patrick's. The tenor was John Baily. The principal bass was John Mason. The alto was William Lambe, and he sang "Behold a virgin" and "Thou shalt break them." Joseph Ward joined Baily in the duet "O death." Handel did not secure the services of the choirs without difficulty. In 1741 Jonathan Swift, the Dean of St. Patrick's, addressed an exhortation to the Sub-Dean and Chapter, commenting on the conduct of certain members of the choir for "singing and fiddling at a club of fiddlers." But in 1742 the reason of the great Dean was wholly subverted, "and his rage became absolute madness." He would neither eat nor drink in the presence of any one, and he would pace the floor ten hours a day. Wynne, the Sub-Dean, ruled in his stead, and he allowed the choir to assist Handel in his benevolent undertaking. Townsend gives the names of some of the men [illegible] two boys. [illegible] According to Dr. Quin, "Dubourg, with several good instrumental performers, composed a very respectable orchestra." Now, as Dubourg was "master of Her Majesty's Band of Music in Ireland," in all probability the State band was part of this orchestra. Maclaine played the organ, Handel conducted the performance and played organ concertos between the parts of the oratorio.

⁂

The public rehearsal was April 8, 1742. Faulkner's Journal said that the audience was "grand, polite and crowded;" the oratorio "was allowed by the greatest judges to be the finest composition of music that ever was heard." The Dublin News-Letter spoke of it as follows: "This elegant entertainment was conducted in the most regular manner and to the entire satisfaction of the most crowded and polite assembly." Tuesday, April 13, the doors of Music Hall were opened at 11 A. M. and the performance began at noon. Tickets were a half-guinea apiece. There were above 700 people in the hall, for the women came without hoops and the men without swords, and so there was extra room for one hundred. The sum collected amounted to about £400. Faulkner's Journal spoke as follows: "The sublime, the grand and the tender, adapted to the most elevated, majestic and moving words, conspired to transport and charm the ravished heart and ear. It is but justice to Mr. Handel that the world should know he generously gave the money arising from this grand performance to be equally shared by the Society for Relieving Prisoners, the Charitable Infirmary and Mercer's Hospital, for which they will ever gratefully remember his name." The oratorio was repeated May 29 of the same year. "In order to keep the room as cool as possible, a pane of glass will be removed from the top of each of the windows," was a sentence in the announcement. Handel sailed from Dublin Aug. 13, 1742. "The Messiah" was first given in London at Covent Garden, March 23, 1743.

⁂

No one now living has ever heard this oratorio as Handel wrote it. We hear it as Robert Franz thinks it should have been written. In this connection it is interesting to note the fact that Mr. Walter Damrosch, as conductor of the New York Oratorio Society, intends to give this oratorio in Music Hall, New York, April 30, without any of the additional orchestral accompaniments of Mozart and Franz. The violin parts will be strengthened by oboes, in the relation of one oboe to every three violins; there will be a bassoon to each 'cello, and another to each double bass. The original Handelian trumpet parts will be used, "and the organ will complete the necessary harmonies." In the organ part, however, lies the great difficulty. In 1759 two horn parts were used in the orchestra at the performance at the Foundling Hospital. But these parts have disappeared, unfortunately, for the tradition is that they were written by Handel.

⁂

It may be said in general of the performance of last evening that the distinguishing feature was the work of the chorus. This was admirable in quality of tone, in general precision of attack, in observance of dynamic contrasts. The smoothness of the roulades showed the virtuosoship of the singers as a body, and the intonation was excellent. The choral work was, in a word, worthy of the anniversary of the birth of the oratorio and the death of the composer. And yet it would be easy to quarrel with Mr. Zerrahn over the question of the proper tempo of certain numbers of "The Messiah." Surely the allegro of the overture was taken at too slow a pace. The chorus "And the glory of the Lord" was too slow; there was no trace of exultation; the performance was therefore without spirit, rigid; it dragged. The pastoral symphony, the air "He shall feed His flock," and the air "I know that my Redeemer liveth," suffered certainly in consequence of the slowness of the tempo in each case; and there were other similar instances. Larghetto was too often confounded with largo. Although the statement may be regarded as blasphemy, I do not believe that Mrs. Cibber ever sang "He was despised," in the snail movement of last evening. It is the fashion to treat "I know that my Redeemer liveth," as though it were of funereal solemnity. Now it is not necessary in order to thoroughly appreciate the spirit of the air to discuss the question of the proper meaning of "Redeemer." Job may have used the term, as Virgil's Dido, in the sense of an earthly avenger; or, as many believe, he proclaimed boldly the immortality of the soul; all this is immaterial. Handel's air is a defiant, brilliant expression of personal belief in the future life and the future happiness. It admits of bold declamation; it demands a grand crescendo of musical faith. Sentimentality and subdued feeling, pretty tricks played with the tempo to gain a cheap effect are out of place.

⁂

The solo singers were Mrs. Genevra Johnstone Bishop, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney, bass. Mrs. Bishop was wholly inadequate. Her voice is nasal. Her pronunciation and enunciation are defective and unpleasant. Her intonation last evening was not always above reproach. Her voice is naturally flexible, as was seen in her bravura work. Her tone production, her attack, her breathing and her phrasing cannot be praised; and she did not show a degree of musical intelligence sufficient to offset her lack of technical skill. Mrs. Alves strengthened the favorable impression made by her on former occasions. She sang with taste and skill. At times she forced her tones to gain effect, and the result was disagreeable; but as a whole her performance was worthy of warm praise. Mr. Lloyd was evidently not in condition to do himself justice. He was hoarse. Still he often showed himself the thorough artist, and in "Thou shalt break them" he sang most skillfully a phrase of amazing length. Perhaps he has traditional license for his alteration of the last measures of the same air, but his version is not an improvement on Handel's text. Mr. Whitney was heartily applauded for his singing of numbers that have for a long time in this city been identified with him.

⁂

There was a large audience, and the applause fell, like the rain, on the just and the unjust. Bach's Passion Music (Saint Matthew) will be given Good Friday evening, with Mrs. Henschel, Mrs. Joachim and Messrs. Lloyd, Parker, Henschel and Lamson as the solo singers.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Post.

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 14, 1892.

The memorial performance of "The Messiah" was given in Music Hall last evening, the 150th anniversary of its original production by Handel. That grand musical body, the Handel and Haydn Society, a large orchestra, with Franz Kneisel as principal; B. J. Lang, organist, and a quartet of soloists gave the familiar work with all its old-time beauty, although many with whom the work is a favorite missed a few of the most enjoyable numbers, which were sacrificed that the performance might be kept within the time usually allotted to concerts.

The work of both chorus and orchestra was worthy of the highest praise. The chorus numbers were characterized by precision of attack, perfect balance of the parts, good phrasing, and correct expression. The orchestra played in the excellent manner characteristic of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With the exception of Edward Lloyd, who is a thorough artist, the soloists did not give satisfaction. Myron Whitney did some admirable execution in the air, "The people that walked in darkness," but the most difficult bass solo, and the most interesting to many, "Why do the nations so furiously rage," was not well done. Both his execution and phrasing were faulty, although his tones were rich and full, true to pitch and full of dramatic feeling.

Mrs. Alves sang with good taste and feeling, but her performance was not what one might expect from her work in the Beach Mass. Unfortunately all of the alto solos were a strain upon the weakest part of her vocal register. Yet her numbers were all given in good taste, and with much feeling. Her interpretation of "He Shall Feed His Flock" was really fine.

Mrs. Bishop was somewhat of a disappointment. The quality of her voice is not pleasing; her method, or rather methods, of tone delivery are poor. She often phrases awkwardly, and sometimes is faulty in attack, yet her high sustained notes were good. Her voice was not wholly free from the obnoxious tremolo, and many faults apparent in her first solos were entirely lacking in the latter part of the evening.

Mr. Lloyd bore away the honors of the evening. His voice is a high, clear tenor of purest quality, his method is true, his phrasing artistic and his whole performance was a source of real pleasure. His recitative "He That Dwelleth in Heaven," and the air which follows, were by far the best features of the concert. Special mention should be made of the always beautiful Pastoral symphony as it was given last evening, without a fault from beginning to end.

Friday night—Good Friday—Bach's Passion Music, with Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mme Joachim, Edward Lloyd, George J. Parker, Georg Henschel and Gardiner Lamson, will be given as a fitting observance of the day.

THE BALTIMORE NEWS.

PUBLISHED BY
THE EVENING NEWS PUBLISHING COMPANY OF BALTIMORE CITY.
Office No. 219 East Baltimore street.

TUESDAY EVENING, APRIL 12, 1892.

D'ALBERT WINS A TRIUMPH.

The Great Pianist Arouses Intense Enthusiasm at His Recital.

D'Albert's recital last evening at the Lyceum Theatre was a musical event not soon to be forgotten. His playing aroused the utmost enthusiasm. Recalls were readily numbered by the dozen; and, although the programme was taxing both to nerve and muscular endurance, he responded to encores, one of which, the Strauss-Lausig waltz, after the Raff suite, might have floored a giant, yet the unsatisfied audience seemed almost determined to have something further before allowing him a moment's rest. His work began with the Bach prelude and fugue D major, composed for organ, and transcribed by D'Albert for the piano. This he followed with the great Beethoven Sonata quasi fantasia, opus 109, and ended the first division of his programme with a marvellous rendition of the Mendelssohn Variations Serieuses. He was recalled by a storm of applause, which did not subside until he had reappeared and bowed his acknowledgments a number of times.

The middle portion of his programme consisted of two Chopin numbers, nocturne, opus 9, No. 3, and valse opus, 42. These works aroused the audience to a high pitch of excitement, but the Raff Suite following created a furore. As an encore he played the waltz "Man liebt nur einmal," which Padesewski had on his progaamme but did not play.

After a short rest D'Albert appeared again as fresh as ever and gave as a finish three characteristic works by the greatest of all piano composers, Liszt. The first was a "Sonetta di Petrarca," full to the brim of poetic sentiment, and D'Albert's rendition showed that nothing in dreamland is beyond his comprehension. Then came the "Feux Follets," or "Will-o'-the-Wisp" Etude, presenting another phase of Liszt's limitless imagination and D'Albert's technical ability. The piano keys seemed to be blown upon rather than touched by the fingers, and the darting melody played hide and seek in all parts of the house. He ended his programme with the Liszt Spanish Rhapsody, which, too, taxes all the powers of a player at once. But to D'Albert there are no piano difficulties of any kind. Young, strong, bold and sure, he plays like a giant, and moves only to conquer. At the close of the number the audience sat still, as if determined not to leave the place, and, after responding to a number of recalls, D'Albert reminded at least the mothers present of their children at home by giving perhaps the most perfect rendition of the Chopin cradle song that was ever heard in this city.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, APRIL 14, 1892.

Music Hall: Handel and Haydn Society.

The Handel and Haydn Society gave an extra concert in the Music Hall last evening, on the occasion of the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the original production of Handel's "Messiah" in Dublin, Ireland. Of course, the concert was devoted to a performance of "The Messiah." The society was assisted by the Boston Symphony orchestra (Mr. Franz Kneisel leading first violin), and by the following solo singers: Mrs. Genevra Johnstone Bishop (soprano), Mrs. Carl Alves (contralto), Mr. Edward Lloyd (tenor), and Mr. Myron W. Whitney (bass). Mrs. Carl Zerrahn conducted, Mr. B. J. Lang presided at the organ, and Mr. Pierre Müller played the trumphet obligato in "The trumpet shall sound." The oratorio was given, in so far as the additional accompaniments were concerned, according to Robert Franz's score.

After the marked improvement in the Handel and Haydn chorus, which now dates from some years back and seems to have become permanent, about the only thing to record of a performance of "The Messiah" is the way in which the solos were sung. In this department Mr. Lloyd must first claim our attention; certainly he can now stand as almost the model Handel singer; not only is his voice delightful and his style exceptionally fine, but his long experience and prestige give a certain authority to all he does. Even when one is forced to criticise him one does so with respect. To our mind he, like almost all English oratorio singers, tends to sing recitative rather too slow—and, not to be unduly special in our criticism, we must add that we have found the same fault, if fault it be, in most American singers. But this is the only point on which we are inclined to differ with him, as a matter of taste. We have no inclination to quarrel with his high A at the end of "Thou shalt break them:" although Handel did not write the note, it seems none the less to belong there, by a sort of divine right, and we doubt if Handel himself would have objected to it; still, it seems to us that Mr. Lloyd's leading up to it with a prolonged high G-sharp, on the second syllable of "potter's" is weaker and less effective than Sims Reeves's sudden leap up a seventh, from a short low G-sharp to the high A. We know that this is not easy, but, with Mr. Lloyd one need not consider difficulty. His singing of all three of the tenor airs was simply wonderful. Mr. Whitney was grand as ever, and narrowly escaped an encore for "Why do the nations." One wonders, however, that he and the Handel and Haydn have not yet thought of cutting out "But who may abide," in Part I, and singing in its stead the very seldom-heard air, "Thou art gone up on high," in Part II. This air is one of the most superb in the whole "Messiah," and Franz's score has, for the first time, made it available for performance: Mozart did nothing to it. Mrs. Bishop has a clear, bell-like soprano, and sings both with assurance and ease; her voice rather lacks depth of quality, and is what one would call a little superficially brilliant; she is more successful in things like "Rejoice, rejoice," than in the profounder religious emotion of "I know that my Redeemer liveth." Still she made a very good impression. Mrs. Alves sang the alto solos very beautifully indeed; with simplicity and all due emotional expressiveness. Her voice, too, is exceedingly beautiful.

One thing we could not help noticing in many of the airs, and this was that Mr. Zerrahn, especially in accompanying singers new to the Handel and Haydn concerts, showed a tendency to depart from the tempo established by the singer, as soon as the voice-part stopped, and a phrase of orchestral interlude was to be played. It may be a moot point, who is properly to decide on questions of tempo, the conductor or the singer? There are good arguments on both sides. Still, this much seems to us indubitable: that if the conductor has allowed the singer to take his own tempo at the beginning of an air, he should at least stick to that tempo throughout, and not vary it. We know that with not a few singers, especially in the slower Handel airs, the conductor is often hard put to it to prevent the singer from dragging; and, in such cases, the little interludes are about the only chances he has for keeping the movement from falling away from slow to slower. Still, wherever, the fault may lie, the effect of this frequent change of tempo is uneasy and irksome. The chorus did very well indeed, and "For unto us a son is born" and "Lift up your heads" barely escaped encores.

The sale of seats for any of the three concerts by Eugen d'Albert at the Music Hall, on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons of next week is open at the office. The first programme is made up entirely of compositions by Beethoven.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 13, 1892.

THE D'ALBERT VISIT.

EUGEN D'ALBERT is again a visitor, and a welcome one, in this city. He comes at the close of a most exhausting musical season, when the enthusiasm of the piano playing loving public is nearly spent, but his playing is a revelation, as it was of yore, and he is more of a musical Hercules than ever. The intensity of his brain, the absolute absorption in his work caused the music critic of the "Recorder" in last Sunday's issue to aptly classify him as "the greatest pianist among musicians and the greatest musician among pianists." As the same writer very justly says d'Albert possesses more precision than Rubinstein, more warmth than Von Bülow. Indeed he might have added that the young man's make up is a happy blending of many of the characteristics of the two pianists with something all his own.

D'Albert has not the magnetism that exhales from a sweet, poetic personality. He rather compels than wins you. It is his deadly earnestness that triumphs over audiences. Criticise him you may, but he forces you to listen to him. The intellect preponderates over the emotional faculties. He is a strong headed young man, playing the piano masterfully. His breadth of culture is wide, his technic overwhelming; in this respect he stands almost alone, and his deep musical feeling, which, like Tausig's, is ever objective, is not of the sort to interest the giddy worshipper of empty virtuosity, but by that very token appeals to the cultured and earnest lovers of all that is highest in the art of piano playing.

Eugen d'Albert is indeed a great little man.

The d'Albert Recitals.

THE d'Albert recitals at the Concert Hall of the Madison Square Garden last week came in at the fag end of a hard musical season. So the first concert did not attract the attention it deserved, but the second and third were crowded with enthusiastic audiences who seemed loath to allow the "little giant of the keyboard" to part. The fascination d'Albert exerts over his hearers is an intellectual one. He has not the poetic charm of personality nor the freakish manners of some virtuosi, but plays with such tremendous intensity, such sincerity of purpose, and his music rings out so true in feeling that he literally fascinates you. Mr. d'Albert is one of the greatest interpreters of Bach, Beethoven and Brahms alive. His absence of mannerisms and freedom from morbidity result in superbly sane and healthy performances of the Beethoven sonatas and Bach's polyphonic compositions. Here are the three programs of the d'Albert recitals:

BEETHOVEN PROGRAM. TUESDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 5.

Thirty-two variations in C minor.
Sonata in E minor, op. 90.
Sonata in C major, op. 53.
Sonata in E major, op. 109.
Sonata in A flat major, op. 110.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 7. PROGRAM.

Prelude and fugue in D major	Bach-d'Albert
Sonata, op. 78	Beethoven
Fifteen variations sérieuses, op. 54	Mendelssohn
Suite in D minor, op. 91 Introduzione e fuga. Giga con variazioni. Cavatina. Marcia.	Raff
Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3	Schubert
Valse, "Man lebt nur einmal"	Strauss-Tausig
Liebestraum, No. 3 Rhapsodie Espagnole (Folies d'Espagne e Jota Arragonesa.)	Liszt

THIRD AND LAST RECITAL. SATURDAY AFTERNOON.

Suite Anglaise, No. 6	Bach
Rondo in A minor	Mozart
Rhapsodie, op. 79, No. 2	Brahms
Sonata in B minor, op. 58	Chopin
Barcarolle in A minor	Rubinstein
Sonetto di Petrarca "Feux Follets" etude Tarentelle, "Napoli"	Liszt

Particularly noteworthy were the renderings of the sonata, op. 90 and the E and A flat sonatas, op. 109 and 110. The variations in E major were most beautifully played. Tremendous, too, on the sensational side, was his playing of the Spanish rhapsody, Liszt's "Feux Follets" and the Strauss-Tausig valse. This latter suffered through over accentuation, but like the A flat polonaise of Chopin, which was given as an encore at the last concert, was played with great tonal splendor and fervid breadth. How completely d'Albert is in sympathy with Brahms could be noticed by his playing of the G minor rhapsody, with its dark harmonies and sinister suggestions. It is a grim tonal mood and was most worthily shadowed forth by the young artist. His amazing versatility was exemplified by his delightful playing, as an encore, of Liszt's A flat valse impromptu.

The Chopin B minor sonata, op. 58, Chopin's best work of the three sonatas he has left us, was played in a very finished manner, though the last movement was taken at too rapid a tempo for clarity. The first movement was well played, but the scherzo was hardly a scherzo at Mr. d'Albert's hands. It lacked variety in coloring and lightness. Mr. d'Albert was more than ably aided by the magnificent Knabe grand he played upon. Its singing qualities were as mellow as Lassalle's most mellow baritone notes, it thundered when d'Albert smote it in Liszt's brilliant pyrotechnics, and it responded perfectly to the delicate embroidery of Chopin's pearly runs. It was a remarkable instrument; Messrs. Knabe & Sons can congratulate themselves on that point. Mr. d'Albert will be heard with the Nikisch orchestra at the same place May 2.

BOSTON NEWS.

BOSTON OFFICE OF THE MUSICAL COURIER,
157 TREMONT STREET, April 9, 1892.

THE program for the twenty-second Symphony concert this evening was:

Overture, "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Symphony No. 2, in A major, "In the Spring"	Paine
Overture, "Egmont"	Beethoven

The "Sakuntala" overture was given a brilliant reading by Mr. Nikisch and the performance was unusually spirited. Owing, probably, to its highly colored orchestration the work was received with the heartiest demonstrations of pleasure of any number upon the program.

The symphony was also well played, and gave apparently great delight, the audience showing special fondness for the "scherzo."

The "Egmont" overture seemed to be the most conscientiously treated by Mr. Nikisch, whose reading of the number can be sincerely praised for its truthfulness.

The program for the next rehearsal, Thursday afternoon, April 14, and the next concert, Saturday evening, April 16, will be:

Symphony in F major, op. 4 (First time in Boston.)	Eugen d'Albert
Aria, "Alessandro"	Händel
Suite from the music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet," op. 50 (First performance in America. Conducted by the composer.)	Henschel
Aria from "Herodiade"	Massenet
Overture, "Oberon"	Weber

Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the soloist.

* * * *

The last concert of the season by the Kneisel Quartet was given on Monday evening. The quartet was assisted by Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Novacek and Mr. Schulz. The program was:

Sextet for strings, in G major (Second viola, Mr. Otto Novacek; Second 'cello, Mr. Leo Schulz.)	Brahms
Sonata for piano and violoncello	Beethoven
Quartet in E minor, op. 59	Beethoven

The sextet was of the usual Brahms order, only more so. A series of abstruse problems in counterpoint played backward would have afforded about as much real musical delight. The additional viola and 'cello but added to its incomprehensible cloudiness.

It is often claimed by lovers of this sort of musical mathematics that only the future generations may appreciate the melodious beauties so carefully and effectually hidden by the composer.

It is a fact in musical history that Beethoven experienced the same lack of appreciation in his day.

Very well. To-day is Beethoven's future. We are quite willing that Brahms' sextets be kept a spell longer. Age might improve them.

The work took an hour to perform, and toward the end of the last movement the future generation (which only will be able to fully appreciate Brahms) seemed well nigh at hand. After a fresh outfit of strings (Messrs. Kneisel and Novacek having worn theirs through) the sextet was finished amid long drawn sighs (presumably of relief) at 9 o'clock.

Then followed that surpassingly beautiful Beethoven sonata for piano and 'cello, which was quite faultlessly played by Messrs. Perabo and Schroeder.

A little more of Mr. Perabo and a little less of Mr. Schroeder, however, would have improved it, if improvement were possible. The concert came to an end with a delightful reading and performance of the Beethoven quartet.

It is with great pleasure that we record the most successful season, artistically and financially, of this incomparable organization, the Kneisel Quartet. Their work has never been equaled in this country.

* * * *

Boston Musical Herald.

April, 1892.

A Monthly Music-Review.

The symphony of Saturday, February 27, began with Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas," and ended with Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes," both finely played. The symphony was Dvorák's Fourth, in G major. Sticklers for conventional forms might reasonably object that it was rather a suite of tone-pictures than a symphony; but why should we care for names, or be so narrow as to demand everlastingly that the new should conform to the old? Let us have the new wine in new bottles. Let us welcome, if we can, the wealth of invention, the splendor of tone-coloring, the vivacity of spontaneous creation,—even though it has a touch of barbaric opulence and wildness,—which characterized this new work by the Hungarian. It is long since we have heard a composition more gorgeous, more tuneful, and, perhaps, judging from comments overheard and printed, more puzzling. Characteristic Hungarian rhythms do not at first occur in it, though the most pleasing and popular movement—the allegretto grazioso—shows Magyar origin; but if we were to point out all the innovations, there would be no room to speak of aught else.

On Wednesday evening (March 2), the Boston Symphony Orchestra had an extra, a self-benefit concert, at which Mrs. Julie L. Wyman, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, and Mr. Paderewski generously gave their services, and a large audience (that it was not larger was due solely to the storm still continuing), gave their enthusiastic applause. The program was at least an hour longer than usual. It began with a full-swung and brilliant performance of the overture to "Tannhäuser," which was followed by Mr. Paderewski's magnificently broad and satisfactory rendering of Schumann's A minor piano concerto, the delighted audience clamoring for more, and succeeding in obtaining, rather cruelly, a romance by Schumann. Then came the orchestral suite from "Esclarmonde," given for the first time, graceful, light, delicious, piquant, but not great; Mr. Schroeder's three Soli for 'cello, Bach's Sarabande, Schubert's Moment Musical, and Davidoff's At the Fountain were heartily applauded. For these and Mrs. Wyman's three songs by Délibes, Massenet, and Ferrari (so perfectly delivered!), Mr. Nikisch played most satisfactorily the accompaniment.

A Russian flavor was imparted by the Andantino and Scherzo from Tschaikowsky's F minor symphony—the pizzicato splendidly played—and the concert ended with the greatest of Liszt's Hungarian Fantasias, royally performed by Mr. Paderewski, who was recalled again and again. During the evening Mr. Paderewski was presented with a silver wreath; and after the concert Mr. Nikisch was the recipient of a testimonial from the orchestra, in the shape of a beautiful clock, warranted not to beat, but to keep time. A great and memorable concert.

At the eighteenth Symphony Concert (March 5), Madame Camilla Urso was the soloist, selecting Bruch's D minor Violin Concerto, a work which, though not without many inspired and beautiful passages, left the impression of being far inferior to the composer's First. The third movement, which is in the manner of a tarantelle, is the weakest and most trivial; the second the most pleasing. Madame Urso played with fine breadth and brilliancy, but her violin, strung with wire strings, was almost constantly too sharp. The concert began with Tschaikowsky's Symphonic Poem, "Hamlet," presented for the first time. There is something peculiarly sympathetic between the character of Hamlet and the Russian national nature: it was, therefore, extremely interesting to hear how the story was interpreted musically by the greatest living Russian composer. To the chronicler it was a most wonderfully thrilling composition, and the various modes which the music adopted in illustrating the moods of the melancholy Dane, the love and madness of Ophelia, and all the incidents of the tragedy, were extremely effective. The symphony was the ordinary or revised version of Schumann's D minor, played with splendidly dramatic force and zeal.

The Kneisel Quartet gave its sixth concert on the following Monday evening with the assistance of Frau Amalie Joachim, who sang songs by Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Ahle, Schultz, Mendelssohn, Schubert and Brahms. She was evidently suffering from a cold, and her enormous contralto voice, which seemed out of place in a small hall, was not under the best of control. Though one might pick flaws in her method of taking tones, it would be indeed a captious critic who should not enjoy her musical interpretation of the German Lieder, of which she has been, for more than a generation, the foremost exponent. Besides the Variations from Beethoven's A major quartet and the entire E flat quartet, the concert included a quartet in E minor by Ottokar Novácek, one of the Symphony Orchestra. With the exception of a curious reminiscence of a figure in the fourth Schumann Symphony, this work savored entirely of the Slavonic school. It was fascinating in its unlikeness to classic models. The short, piquant prestissimo aroused much enthusiasm and was repeated.

At the nineteenth Symphony concert, Mr. Eugen D'Albert was the soloist: he gave a faultless rendering of Beethoven's E flat Piano Concerto—that pièce de resistance for all great artists. So masterly was his rendering, so colossal his victory over technical difficulties, so completely was his individuality not sunk, but made transparent, as it were, that one might doubt whether the work was ever given a more ideal interpretation. Unfortunately, the piano failed to respond to the demands. It lacked tonality: in powerful passages the tone seemed to strike through to the wood. Recalled, Mr. D'Albert played a piece by Brahms of immense difficulty, almost brutally, but splendidly ugly, the exquisite theme loaded down with tremendous arpeggios.

Mrs. Nikisch's long postponed Song-recital (in which she was assisted by Mr. Arthur Nikisch and Master Alexander Fiedemann, a youthful violinist of great promise), Mrs. Sherwood's three piano recitals, and the two weeks' season of Grand Opera at Mechanics Hall, must be mentioned without comment.

At the twentieth Symphony Concert (March 26), the orchestral selections were Brahms's noble "Tragic Overture," Gluck's Contrasted Dances of the Spirits in Bliss and of the Furies—Mr. Mole's rendering of the flute solo was something to remember—and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony so overflowing with exuberant life, fun and good spirits. It was magnificently played. Frau Joachim was the soloist, delighting the majority of the audience with her rendering of Gluck's "che faró," and of songs by Schubert and Schumann. In her first selection she and the orchestra had an amusing race to the end, or rather Frau Joachim sailed away from her accompaniment on the pinions of song. Mr. Nikisch played finely the accompaniments to the German songs—particularly that to the Erl King. Frau Joachim's voice is well adapted to Music Hall but she sang occasionally flat and indulged too frequently in upward portamentos and explosive accents. But she pleased "nathless!"

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1892.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN.

The Annual Performance of Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion.

ach's Passion according to St. Matthew was t brought out in a service in St. Thomas urch, Leipsic, Good Friday, 1729, but the ver- known to us was not completed until 1740. vas sung by the church singers. They were out 50 in number. "Seventeen were good; 17 ight be good in time," Bach wrote; 17 were no talent whatever. The orchestra was the urch orchestra and it was related to the choir the proportion of three to two.

Last evening the greater part of the work was ven in Music Hall by the Handel and Haydn ociety, under the direction of Mr. Zerrahn. Irs. Georg Henschel was the soprano; Mrs. malie Joachim, the alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd was the chief narrator; Mr. George J. Parker sang the other members allotted to the tenor; Mr. Henschel sang the music of Jesus. To Mr. Gardner S. Lamson were intrusted the other bass parts of varied nature. Mr. Lang was the organist, Mr. Tucker was at the pianoforte. The orchestra was made up of Symphony men, with Mr. Kneisel as concert meister. A chorus of boys from the choirs of Emmanuel, Saint Paul's and Harvard College assisted. There was a very large audience, and the performance was three hours in length.

The performance, as a whole, was an improvement on that of last year. The chorus work was much better in precision and intonation. At times, the middle parts were poorly nourished, and in four-voice work the sopranos and the basses were heard alone. The answers of the chorus to the tenor recitatives in No. 25 were not sufficiently subdued, and the effect of the great choral, "O man, thy heavy sin lament," was marred by the monotonous loudness of the vocal figuration, so that the melody of the choral was often lost. All in all, the improvement in the chorus work, however, was marked.

Mr. Lloyd was still indisposed, to the great regret of all. In spite of this disadvantage, he bore away the honors of the evening by the sincerity and beauty of his art. He did not make the mistake of emphasizing unimportant phrases. His tenderness was always manly. His effects were without exaggeration. His task was an arduous one, and it was skillfully and successfully accomplished. Mr. Henschel was often admirable, and interesting even in his mannerisms and his extravagances. But the vocal means by which he gained his effects cannot be praised, and mouthing often took the place of dignified delivery. He was always in evidence. He seemed to wish to compel attention and admiration, even when the text gave him no occasion. Nor was he free from juggling spasmodically with his tones. Mr. Parker gave a musician-like interpretation of the recitatives and the air in the first part, and, by the way, the chorus that accompanies "I'll watch" would have gained in effect if it had been sung piano. His delivery of the air, "Behold, how still," was delightful in its accuracy and its tasteful phrasing, and it was one of the most artistic features of the evening. Mr. Lamson was unfortunate in "Give me back," and yet such accidents will occur to even the most experienced. It is not so easy to excuse the exaggerations that injured his performance of other numbers, such as the declaiming of lines of little moment with undue dramatic intensity, over-accentuation of consonants, etc. Mr. Lamson's very earnestness may prove a foe to his progress. Last evening his intonation was not always true to the pitch. Mrs. Henschel sang her music in an unaffected and sympathetic manner; but she is heard to better advantage in works of a lighter nature. In the recitative, "Although My Heart in Tears," she groped her way at the beginning of the final half dozen measures. Mrs. Joachim sang in English. In the air, "Look Where Jesus," she started with a phrase of unexpected length, for on former occasions she has not shown such excellent management of breath. With this exception, there was nothing worthy of special remark in her performance, which at its best was one of conventional respectabilitys Nor is it necessary to refer now to the technical failings that were discussed when she sang in Steinert Hall and Music Hall. Mr. Kneisel played the obligato to the great alto solo with fine taste. In the flute solo in "From love unbounded" the reading of the appoggiaturas was questionable, if it was not wholly wrong. The work of the orchestra in general was an improvement on that of last year. The audience stood and joined in the singing of certain chorals.

Sunday evening (Easter) Haydn's "Creation" will be sung. Mrs. Albani and Messrs. Lloyd and Whitney will take part.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Post.

SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 16, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Bach's beautiful Passion Music received a splendid rendition last night at Music Hall, by Carl Zerrahn and his splendid chorus, with an orchestra, a large choir of boys prepared by George L. Osgood and Warren A. Locke, and a list of principals including Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mme. Amalie Joachim, Edward Lloyd, George J. Parker, Mr. Georg Henschel, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, and B. J. Lang, organist.

The work of the chorus was admirable, showing close attention to detail, and giving additional proof of Mr. Zerrahn's rare ability as conductor. The orchestra and choir were both excellent, and the work of the principals exceptional. Mrs. Henschel evinced the same rare taste that has characterized her season's work here, and Mr. Henschel gave examples of impressive recitative work.

Mme. Joachim's phrasing was a marvel of skill—the very difficult solo, "Oh Pardon Me," was perfectly phrased and in good tune throughout.

Mr. Lloyd was suffering from a hoarseness which wore away toward the close of the evening, but his rendition of the recitative, "And Peter Then Began," was magnificent.

Mr. Lamson's tones were a little explosive, but for the most part he was satisfactory. George Parker's part was small, but he made all possibly of it. As a performance, last night's work left little to be desired.

Music Notices.

Tonight's symphony programme is a fine one, containing Schumann's symphony No. 1, in B-flat, op. 38; Handel's aria, "Alessandro"; Henschel's suite from the music to Shakspere's "Hamlet," op. 50; Massenet's aria from "Herodiade," and Weber's overture, "Oberon." Mrs. Henschel will be the soloist.

At the third and last concert of its series, the Kneisel Quartet will have the co-operation of Eugen D'Albert, who will be heard in chamber music on this occasion for the only time in this vicinity.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The twenty-second Symphony programme was well made up, but it represented in its performance that Sir Oracle determination of Mr. Nikisch to have the music he chooses given according to his fantasy and his obstinacy. It is a thousand pities that Mr. Higginson—whose noble initiative and sustaining power in the matter of these concerts cannot be too much commended or too well remembered—cannot make up his mind to replace his too bumptious conductor with a man who knows more and is consequently more reasonable. If an actor were to play Hamlet in top-boots and spurs, read "To Be or Not to Be" like a comedy soliloquy and slay Laertes with a navy revolver, the general sense would rebel and general indignation would put down such an "interpretation" instantly. Unfortunately, a large part of the Symphony audiences do not know what is right—they attend the concerts in the hope of learning—and another large part do not dare to protest. But the wrong Mr. Nikisch is allowed to do may become irreparable, unless at great cost of pains and labor, if he be not brought into subjection or dismissed. At this concert two overtures felt his reconstructive hand—Goldmark's "Sakuntala," which, being purely romantic, might permit some injection of fantastic personality, and Beethoven's "Egmont," to alter a bar or a tempo of which is evidence of ignorance or conceit and perhaps of both. Between these came Professor John K. Paine's long unheard "Spring" symphony, which is one of the illustrations which its author has given of the most serious and lofty talent for composition yet found in this country. It is often eloquent, constantly beautiful, full of fine original thought and expression, and yet always in consonance with the best classical theses of composition. That it did not always shine and sparkle, glow and warm, as it should, was the fault of the conductor, who, apparently because he could not find opportunities for erratic display—read much of it irregularly and without due respect or sympathy for the composer's evident intentions and clear indications.

The programme for tonight is a notable one. It begins with Schumann's first symphony, and it ends with the "Oberon" overture. The central number will be the suite from Mr. Henschel's incidental music to "Hamlet," which the composer will conduct—won't he get a reception, though!—and each side of this will be placed large airs from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade," which Mrs. Henschel will sing.

* * *

Although the community has had about as many pianoforte recitals as it could reasonably be expected to assimilate, it will assuredly find some yet unfilled want which will be gratified by the three afternoon concerts which Mr. Eugen D'Albert is to give in Music Hall on the afternoons of next Monday, Wednesday and Saturday. The first of these will be devoted in accordance with a frequently expressed desire, to Beethoven, for the rendering of whose music no concert pianist of the time stands higher. He has chosen for this occasion the set of thirty-two variations in C-minor and these sonatas—C-major, op. 53, E-minor, op. 90, E-major, op. 109, and A-flat-major, op. 110. Several periods of the master's thought and manner are here represented, and the pianist may be depended upon to give them each with its right feeling and form. Miscellaneous programmes, drawn from classic and popular composers, may be expected upon the other days.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE AT CAMBRIDGE.

The concert to be given on Tuesday evening next in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, by the Kneisel Quartette, will be an important one, because then Mr. D'Albert will be heard in chamber music for the only time in this vicinity. He plays twice, taking part in Beethoven's "Kreutzer" sonata with Mr. Kneisel and in Schumann's E-flat piano quartette. That many amateurs will take the trouble of the little trip to Cambridge for the purpose of hearing these works thus played is a sure thing. The programme is headed by Mozart's string quartette in C-major, so that all the selections are good and interesting.

Journal
Chicago april 7

Paderewski is lavish in his praise of Mr. Nikisch and his Boston Symphony Orchestra. He says: "I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra the best in the world, not excepting the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris. Mr. Nikisch is much superior to the conductor of the Conservatoire. After the performance of my concerto in Brooklyn, in which Mr. Nikisch directed the accompaniment, I declared I would never play the piece again; and I will not, as its perfection may not be reached again."

Newton Journal.

FRIDAY, APRIL 15, 1892.

Eugene D'Albert, the pianist, whose playing is the wonder of the musical world, even in this day of extraordinary performers, is to give three piano recitals in Music Hall, Boston, on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons next, the last before his final concert tour with the Symphony orchestra. His special skill as an interpreter of Beethoven's music will be shown in the first recital, which has an exclusively Beethoven program. The other programs are rich in the works of modern as well as the old classic composers, and some of the most remarkable and magnificent exhibitions of piano playing yet heard in Boston may be expected. Season and single tickets can be had by addressing Music Hall.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING APRIL 16, 1892.

THE PASSION MUSIC.

A VERY NOTABLE CHORAL PERFORMANCE.

It Was in Some Degree a Religious Service—The Choristers Clad in Black—Audience Permitted to Join in the Chorals, as Bach's Congregations Did a Century and a Half Ago.

It was in some degree a religious service that was held in Music Hall last night, for not only were the choristers soberly clad in black and all applause dispensed with, but the audience (or congregation) were permitted to join in the chorals, just as Bach's congregations did in the Thomas Kirche a century and a half ago. It is not affectation to treat the Passion Music in this reverent manner, for if one enters into the devout feelings of the composer the music cannot but gain by the process. Yet to many the work may have seemed only a rather severe mode of doing penance, for it is not one that can attract much at a first hearing; to the average auditor it comes as a very tangled musical skein. It was not performed in its entirety, nor anything like it, for a complete performance of the masterpiece occupies between four and five hours, and we are not as patient as our ancestors. Yet it might have been pruned still closer; the phrases of the Evangelist, for example, are very dry recitatives, full of interest to the student of modulation, but rather wearisome to the average listener, and only serving to link the keys of the different larger numbers into a perfect continuity; but since this continuity was broken in any case, the short phrases might well have been committed to a good reader.

This Passion Music shows both the greatness and the limitations of the great contrapuntist; the choruses are glorious beyond compare, the very acme of polyphonic music. The ancients imagined the pillars of Hercules to mark the utmost boundary of the habitable world, and in just such manner can the musician cite the opening and the closing chorus of the Passion Music as the utmost limits of expressive counterpoint in vocal form. Tallis may have composed a work of 40 real parts; Palestrina may have evolved more complex polyphonic treatment; but "Come, Ye Daughters, Weep for Anguish," and "Around Thy Tomb Here Sit We Weeping" still remain the musical pillars of Hercules. The Chorals, too, are the perfection of congregational work; examine each part separately and one will find a leading of voices so pure and perfect that it will remain a model for all time. But the solos (whisper it not in Gath!) seem tiresome as a whole, and are at times prolix. Bach does not seem as successful as Handel in producing an aria; the Passion Music is essentially a choral triumph, and the solos, spite of the sorrow of "Grief and Pain," the pathos of "Oh pardon me, my God," the remorse of "Give me back my dearest Master," or the beauty of "At Eventide, cool hour of Rest," are not continuously interesting; were the work changed into a choral service altogether, I am not sure but it might become a success with the laity, as it long has been with the musician. The choruses themselves offer abundant contrasts, from the mighty power of the chorals to the fierce Turbæ, the harsh cries of the multitude. Not Wagner himself could have better pictured remorseless and dissonant unanimity than that wild shout of "Barabbas!" The melody of the chorals is always entirely singable, and the recurrent one which becomes "Oh, Sacred Head now Wounded," was at first a love song by Hassler, and began, "Mein G'mueth ist mir verwirret"—"My mind is all distracted." Bach took the tune because it was familiar to his congregation and he could rely upon their singing it with surety. Modern hymn composers also seem to believe in giving popular melodies to the congregations, but they do not take the trouble to attach such harmonies to their productions.

The soloists were great enough to make their thankless task seem more interesting than in preceding performances of the work. Such a list of performers has not been united in a Handel and Haydn concert in a very long while.

The place of honor belongs to Mr. Edward Lloyd, for he sang the frightfully difficult part of the Evangelist, made up altogether of modulations and with a minimum of melody, and it is safe to say that the part has never been sung so well in America. The artist was undoubtedly hoarse, but this seemed to interfere only with a few notes in middle register, and only temporarily at that, while the almost impossible phrases in the highest tessitura were always clear and the intonation true as steel. At times, too, the great singer managed to give an unexpected wealth of expression to the dry recitative, as for example, at the words—"Then went he out and wept bitterly," which were given with indescribable pathos, and the translation of the last words of the Saviour, which was delivered with befitting anguish; but the culmination was in the dramatic rending of the veil of the Temple. Few non-musicians could have known how difficult the entire thankless task was, or how bravely Mr. Lloyd overcame it.

Next to this phenomenal work one may rank the artistic singing of Mr. Henschel. His part was not a large one, but his presentation of the agony of the Passion was most effective, culminating properly, in a most beseeching delivery of the phrase—"Eli, Eli, lama, Sabachthani."

If Mme. Joachim flatted a little in "Look Down, Oh God," at least she sang with the loftiest spirit, the keenest intelligence, and phrased most artistically; all in all it was the most satisfactory work she has yet done in Boston, and her rendering of "Oh, Pardon Me, My God," was something to be remembered. This aria is only to be compared with Handel's "He Was Despised" (one must add that the latter gains by the comparison) where the alto also represents sobs and tears. In this number, however, the language of grief is largely given to the violin, and the obbligato was finely given by Mr. Kneisel, as also the subsequent one in "Give Me Back My Dearest Master." Mrs. Henschel was obliged to force her rather fragile voice, and the result was not always perfect, besides inspiring the auditor with that sense of insecurity which is always fatal to hearty enjoyment of any public work.

Mr. Parker was, as ever, sound and conscientious, just a trifle too explosive, perhaps, when heard in juxtaposition with Mr. Lloyd's even and unforced high passages, but entirely praiseworthy in the sweet "Behold, how still." Mr. Lamson is not suited to this kind of work and I fear that he felt this early in the evening; at first he "romanticized" his part in a manner that made Judas rather Schumannesque, and finally nervousness spoiled portions of "Give me back my dearest Master." But he redeemed the slip somewhat by better work in "At eventide, cool hour of Rest," in which the violin figure of the orchestra also deserved commendation.

But the orchestra as a whole was not good; not only was there a lack of shading, but there was roughness, irregular attack, and a generally poor ensemble. Of course one accepted without cavil, the lack of some of Bach's instruments; "Although my heart" and the subsequent aria, call for two oboi d'Amore, and "From Love unbounded," and "Ah Golgotha," were played with oboi du Caccia obbligatos in Bach's time, but clarinets have come in since his day, and these and English horns or oboes, can atone for the loss of a little antique tone color. The individual points in the orchestral work (in addition to the above mentioned obbligato work) were good; as, for example, the flute in "From love unbounded," the contrabasses in "Ye lightnings, ye thunders," and the oboe in "I'll watch with my dear Jesu"; but the crowning glory of all was the chorus work. The society and Mr. Zerrahn are to be congratulated on the steadiness and clearness with which almost every choral number was executed. The Turbæ and some of the double choruses are difficult things to achieve with good ensemble, yet that is what was conquered last night. Spite of all the excellent points chronicled, the chorus numbers are the glory of this work, and had every solo been omitted, one could still be well content with such grand numbers as these and so well executed. "Around thy tomb here sit we weeping" was the fitting crown of what began so grandly with "Come Ye Daughters," and one could only commiserate the members of the large procession which filed out before it was given. If only the directors of the society would prune the work some more before next season (not touching a single chorus number however) the Passion Music would find as permanent welcome as the at present more popular "Messiah."

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, APRIL 16.

HANDEL AND HAYDN.

Second Evening Concert of the Society at Music Hall.

The second evening concert of the Handel & Haydn Society took place in Music Hall last evening, Bach's "St. Matthew Passion Music," the ninth performance by the organization, forming the programme. The date, Good Friday, April 15, had an anniversary feature, for it was on that day and date that this great religious work was first produced by the composer at Leipsic in 1729.

The oratorio was given in about the same form as last year. Some additions were made to the score to add continuity to the story, and nearly all the original chorals were sung, the audience joining in the singing at designated numbers on the programme, and making the performance very impressive.

Conductor Zerrahn made a very good choice in the solo singers. They were: Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Mrs. Amalie Joachim, contralto; Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. G. J. Parker, tenors; Mr. Georg Henschel, Mr. G. S. Lamson and Mr. Thomas Hooper, basses.

The chorus was augmented by a large number of boys from Emanuel, St. Paul's and Harvard College choirs. The orchestra was composed of Symphony players, Mr. Kneisel principal. Mr. Lang officiated at the organ, and Mr. H. G. Tucker was the pianist.

The hall was crowded to its full capacity, the walls being lined with spectators who were unable to procure seats.

Of the chorus work it may be said it was excellent, and the assistance of the boyish voices in the double chorals made these numbers particularly effective.

The eight-part opening chorus is worthy of mention and "Ye lightnings, ye thunders" was given with grand results, the boy contingent augmenting the chorus with grand results.

The instrumental portion of the composition was well performed, the delicate interludes by the strings being beautifully played, and the work as rendered by chorus and orchestra was in a manner worthy of the interesting religious event.

The soloists of the evening were capable artists and they sang their numbers, which a prominent writer of music terms "archaic," in a generally meritorious manner.

Mr. Lloyd, as the Evangelist, has a long series of difficult recitatives to declaim and in this trying work he was thoroughly successful. His melodious voice was in better form than when he sang in "The Messiah" on Wednesday evening, and his distinct enunciation and dramatic delivery of the lines won every heart. His work was grandly done.

Mr. George J. Parker, tenor, and Mr. Gardner, basso, interpreted the music acceptably.

Mr. Georg Henschel sang with artistic skill and unaffectedly. His long declamations were judiciously managed.

Mrs. Georg Henschel's voice was not at its best, and sounded at times forced and clouded. The lady interpreted her music with expression and true artistic feeling, and many of the passages were exquisitely sung.

Mme. Joachim's contralto was quite effective and her voice easily filled the hall. Her most satisfactory number was the recitative "Look down, O God," in the second part. This artist, by the way, is never heard at her best in the earlier portion of a programme, and her voice seems to improve as she warms to her work.

Mr. Lang, Mr. Tucker and Mr. Hooper ably assisted in their various ways.

On Sunday evening Haydn's oratorio "The Creation" will be performed, with Mrs. Emma Albani, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Myron W. Whitney as soloists.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert's Beethoven recital will be given in Music Hall Monday afternoon, April 18. The other concerts are announced for Wednesday and Saturday afternoons of this week.

The third and last concert by Eugen D'Albert and the Kneisel quartet in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, will take place Tuesday evening, April 19.

Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the soloist at the Symphony concert in Music Hall this evening. Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" will be given for the first time in America, the composer conducting the orchestra.

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1892.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN.

The Annual Performance of Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion.

Bach's Passion according to St. Matthew was first brought out in a service in St. Thomas Church, Leipsic, Good Friday, 1729, but the version known to us was not completed until 1740. It was sung by the church singers. They were about 30 in number. Seventeen were good; 17 might be good in time," Bach wrote; 17 were of no talent whatever. The orchestra was the church orchestra and it was related to the choir in the proportion of three to two.

Last evening the greater part of the work was given in Music Hall by the Handel and Haydn Society, under the direction of Mr. Zerrahn. Mrs. Georg Henschel was the soprano; Mrs. Amalie Joachim, the alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd was the chief narrator; Mr. George J. Parker sang the other members allotted to the tenor; Mr. Henschel sang the music of Jesus. To Mr. Gardner S. Lamson were intrusted the other bass parts of varied nature. Mr. Lang was the organist. Mr. Tucker was at the pianoforte. The orchestra was made up of Symphony men, with Mr. Kneisel as concert meister. A chorus of boys from the choirs of Emmanuel, Saint Paul's and Harvard College assisted. There was a very large audience, and the performance was three hours in length.

The performance, as a whole, was an improvement on that of last year. The chorus work was much better in precision and intonation. At times, the middle parts were poorly nourished, and in four-voice work the sopranos and the basses were heard alone. The answers of the chorus to the tenor recitatives in No. 25 were not sufficiently subdued, and the effect of the great choral, "O man, thy heavy sin lament," was marred by the monotonous loudness of the vocal figuration, so that the melody of the choral was often lost. All in all, the improvement in the chorus work, however, was marked.

Mr. Lloyd was still indisposed, to the great regret of all. In spite of this disadvantage, he bore away the honors of the evening by the sincerity and beauty of his art. He did not make the mistake of emphasizing unimportant phrases. His tenderness was always manly. His effects were without exaggeration. His task was an arduous one, and it was skillfully and successfully accomplished. Mr. Henschel was often admirable, and interesting even in his mannerisms and his extravagances. But the vocal means by which he gained his effects cannot be praised, and mouthing often took the place of dignified delivery. He was always in evidence. He seemed to wish to compel attention and admiration, even when the text gave him no occasion. Nor was he free from juggling spasmodically with his tones. Mr. Parker gave a musician-like interpretation of the recitatives and the air in the first part, and, by the way, the chorus that accompanies "I'll watch" would have gained in effect if it had been sung piano. His delivery of the air, "Behold, how still," was delightful in its accuracy and its tasteful phrasing, and it was one of the most artistic features of the evening. Mr. Lamson was unfortunate in "Give me back," and yet such accidents will occur to even the most experienced. It is not so easy to excuse the exaggerations that injured his performance of other numbers, such as the declaiming of lines of little moment with undue dramatic intensity, over-accentuation of consonants, etc. Mr. Lamson's very earnestness may prove a foe to his progress. Last evening his intonation was not always true to the pitch. Mrs. Henschel sang her music in an unaffected and sympathetic manner; but she is heard to better advantage in works of a lighter nature. In the recitative, "Although My Heart in Tears," she groped her way at the beginning of the final half dozen measures. Mrs. Joachim sang in English. In the air, "Look Where Jesus," she started with a phrase of unexpected length, for on former occasions she has not shown such excellent management of breath. With this exception, there was nothing worthy of special remark in her performance, which at its best was one of conventional respectability. Nor is it necessary to refer now to the technical failings that were discussed when she sang in Steinert Hall and Music Hall. Mr. Kneisel played the obligato to the great alto solo with fine taste. In the flute solo in "From love unbounded" the reading of the appoggiaturas was questionable, if it was not wholly wrong. The work of the orchestra in general was an improvement on that of last year. The audience stood and joined in the singing of certain chorals.

Sunday evening (Easter) Haydn's "Creation" will be sung. Mrs. Albani and Messrs. Lloyd and Whitney will take part.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Post.
SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 16, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Bach's beautiful Passion Music received a splendid rendition last night at Music Hall, by Carl Zerrahn and his splendid chorus, with an orchestra, a large choir of boys prepared by George L. Osgood and Warren A. Locke, and a list of principals including Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mme. Amalie Joachim, Edward Lloyd, George J. Parker, Mr. Georg Henschel, Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, and B. J. Lang, organist.

The work of the chorus was admirable, showing close attention to detail, and giving additional proof of Mr. Zerrahn's rare ability as conductor. The orchestra and choir were both excellent, and the work of the principals exceptional. Mrs. Henschel evinced the same rare taste that has characterized her season's work here, and Mr. Henschel gave examples of impressive recitative work.

Mme. Joachim's phrasing was a marvel of skill—the very difficult solo, "Oh Pardon Me," was perfectly phrased and in good tune throughout.

Mr. Lloyd was suffering from a hoarseness which wore away toward the close of the evening, but his rendition of the recitative, "And Peter Then Began," was magnificent.

Mr. Lamson's tones were a little explosive, but for the most part he was satisfactory. George Parker's part was small, but he made all possibly of it. As a performance, last night's work left little to be desired.

Music Notices.

Tonight's symphony programme is a fine one, containing Schumann's symphony No. 1, in B-flat, op. 38; Handel's aria, "Alessandro"; Henschel's suite from the music to Shakspere's "Hamlet," op. 50; Massenet's aria from "Herodiade," and Weber's overture, "Oberon." Mrs. Henschel will be the soloist.

At the third and last concert of its series, the Kneisel Quartet will have the co-operation of Eugen D'Albert, who will be heard in chamber music on this occasion for the only time in this vicinity.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The twenty-second Symphony programme was well made up, but it represented in its performance that Sir Oracle determination of Mr. Nikisch to have the music he chooses given according to his fantasy and his obstinacy. It is a thousand pities that Mr. Higginson—whose noble initiative and sustaining power in the matter of these concerts cannot be too much commended or too well remembered—cannot make up his mind to replace his too bumptious conductor with a man who knows more and is consequently more reasonable. If an actor were to play Hamlet in top-boots and spurs, read "To Be or Not to Be" like a comedy soliloquy and slay Laertes with a navy revolver, the general sense would rebel and general indignation would put down such an "interpretation" instantly. Unfortunately, a large part of the Symphony audiences do not know what is right—they attend the concerts in the hope of learning—and another large part do not dare to protest. But the wrong Mr. Nikisch is allowed to do may become irreparable, unless at great cost of pains and labor, if he be not brought into subjection or dismissed. At this concert two overtures felt his reconstructive hand—Goldmark's "Sakuntala," which, being purely romantic, might permit some injection of fantastic personality, and Beethoven's "Egmont," to alter a bar or a tempo of which is evidence of ignorance or conceit and perhaps of both. Between these came Professor John K. Paine's long unheard "Spring" symphony, which is one of the illustrations which its author has given of the most serious and lofty talent for composition yet found in this country. It is often eloquent, constantly beautiful, full of fine original thought and expression, and yet always in consonance with the best classical theses of composition. That it did not always shine and sparkle, glow and warm, as it should, was the fault of the conductor, who, apparently because he could not find opportunities for erratic display—read much of it irregularly and without due respect or sympathy for the composer's evident intentions and clear indications.

The programme for tonight is a notable one. It begins with Schumann's first symphony, and it ends with the "Oberon" overture. The central number will be the suite from Mr. Henschel's incidental music to "Hamlet," which the composer will conduct—won't he get a reception, though!—and each side of this will be placed large airs from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade," which Mrs. Henschel will sing.

Although the community has had about as many pianoforte recitals as it could reasonably be expected to assimilate, it will assuredly find some yet unfilled want which will be gratified by the three afternoon concerts which Mr. Eugen D'Albert is to give in Music Hall on the afternoons of next Monday, Wednesday and Saturday. The first of these will be devoted in accordance with a frequently expressed desire, to Beethoven, for the rendering of whose music no concert pianist of the time stands higher. He has chosen for this occasion the set of thirty-two variations in C-minor and these sonatas—C-major, op. 53, E-minor, op. 90, E-major, op. 109, and A-flat-major, op. 110. Several periods of the master's thought and manner are here represented, and the pianist may be depended upon to give them each with its right feeling and form. Miscellaneous programmes, drawn from classic and popular composers, may be expected upon the other days.

THE KNEISEL QUARTETTE AT CAMBRIDGE.

The concert to be given on Tuesday evening next in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, by the Kneisel Quartette, will be an important one, because then Mr. D'Albert will be heard in chamber music for the only time in this vicinity. He plays twice, taking part in Beethoven's "Kreutzer" sonata with Mr. Kneisel and in Schumann's E-flat piano quartette. That many amateurs will take the trouble of the little trip to Cambridge for the purpose of hearing these works thus played is a sure thing. The programme is headed by Mozart's string quartette in C-major, so that all the selections are good and interesting.

Paderewski is lavish in his praise of Mr. Nikisch and his Boston Symphony Orchestra. He says: "I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra the best in the world, not excepting the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris. Mr. Nikisch is much superior to the conductor of the Conservatoire. After the performance of my concerto in Brooklyn, in which Mr. Nikisch directed the accompaniment, I declared I would never play the piece again; and I will not, as its perfection may not be reached again."

Newton Journal.
FRIDAY, APRIL 15, 1892.

Eugene D'Albert, the pianist, whose playing is the wonder of the musical world, even in this day of extraordinary performers, is to give three piano recitals in Music Hall, Boston, on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons next, the last before his final concert tour with the Symphony orchestra. His special skill as an interpreter of Beethoven's music will be shown in the first recital, which has an exclusively Beethoven program. The other programs are rich in the works of modern as well as the old classic composers, and some of the most remarkable and magnificent exhibitions of piano playing yet heard in Boston may be expected. Season and single tickets can be had by addressing Music Hall.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.
SATURDAY MORNING APRIL 16, 1892.

THE PASSION MUSIC.

A VERY NOTABLE CHORAL PERFORMANCE.

It Was in Some Degree a Religious Service—The Choristers Clad in Black—Audience Permitted to Join in the Chorals, as Bach's Congregations Did a Century and a Half Ago.

It was in some degree a religious service that was held in Music Hall last night, for not only were the choristers soberly clad in black and all applause dispensed with, but the audience (or congregation) were permitted to join in the chorals, just as Bach's congregations did in the Thomas Kirche a century and a half ago. It is not affectation to treat the Passion Music in this reverent manner, for if one enters into the devout feelings of the composer the music cannot but gain by the process. Yet to many the work may have seemed only a rather severe mode of doing penance, for it is not one that can attract much at a first hearing; to the average aueitor it comes as a very tangled musical skein. It was not performed in its entirety, nor anything like it, for a complete performance of the masterpiece occupies between four and five hours, and we are not as patient as our ancestors. Yet it might have been pruned still closer; the phrases of the Evangelist, for example, are very dry recitatives, full of interest to the student of modulation, but rather wearisome to the average listener, and only serving to link the keys of the different larger numbers into a perfect continuity; but since this continuity was broken in any case, the short phrases might well have been committed to a good reader.

This Passion Music shows both the greatness and the limitations of the great contrapuntist; the choruses are glorious beyond compare, the very acme of polyphonic music. The ancients imagined the pillars of Hercules to mark the utmost boundary of the habitable world, and in just such manner can the musician cite the opening and the closing chorus of the Passion Music as the utmost limits of expressive counterpoint in vocal form. Tallis may have composed a work of 40 real parts; Palestrina may have evolved more complex polyphonic treatment; but "Come, Ye Daughters, Weep for Anguish," and "Around Thy Tomb Here Sit We Weeping" still remain the musical pillars of Hercules. The Chorals, too, are the perfection of congregational work; examine each part separately and one will find a leading of voices so pure and perfect that it will remain a model for all time. But the solos (whisper it not in Gath!) seem tiresome as a whole, and are at times prolix. Bach does not seem as successful as Handel in producing an aria; the Passion Music is essentially a choral triumph, and the solos, spite of the sorrow of "Grief and Pain," the pathos of "Oh pardon me, my God," the remorse of "Give me back my dearest Master," or the beauty of "At Eventide, cool hour of Rest," are not continuously interesting; were the work changed into a choral service altogether, I am not sure but it might become a success with the laity, as it long has been with the musician. The choruses themselves offer abundant contrasts, from the mighty power of the chorals to the fierce Turbæ, the harsh cries of the multitude. Not Wagner himself could have better pictured remorseless and dissonant unanimity than that wild shout of "Barabbas!" The melody of the chorals is always entirely singable, and the recurrent one which becomes "Oh, Sacred Head now Wounded," was at first a love song by Hassler, and began, "Mein G'mueth ist mir verwirret"—"My mind is all distracted." Bach took the tune because it was familiar to his congregation and he could rely upon their singing it with surety. Modern hymn composers also seem to believe in giving popular melodies to the congregations, but they do not take the trouble to attach such harmonies to their productions.

The soloists were great enough to make their thankless task seem more interesting than in preceding performances of the work. Such a list of performers has not been united in a Handel and Haydn concert in a very long while.

The place of honor belongs to Mr. Edward Lloyd, for he sang the frightfully difficult part of the Evangelist, made up altogether of modulations and with a minimum of melody, and it is safe to say that the part has never been sung so well in America. The artist was undoubtedly hoarse, but this seemed to interfere only with a few notes in middle register, and only temporarily at that, while the almost impossible phrases in the highest tessitura were always clear and the intonation true as steel. At times, too, the great singer managed to give an unexpected wealth of expression to the dry recitative, as for example, at the words—"Then went he out and wept bitterly," which were given with indescribable pathos, and the translation of the last words of the Saviour, which was delivered with befitting anguish; but the culmination was in the dramatic rending of the veil of the Temple. Few non-musicians could have known how difficult the entire thankless task was, or how bravely Mr. Lloyd overcame it.

Next to this phenomenal work one may rank the artistic singing of Mr. Henschel. His part was not a large one, but his presentation of the agony of the Passion was most effective, culminating properly, in a most beseeching delivery of the phrase—"Eli, Eli, lama, Sabachthani."

If Mme. Joachim flatted a little in "Look Down, Oh God," at least she sang with the loftiest spirit, the keenest intelligence, and phrased most artistically; all in all it was the most satisfactory work she has yet done in Boston, and her rendering of "Oh, Pardon Me, My God," was something to be remembered. This aria is only to be compared with Handel's "He Was Despised" (one must add that the latter gains by the comparison) where the alto also represents sobs and tears. In this number, however, the language of grief is largely given to the violin, and the obbligato was finely given by Mr. Kneisel, as also the subsequent one in "Give Me Back My Dearest Master." Mrs. Henschel was obliged to force her rather fragile voice, and the result was not always perfect, besides inspiring the auditor with that sense of insecurity which is always fatal to hearty enjoyment of any public work.

Mr. Parker was, as ever, secure and conscientious, just a trifle too explosive, perhaps, when heard in juxtaposition with Mr. Lloyd's even and unforced high passages, but entirely praiseworthy in the sweet "Behold, how still." Mr. Lamson is not suited to this kind of work and I fear that he felt this early in the evening; at first he "romanticized" his part in a manner that made Judas rather Schumannesque, and finally nervousness spoiled portions of "Give me back my dearest Master." But he redeemed the slip somewhat by better work in "At eventide, cool hour of Rest," in which the violin figure of the orchestra also deserved commendation.

But the orchestra as a whole was not good; not only was there a lack of shading, but there was roughness, irregular attack, and a generally poor ensemble. Of course one accepted without cavil, the lack of some of Bach's instruments; "Although my heart" and the subsequent aria, call for two oboi d'Amore, and "From Love unbounded," and "Ah Golgotha," were played with oboi du Caccia obbligatos in Bach's time, but clarinets have come in since his day, and these and English horns or oboes, can atone for the loss of a little antique tone color. The individual points in the orchestral work (in addition to the above mentioned obbligato work) were good; as, for example, the flute in "From love unbounded," the contrabasses in "Ye lightnings, ye thunders," and the oboe in "I'll watch with my dear Jesu"; but the crowning glory of all was the chorus work. The society and Mr. Zerrahn are to be congratulated on the steadiness and clearness with which almost every choral number was executed. The Turbæ and some of the double choruses are difficult things to achieve with good ensemble, yet that is what was conquered last night. Spite of all the excellent points chronicled, the chorus numbers are the glory of this work, and had every solo been omitted, one could still be well content with such grand numbers as these and so well executed. "Around thy tomb here sit we weeping" was the fitting crown of what began so grandly with "Come Ye Daughters," and one could only commiserate the members of the large procession which filed out before it was given. If only the directors of the society would prune the work some more before next season (not touching a single chorus number however) the Passion Music would find as permanent welcome as the at present more popular "Messiah."

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily Globe.
SATURDAY, APRIL 16.

HANDEL AND HAYDN.

Second Evening Concert of the Society at Music Hall.

The second evening concert of the Handel & Haydn Society took place in Music Hall last evening, Bach's "St. Matthew Passion Music," the ninth performance by the organization, forming the programme. The date, Good Friday, April 15, had an anniversary feature, for it was on that day and date that this great religious work was first produced by the composer at Leipsic in 1729.

The oratorio was given in about the same form as last year. Some additions were made to the score to add continuity to the story, and nearly all the original chorals were sung, the audience joining in the singing at designated numbers on the programme, and making the performance very impressive.

Conductor Zerrahn made a very good choice in the solo singers. They were: Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Mrs. Amalie Joachim, contralto; Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. G. J. Parker, tenors; Mr. Georg Henschel, Mr. G. S. Lamson and Mr. Thomas Hooper, basses.

The chorus was augmented by a large number of boys from Emanuel, St. Paul's and Harvard College choirs. The orchestra was composed of Symphony players, Mr. Kneisel principal. Mr. Lang officiated at the organ, and Mr. H. G. Tucker was the pianist.

The hall was crowded to its full capacity, the walls being lined with spectators who were unable to procure seats.

Of the chorus work it may be said it was excellent, and the assistance of the boyish voices in the double chorals made these numbers particularly effective.

The eight-part opening chorus is worthy of mention and "Ye lightnings, ye thunders" was given with grand results, the boy contingent augmenting the chorus with grand results.

The instrumental portion of the composition was well performed, the delicate interludes by the strings being beautifully played, and the work as rendered by chorus and orchestra was in a manner worthy of the interesting religious event.

The soloists of the evening were capable artists and they sang their numbers, which a prominent writer of music terms "archaic," in a generally meritorious manner.

Mr. Lloyd, as the Evangelist, has a long series of difficult recitatives to declaim and in this trying work he was thoroughly successful. His melodious voice was in better form than when he sang in "The Messiah" on Wednesday evening, and his distinct enunciation and dramatic delivery of the lines won every heart. His work was grandly done.

Mr. George J. Parker, tenor, and Mr. Gardner, basso, interpreted the music acceptably.

Mr. Georg Henschel sang with artistic skill and unaffectedly. His long declamations were judiciously managed.

Mrs. Georg Henschel's voice was not at its best, and sounded at times forced and clouded. The lady interpreted her music with expression and true artistic feeling, and many of the passages were exquisitely sung.

Mme. Joachim's contralto was quite effective and her voice easily filled the hall. Her most satisfactory number was the recitative "Look down, O God," in the second part. This artist, by the way, is never heard at her best in the earlier portion of a programme, and her voice seems to improve as she warms to her work.

Mr. Lang, Mr. Tucker and Mr. Hooper ably assisted in their various ways.

On Sunday evening Haydn's oratorio "The Creation" will be performed, with Mrs. Emma Albani, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Myron W. Whitney as soloists.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert's Beethoven recital will be given in Music Hall Monday afternoon, April 18. The other concerts are announced for Wednesday and Saturday afternoons of this week.

The third and last concert by Eugen D'Albert and the Kneisel quartet in Brattle Hall, Cambridge, will take place Tuesday evening, April 19.

Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the soloist at the Symphony concert in Music Hall this evening. Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" will be given for the first time in America, the composer conducting the orchestra.

[illegible]
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 107.
SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The "Passion Music" of Bach by the Handel and Haydn.

The annual performance of selections from Bach's "Passion Music" by the Handel and Haydn Society, given at Music Hall last evening, called out an audience that filled every seat, and the presentation of the usual numbers was listened to with marked interest.

This was the ninth performance of the work by this society since its original production in this country in 1874, and it was made especially noteworthy by the introduction of the custom abroad of having the audience join in the singing of certain of the chorals, an innovation that met with a quick adoption, and one that will unquestionably be more and more generally followed here in future seasons.

The great chorus of the society has never shown to better advantage in the difficult work than on this occasion, the singing of the most difficult chorus numbers displaying a confidence on the part of the singers only made possible by the most faithful preparatory study. Mr. Zerrahn has good cause for satisfaction with the results of the society's singers last evening, and the public owes a debt of gratitude to the veteran conductor for making it possible to hear the great Bach choruses sung as they were last evening.

The chorus was assisted in the performance by Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Mrs. Amalie Joachim, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. George J. Parker, tenor; Mr. Georg Henschel, bass; Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, bass; Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor; Mr. B. J. Lang, organist; Mr. H. G. Tucker, pianist; Mr. Thomas Hooper, Jr., of the chorus, in the additional bass part; players from the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Frank Kneisel, principal, and a large chorus of boys from the choirs of Emmanuel, St. Paul's and Harvard College, prepared by Mr. George L. Osgood and Mr. Warren A. Locke.

Mr. Henschel's singing of the numbers of the role of Jesus has never been approached by any other singer who has attempted this portion of the work, and he again charmed and delighted all who heard him last evening by his thoroughly artistic and intelligent delivery of the music assigned him in last evening's performance. Not a point escaped him, and the rare beauty of his phrasing of the recitatives was again a study for all who appreciate the difficulties incidental to such vocal work.

Mrs. Henschel was heard at some disadvantage in the "Although My Heart" and the following air, but the "From Love Unbounded" was sung in the most admirable fashion, the faultless purity and accuracy of intonation being equalled only by the tones of Mr. Mole's flute in his highly artistic obligato.

Mr. Lloyd was again far from satisfactory, his voice being in such a condition that his efforts to make it respond to the demands made upon it in the lengthy recitatives become almost tiresome. There were times when the turning of a phrase or some artistic touch showed the gifted singer to advantage, as in the concluding words, "Wept very bitterly," in No. 46; but the recitatives have been much better sung in former years by American singers.

Mme. Joachim proved a sad disappointment in the contralto music, her continuously faulty intonation destroying what pleasure was given by her intelligent delivery of her numbers.

Mr. Parker is to be commended for his earnest and artistic work in the second parts for tenor voice, and in the "I'll watch with my dear Jesu" he was highly satisfactory.

Mr. Lamson showed his usual good taste in the parts assigned him, and Mr. Kneisel, as the violin soloist, gave unqualified pleasure.

NOTES.

The first d'Albert piano recital at Music Hall on next Monday afternoon will be given to Beethoven exclusively.

Seats are now ready at Music Hall for the last concert by De Pachmann, the pianist, at Chickering Hall next Thursday afternoon.

Mr. Georg Henschel's "Hamlet" music will have its first hearing at the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall this evening. Mr. Henschel will conduct its performance and Mrs. Henschel is to appear as soloist in the programme.

The Daily American
SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1892.

LAWRENCE,

Eugen D'Albert is a pianist who is the wonder of the musical world even in this day of extraordinary performers. He is to give three final piano recitals in Boston Music Hall, on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons next, the last before his closing tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. D'Albert's special skill as an interpreter of Beethoven's music will be shown in the first recital which has an exclusively Beethoven program. The other programs are rich in the works of modern as well as the old classic composers and some of the most remarkable and magnificent exhibition of piano playing yet heard in Boston may be expected. Season and single tickets can be secured by addressing C. A. Ellis, manager, Boston, Mass.

THE MORNING HERALD
BALTIMORE.
SATURDAY, APRIL 16

NIKISCH.—Mr. and Mrs. Georg

HENSCHEL

AND THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

ACADEMY CONCERT HALL,
APRIL 28.

The Sale of Seats Begins at ALBERT'S on THURSDAY, APRIL 21. No more than the seating capacity of the hall will be sold. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

[185]

[illegible]
SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1892.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.

The Handel and Haydn Society gave Sebastian Bach's "Saint Matthew-Passion" in the Music Hall last evening. The society was assisted by Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Mrs. Amalie Joachim, contralto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. George J. Parker, tenor: Mr. Georg Henschel, bass: Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, bass; the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Mr. Franz Kneisel, leading first violin); a chorus of boys from the choirs of Emmanuel and St. Paul's churches, and of Harvard College; Mr. H. G. Tucker, pianist. Mr. Carl Zerrahn conducted, and Mr. B. J. Lang presided at the organ.

The great work was given, in some ways, on a better plan than ever before in this city; to be sure, we must own to a preference for its being given entire, in an afternoon and evening performance, as it has been once or twice here before; but, this scheme having been judged impracticable this year, the plan adopted was certainly the next best. The cuts made in the work consisted largely of airs; but little of the narrative part was omitted, and more of the chorals were given than at any previous partial performance. There was no lack of continuity in the story, and none of the purely meditative portions were left unexplained by the omission of pertinent narrative matter. Another vast improvement was giving nothing but the part of the Evangelist to Mr. Lloyd, and having the tenor airs sung by another singer, Mr Parker. There is hardly a tenor living who can do full justice to the Evangelist's recitatives and the taxing airs into the bargain; flesh and blood cannot stand the strain. The only improvement we could suggest in the whole arrangement would have been to have the violin obbligato to "Give me back my dearest Master" played by Mr. Roth (leading first violin of the second orchestra), who sat immediately behind Mr. Lamson, who sang the air, instead of by Mr. Kneisel, whose seat was a certain distance off, on the other side of the stage; it is always well to have an elaborate florid obbligato played from a position as near the singer as possible. Besides, this air is assigned in the score to the "Basso solo del Coro II." and its obbligato belongs consequently in the second orchestra. Inviting the audience to join in singing some of the chorals was an idea in favor of which something is undoubtedly to be said; although we think that more is to be urged on the other side. Although proper respect is paid to the sacredness of the work and the season by there being no applause at performances of the "Saint Matthew-Passion" on Good Friday, one can hardly argue that these performances are really religious services; look at them in what light you may, they are and remain essentially concerts. With all the due respect paid to sacred associations, the best musical effect is what is primarily aimed at; they are concerts, if very reverent ones. Now the only thing to be gained by the audience joining in the chorals is, to our mind, its being an imitation of the congregational singing in Lutheran churches in Germany, and we think the musical value of such an imitation very problematical, at best. It is not as if the Lutheran choral had any specifically ecclesiastical associations for us New Englanders—as "Federal Street" and other familiar and long-loved psalm tunes have—for most of us know the Lutheran choral simply as music; it is no more associated in our minds with congregational singing at divine service than any other sacred music. If the value of the plan is supposed to lie in sacredness of association, we think it fails utterly; for there is an element of artificiality in it that is foreign to the idea of religious devotion. No more need, however, be urged against it at present, for last evening it was a total failure; continuous enjoyment of the music was sadly interrupted by the time lost in getting the audience upon its feet, and hardly anyone sang. The only singing by members of the audience that we could detect was done by a few men who sang the bass part! A more direct slap in the face to German methods of congregational singing could hardly be imagined. We hope this sort of thing will not be tried again.

That the "Saint Matthew-Passion" has well worked its way into the hearts of our Boston public was sufficiently evidenced by the enormous audience last evening; it is good, too, to hear, as we do on the best authority, that the Handel and Haydn Chorus take more and more unfeigned pleasure in "wrestling with old Bach's terrible choruses." They sang, for the most part, exceedingly well last evening; with firmness, accuracy, and vigor; slips, or blurred passages, were the exception. The boy choir was immensely effective both in the opening triple chorus, and in the great figured choral, "Man, bewail thy sin so great," in which latter it sang for the first time. The orchestra played excellently, and we are now beginning to feel the full value of Franz's additional accompaniments; the seating of the orchestra has been much improved, the wooden wind, especially Franz's quartet of clarinets and bassoons, being brought farther to the front than formerly. The thing they call an organ had the grip, complicated with asthma; an ode ought to be written to that wondrous instrument by the author of "Les Râles d'un Asphyxié."

Of the solo singers we would speak first of Mrs. Joachim. Let us admit at once that her voice has lost its freshness, and that she frequently sings out of tune; this is undeniable. If some singing-teacher tell us that her production of tone is bad, we must take his word for it, for we are no specialist; we can only wish, as a musician, that a good many other singers produced their tone just like her. In spite of all possible and impossible drawbacks, we found her singing last evening utterly superb. Here is a great and famous singer, absolutely the first one we can remember, who can actually do what any second violinist in an orchestra can do, namely, sing throughout exactly in time! She not only sings in time but, none the less, with the most poignant emotional expressiveness, such as most singers seem to think inseparable from exaggerated rubato and the devil-knows-what-not that is untimely. We heard a singer say the other day that Franz's accompaniments to Bach and Handel airs were musically beautiful, if you will, but they were not favorable to the singer; with all of which we agree heartily, with one reservation—they are unfavorable to the singer who sings wrong! Only sing strictly in time, as Mrs. Joachim does, and as Bach and Handel ought to be sung, and you will find that the accompaniment falls in with the voice as naturally and easily as possible. Note, too, that when Mrs. Joachim sings in exact time, she does so without any mere mechanical sing-song, but with the profoundest expressiveness. She has read us a lesson worth the learning. Mr. Henschel sang the part of Christ very beautifully and impressively. It is no mean tribute to his artistic force to say that we felt this throughout, for he conceives the music quite differently from ourselves; his is rather a sentimental, Carlo Dolci Christ, and such an one is not wholly to our liking. But Mr. Henschel imposed his conception upon the listener with a power that was irresistible; there was no gainsaying the deep beauty of the impression he produced. Mr. Lloyd was admirable at every point as the Evangelist; one can hardly imagine those wonderful recitatives more finely sung. Mrs. Henschel, albeit her voice is still a little slight for the Music Hall, sang the soprano airs almost to perfection; her singing of "From love, from love unbounded," with Mr. Molé's flut obligato, was a dream of purity and beauty. Mr. Parker, also, in the two tenor airs, was superb. Mr. Lamson has never done such fine singing in our hearing as last evening; in the recitatives he was full of dramatic fire (of the right sort), and he sang the bass airs capitally, with true expression and great effect. His one unlucky slip in "Give Me Back My Dearest Master," is to be attributable to nervousness and inexperience, rather than to want of musicianship; for he got out in so perfectly simple a place that the very surprise at finding himself astray at all must have been more confusing to him than the fact of his being out. It was just one of those little accidents that may happen to any one. Upon the whole it may be said emphatically that this was the best performance of the "Passion" yet given here.

The Handel and Haydn Society will close its season tomorrow night by a performance at the Music Hall of "The Creation," with Mrs. Emma Albani and Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Myron W. Whitney for solo singers.

Eugen D'Albert will give concerts of pianoforte music at the Music Hall on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday of next week. The first programme, made up of works by Beethoven, includes thirty-two variations, C minor; and the sonatas, op. 53, 90, 109 and 110. The other programmes are varied, covering a wide range of composers.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.
403 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.
SATURDAY, APRIL 16,

THE MESSIAH.

The Handel and Haydn society celebrated at Music Hall on Wednesday evening the 150th anniversary of Handel's first production of his oratorio "The Messiah." Those assisting in the performance were Mrs. Genevra Johnstone Bishop, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. M. W. Whitney, basso; Mr. B. J. Lang, organist; players from the Symphony orchestra with Mr. Franz Kneisel at their head, Mr. Pierre Müller, trumpet soloist, and Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor. Of the soloists Mrs. Alves and Mr. Lloyd did the most satisfactory work of the evening. Mrs. Alves has a beautiful voice which she uses in an intelligent and musicianly manner. All her work was more than good, and her rendering of "Behold a virgin shall conceive," with the air following was one of the finest performances of the evening. Mrs. Alves' enunciation is clear, her attack clean, and she sings with much feeling. Mr. Lloyd is perhaps the most perfect interpreter of oratorio music now before the public, and when that has been said it is almost unnecessary to say that his performance was a fine one, notwithstanding the slight hoarseness from which he suffered. Mrs. Bishop's performance was unworthy the music allotted to her. She would probably appear to better advantage in music of another style, but on Wednesday night her voice was hard and unsympathetic, and she has a bad habit of slurring up to her notes instead of taking them squarely. She took the "I Know that My Redeemer Liveth" much too slowly, and "Rejoice Greatly" in a manner that was almost jiggy. Mr. Whitney's work was not quite up to his usual high standard, but an artist of his caliber may easily fall a little from grace, and yet do enjoyable work. The choral work of the society was on the whole most satisfactory. The attack was clean-cut, the slips from pitch very few, and the body of tone rich and full. The society's best efforts were "All we like sheep" and "For unto us a child is born," the latter being one of the best features of the performance. The orchestra, under the directorship of Mr. Zerrahn, did fine work.

VALENTINE.

Of Eugen D'Albert who is to give three recitals at Music Hall on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons, little can be said that is not already known. His remarkable career, stupendous power and great reputation are matters of which the public are thoroughly informed, and his playing has delighted and astonished them so recently that it is still fresh in their memory. D'Albert is pre-eminent as a Beethoven player and his first program will be entirely of this master's works. On Wednesday and Saturday they comprise selections from the time of Bach to Liszt and will show this "little giant" at his best.

At the third and last concert of its series at Brattle Hall, Cambridge, on Tuesday evening next, the Kneisel Quartet will have the co-operation of Mr. Eugen D Albert who will be heard in chamber music on this occasion for the only time in this vicinity.

The Morning Times
SATURDAY MORNING, APRIL 16.

LOWELL

Lowell lovers of music should not overlook an artistic attraction of the greatest merit which is to be presented next week in Boston Music hall. The renowned piano virtuoso, Mr. Eugen d'Albert, will give three recitals at Music hall—Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons at 2 30. The great fame of the distinguished artist and the fact that this will be the only opportunity of hearing him will be likely to cause a large number to attend from Lowell. Tickets are sold at the very reasonable price of $1.50, and are now to be had at the box office.

THE COMMONWEALTH.
ESTABLISHED IN 1862.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1892.

The season of the Handel and Haydn Society's concerts closes with the production of Haydn's 'Creation' tomorrow evening. In the week ending with this performance there have been produced Handel's 'Messiah' on Wednesday evening and Bach's Passion Music on Friday evening. Of the latter, we have no opportunity to speak in this issue, beyond the brief statement that the work was given with a perfection of choral singing not before equalled and with an ideal cast of soloists.

The 'Messiah' was given as an extra concert in the season of this Society, taking the form of a commemoration of the first production of the work in Dublin, one hundred and fifty years ago. When listening to the familiar choruses as given by mammoth choir of the Handel and Haydn Society and the wealth of instrumental resources added from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was possible to form some idea of the vast difference in conditions to-day and when the 'Messiah' was heard in Dublin with the small chorus and the meagre orchestra of that time. It was an object lesson in the advance of musical art.

There is little new that can be said of the choral performances. The work of the Handel and Haydn Society in this line is always admirable; it is the standard with which we compare other performances. The soloists—Mrs. Bishop, Mrs. Alves, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Whitney—made a good impression, despite an evident hoarseness from which Mr. Lloyd suffered.

Tomorrow evening the 'Creation' will be produced for the first time in five years, with Mrs. Albani, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Whitney as soloists.

The series of pianoforte recitals by Eugen d'Albert at Music Hall next week is exciting very pleasurable anticipations. Very few pianists have established such a gratifying reputation among the judicious as this gifted young player, and his return is welcome indeed. The programmes offered for these recitals are very attractive. That for the Monday concert is entirely Beethoven. It includes the '32 Variations' and four sonatas—Op. 53, 90, 109, 110. On Wednesday and Saturday afternoons, the programmes are varied, containing much of interest and ranging from Bach to Brahms and Rubinstein.

Boston Daily Globe.
MONDAY, APRIL 18.

HEARD THE CREATION.

Solos and Duets Executed With Perfection.

Interpretation of Sweet Airs by Albani Swayed the Audience.

Attaches of the Hollis and Columbia Given Benefits.

Haydn's oratorio, "The Creation," was given last night as the Easter offering of the Handel and Haydn Society, closing the society's season.

The first performance of the oratorio by this society was in 1819, and its last presentation previous to last night was five years ago. In the 68 years intervening this organization gave 62 performances of the composition.

"The Creation" requires a high grade of talents in the soloists and good material and thorough training in the chorus for worthy and adequate rendition, and for last night's production no pains had been spared in supplying these wants. The society was assisted by Mrs. Emma Albani, soprano; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. Myron W. Whitney, bass; besides instrumentalists from the Boston symphony orchestra. Mr. Carl Zerrahn was the conductor, and Mr. B. J. Lang officiated at the organ.

The soloists all acquitted themselves with distinguished ability, a fact of which their names alone would be a sufficient voucher.

Mrs. Albani's voice is excellently adapted to oratorio. She sang last night most tastefully and effectively. Her interpretation of the sweet airs assigned to Gabriel was never wanting in expression, and the sympathy and feeling which she at the same time seemed to feel and to inspire would tempt one to a free use of superlatives in describing her work. Her singing was more admirable in the solos than in the trios and duets for the most part, but it was at no point careless or inaccurate.

The air "On Mighty Pens Uplifted" was vocal with the music of the woods, and it did not need the naming of the birds to give a vivid impression of the songs of nature as first heard on the fifth day of the creation.

In the duets in the third part, the joyful songs of praise of Adam and Eve, Mrs. Albani's melodious soprano blended to fine advantage with Mr. Whitney's bass, and it could only be with keen regret that any in the audience, dependent upon suburban trains, left the hall before the close of the oratorio.

Mr. Whitney, by the great range of his voice, its power coupled with flexibility and expressiveness, aided in making the evening's performance a memorable one. The ease with which he reached the low tones in the seventh and 22d numbers, and the beautiful quality of his voice rendered those numbers among the gems of the oratorio as heard last night.

He made a decided impression too in the duets and trios.

In the air "In native worth and honor clad," Mr. Phelps was heard to best advantage, and this was one of the most artistic features of the evening. In his previous solos there was a trace of hoarseness, but here it entirely disappeared, and the part was rendered with sincerity and with true musical quality. Mr. Phelps' work was of uneven merit, but it contained much to commend.

The choruses were much stronger than when "The Creation" was last rendered by the society. The fidelity with which the work was carried out, the precision in execution and the admirable [illegible]

[illegible]

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 107.

SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The "Passion Music" of Bach by the Handel and Haydn.

The annual performance of selections from Bach's "Passion Music" by the Handel and Haydn Society, given at Music Hall last evening, called out an audience that filled every seat, and the presentation of the usual numbers was listened to with marked interest.

This was the ninth performance of the work by this society since its original production in this country in 1874, and it was made especially noteworthy by the introduction of the custom abroad of having the audience join in the singing of certain of the chorals, an innovation that met with a quick adoption, and one that will unquestionably be more and more generally followed here in future seasons.

The great chorus of the society has never shown to better advantage in the difficult work than on this occasion, the singing of the most difficult chorus numbers displaying a confidence on the part of the singers only made possible by the most faithful preparatory study. Mr. Zerrahn has good cause for satisfaction with the results of the society's singers last evening, and the public owes a debt of gratitude to the veteran conductor for making it possible to hear the great Bach choruses sung as they were last evening.

The chorus was assisted in the performance by Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Mrs. Amalie Joachim, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. George J. Parker, tenor; Mr. Georg Henschel, bass; Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, bass; Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor; Mr. B. J. Lang, organist; Mr. H. G Tucker, pianist; Mr. Thomas Hooper, Jr., of the chorus, in the additional bass part; players from the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Frank Kneisel, principal, and a large chorus of boys from the choirs of Emmanuel, St. Paul's and Harvard College, prepared by Mr. George L. Osgood and Mr. Warren A. Locke.

Mr. Henschel's singing of the numbers of the role of Jesus has never been approached by any other singer who has attempted this portion of the work, and he again charmed and delighted all who heard him last evening by his thoroughly artistic and intelligent delivery of the music assigned him in last evening's performance. Not a point escaped him, and the rare beauty of his phrasing of the recitatives was again a study for all who appreciate the difficulties incidental to such vocal work.

Mrs. Henschel was heard at some disadvantage in the "Although My Heart" and the following air, but the "From Love Unbounded" was sung in the most admirable fashion, the faultless purity and accuracy of intonation being equalled only by the tones of Mr. Mole's flute in his highly artistic obligato.

Mr. Lloyd was again far from satisfactory, his voice being in such a condition that his efforts to make it respond to the demands made upon it in the lengthy recitatives become almost tiresome. There were times when the turning of a phrase or some artistic touch showed the gifted singer to advantage, as in the concluding words, "Wept very bitterly," in No. 46; but the recitatives have been much better sung in former years by American singers.

Mme. Joachim proved a sad disappointment in the contralto music, her continuously faulty intonation destroying what pleasure was given by her intelligent delivery of her numbers.

Mr. Parker is to be commended for his earnest and artistic work in the second parts for tenor voice, and in the "I'll watch with my dear Jesu" he was highly satisfactory.

Mr. Lamson showed his usual good taste in the parts assigned him, and Mr. Kneisel, as the violin soloist, gave unqualified pleasure.

NOTES.

The first d'Albert piano recital at Music Hall on next Monday afternoon will be given to Beethoven exclusively.

Seats are now ready at Music Hall for the Liszt concert by De Pachmann, the pianist, at Chickering Hall next Thursday afternoon.

Mr. Georg Henschel's "Hamlet" music will have its first hearing at the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall this evening. Mr. Henschel will conduct its performance and Mrs. Henschel is to appear as soloist in the programme.

The Daily American

SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1892.

LAWRENCE,

Eugen D'Albert is a pianist who is the wonder of the musical world even in this day of extraordinary performers. He is to give three dual piano recitals in Boston Music Hall, on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons next, the last before his closing tour with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. D'Albert's special skill as an interpreter of Beethoven's music will be shown in the first recital which has an exclusively Beethoven program. The other programs are rich in the works of modern as well as the old classic composers and some of the most remarkable and magnificent exhibition of piano playing yet heard in Boston may be expected. Season and single tickets can be secured by addressing C. A. Ellis, manager, Boston, Mass.

THE MORNING HERALD
BALTIMORE.

SATURDAY, APRIL 16

NIKISCH.—Mr. and Mrs. Georg
HENSCHEL
AND THE
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
ACADEMY CONCERT HALL,
APRIL 28.

The Sale of Seats Begins at ALBERT'S on THURSDAY, APRIL 21. No more than the seating capacity of the hall will be sold. C. A. ELLIS, ap16&17 Manager.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1892.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.

The Handel and Haydn Society gave Sebastian Bach's "Saint Matthew-Passion" in the Music Hall last evening. The society was assisted by Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Mrs. Amalie Joachim, contralto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. George J. Parker, tenor: Mr. Georg Henschel, bass: Mr. Gardner S. Lamson, bass; the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Mr. Franz Kneisel, leading first violin); a chorus of boys from the choirs of Emmanuel and St. Paul's churches, and of Harvard College; Mr. H. G. Tucker, pianist. Mr. Carl Zerrahn conducted, and Mr. B. J. Lang presided at the organ.

The great work was given, in some ways, on a better plan than ever before in this city; to be sure, we must own to a preference for its being given entire, in an afternoon and evening performance, as it has been once or twice here before; but, this scheme having been judged impracticable this year, the plan adopted was certainly the next best. The cuts made in the work consisted largely of airs; but little of the narrative part was omitted, and more of the chorals were given than at any previous partial performance. There was no lack of continuity in the story, and none of the purely meditative portions were left unexplained by the omission of pertinent narrative matter. Another vast improvement was giving nothing but the part of the Evangelist to Mr. Lloyd, and having the tenor airs sung by another singer, Mr Parker. There is hardly a tenor living who can do full justice to the Evangelist's recitatives and the taxing airs into the bargain; flesh and blood cannot stand the strain. The only improvement we could suggest in the whole arrangement would have been to have the violin obbligato to "Give me back my dearest Master" played by Mr. Roth (leading first violin of the second orchestra), who sat immediately behind Mr. Lamson, who sang the air, instead of by Mr. Kneisel, whose seat was a certain distance off, on the other side of the stage; it is always well to have an elaborate florid obbligato played from a position as near the singer as possible. Besides, this air is assigned in the score to the "Basso solo del Coro II." and its obbligato belongs consequently in the second orchestra. Inviting the audience to join in singing some of the chorals was an idea in favor of which something is undoubtedly to be said; although we think that more is to be urged on the other side. Although proper respect is paid to the sacredness of the work and the season by there being no applause at performances of the "Saint Matthew-Passion" on Good Friday, one can hardly argue that these performances are really religious services; look at them in what light you may, they are and remain essentially concerts. With all the due respect paid to sacred associations, the best musical effect is what is primarily aimed at; they are concerts, if very reverent ones. Now the only thing to be gained by the audience joining in the chorals is, to our mind, its being an imitation of the congregational singing in Lutheran churches in Germany, and we think the musical value of such an imitation very problematical, at best. It is not as if the Lutheran choral had any specifically ecclesiastical associations for us New Englanders—as "Federal Street" and other familiar and long-loved psalm tunes have—for most of us know the Lutheran choral simply as music; it is no more associated in our minds with congregational singing at divine service than any other sacred music. If the value of the plan is supposed to lie in sacredness of association, we think it fails utterly; for there is an element of artificiality in it that is foreign to the idea of religious devotion. No more need, however, be urged against it at present, for last evening it was a total failure; continuous enjoyment of the music was sadly interrupted by the time lost in getting the audience upon its feet, and hardly anyone sang. The only singing by members of the audience that we could detect was done by a few men who sang the bass part! A more direct slap in the face to German methods of congregational singing could hardly be imagined. We hope this sort of thing will not be tried again.

That the "Saint Matthew-Passion" has well worked its way into the hearts of our Boston public was sufficiently evidenced by the enormous audience last evening; it is good, too, to hear, as we do on the best authority, that the Handel and Haydn Chorus take more and more unfeigned pleasure in "wrestling with old Bach's terrible choruses." They sang, for the most part, exceedingly well last evening; with firmness, accuracy, and vigor; slips, or blurred passages, were the exception. The boy choir was immensely effective both in the opening triple chorus, and in the great figured choral, "Man, bewail thy sin so great," in which latter it sang for the first time. The orchestra played excellently, and we are now beginning to feel the full value of Franz's additional accompaniments; the seating of the orchestra has been much improved, the wooden wind, especially Franz's quartet of clarinets and bassoons, being brought farther to the front than formerly. The thing they call an organ had the grip, complicated with asthma; an ode ought to be written to that wondrous instrument by the author of "Les Râles d'un Asphyxié."

Of the solo singers we would speak first of Mrs. Joachim. Let us admit at once that her voice has lost its freshness, and that she frequently sings out of tune; this is undeniable. If some singing-teacher tell us that her production of tone is bad, we must take his word for it, for we are no specialist; we can only wish, as a musician, that a good many other singers produced their tone just like her. In spite of all possible and impossible drawbacks, we found her singing last evening utterly superb. Here is a great and famous singer, absolutely the first one we can remember, who can actually do what any second violinist in an orchestra can do, namely, sing throughout exactly in time! She not only sings in time but, none the less, with the most poignant emotional expressiveness, such as most singers seem to think inseparable from exaggerated rubato and the devil-knows-what-not that is untimely. We heard a singer say the other day that Franz's accompaniments to Bach and Handel airs were musically beautiful, if you will, but they were not favorable to the singer; with all of which we agree heartily, with one reservation—they are unfavorable to the singer who sings wrong! Only sing strictly in time, as Mrs. Joachim does, and as Bach and Handel ought to be sung, and you will find that the accompaniment falls in with the voice as naturally and easily as possible. Note, too, that when Mrs. Joachim sings in exact time, she does so without any mere mechanical sing-song, but with the profoundest expressiveness. She has read us a lesson worth the learning. Mr. Henschel sang the part of Christ very beautifully and impressively. It is no mean tribute to his artistic force to say that we felt this throughout, for he conceives the music quite differently from ourselves; his is rather a sentimental, Carlo Dolci Christ, and such an one is not wholly to our liking. But Mr. Henschel imposed his conception upon the listener with a power that was irresistible; there was no gainsaying the deep beauty of the impression he produced. Mr. Lloyd was admirable at every point as the Evangelist; one can hardly imagine those wonderful recitatives more finely sung. Mrs. Henschel, albeit her voice is still a little slight for the Music Hall, sang the soprano airs almost to perfection: her singing of "From love, from love unbounded," with Mr. Molé's flut obligato, was a dream of purity and beauty. Mr. Parker, also, in the two tenor airs, was superb. Mr. Lamson has never done such fine singing in our hearing as last evening; in the recitatives he was full of dramatic fire (of the right sort), and he sang the bass airs capitally, with true expression and great effect. His one unlucky slip in "Give Me Back My Dearest Master," is to be attributable to nervousness and inexperience, rather than to want of musicianship; for he got out in so perfectly simple a place that the very surpise at finding himself astray at all must have been more confusing to him than the fact of his being out. It was just one of those little accidents that may happen to any one. Upon the whole it may be said emphatically that this was the best performance of the "Passion" yet given here.

The Handel and Haydn Society will close its season tomorrow night by a performance at the Music Hall of "The Creation," with Mrs. Emma Albani and Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Myron W. Whitney for solo singers.

Eugen D'Albert will give concerts of pianoforte music at the Music Hall on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday of next week. The first programme, made up of works by Beethoven, includes thirty-two variations, C minor; and the sonatas, op. 53, 90, 109 and 110. The other programmes are varied, covering a wide range of composers.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

403 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.

SATURDAY, APRIL 16,

THE MESSIAH.

The Handel and Haydn society celebrated at Music Hall on Wednesday evening the 150th anniversary of Handel's first production of his oratorio "The Messiah." Those assisting in the performance were Mrs. Genevra Johnstone Bishop, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. M. W. Whitney, basso; Mr. B. J. Lang, organist; players from the Symphony orchestra with Mr. Franz Kneisel at their head, Mr. Pierre Müller, trumpet soloist, and Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor. Of the soloists Mrs. Alves and Mr. Lloyd did the most satisfactory work of the evening. Mrs. Alves has a beautiful voice which she uses in an intelligent and musicianly manner. All her work was more than good, and her rendering of "Behold a virgin shall conceive," with the air following was one of the finest performances of the evening. Mrs. Alves' enunciation is clear, her attack clean, and she sings with much feeling. Mr. Lloyd is perhaps the most perfect interpreter of oratorio music now before the public, and when that has been said it is almost unnecessary to say that his performance was a fine one, notwithstanding the slight hoarseness from which he suffered. Mrs. Bishop's performance was unworthy the music allotted to her. She would probably appear to better advantage in music of another style, but on Wednesday night her voice was hard and unsympathetic, and she has a bad habit of slurring up to her notes instead of taking them squarely. She took the "I Know that My Redeemer Liveth" much too slowly, and "Rejoice Greatly" in a manner that was almost jiggy. Mr. Whitney's work was not quite up to his usual high standard, but an artist of his caliber may easily fall a little from grace, and yet do enjoyable work. The choral work of the society was on the whole most satisfactory. The attack was clean-cut, the slips from pitch very few, and the body of tone rich and full. The society's best efforts were "All we like sheep" and "For unto us a child is born," the latter being one of the best features of the performance. The orchestra, under the directorship of Mr. Zerrahn, did fine work. VALENTINE.

Of Eugen D'Albert who is to give three recitals at Music Hall on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons, little can be said that is not already known. His remarkable career, stupendous power and great reputation are matters of which the public are thoroughly informed, and his playing has delighted and astonished them so recently that it is still fresh in their memory. D'Albert is pre-eminent as a Beethoven player and his first program will be entirely of this master's works. On Wednesday and Saturday they comprise selections from the time of Bach to Liszt aud will show this "little giant" at his best.

At the third and last concert of its series at Brattle Hall, Cambridge, on Tuesday evening next, the Kneisel Quartet will have the co-operation of Mr. Eugen D Albert who will be heard in chamber music on this occasion for the only time in this vicinity.

The Morning Times

SATURDAY MORNING. APRIL 16.

LOWELL

Lowell lovers of music should not overlook an artistic attraction of the greatest merit which is to be presented next week in Boston Music hall. The renowned piano virtuoso, Mr. Eugen d'Albert, will give three recitals at Music hall—Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons at 2 30. The great fame of the distinguished artist and the fact that this will be the only opportunity of hearing him will be likely to cause a large number to attend from Lowell. Tickets are sold at the very reasonable price of $1.50, and are now to be had at the box office.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 16, 1892.

The season of the Handel and Haydn Society's concerts closes with the production of Haydn's 'Creation' tomorrow evening. In the week ending with this performance there have been produced Handel's 'Messiah' on Wednesday evening and Bach's Passion Music on Friday evening. Of the latter, we have no opportunity to speak in this issue, beyond the brief statement that the work was given with a perfection of choral singing not before equalled and with an ideal cast of soloists.

The 'Messiah' was given as an extra concert in the season of this Society, taking the form of a commemoration of the first production of the work in Dublin, one hundred and fifty years ago. When listening to the familiar choruses as given by mammoth choir of the Handel and Haydn Society and the wealth of instrumental resources added from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was possible to form some idea of the vast difference in conditions to-day and when the 'Messiah' was heard in Dublin with the small chorus and the meagre orchestra of that time. It was an object lesson in the advance of musical art.

There is little new that can be said of the choral performances. The work of the Handel and Haydn Society in this line is always admirable; it is the standard with which we compare other performances. The soloists—Mrs. Bishop, Mrs. Alves, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Whitney—made a good impression, despite an evident hoarseness from which Mr. Lloyd suffered.

Tomorrow evening the 'Creation' will be produced for the first time in five years, with Mrs. Albani, Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Whitney as soloists.

The series of pianoforte recitals by Eugen d'Albert at Music Hall next week is exciting very pleasurable anticipations. Very few pianists have established such a gratifying reputation among the judicious as this gifted young player, and his return is welcome indeed. The programmes offered for these recitals are very attractive. That for the Monday concert is entirely Beethoven. It includes the '32 Variations' and four sonatas—Op. 53, 90, 109, 110. On Wednesday and Saturday afternoons, the programmes are varied, containing much of interest and ranging from Bach to Brahms and Rubinstein.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, APRIL 18.

HEARD THE CREATION.

Solos and Duets Executed With Perfection.

Interpretation of Sweet Airs by Albani Swayed the Audience.

Attaches of the Hollis and Columbia Given Benefits.

Haydn's oratorio, "The Creation," was given last night as the Easter offering of the Handel and Haydn Society, closing the society's season.

The first performance of the oratorio by this society was in 1819, and its last presentation previous to last night was five years ag[illegible] the 68 years intervening this organiza[illegible] gave 62 performances of the composition.

"The Creation" requires a high grade of talents in the soloists and good material and thorough training in the chorus for worthy and adequate rendition, and for last night's production no pains had been spared in supplying these wants. The society was assisted by Mrs. Emma Albani, soprano; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. Myron W. Whitney, bass; besides instrumentalists from the Boston symphony orchestra. Mr. Carl Zerrahn was the conductor, and Mr. B. J. Lang officiated at the organ.

The soloists all acquitted themselves with distinguished ability, a fact of which their names alone would be a sufficient voucher.

Mrs. Albani's voice is excellently adapted to oratorio. She sang last night most tastefully and effectively. Her interpretation of the sweet airs assigned to Gabriel was never wanting in expression, and the sympathy and feeling which she at the same time seemed to feel and to inspire would tempt one to a free use of superlatives in describing her work. Her singing was more admirable in the solos than in the trios and duets for the most part, but it was at no point careless or inaccurate.

The air "On Mighty Pens Uplifted" was vocal with the music of the woods, and it did not need the naming of the birds to give a vivid impression of the songs of nature as first heard on the fifth day of the creation.

In the duets in the third part, the joyful songs of praise of Adam and Eve, Mrs. Albani's melodious soprano blended to fine advantage with Mr. Whitney's bass, and it could only be with keen regret that any in the audience, dependent upon suburban trains, left the hall before the close of the oratorio.

Mr. Whitney, by the great range of his voice, its power coupled with flexibility and expressiveness, aided in making the evening's performance a memorable one. The ease with which he reached the low tones in the seventh and 22d numbers, and the beautiful quality of his voice rendered those numbers among the gems of the oratorio as heard last night.

He made a decided impression too in the duets and trios.

In the air "In native worth and honor clad," Mr. Phelps was heard to best advantage, and this was one of the most artistic features of the evening. In his previous solos there was a trace of hoarseness, but here it entirely disappeared, and the part was rendered with sincerity and with true musical quality. Mr. Phelps' work was of uneven merit, but it contained much to commend.

The choruses were much stronger than when "The Creation" was last rendered by the society. The fidelity with which the work was carried out, the precision in execution and the admirable balance maintained between the several parts leave little to criticise.

The instrumental music under Mr. Zerrahn's baton was well performed. There was an occasional defect, but such occasions were rare.

In general, the performance was as thoroughly enjoyable as any given by the Handel and Haydn Society which most devotees of oratorio can recall. The audience, as goes without saying, was as large as Music Hall can contain. Applause was hearty and judicious, and floral offerings added their silent tribute of appreciation.

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON, APRIL 17, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

The audience at last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra filled every seat in the hall and all the available standing room. The special attraction was doubtless the reappearance of Mr. Georg Henschel at the conductor's stand which he occupied for the first three years of the Symphony Orchestra's existence. His reception was enthusiastically cordial when he came forward to conduct his Suite from the music he composed to Shakespeare's "Hamlet" for Mr. Beerbohm Tree's production of the tragedy in London. The suite opens with a prelude intended to typify the character of Hamlet. It is followed by another prelude meant to suggest the sweetness of Ophelia's nature. Then comes an interlude that deals again with Hamlet in a more resolute mode, and this in turn is followed by a pastorale, after which comes another prelude illustrating the death of Ophelia, the whole concluding with a Danish march. This music is all in the extreme modern school, is very chromatic in its harmonies, restless in its modulations and exceedingly rich in its orchestral coloring. It is musicianly, but it is not especially felicitous in invention, and it has no originality decided enough to give it the distinction of an individuality essentially the composer's. The themes are very brief and are reiterated and reiterated again until they become almost wearisomely monotonous. The hearer carries nothing away with him except the memory of a distant Wagnerian echo. The Ophelia prelude has a certain warmth and graceful flow, but the pastorale is the gem of the suite in its quaint and well rounded melody, its tender melancholy, its charming simplicity and its delicate orchestration. The music shows in all directions the skill and the taste of a thorough musician, and a fine artistic temperament; but it is music that has been laboriously "made," and is of the head rather than the heart. It was beautifully played, Mr. Henschel conducting firmly and without display, and obtaining with ease every shade of color and of expression that he desired. His method is clear and unostentatious, and judging by his success of last night, he has, since he last led this orchestra some eight seasons ago, become an able and a finished conductor. His music met with warm appreciation, and he was applauded with great enthusiasm and twice recalled. The other instrumental selections were Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, and Weber's "Oberon" overture. The first was read with immense vigor, but with that obstinate disregard of the composer's intentions that seems to be a mania with Mr. Nikisch, and of which it has become wearisome to complain. Mrs. Henschel was the soloist, and sang the air, "Lusinghe piu care," from Handel's "Alessandro," in which she has frequently been heard here, and the familiar air from Massenet's "Herodiade." The first she sang prettily and neatly, and with much grace of florid execution, though without great variety of expression. The second she sang with more warmth, but her voice is not large enough to do it full justice, especially in so vast a hall. She was applauded with immense fervor, and recalled three times after her first effort, and twice after her second. The season will close with this week's concert, the programme for which is: Symphony in G, Haydn; Concerto for violin, Paganini, and Brahms's Symphony No. 1. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

Music Notes.

On Wednesday evening the Handel and Haydn Society gave its memorial performance of "The Messiah," that date being the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the original production of the work. The society was assisted by Mrs. Genevra Johnstone Bishop, Mrs. Carl Alves, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Myron W. Whitney, and a full orchestra. The audience completely filled Music Hall, and was very enthusiastic. The best feature of the performance was the singing of the chorus, which was excellent in its steadiness, its invariably firm attack, its smoothness and its admirable tone color. In brief the success of the chorus on this occasion fully equalled that achieved by it in the same work some months ago, and reflected like credit on itself and on Mr. Zerrahn. We think, however, that Mr. Zerrahn was not as felicitous in his tempi last week as he was at the Christmas performance. Several of the choruses were taken somewhat too slowly and the effect was stiff and dry, notably in the first chorus, "And the Glory of the Lord," which moved heavily and thickly for lack of greater spirit in the movement. The pastoral symphony dragged somewhat from the same cause. The soloists appeared to be affected also by a tendency to sing their music at too slow a pace. "He was Despised," was a case in point. The tempo was so drawn out that the melody scarcely hung together. "He shall feed his flocks" and "I know that my Redeemer liveth," were likewise given with a slowness that deprived them not only of emphasis, but of spirit. As we have stated in this column on previous occasions, we could never understand why "I know that my Redeemer liveth" should be sung as if it were a dirge instead of the uplifting expression of faith in immortality that it is. Instead of exulting in the belief of a life to come, the singer generally moans and mourns over it, as if it were a thing to be lamented with tears and sighs. Handel, who was nothing if not dramatic, surely never meant the air to be sung regretfully, in defiance of both words and music. Of the soloists we may speak briefly. Mrs. Bishop has a voice of natural purity and sweetness, but her use of it cannot be praised. She attacks her notes from below and "scoops" up to them with unpleasing effect. Her tone production is faulty, inasmuch as it results too frequently in nasality. Her phrasing is not artistic, and her intonation is not always true. In "Rejoice greatly" she sang with flexible ease, but in a manner that was perfunctory rather than spontaneous; and in "I know that my Redeemer liveth" she was quite inadequate. In other words, Mrs. Bishop failed to justify her selection as the soprano soloist on this occasion. Mrs. Alves, on the other hand, acquitted herself admirably. She sang with taste, intelligence, and ability, and with excellent artistic judgment, and though now and then there was a harsh lower note, her efforts on the whole may be justly praised with but little reserve. Mr. Lloyd was manifestly laboring under a severe cold, and was therefore not heard at his best; but his fine skill and his thorough musicianly style made him always interesting, and in the air "Thou shalt break them" he was heard with a brilliant effect that won for him the most enthusiastic applause of the evening. Mr. Whitney sang the bass solos in which he has been heard here so often, and his singing of them drew forth as much applause as it has done at any time in the past.

On Friday evening Bach's Passion Music was given in the condensed form in which it has always been presented by the Society. It could have been curtailed still more with advantage, especially in the recitatives sung by the Evangelist, which though deeply interesting in the harmonies that accompany them, are dry, not to say wearisome in effect, when heard in the concert room, impressive and neccessary as they may be when the work is sung as a church service. The solos were sung by Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mrs. Amalie Joachim, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr George J. Parker, Mr. Georg Henschel, and Mr. Gardner S. Lamson. Mr. B. J. Lang presided at the organ and Mr. H. G. Tucker at the pianoforte. A boy choir assisted and Mr. Kneisel was the concert master. The audience filled the hall to overflowing. The chorus again distinguished itself by the steadiness and the precision of its performances. Now and then it was felt that the alto voices were not sufficiently numerous to produce their due balance of effect, but otherwise the results were wholly admirable. Mr. Lloyd, who sang the music of the principal Narrator, was again in bad voice, but this misfortune, though it somewhat marred his singing, did not cloud the truth and finish of his readings, the grace and purity of his style and the exquisite refinement of his taste. A fine dignity and sincerity marked his efforts throughout and won for them the chief honors of the occasion. Mr. Henschel acquitted himself in an impressively artistic manner in the music of Jesus, as far as its reading was concerned, and even while it was not easy to admire his method of singing and his roughness of voice, he was always interesting. Mr. Parker's interpretations of his solos were delightful in the appropriateness of sentiment and felicitous artistic intelligence he brought to bear on them. Nothing could have been more beautiful in expression and phrasing than his singing of "Behold how still." Mr. Lamson declaimed his recitatives broadly and effectively, though, perhaps, now and then with an excess of emphasis that was [illegible] His work, however, may be heartily commended for its sincerity and intelligence. Mrs. Henschel sang her solos with sympathetic tenderness and faultless taste; but she is not heard at her best in music of this deeply serious order, and her voice is somewhat too light to do it full justice, especially in so large an auditorium as that of Music Hall. Mrs. Joachim sang with large dignity of style and admirable phrasing, and in "O pardon me, my God," vouchsafed some of the most satisfying singing that she has done here, despite its lapses in intonation and technical shortcomings. The orchestral work was not all that it should have been, and was frequently ragged and rough; but the various solos were beautifully played, notably the obligati performed by Mr. Kneisel, the flute solo in "From love unbounded," played by Mr. Molé, and the oboe solo in "I'll watch," played by Mr. Sautet. The chorus singing, however, was the great triumph of the performance. The occasion was marked by much solemnity. The chorus singers were all clad in black. There was no applause, and the audience rose and joined in the singing of some of the chorales. This evening, Haydn's "The Creation" will be given, with Madam Albani, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Whitney in the solos.

On Tuesday evening the Adamowski Quartet gave the third and last in its this season's series of chamber concerts in Union Hall. The programme was: Quartette in G-minor, No. 4 (first time), Bazzini; Two movements from quartette (first time), C. M. Loeffler; Quartette, op. 18, No. 4, Beethoven. The Bazzini quartet is a charming work, written in a quartet style as pure as that of Haydn himself, and distinguished by much of the grace, clearness and delightful feeling that characterize the chamber music of the older master. It is worked out with great care and exquisite finish, but it is spontaneous in effect, and is thoroughly fascinating in the hearing. Its easy flow and its melodiousness are thoroughly Italian, but its development and its treatment generally are in a more serious vein. It was beautifully played. In fact, the playing of the organization through the whole concert may be frankly and cordially commended. It was much in advance of anything the Quartet has hitherto vouchsafed, and in nothing was this more satisfactorily emphasized than in the admirable balance of tone that was maintained. Even the 'cello kept within discreet artistic bounds. The movements from Mr. Loeffler's quartet afforded pleasing evidences of the composer's fine gifts, and reinforced the already strong impression of his talents that was made by his violin concerto earlier in the season. They are clearly written, are unimpeachable in point of taste, and their musicianship is as refined as it is able. They are eminently modern in style, and yet there is no straining after effect through extreme harmonies or rhythmical eccentricity. The theme and variations are specially interesting, the former by reason of its simplicity and pure harmony, the latter for their ingenuity and their refinement. They were heartily and deservedly applauded. The Beethoven Quartet was sympathetically read, and was played with a graceful smoothness and a genial warmth that excelled anything that the Quartet had previously achieved in those directions.

Tomorrow afternoon, Mr. Eugen D'Albert will give the first in his series of three piano recitals in Music Hall. His programme will be devoted wholly to Beethoven and is: 32 variations in C-minor; sonata in C, op. 53; sonata in E-minor, op. 90; sonata in E, op. 109; sonata in A-flat, op. 110. On Wednesday afternoon he will play works work by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, Strauss-Tausig, and Liszt. On Saturday afternoon, selections from Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein and Liszt will be given.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 109.

MONDAY, APRIL 18, 1892.

The Handel and Haydn Ends Its Season with "The Creation.

The final performance of the 77th season of the Handel and Haydn Society, at Music Hall, last evening, consisted of Haydn's "Creation," the oratoria having its 65th performance by this organization on this occasion. Public interest in this event was unusually strong from the original announcement of the work as a part of the season's scheme, and every seat in the hall was sold a week ago, while even standing room could not be had last evening.

The society was assisted by Mrs. Emma Albani, soprano; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. Myron W. Whitney, bass; Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor; Mr. B. J. Lang, organist; Mrs. Eleanor V. Tufts of the chorus in the final quartet, and Mr. H. E. Tucker as piano accompanist for the recitatives.

After the Bach "Passion," Haydn's simple melodious numbers sung themseves, and the chorus entered upon their evening's duties with evident enjoyment. The ladies of the society bedecked themselves in gay attire in honor of the church holiday, and there was an air of rejoicing thoughout the hall which was largely heightened by an absolutely reckless expenditure in the way of gas and electric lighting, which made it possible to recognize faces across the hall.

Detailed comment upon the work of the chorus, and, indeed, of the performance as a whole, is almost unnecessary. The singers under Mr. Zerrahn gave him their very best efforts, and the tuneful numbers were splendidly sung throughout the evening, the "Heavens are Telling" and "The Lord is Great" arousing the audience tofine bursts of enthusiastic applause as they were concluded.

Mme. Albani's singing of the soprano music was an exhibition of the pure oratorio style such as has seldom been given here. In the "With Verdure Clad" and again in the "On Mighty Pens," this gifted artist held her audience spellbound by the magic of her art, and her delivery of these numbers marked the highest degree of success attained during the evening. Every phrase was turned with an artistic grace and beauty of delivery that quite charmed all who heard her, and the approval of the audience was echoed in the most pronounced fashion from the chorus seats. The gracious manner in which Mme. Albani acknowledged the share of the chorus in the good work of the evening made a very pleasant feature of her appearance.

Mr. Lloyd had fortunately overcome to a large extent the physical causes which interfered with a full enjoyment of his work in the oratorios of last week, and a large measure of success rewarded his heroic efforts to completely master the results of a week spent in Boston's inhospitable climate. He is a great artist, an honest tenor singer, and a master of the oratorio style, and all these characteristics were plainly demonstrated in the united opportunities of last evening's appearance. His interpretation of the "In Native Worth" was a study in oratorio phrasing, and the masterly manner in which this number was delivered made amends for all the unpleasant results of climatic condition.

Mr. Whitney showed just a trace of his recent wrestling match with "La Grippe" in his opening number, but he quickly overcame the vocal difficulty and sung throughout the trying bass roll as no one but Myron W. Whitney has during the present generation. His exhibition of subcellar vocalization in depicting the unhappy "worm" called out the usual ovation, and he well deserved the applause which rewarded all his efforts.

The beautiful descriptive music given to the orchestra was played with admirable taste at all times, and Mr. Tucker gave excellent support at the piano in the recitatives.

In recalling the remarkable work of the society during the present season, the "Messiah," the Beach Mass, the Bach "Passion" in the "Creation," it is impossible to resist penning a tribute to Mr. Carl Zerrahn, the faithful conductor of the chorus for so many years. Where can his peer be found? At all times, and under all circumstances, the master of the situation, competent, devoted, and with an ardent love for all that is grand and beautiful in his chosen profession, may he live to see a result for his labors that shall be a just reward for the great work he has done in advancing the cause of music in America.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 18, 1892.

HAYDN'S "CREATION"

GIVEN BY THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.

Liberties Taken With the Composer by the Soloists—Mme. Albani Touched All Grades of Excellence and Mediocrity—The Orchestra Did Better Than in the Passion Music.

No greater contrast can be imagined in music than that between the two works presented in the last two concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society. Bach's "Passion Music," all earnestness and solemnity. Haydn's "Creation," all simplicity, melody and tone pictures: the one work the loftiest achievement of counterpoint, the other the beginning of programme music. It is easy enough to prove that realism in music is a very ancient affair; one can cite Bach's concerto on the departure of his brother, Kuhnau's "Bible Histories," or even the fact that an ancient Athenian played a representation of a tempest, on the kithara, to Dorian; but spite of this one may truthfully say that descriptive music had its real birth with this oratorio, as the programme symphony began with Beethoven's Pastoral symphony a dozen years later. The very beginning of the "Creation" is programme music pure and simple, for it represents Chaos in a number which is wholly instrumental, but not in any degree chaotic. To give fugal imitations in a tone picture of chaos is a solecism that causes one to wonder what form of music could possibly picture the subsequent evolution of things. When order is established Haydn takes refuge largely in tone pictures. The cooing of doves on wind instruments, the surging of the ocean on the strings, the tread of heavy beasts on contrabassoon, and a dozen other equally realistic touches show a new development in accompaniment, and prove the birth of objective music. The school is not the highest one, and it is not wonderful that the moderns have begun to recede from it. Perhaps it would be truer to state that, at this end of the century musical photography is kept in the background rather than abolished altogether, for the fire figure of Wagner's trilogy, the wave figure which begins "Rheingold," the whinneyings of the "Ride of the Walkyries" are all relatives of the martellato strokes which illustrate the snow, the sinuous contra bass phrase which portrays the worm, or the deep thrills which present the roarings of the lion, in this early piece of tonal realism. But, in the modern works, these are but accessories, while in the Haydn oratorio they seem to usurp the principal place in the solos, and, when the catalogue of the creation is done, the suave love-making of Adam and Eve comes in some degree as an anti-climax. The culmination of the work is in the chorus, "Achieved is the Glorious Work," and the subsequent scenes in Paradise are a trifle cloying. Yet who can avoid drawing some inspiration from the melodic grace of almost every number in the work! What ease and facility of construction are in every part of the choruses and concerted numbers! We may not go back to the simplicity of Haydn, but it is possible that the great composer of the 20th century may return to his tenderness and grace of melody and superpose it upon the breadth of treatment and power of orchestration which the world has learned from a Wagner, and thus banish the demon of unrest who has the entire modern school in his clutches. It is placidity after tumult, milk after Burgundy, to turn to the "Creation" after the Tschaikowskys, Dvoraks and Rubinsteins of the present, and so last night the auditor rested and put aside all the trouble of thinking, and simply listened and enjoyed. Yet if this music is simple to the comprehension, it is by no means a light task to the artist, for in its execution every error stands forth as a flaw in a crystal; it is a very difficult kind of simplicity for the singer. The soloists last night were adequate, but it must be stated that they took plenty of liberty with the composer. Mr. Whitney went travelling in search of low "D's" without any passport from Haydn, and Mme. Albani dwelt upon the fermate marks with a persistence that once or twice threatened total stagnation. Only Mr. Lloyd remained faithful to the composer's score. One cannot but admire this English fidelity to the music as written; nine times out of ten it succeeds better than the elaborations with which our artists try to catch the multitude. But Mr. Lloyd was, unfortunately, still hoarse, and the deep notes of his part were inaudible, the middle register unreliable; only in the high passages did he make the full effects of which he is capable, so that "In Native Worth," which he has sung better than any other living tenor, was labored and rather ineffective. The audience applauded him on faith, however, and he was made the recipient of a floral tribue from the chorus, as also was Mr. Zerrahn. Mme. Albani touched all grades of excellence and mediocrity in her work. She sang exceedingly well in "The Marvellous Work," and took a high C with much clearness; she began "With Verdure Clad" with excellent tone, and gave some beautiful legato phrases, doing the fioriture also with purity and good intonation, but she grew slower and slower in the tempo until at the end there was a drawling and a constant dwelling on single notes that made the number mawkish. This defect was still more pronounced in "On Mighty Pens" (in which the flute playing was very good), and from this time to the very end her work seemed labored, and an attempt at a high C was almost disastrous. Her intonation in the duets of the third part was slightly flat.

Mr. Whitney was in excellent voice and the splendid timbre of his tones suited the parts of Raphael and of Adam admirably. He sang "Rolling in Foaming Billows" in a perfect manner, and even the high F did not seem to trouble him in the least, but the deep Ds in this and in "Straight opening her fertile womb" were unnecessary, even if they did astonish the audience. Nevertheless his work as a whole was of the most artistic character, and proved him still the chief of American oratorio-basses. The orchestra did much better than in the Passion music, but there were still some rough attacks and irregular ensembles to condone. The oboe part deserves an especial word, Haydn uses it very freely in this work where a modern would have employed clarinet; it was well played in every number, and especially in the duet, "By Thee, with Bliss," where it has an important obligato. The choruses were sometimes taken in rather too slow a tempo, but the execution was good. In "The Marvellous Work" there could have been more precision, and in "The Heavens are Telling" there could have been more power in tenor and alto to advantage, but in such fugal work as "For He Hath Heaven and Earth," and in the double theme (or subject and counter-subject) of "Achieved in the Glorious Work," the singing was steady and well balanced. In the trio and chorus, "The Lord is Great," the latter was too forcible, the soloists not being heard, and no one could tell whether they sang their embellishments or not. At the passage "By heavy beast the ground is trod" the contra-bassoon was replaced by some brass instrument; it sounded as if pedal tones of the trombone were employed. But this is a minor fault. The performance was in the main a very enjoyable one, and if it teaches the ultra radicals that Wagner has not abolished Haydn, and that the old school ought to exert some influence on the new, its best purpose, educationally, will have been served. LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Symphony Concert.

Schumann's first symphony is even more a poem of spring than the spring symphony which had been given a week before, and it is so ineffably beautiful that it is almost impossible to spoil it entirely. If any symphony deserves the title of "the 10th" in the sense of continuing the series of Beethoven epics and idyls, it is surely this work. Mr. Nikisch certainly does not recede from his exaggerations because of criticism; the very first notes were as a gauntlet of defiance, and the call of trumpets and horns was rather like a summons to a tournament than a signal of approaching spring. It may not be generally known that Schumann originally wrote this opening phrase a third deeper, thereby committing an error of instrumentation, for the natural horns could only produce the sixth note of the figure by "stopping," thus producing a most hideous sound in the midst of a romantic figure, and causing great mirth among the musicians. Yet now that the keyed horn is used it would be well to restore the notes as the composer originally wrote them, as the effect is finer in every way. It is unpleasant to repeat the same tale week after week, and it must become decidedly tiresome to the reader; yet I can only reiterate that, in spite of many beauties in certain phrases, as for example the theme on the cellos in the second movement, and the oboe and horn work in scherzo and finale (and the individual players deserve much of the credit here) the spirit of exaggeration and of noise hung over almost everything, and the end was absolutely deafening. It may be urged that the large audience appreciated just this ending in the highest degree, but after all, would not Gilmore win as great applause for a noisy climax? And does not the vocalist who ends a badly sung aria with a chest "C" win the same popular approval? In the Oberon overture, which ended the concert, there were contrasts made that were the very reductio ad absurdum of tonal effect; the force of kettledrums could no further go, and Haydn's "Surprise Symphony" was entirely eclipsed.

Mr. Henschel was welcomed back to his old post as conductor with much enthusiasm. He directed his own suite of "Hamlet" music. He has gained greatly in his control of the orchestral forces, and in his reading of his own work there were no such extremes as we have recently been accustomed to. The music was noble in the highest degree, and while it was of the modern school, it was original in treatment and themes. The first movement, "Hamlet," was gloomy and brooding, and was too earnest to win an immediate popular success, but the sweetness of the succeeding "Ophelia" movement was the more delicious by contrast. It began with trumpet, but the reiterated tones on the instrument were not allowed to become too prominent. Throughout it all the balance of parts was well observed. The richness of melody of this movement, and the musicianly treatment of the subject matter, leading to a true and effective climax caused this to become one of the gems of the work.

The quaint melancholy of the pastorale (English horn and clarinet chiefly) was very attractive, and the ineffable tenderness of the muted violins against the soft strokes of kettledrum in "Ophelia's Death," reminded of the romantic style of Schumann. The final march had a true Danish flavor, and dealt largely in fanfares, and ended with a cymbal clash. The best numbers were the pastorale, the "Ophelia" movement and "Ophelia's Death," although I think that the "Hamlet", movement will grow more attractive with repeated hearing, and the entire suite is a work which stamps Mr. Henschel as a most poetic composer.

Mrs. Henschel also won a triumph at this concert, and deserved it. She wisely forebore to force her voice, and although it seemed too light for the large hall, it retained that sweet purity which is its chief charm, and the flexibility of the Handelian air was most gracefully presented, while the tenderness of Massenet's aria from "Herodiade" was commendable altogether. At the close of this, the artist was able to give a burst of power that was a very triumphant end of a most artistic effort, and recall after recall testified the appreciation of the large audience. Decidedly this was the best work Mrs. Henschel has recently done in Boston. LOUIS C. ELSON.

Notes.

This afternoon Eugen D'Albert begins a series of three piano recitals at Music Hall with a programme drawn entirely from the compositions of Beethoven. His fame as a Beethoven player caused a generally expressed desire for such a programme. It has been compiled with rare judgment and embraces striking specimens of the three distinct periods in which his compositions are classed, the first which shows the influence of musical traditions, the second when he displayed his individuality, and the last and profound period. The programme is: Thirty-two variations in C minor and four sonatas, C major op. 53, E minor op. 90, E major of 109 and A flat major op. 110. The recitals on Wednesday and Saturday afternoons have programmes drawn from the time of Bach to the present.

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING
EDITION.

BOSTON, APRIL 17, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

The audience at last night's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra filled every seat in the hall and all the available standing room. The special attraction was doubtless the reappearance of Mr. Georg Henschel at the conductor's stand which he occupied for the first three years of the Symphony Orchestra's existence. His reception was enthusiastically cordial when he came forward to conduct his Suite from the music he composed to Shakspeare's "Hamlet" for Mr. Beerbohm Tree's production of the tragedy in London. The suite opens with a prelude intended to typify the character of Hamlet. It is followed by another prelude meant to suggest the sweetness of Ophelia's nature. Then comes an interlude that deals again with Hamlet in a more resolute mode, and this in turn is followed by a pastorale, after which comes another prelude illustrating the death of Ophelia, the whole concluding with a Danish march. This music is all in the extreme modern school, is very chromatic in its harmonies, restless in its modulations and exceedingly rich in its orchestral coloring. It is musicianly, but it is not especially felicitous in invention, and it has no originality decided enough to give it the distinction of an individuality essentially the composer's. The themes are very brief and are reiterated and reiterated again until they become almost wearisomely monotonous. The hearer carries nothing away with him except the memory of a distant Wagnerian echo. The Ophelia prelude has a certain warmth and graceful flow, but the pastorale is the gem of the suite in its quaint and well rounded melody, its tender melancholy, its charming simplicity and its delicate orchestration. The music shows in all directions the skill and the taste of a thorough musician, and a fine artistic temperament; but it is music that has been laboriously "made," and is of the head rather than the heart. It was beautifully played, Mr. Henschel conducting firmly and without display, and obtaining with ease every shade of color and of expression that he desired. His method is clear and unostentatious, and judging by his success of last night, he has, since he last led this orchestra some eight seasons ago, become an able and a finished conductor. His music met with warm appreciation, and he was applauded with great enthusiasm and twice recalled. The other instrumental selections were Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, and Weber's "Oberon" overture. The first was read with immense vigor, but with that obstinate disregard of the composer's intentions that seems to be a mania with Mr. Nikisch, and of which it has become wearisome to complain. Mrs. Henschel was the soloist, and sang the air, "Lusinghe piu care," from Handel's "Alessandro," in which she has frequently been heard here, and the familiar air from Massenet's "Herodiade." The first she sang prettily and neatly, and with much grace of florid execution, though without great variety of expression. The second she sang with more warmth, but her voice is not large enough to do it full justice, especially in so vast a hall. She was applauded with immense fervor, and recalled three times after her first effort, and twice after her second. The season will close with this week's concert, the programme for which is: Symphony in G, Haydn; Concerto for violin, Paganini, and Brahms's Symphony No. 1. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

Music Notes.

On Wednesday evening the Handel and Haydn Society gave its memorial performance of "The Messiah," that date being the one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the original production of the work. The society was assisted by Mrs. Genevra Johnstone Bishop, Mrs. Carl Alves, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Myron W. Whitney, and a full orchestra. The audience completely filled Music Hall, and was very enthusiastic. The best feature of the performance was the singing of the chorus, which was excellent in its steadiness, its invariably firm attack, its smoothness and its admirable tone color. In brief the success of the chorus on this occasion fully equalled that achieved by it in the same work some months ago, and reflected like credit on itself and on Mr. Zerrahn. We think, however, that Mr. Zerrahn was not as felicitous in his tempi last week as he was at the Christmas performance. Several of the choruses were taken somewhat too slowly and the effect was stiff and dry, notably in the first chorus, "And the Glory of the Lord," which moved heavily and thickly for lack of greater spirit in the movement. The pastoral symphony dragged somewhat from the same cause. The soloists appeared to be affected also by a tendency to sing their music at too slow a pace. "He was Despised," was a case in point. The tempo was so drawn out that the melody scarcely hung together. "He shall feed his flocks" and "I know that my Redeemer liveth," were likewise given with a slowness that deprived them not only of emphasis, but of spirit. As we have stated in this column on previous occasions, we could never understand why "I know that my Redeemer liveth" should be sung as if it were a dirge instead of the uplifting expression of faith in immortality that it is. Instead of exulting in the belief of a life to come, the singer generally moans and mourns over it, as if it were a thing to be lamented with tears and sighs. Handel, who was nothing if not dramatic, surely never meant the air to be sung regretfully, in defiance of both words and music. Of the soloists we may speak briefly. Mrs. Bishop has a voice of natural purity and sweetness, but her use of it cannot be praised. She attacks her notes from below and "scoops" up to them with unpleasing effect. Her tone production is faulty, inasmuch as it results too frequently in nasality. Her phrasing is not artistic, and her intonation is not always true. In "Rejoice greatly" she sang with flexible ease, but in a manner that was perfunctory rather than spontaneous; and in "I know that my Redeemer liveth" she was quite inadequate. In other words, Mrs. Bishop failed to justify her selection as the soprano soloist on this occasion. Mrs. Alves, on the other hand, acquitted herself admirably. She sang with taste, intelligence, and ability, and with excellent artistic judgment, and though now and then there was a harsh lower note, her efforts on the whole may be justly praised with but little reserve. Mr. Lloyd was manifestly laboring under a severe cold, and was therefore not heard at his best; but his fine skill and his thorough musicianly style made him always interesting, and in the air "Thou shalt break them" he was heard with a brilliant effect that won for him the most enthusiastic applause of the evening. Mr. Whitney sang the bass solos in which he has been heard here so often, and his singing of them drew forth as much applause as it has done at any time in the past.

On Friday evening Bach's Passion Music was given in the condensed form in which it has always been presented by the Society. It could have been curtailed still more with advantage, especially in the recitatives sung by the Evangelist, which though deeply interesting in the harmonies that accompany them, are dry, not to say wearisome in effect, when heard in the con-concert room, impressive and neccessary as they may be when the work is sung as a church service. The solos were sung by Mrs. Georg Henschel, Mrs. Amalie Joachim, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr George J. Parker, Mr. Georg Henschel, and Mr. Gardner S. Lamson. Mr. B. J. Lang presided at the organ and Mr. H. G. Tucker at the pianoforte. A boy choir assisted and Mr. Kneisel was the concert master. The audience filled the hall to overflowing. The chorus again distinguished itself by the steadiness and the precision of its performances. Now and then it was felt that the alto voices were not sufficiently numerous to produce their due balance of effect, but otherwise the results were wholly admirable. Mr. Lloyd, who sang the music of the principal Narrator, was again in bad voice, but this misfortune, though it somewhat marred his singing, did not cloud the truth and finish of his readings, the grace and purity of his style and the exquisite refinement of his taste. A fine dignity and sincerity marked his efforts throughout and won for them the chief honors of the occasion. Mr. Henschel acquitted himself in an impressively artistic manner in the music of Jesus, as far as its reading was concerned, and even while it was not easy to admire his method of singing and his roughness of voice, he was always interesting. Mr. Parker's interpretations of his solos were delightful in the appropriateness of sentiment and felicitous artistic intelligence he brought to bear on them. Nothing could have been more beautiful in expression and phrasing than his singing of "Behold how still." Mr. Lamson declaimed his recitatives broadly and effectively, though, perhaps, now and then with an excess of emphasis that was superfluously dramatic. His work, however, may be heartily commended for its sincerity and intelligence. Mrs. Henschel sang her solos with sympathetic tenderness and faultless taste; but she is not heard at her best in music of this deeply serious order, and her voice is somewhat too light to do it full justice, especially in so large an auditorium as that of Music Hall. Mrs. Joachim sang with large dignity of style and admirable phrasing, and in "O pardon me, my God," vouchsafed some of the most satisfying singing that she has done here, despite its lapses in intonation and technical shortcomings. The orchestral work was not all that it should have been, and was frequently ragged and rough; but the various solos were beautifully played, notably the obligati performed by Mr. Kneisel, the flute solo in "From love unbounded," played by Mr. Molé, and the oboe solo in "I'll watch," played by Mr. Sautet. The chorus singing, however, was the great triumph of the performance. The occasion was marked by much solemnity. The chorus singers were all clad in black. There was no applause, and the audience rose and joined in the singing of some of the chorales. This evening, Haydn's "The Creation" will be given, with Madam Albani, Mr. Lloyd, and Mr. Whitney in the solos.

On Tuesday evening the Adamowski Quartet gave the third and last in its this season's series of chamber concerts in Union Hall. The programme was: Quartette in G-minor, No. 4 (first time), Bazzini; Two movements from quartette (first time), C. M. Loeffler; Quartette, op. 18, No. 4, Beethoven. The Bazzini quartet is a charming work, written in a quartet style as pure as that of Haydn himself, and distinguished by much of the grace, clearness and delightful feeling that characterize the chamber music of the older master. It is worked out with great care and exquisite finish, but it is spontaneous in effect, and is thoroughly fascinating in the hearing. Its easy flow and its melodiousness are thoroughly Italian, but its development and its treatment generally are in a more serious vein. It was beautifully played. In fact, the playing of the organization through the whole concert may be frankly and cordially commended. It was much in advance of anything the Quartet has hitherto vouchsafed, and in nothing was this more satisfactorily emphasized than in the admirable balance of tone that was maintained. Even the 'cello kept within discreet artistic bounds. The movements from Mr. Loeffler's quartet afforded pleasing evidences of the composer's fine gifts, and reinforced the already strong impression of his talents that was made by his violin concerto earlier in the season. They are clearly written, are unimpeachable in point of taste, and their musicianship is as refined as it is able. They are eminently modern in style, and yet there is no straining after effect through extreme harmonies or rhythmical eccentricity. The theme and variations are specially interesting, the former by reason of its simplicity and pure harmony, the latter for their ingenuity and their refinement. They were heartily and deservedly applauded. The Beethoven Quartet was sympathetically read, and was played with a graceful smoothness and a genial warmth that excelled anything that the Quartet had previously achieved in those directions.

Tomorrow afternoon, Mr. Eugen D'Albert will give the first in his series of three piano recitals in Music Hall. His programme will be devoted wholly to Beethoven and is: 32 variations in C-minor; sonata in C, op. 53; sonata in E-minor, op. 90; sonata in E, op. 109; sonata in A-flat, op. 110. On Wednesday afternoon he will play works work by Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, Strauss-Tausig, and Liszt. On Saturday afternoon, selections from Bach, Mozart, Brahms, Chopin, Rubinstein and Liszt will be given.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 109.

MONDAY, APRIL 18, 1892.

The Handel and Haydn Ends Its Season with "The Creation.

The final performance of the 77th season of the Handel and Haydn Society. at Music Hall, last evening, consisted of Haydn's "Creation," the oratoria having its 65th performance by this organization on this occasion. Public interest in this event was unusually strong from the original announcement of the work as a part of the season's scheme, and every seat in the hall was sold a week ago, while even standing room could not be had last evening.

The society was assisted by Mrs. Emma Albani, soprano; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; Mr. Myron W. Whitney, bass; Mr. Carl Zerrahn, conductor; Mr. B. J. Lang, organist; Mrs. Eleanor V. Tufts of the chorus in the final quartet, and Mr. H. E. Tucker as piano accompanist for the recitatives.

After the Bach "Passion," Haydn's simple melodious numbers sung themseves, and the chorus entered upon their evening's duties with evident enjoyment. The ladies of the society bedecked themselves in gay attire in honor of the church holiday, and there was an air of rejoicing thoughout the hall which was largely heightened by an absolutely reckless expenditure in the way of gas and electric lighting, which made it possible to recognize faces across the hall.

Detailed comment upon the work of the chorus, and, indeed, of the performance as a whole, is almost unnecessary. The singers under Mr. Zerrahn gave him their very best efforts, and the tuneful numbers were splendidly sung throughout the evening, the "Heavens are Telling" and "The Lord is Great" arousing the audience tofine bursts of enthusiastic applause as they were concluded.

Mme. Albani's singing of the soprano music was an exhibition of the pure oratorio style such as has seldom been given here. In the "With Verdure Clad" and again in the "On Mighty Pens," this gifted artist held her audience spellbound by the magic of her art, and her delivery of these numbers marked the highest degree of success attained during the evening. Every phrase was turned with an artistic grace and beauty of delivery that quite charmed all who heard her, and the approval of the audience was echoed in the most pronounced fashion from the chorus seats. The gracious manner in which Mme. Albani acknowledged the share of the chorus in the good work of the evening made a very pleasant feature of her appearance.

Mr. Lloyd had fortunately overcome to a large extent the physical causes which interfered with a full enjoyment of his work in the oratorios of last week, and a large measure of success rewarded his heroic efforts to completely master the results of a week spent in Boston's inhospitable climate. He is a great artist, an honest tenor singer, and a master of the oratorio style, and all these characteristics were plainly demonstrated in the united opportunities of last evening's appearance. His interpretation of the "In Native Worth" was a study in oratorio phrasing, and the masterly manner in which this number was delivered made amends for all the unpleasant results of climatic condition.

Mr. Whitney showed just a trace of his recent wrestling match with "La Grippe" in his opening number, but he quickly overcame the vocal difficulty and sung throughout the trying bass roll as no one but Myron W. Whitney has during the present generation. His exhibition of subcellar vocalization in depicting the unhappy "worm" called out the usual ovation, and he well deserved the applause which rewarded all his efforts.

The beautiful descriptive music given to the orchestra was played with admirable taste at all times, and Mr. Tucker gave excellent support at the piano in the recitatives.

In recalling the remarkable work of the society during the present season, the "Messiah," the Beach Mass, the Bach "Passion" in the "Creation," it is impossible to resist penning a tribute to Mr. Carl Zerrahn, the faithful conductor of the chorus for so many years. Where can his peer be found? At all times, and under all circumstances, the master of the situation, competent, devoted, and with an ardent love for all that is grand and beautiful in his chosen profession, may he live to see a result for his labors that shall be a just reward for the great work he has done in advancing the cause of music in America.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 18, 1892.

HAYDN'S "CREATION"

GIVEN BY THE HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.

Liberties Taken With the Composer by the Soloists—Mme. Albani Touched All Grades of Excellence and Mediocrity—The Orchestra Did Better Than in the Passion Music.

No greater contrast can be imagined in music than that between the two works presented in the last two concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society. Bach's "Passion Music," all earnestness and solemnity. Haydn's "Creation," all simplicity, melody and tone pictures; the one work the loftiest achievement of counterpoint, the other the beginning of programme music. It is easy enough to prove that realism in music is a very ancient affair; one can cite Bach's concerto on the departure of his brother, Kuhnau's "Bible Histories," or even the fact that an ancient Athenian played a representation of a tempest, on the kithara, to Dorian; but spite of this one may truthfully say that descriptive music had its real birth with this oratorio, as the programme symphony began with Beethoven's Pastoral symphony a dozen years later. The very beginning of the "Creation" is programme music pure and simple, for it represents Chaos in a number which is wholly instrumental, but not in any degree chaotic. To give fugal imitations in a tone picture of chaos is a solecism that causes one to wonder what form of music could possibly picture the subsequent evolution of things. When order is established Haydn takes refuge largely in tone pictures. The cooing of doves on wind instruments, the surging of the ocean on the strings, the tread of heavy beasts on contrabassoon, and a dozen other equally realistic touches show a new development in accompaniment, and prove the birth of objective music. The school is not the highest one, and it is not wonderful that the moderns have begun to recede from it. Perhaps it would be truer to state that, at this end of the century musical photography is kept in the background rather than abolished altogether, for the fire figure of Wagner's trilogy, the wave figure which begins "Rheingold," the whinneyings of the "Ride of the Walkyries" are all relatives of the martellato strokes which illustrate the snow, the sinuous contra bass phrase which portrays the worm, or the deep thrills which present the roarings of the lion, in this early piece of tonal realism. But, in the modern works, these are but accessories, while in the Haydn oratorio they seem to usurp the principal place in the solos, and, when the catalogue of the creation is done, the suave love-making of Adam and Eve comes in some degree as an anti-climax. The culmination of the work is in the chorus, "Achieved is the Glorious Work," and the subsequent scenes in Paradise are a trifle cloying. Yet who can avoid drawing some inspiration from the melodic grace of almost every number in the work! What ease and facility of construction are in every part of the choruses and concerted numbers! We may not go back to the simplicity of Haydn, but it is possible that the great composer of the 20th century may return to his tenderness and grace of melody and superpose it upon the breadth of treatment and power of orchestration which the world has learned from a Wagner, and thus banish the demon of unrest who has the entire modern school in his clutches. It is placidity after tumult, milk after Burgundy, to turn to the "Creation" after the Tschaikowskys, Dvoraks and Rubinsteins of the present, and so last night the auditor rested and put aside all the trouble of thinking, and simply listened and enjoyed. Yet if this music is simple to the comprehension, it is by no means a light task to the artist, for in its execution every error stands forth as a flaw in a crystal; it is a very difficult kind of simplicity for the singer. The soloists last night were adequate, but it must be stated that they took plenty of liberty with the composer. Mr. Whitney went travelling in search of low "D's" without any passport from Haydn, and Mme. Albani dwelt upon the fermate marks with a persistence that once or twice threatened total stagnation. Only Mr. Lloyd remained faithful to the composer's score. One cannot but admire this English fidelity to the music as written; nine times out of ten it succeeds better than the elaborations with which our artists try to catch the multitude But Mr. Lloyd was, unfortunately, still hoarse, and the deep notes of his part were inaudible, the middle register unreliable; only in the high passages did he make the full effects of which he is capable, so that "In Native Worth," which he has sung better than any other living tenor, was labored and rather ineffective. The audience applauded him on faith, however, and he was made the recipient of a floral tribue from the chorus, as also was Mr. Zerrahn. Mme. Albani touched all grades of excellence and mediocrity in her work. She sang exceedingly well in "The Marvellous Work," and took a high C with much clearness; she began "With Verdure Clad" with excellent tone, and gave some beautiful legato phrases, doing the floriture also with purity and good intonation, but she grew slower and slower in the tempo until at the end there was a drawling and a constant dwelling on single notes that made the number mawkish. This defect was still more pronounced in "On Mighty Pens" (in which the flute playing was very good), and from this time to the very end her work seemed labored, and an attempt at a high C was almost disastrous. Her intonation in the duets of the third part was slightly flat.

Mr. Whitney was in excellent voice and the splendid timbre of his tones suited the parts of Raphael and of Adam admirably. He sang "Rolling in Foaming Billows" in a perfect manner, and even the high F did not seem to trouble him in the least, but the deep Ds in this and in "Straight opening her fertile womb" were unnecessary, even if they did astonish the audience. Nevertheless his work as a whole was of the most artistic character, and proved him still the chief of American oratorio-basses. The orchestra did much better than in the Passion music, but there were still some rough attacks and irregular ensembles to condone. The oboe part deserves an especial word, Haydn uses it very freely in this work where a modern would have employed clarinet; it was well played in every number, and especially in the duet, "By Thee, with Bliss," where it has an important obligato. The choruses were sometimes taken in rather too slow a tempo, but the execution was good. In "The Marvellous Work" there could have been more precision, and in "The Heavens are Telling" there could have been more power in tenor and alto to advantage, but in such fugal work as "For He Hath Heaven and Earth," and in the double theme (or subject and counter-subject) of "Achieved in the Glorious Work," the singing was steady and well balanced. In the trio and chorus, "The Lord is Great," the latter was too forcible, the soloists not being heard, and no one could tell whether they sang their embellishments or not. At the passage "By heavy beast the ground is trod" the contra-bassoon was replaced by some brass instrument; it sounded as if pedal tones of the trombone were employed. But this is a minor fault. The performance was in the main a very enjoyable one, and if it teaches the ultra radicals that Wagner has not abolished Haydn, and that the old school ought to exert some influence on the new, its best purpose, educationally, will have been served. LOUIS C. ELSON.

The Symphony Concert.

Schumann's first symphony is even more a poem of spring than the spring symphony which had been given a week before, and it is so ineffably beautiful that it is almost impossible to spoil it entirely. If any symphony deserves the title of "the 10th" in the sense of continuing the series of Beethoven epics and idyls, it is surely this work. Mr. Nikisch certainly does not recede from his exaggerations because of criticism; the very first notes were as a gauntlet of defiance, and the call of trumpets and horns was rather like a summons to a tournament than a signal of approaching spring. It may not be generally known that Schumann originally wrote this opening phrase a third deeper, thereby committing an error of instrumentation, for the natural horns could only produce the sixth note of the figure by "stopping," thus producing a most hideous sound in the midst of a romantic figure, and causing great mirth among the musicians. Yet now that the keyed horn is used it would be well to restore the notes as the composer originally wrote them, as the effect is finer in every way. It is unpleasant to repeat the same tale week after week, and it must become decidedly tiresome to the reader; yet I can only reiterate that, in spite of many beauties in certain phrases, as for example the theme on the cellos in the second movement, and the oboe and horn work in scherzo and finale (and the individual players deserve much of the credit here) the spirit of exaggeration and of noise hung over almost everything, and the end was absolutely deafening. It may be urged that the large audience appreciated just this ending in the highest degree, but after all, would not Gilmore win as great applause for a noisy climax? And does not the vocalist who ends a badly sung aria with a chest "C" win the same popular approval? In the Oberon overture, which ended the concert, there were contrasts made that were the very reductio ad absurdum of tonal effect; the force of kettledrums could no further go, and Haydn's "Surprise Symphony" was entirely eclipsed.

Mr. Henschel was welcomed back to his old post as conductor with much enthusiasm. He directed his own suite of "Hamlet" music. He has gained greatly in his control of the orchestral forces, and in his reading of his own work there were no such extremes as we have recently been accustomed to. The music was noble in the highest degree, and while it was of the modern school, it was original in treatment and themes. The first movement, "Hamlet," was gloomy and brooding, and was too earnest to win an immediate popular success, but the sweetness of the succeeding "Ophelia" movement was the more delicious by contrast. It began with trumpet, but the reiterated tones on the instrument were not allowed to become too prominent. Throughout it all the balance of parts was well observed. The richness of melody of this movement, and the musicianly treatment of the subject matter, leading to a true and effective climax caused this to become one of the gems of the work.

The quaint melancholy of the pastorale (English horn and clarinet chiefly) was very attractive, and the ineffable tenderness of the muted violins against the soft strokes of kettledrum in "Ophelia's Death," reminded of the romantic style of Schumann. The final march had a true Danish flavor, and dealt largely in fanfares, and ended with a cymbal clash. The best numbers were the pastorale, the "Ophelia" movement and "Ophelia's Death," although I think that the "Hamlet', movement will grow more attractive with repeated hearing, and the entire suite is a work which stamps Mr. Henschel as a most poetic composer.

Mrs. Henschel also won a triumph at this concert, and deserved it. She wisely forebore to force her voice, and although it seemed too light for the large hall, it retained that sweet purity which is its chief charm, and the flexibility of the Handelian air was most gracefully presented, while the tenderness of Massenet's aria from "Herodiade" was commendable altogether. At the close of this, the artist was able to give a burst of power that was a very triumphant end of a most artistic effort, and recall after recall testified the appreciation of the large audience. Decidedly this was the best work Mrs. Henschel has recently done in Boston. LOUIS C. ELSON.

Notes.

This afternoon Eugen D'Albert begins a series of three piano recitals at Music Hall with a programme drawn entirely from the compositions of Beethoven. His fame as a Beethoven player caused a generally expressed desire for such a programme. It has been compiled with rare judgment and embraces striking specimens of the three distinct periods in which his compositions are classed, the first which shows the influence of musical traditions, the second when he displayed his individuality, and the last and profound period. The programme is: Thirty-two variations in C minor and four sonatas. C major op. 53. E minor op. 90. E major of 109 and A flat major op. 110. The recitals on Wednesday and Saturday afternoons have programmes drawn from the time of Bach to the present.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, APRIL 18, 1892.

CAUSERIE.

Mr. Henschel's Music to the Tragedy, "Hamlet."

Haydn's "Creation" as Sung by the Handel and Haydn.

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony concert in Music Hall Saturday evening was as follows:

Symphony No. 1, B flat, op. 38	Schumann
Aria, "Alessandro"	Handel
Suite from the music to Shakspeare's "Hamlet," op. 50	Henschel
Aria from "Herodiade"	Massenet
Overture, "Oberon"	Weber

Mrs. Henschel was the singer. Mr. Henschel conducted his suite, which was played for the first time in America.

⁂

The suite was a disappointment. It does not seem well adapted to the purposes of the theatre, and its contents are not of such moment or individuality as to warrant performance in a symphony concert. The music is devoid of originality and spontaneity, nor is it so skillfully made that it excites respectful attention. The themes are neither striking nor melodious; the development of the themes is commonplace; the instrumentation is dry. The best of the numbers is the pastorale, which at the start is promising; this promise, however, is not fulfilled, and the constant use of the same instrumental effects brings monotony. The first prelude is called "Hamlet," the second is "Ophelia," and if the titles were interchanged, the hearer would not suffer, for the music of the one seems as appropriate, or inappropriate, to the character as that of the other. Hamlet and Ophelia in Mr. Henschel's music are twins of tender age; they are dressed alike, they speak with the same inflections, and it is impossible to distinguish the sex. The prelude, "Ophelia's Death," is devoid of pathos, and the Danish march is without a climax. In a word, the suite is manufactured music. It was well played by the orchestra. The composer was welcomed warmly and recalled after the march.

⁂

Mrs. Henschel sang the aria "Lusing he piu Care" from Handel's "Alessandro" in a most delightful manner, and she was applauded with enthusiasm. The air was written for Faustina Bordoni, the reckless beauty who, at the age of 18, was called in Italy "the new siren" and "the tenth muse." The fame of her song was only equaled by the prodigality of her life. Medals were struck in her honor at Naples. Coarse and vindictive pamphlets were written against her in London. Not until she married Hasse did she assume the role of respectability. The learned Dr. Chrysander in his ponderous "Life of Handel," as yet unfinished, does not disdain to quote in foot notes the scandals of her London visit. She made her first appearance in that city in 1726 in "Alessandro," and the rivalry between "Madam Faustina, the rare singing woman," and Cuzzoni led to social dissension. Faustina, on account of her surpassing physical charms, was the favorite of the debauched nobility and the heroine of the masquerades. No wonder that protests were many and loud and fierce. From one of the least outrageous in its defiance of decency, the following lines may be quoted; for they show the temper of the time:

> "Cuzzoni can no longer charm,
> Faustina now does all allarm (sic)
> And we must buy her pipe so clear
> With hundreds twenty-five a year.
> Britons! For shame, give all these follies o'er,
> The ancient British nobleness restore."

⁂

But how did Faustina sing? Her voice was a demi-soprano, and its compass was from B flat to G. She was mistress of the cantar granito, the firm and bound song. Her execution was brilliant, and she was able to enunciate with great rapidity. Her trill was without a flaw, and the most complicated passages were sung as easily as though they were played by a violinist. Her intonation was sure; her breathing was remarkable. She first introduced with success the rapid repetition of the same note. She improvised cadenzas with taste. She was a chanteuse legere. And so she was accused of a lack of passion, a want of soul. Sara Goudar, whose knack of being disagreeable on all occasions amonted to positive genius, refused to join in the general chorus of praise. According to her, Faustina was the first that sang sixteen eighth notes in a measure, and "this agility was the signal for the introduction of bad taste in song. Natural simplicity was soon changed into artificial gayety. There was no longer a question of singing well, but the chief thing desired was the ability to sing quickly." So Faustina prevailed against Cuzzoni, who moved the soul. Born in 1700, Faustina left the stage at the age of 53. Dr. Burney saw her in Vienna when she was 72. She was still beautiful, and her spirits were high. She would not sing for the Englishman, and he listened to her daughters. Her rival, Cuzzoni, died in Bologna in 1770 in abject poverty, having supported herself some time by making buttons.

⁂

Mrs. Henschel sang the air from Massenet's "Herodiade" with taste, but the air itself demands a fuller, warmer voice, a broader style and a more pronounced personality. When the opera was produced at the Theatre de la Monnaie in Brussels Dec. 19, 1881, the air was sung by Duvivier, who was then receiving $400 a month. When it was first brought out in Paris at the Theatre-Italien in 1884, and in Italian, the air was sung by Fides Devries. It is interesting to note in this connection that Jean de Reszke then made his appearance in Paris as a tenor, and he was accused of wanting power.

⁂

The Schumann B flat symphony and the "Oberon" overture are familiar numbers. The symphony started with blatant indecision, and it was played throughout with little regard for Schumann's dynamic marks. Coarse and undiscriminating as was the reading of Mr. Nikisch, the performance evidently gave pleasure to many in the audience. But neither the programme nor the performance as a whole was worthy of the reputation of the Symphony Orchestra.

⁂

Haydn's "The Creation" was given last evening in Music Hall by the Handel and Haydn Society, under the direction of Mr. Zerrahn. The solo singers were Mrs. Albani and Messrs. Edward Lloyd and M. W. Whitney. The orchestra was made up of men from the Symphony Orchestra. The programme intimated that the first performance of this well-known work was March 19, 1799, under the direction of Haydn. According to Hanslick's "History of Concerts in Vienna," the first performance was on an earlier date, viz., the 19th of January, 1799, and the place was the Schwarzenberg Palace. It was then sung by a society of the nobility, and it was repeated on the 19th of March for Haydn's benefit. It was sung in the Burg Theatre by the "Tonkuenstlers Societaet the 22d and 23d of December of the same year, and the entrance fee was doubled for the first time in the history of the society. Nearly 4500 florins were taken in these two evenings, a most unusual sum in those days.

There were many who in their sincere devotion believe that even the longest works of the great masters should be given without cuts. They insist that "The Messiah" and Bach's St. Matthew Passion should be sung without the omission of a number. But the ear is only capable of receiving musical impressions for a certain time, and this time is of comparatively short duration. In the theatre the eyes are interested as well as the ears. Scenery, costumes, action divert the mind. It is different in the concert room. In this age of nerves the blue pencil is the hearer's friend. Now, in the case of "The Creation," the whole of the third part could easily be spared. Adam and Eve grow tiresome in their performance of the Benedicite. Their conjugal discussions, in spite of mutual compliments and assurances of everlasting delight in the companionship, are as long and unsatisfactory as any Caudle lecture. There is too much smirking, too little vigorous strength and no primeval simplicity. Haydn's Adam was an authority in matters of etiquette, and his Eve was not unacquainted with the coquetry of the fan.

⁂

The work of the chorus was excellent throughout. There was, perhaps, here and there a faint attack or a suspicion of false intonation, but such instances were rare. The choruses of long breath—and they are masterpieces—were given with unusual spirit, and with firmness and decision. In "Awake the Harp" the altos seemed weak, but in the other choruses the parts were well balanced. The society may well be congratulated on the general excellence of the work of the great body of singers.

⁂

The performance of two of the solo singers was of uneven worth. Mrs. Albani took "With Vendure Clad" at too slow a pace, and the phrases suffered at times in consequence of the liberties taken. It is true that the air is written in Italian style, and considerable license should be granted to such a well-equipped singer as Albani. But the treatment of holds and of the ornaments is one thing; the destroying of the broad, general effect of a phrase for the gain of several lesser effects is another. Last evening Mrs. Albani was at first inclined to reduce the airs to pretty mosaic work. Her performance of "On Mighty Pens" might be called a study in holds. For she exaggerated each fermata. At the same time there was so much that was thoroughly admirable in her work, and occasionally that which closely approached greatness, that it seems ungracious to refer to her occasional chopping of phrases or false intonation. Mr. Lloyd was still suffering from the rudeness of our climate, but his recitatives were declaimed and the famous "In Native Worth" was sung with nobility and unaffected tenderness. It is a great pleasure in these days of tone-eruptions and spasmodic delivery to hear a singer of such sincerity, taste and skill. Mr. Whitney was unfortunate in his intonation at the beginning, for he, too, is a sufferer on account of sudden climatic changes, but he delivered the "animal" recitative with effect, and sang "Now heaven in fullest glory shone" to the great satisfaction of the audience. Of the trios, "The Lord is great," with the accompanying chorus, was the most heartily to be commended. The hall was crowded, and the chorus, conductor and solo singers were frequently and loudly applauded.

PHILIP HALE.

CONCERTS OF THE WEEK.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert will give the first of his pianoforte recitals this afternoon in Music Hall at 2.30 o'clock. The programme will be devoted to works of Beethoven, and will include 32 variations, C minor and sonatas, op. 53, op. 90, op. 109, op. 110.

Mr. D'Albert will give the second of his pianoforte recitals in Music Hall Wednesday afternoon. The programme will include prelude and fugue, D major, Bach-D'Albert; sonata, op. 78, Beethoven; variations serieuses, Mendelssohn; suite, D minor, op. 91, Raff; impromptu, op. 90, No. 3, Schubert; "Man Lebt nur Einmal," Strauss-Tausig; Liebestraum No. 3, and Rhapsodie Espagnole, Liszt.

The programme of the last Symphony rehearsal and concert of the season, Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, will include Haydn's G major symphony (No. 13, B and H); Paganini's concerto for violin (Wilhelmj arrangement); and Brahms symphony No. 1, C major. Mr. Kneisel will be the solo violinist.

The third and last of the D'Albert pianoforte recitals will be given in Music Hall Saturday afternoon. This is the programme:

Mr. Eugen D'Albert will assist at the third and last concert of the Kneisel Quartette in Cambridge, Brattle Hall, Tuesday evening at 8.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 17, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Notable Programme by the Symphony Orchestra.

Handel and Haydn to Sing "The Creation" in Music Hall Tonight.

D'Albert's Recitals—Happenings Interesting to Music Lovers.

The audience at the last but one of this season's Symphony concerts was even larger than the average assemblage which has crowded Music Hall for the pleasure of hearing Director Nikisch's offerings.

The programme last evening was of more than common interest, affording as it did an opportunity of hearing for the first time in Boston a suite for orchestra by Mr. Georg Henschel, and again enjoying the singing of his charming wife.

The Henschels were so closely identified with the early history of the Symphony orchestra that their reappearance with this now unrivalled organization was naturally an event of exceeding interest.

There were enthusiastic plaudits to welcome both of these favorites, and their offerings were received with cordial favor.

The orchestral suit as given yesterday was arranged from the music which Mr. Henschel composed for Mr. Beerbohm Tree's production of "Hamlet." It consisted of the prelude, the entr'acte and the Danish march. The music incidental to the play was not given.

The music is for the most part of a scholarly nature and is rather of a more ambitious character than Mr. Henschel's previous works. He has generally employed the Wagnerian method of leit motif to express the various characters and ideas, and the work is throughout decidedly modern in style.

The overture is founded upon two delightful themes, the one identified with Hamlet being changeable and irresolute and the Ophelia subject most tender and pathetic. These subjects are repeated in the succeeding entr'actes with greater strength and more elaborate orchestral effects.

The entr'acte that precedes the fourth act is elegiac in character and is written solely for the strings of the orchestra, reinforced by the drums. It is a most effective and beautiful number and was exquisitely played. The final interlude is of pastorale nature, delicate and sympathetic, and is intended to represent Mr. Tree's idea of Ophelia's burial in a sunlit churchyard.

The Danish march, which concludes the suit, is suggestive of national airs and is treated in a vigorous but exceedingly simple style.

Mr. Henschel conducted with the masterly skill which is so pleasantly remembered here, and he was repeatedly and enthusiastically recalled at the conclusion of the performance.

Mrs. Henschel sang two arias from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade." She sang the Handel number with much expression and a great deal of artistic finish. She was also very successful in Massenet's beautiful aria. Of course there were cordial pluadits unnumbered.

Schumann's Symphony No. 1, in B flat, was substituted for the promised D'Albert symphony. The performance of the latter was postponed on account of the non-arrival of the orchestral parts from Europe. Mr. Nikisch read the Schumann symphony very satisfactorily, and its performance by the orchestra afforded much pleasure to the audience. Weber's "Oberon" overture concluded the concert.

The last concert of the season will be given next Saturday. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist, and the programme promised is as follows: Symphony, G major, No. 13, B. & H., Haydn; concerto for violin, Paganini; symphony No. 1, C minor, Brahms.

D'Albert's Piano Recitals.

The often expressed desire to hear Eugen D'Albert in a Beethoven programme, in the interpretation of which no pianist ranks so high, is to be gratified tomorrow evening at Music Hall.

D'Albert has selected for this occasion several distinctive periods of the master's style and thought, and the listener can be assured that each will have its innermost beauties revealed and will be presented with the same power and skill that have made D'Albert's fame so great in this and in other countries.

The programme is the set of 32 variations in C minor and four sonatas, C major op. 53, E minor op. 90, E major op. 109, and A flat major op. 110.

Two other recitals with miscellaneous programmes selected from classic and modern sources, follow on Wednesday and Saturday afternoons. The wonderful technique and intellectual power of this "little giant of the pianoforte" will be heard at its best on these occasions.

—The Symphony rehearsal this week, which was Thursday afternoon instead of Friday on account of its being holy week, was very largely attended considering the number of regular habitues who are absent from town. Mrs. Henschel made her usual artistic success and was received with a warmth of enthusiasm which must have been most gratifying. She looked very attractive in a pearl gray cloth walking dress, studded with steel. The skirt was edged with fur of the same color. Her close bonnet was of white straw trimmed with yellow and black. She carried a cluster of "Jack" roses tied with long ribbons. Among the many well-known faces seen in the seats near the platform were those of Mrs. W. P. Fay and Miss Fay, Mrs. Nathaniel Walker and her daughter, Mrs. Oscar Iasigi, Mrs. Lang, Miss Virginia Stackpole, Mr. Francis Bartlett, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Zerrahn, Rev. Father Bodfish, Mr. Elliot Pratt, Mr. Arthur Foote and Mr. Heinrich Meyn.

—Bach's Passion Music attracted, as usual, an immense audience at the Music Hall, Friday night. Mme. Joachim and Mrs. Henschel, the two women soloists, were both gowned in black, the former with decollete sleeveless bodice of fine lace. Mrs. Henschel's dress was relieved by a white bodice, which was confined by a black girdle. In the audience among the throng of well-known people were Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Mr. and Mrs. Grafton Minot, Mr. and Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger, and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. [illegible] Browne, Mrs. Nathaniel Walker, Mr. Pierson Beebe and Miss Beebe, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe and her daughter, Mrs. Elliott, Miss Charlotte Dana, Mr. G. A. Goddard, Miss Florence Lyman, Mr. Theodore Dwight, Mr. W. P. Blake, Mr. and Mrs. G. R. Minot and Mrs. Richard Olney, Mr. Clayton Johns, Dr. John Homans 2d, Dr. Richard Sprague, Mr. A. H. Pickering, Mr. Arthur Foote, Prof. and Mrs. Royce of Cambridge, Mr. and Mrs. Elliot Pratt and Mr. Krehbiel of the New York Tribune.

—The D'Albert recitals at Music Hall, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons of this week, should not be forgotten in the plethora of music. Mr. C. A. Ellis is Mr. D'Albert's manager.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 108.

SUNDAY, APRIL 17, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Conductor Nikisch is making a memorable ending of the season's symphony concerts, and the 23d of the season's series, given at Music Hall last evening, will be an excellent model to follow in future years in the making of programmes. Schumann's tuneful symphony No. 1, in B flat, was played first, and its several movements were given a most interesting reading, the performance of the work as a whole commanding high praise for the orchestra and its conductor.

The orchestral novelty of the evening consisted of a suite of five movements, arranged by the composer, Mr. Georg Henschel, for the concert room, from the music composed for the recent London production of "Hamlet," by Manager Beerholm Tree. Mr. Henschel directed the performance of his own music, and his assumption of his old place at the conductor's desk called out quite an ovation in his honor. The music selected and arranged for the concert room by Mr. Henschel had its first American hearing on this occasion, and its merits were quickly and heartily appreciated by the audience.

The selections made were as follows: (a) Prelude (Hamlet), (b) prelude to act II. (Ophelia), (c) interlude (act III.) and pastorale (act V.), (d) prelude to act V. (Ophelia's death), (e) Danish March. Aside from the opening number, the several movements have characteristics which give them a distinct and definite value apart from their association with the play, and the suite will make a valuable addition to the concert music of the day.

Mr. Henschel's marked individuality shows itself in all his work, and the themes of his "Hamlet" music are as original and clear in their ideas and development as one would expect from this capable musician and born composer.

The admirably contrasted motives which are associated with the characters of Hamlet and Ophelia are among the evidences of the inspiration of the composer, and the use made of these themes is at all times masterly and artistic.

The prelude to act 2, the "interlude" in act 3 and the "Danish march" are compositions which will readily be accepted as standards of excellence in the modern style, and these numbers of the suite met with especial favor at their hearing last evening. The music is richly and skilfully scored for full orchestra, and can hardly fail of gaining a recognition of its merits wherever it is heard.

Mr. Henschel directed the orchestra in a masterly fashion, showing in his beat the same decisive and definite purpose as in the old days; but with this a degree of repose and self-command that has evidently resulted from his added years of experience since he first entered the field of the conductor in this city.

Mrs. Henschel was the soloist, and she sung in her own delightful fashion arias from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade," winning a genuine appreciation of her charming gifts as a singer after both her contributions to the programme. The "Oberon" overture ended the evening's programme.

A somewhat curious misunderstanding necessitated the abandonment of the promised first American performance of Eugen D'Albert's symphony, No. 4. It is not often that a pianist of today becomes so identified with Beethoven as to have his compositions mixed up in the mind of a publisher with those of the man who wrote the "immortal nine." Such, however, has proved to be the case with D'Albert, for, in response to an order for D'Albert's fourth symphony, a leading European publisher forwarded to the manager of these concerts a full score and parts of Beethoven's fourth symphony. The error was not discovered in season to remedy it and give the performance of D'Albert's symphony in a proper fashion.

PIANO RECITALS THIS WEEK.

The appearances of Eugen D'Albert in recital programmes at Music Hall will occur tomorrow afternoon and on the afternoons of Wednesday, the 20th, and Saturday, the 23d inst. This great artist has made an especial feature of Beethoven's compositions in his concerts of the present season, and his first recital will be given exclusively to this composer, the programme being as follows: 32 variations in C minor, sonata in C major, Op. 53; sonata in E minor, Op. 90; sonata in E major, Op. 109, and sonata in A-flat major, Op. 110.

The Handel and Haydn Society ends its season, with "The Creation," at Music Hall, this evening, when the soloists will be Mme. Emma Albani, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. M. W. Whitney.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 18, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The twenty-third Symphony concert given at Music Hall Saturday evening was one of the most thoroughly enjoyable concerts of the course. Not only was the programme one of rare taste, but the soloist, Mrs. Henschel, was the personification of perfect musical taste.

Schumann's spring symphony was substituted for the promised D'Albert symphony, which was postponed on account of the non arrival of the orchestral parts. The rendition of the Schumann number was wholly satisfactory, appealing to the taste of the large audience in its finish of phrasing and its beauty of interpretation.

Mr. Henschel's orchestral suite from the music to Shakspere's "Hamlet," consisting of the prelude, the entr'acte and Danish march, is an ambitious work full of merit and worthy a place with Schumann's and Weber's best efforts. It is modern in style, but constructed on the principles of strict beauty in orchestration; it is founded upon two delightful themes—the restlessness and instability of Hamlet and the tenderness of Ophelia. These themes are repeated in the succeeding movements with greater elaboration. The entr'acte preceding the fourth act is written solely for strings, with occasional aid from the drums. It is a beautiful movement, calling forth the best powers of the strongest part of the orchestra. The final movement is a pastoral, quaint and pathetic in nature, contrasting strongly with the vigorous measure of the Danish march. Its interpretation was as nearly like the composer's conception as his complete mastery of the orchestra could command.

Had there been sufficient time the audience would have more vigorously expressed its appreciation of the grand manner in which Mr. Nikisch and his men gave the "Oberon" overture. It is true art to arrange a programme with the view of making each number more interesting, and certainly Weber's work was a fitting close to a fine performance.

Mrs. Henschel sang two arias with orchestral accompaniment—Handel's aria, "Alessandro," and an aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," with rare taste. The orchestration of the last number was a trifle heavy for her voice, but the skill of execution, the delicate finish of the phrases, the clear enunciation, which characterized her former appearances, were all present.

"The Creation."

The miracle o' the creation set to the pulse throbs of the Easter world, new created of nature every year, was told last night at Music Hall in the majestic music of Haydn's famous oratorio.

The Handel and Haydn Society were assisted by Mme. Emma Albani, soprano; Edward Lloyd, tenor; Myron W. Whitney, bass, with Carl Zerrahn as conductor, B. J. Lang as organist, and players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Franz Kneisel as principal.

In the parts of Gabriel and Eve, Mme. Albani did a great deal of thorough, conscientious work, though her voice was scarcely suited to the peculiar requirements of the parts, flexibility and lightness being more desirable than the dramatic qualities which Mme. Albani's voice possesses. At times she seemed to force her voice, thereby obtaining a nasal quality of tone far from agreeable. She took liberties with the score, but her work was artistic and enjoyable from the earnestness which marked her whole performance.

Mr. Lloyd's vocalization was better than that of any other performance, for the huskiness which has taken hold of his voice since he reached Boston was apparent only at intervals and his representation of Uriel was characteristically artistic. His solo, "In Native Worth," was a masterpiece in regard to phrasing, enunciation and expression. He was heartily applauded at the close of the number.

Mr. Whitney's "Raphael" and "Adam" were well done. He was in better voice than on Wednesday, and seemed more familiar with the music. His deep tones were very effective. The chorus work was admirable throughout, and the orchestration all that could be desired. "Creation" has not been given by this society for five years.

Musical Notices.

A Beethoven programme by the noted Beethoven player, D'Albert is the musical attraction this afternoon at Music Hall. The First period that marked the master's style will be represented by his thirty-two variations in C minor; the second period by his sonatas in C major, op. 53, and E minor, op. 90; the third by his later sonatas in E major, op. 109, and A flat major, op. 100. D'Albert is perhaps the best equipped pianist both intellectually and technically to present these great works to the satisfaction of musicians and the entertainment of the public. The other recitals on Wednesday and Saturday will have miscellaneous programmes.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 17, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-SECOND CONCERT.

The twenty-second Symphony concert was given in Music hall Saturday evening, April 9. This was the programme:

Goldmark. Overture. "Sakuntala."
J. K. Paine. Symphony No. 2, in A major. "In the Spring."
1. Introduction. Adagio sostenuto. The Departure of Winter. Allegro ma non troppo. The Awakening of Nature.
2. Scherzo. Allegro. May Night Fantasy.
3. Adagio. A Romance of Springtime.
4. Allegro giojoso. The Glory of Nature.
Beethoven. Overture. "Egmont."

The overture is a remarkably fine one, and is by one of the very best of modern composers. It is happily conceived, ingeniously worked out, richly orchestrated and quite fascinating. As it is music after Mr. Nikisch's own heart, it was faultlessly performed.

The symphony, a noble, manly composition, would be so considered in any country; and emanating from an American it should receive the warmest commendation and praise from our people which it is possible to bestow. It is not a fascinating piece; is not interesting as music, to the musical world at large, but to the musically educated and refined, it shines out with glowing colors, resplendent with beauties of the art divine. All credit and praise is due the composer, Mr. J. K. Paine. It received good treatment at the hands of Mr. Nikisch. More regard for American composers would have a tendency to encourage those who are now lost in oblivion for the want of patronage and kindly sympathy.

The Beethoven overture was remarkably well played.

JAMES M. TRACY.

The renowned pianist, Eugen D'Albert, will give recitals in Music hall on Monday, Wednesday and Saturday at 2.30 p. m. It is now generally conceded that D'Albert is the greatest living exponent of piano music and the worthiest successor of Tausig, Liszt, Rubenstein and VonBülow. No player has attained such super-eminence as this young artist, who unites with a degree of technique that knows no limit a comprehension of musical sentiment, and entrancing in its expression. He is the wonder of the musical world, and his concert will carry the musical season, already rich in great performers and celebrities, to a superb climax.—Ex.

The time is approaching when thoughts of the "Pop" concerts in Music hall will fill many minds. These concerts are of great benefit during the summer in many ways, and their re-inauguration this season will be heartily welcomed. It is understood that Mr. Ellis has already made arrangements with the board of police to this end.

THE HANDEL AND HAYDN CONCERTS.

The annual concerts for the Lenten season by the Handel and Haydn society began in Music hall on Wednesday and the immortal choruses of "The Messiah" were given out with the well-known promptness of attack, unanimity of phrasing, and general accuracy to which the society has accustomed us in past seasons. The solo singers were Mrs. Genevra Johnstone-Bishop, soprano; Mrs. Carl Alves, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor; and Mr. Myron Whitney, bass. Mrs. Bishop was unfortunate in not being adequately prepared to do justice to the great recitative and aria of "The Messiah." Her tones were in a somewhat drawling fashion, as if to affect a portamento, which, however, was in no instance artistically employed. From the interpreter's point of view she also erred, there being a constant void in her performance of depth of feeling and musical intelligence. Mrs. Alves sang in a very sincere and fervent spirit and with much beauty of tone, excepting her tendency now and then to a somewhat explosive tone-production. Mr. Lloyd, while not in good voice, was yet enabled to give all the more welcome evidence of his splendid ability as an oratorio singer. He occasionally deviated from the literal requirements of Handel's music, yet in this respect he at no time offended. Mr. Myron W. Whitney was the same unrivalled interpreter as ever for his rôle, and sang admirably throughout.

Friday evening the society gave Bach's Passion Music according to St. Matthew. Mrs. Georg Henschel was the soprano; Mrs. Amalie Joachim, alto; Mr. Edward Lloyd was the chief narrator; Mr. George J. Parker, tenor; Mr. Georg Henschel sang the music of Jesus; and other bass parts were assigned to Mr. Gardner S. Lamson. Mr. Lang was the organist and Mr. Tucker the pianist. There was also a chorus of boys from the choirs of Emmanuel, Saint Paul's, and Harvard college. The performance by the chorus was one of striking merit, and the numerous difficulties that the vocal score presented were wonderfully well mastered. Mr. Lloyd, although again not at his best as regards voice, sang so expressively, and with such a refined mastery that he could but have won the admiration of all present, as was indeed testified by the heartiest of plaudits which never seemed more worthily bestowed. His singing throughout was of an irreproachably artistic and elevating standard. As regards Mr. Henschel, the impassioned and dramatic character of his singing was as conspicuous as ever, yet with much the same faults of vocalization to which attention has heretofore been called. Mr. Lamson, despite he is one of the most conscientious and refined of our resident artists, was quite unjust to his abilities and his performance failed of that favorable impression which it might otherwise have attained. Mrs. Henschel and Mr. Parker were both admirable, and Mrs. Joachim was also heard to better advantage than at her recent appearance at the Symphony violin concert. The part to the alto solo was played with delightful effect by Mr. Kneisel.

The Handel and Haydn society will close its season tonight by a performance at Music hall of "The Creation," with Mrs. Emma Albani and Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Myron W. Whitney for solo singers. This work has not been sung for five years. The chorus and admirable soloists will doubtless give a performance which will fittingly close this season's remarkable series.

KNEISEL QUARTETTE AND D'ALBERT IN BRATTLE HALL.

Brattle hall, Cambridge, will be the scene of an important concert next Tuesday evening. It will be the third and last concert of the series by the Kneisel quartette—Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, L. Svecenski, Alwin Schroeder—and a splendid programme of chamber music is arranged, headed by Mozart's string quartette in C major. The quartette will have the assistance of the pianist, Eugen D'Albert, who will be heard in chamber music for the only time in this vicinity. He will play twice, taking part in Beethoven's "Kreutzer" sonata with Mr. Kneisel, and in Schumann's E-flat piano quartette. That many will go to Cambridge from Boston and vicinity is assured.

EUGEN D'ALBERT'S RECITALS.

That "little giant" of the pianoforte, Eugen D'Albert, will give three recitals in Music hall on Monday, Wednesday, and Saturday afternoons of this week, April 18, 20 and 23, tickets for which are now on sale at Music hall. The opening recital is by special request devoted to the music of Beethoven, this artist's forte. The others contain selections from many composers, as will be seen from the subjoined programmes.

Monday afternoon, April 18, at 2.30—Beethoven programme:

32 Variations in C minor.
Sonata in C major, Op. 53.
  Allegro con brio—Introduzione e Rondo.
Sonata in E minor, Op. 90.
  Allegro moderato—Moderato cantabile.
Sonata in E major, Op. 109.
  Introduzione. Prestissimo. Aria con Variazione.
Sonata in A-flat major, Op. 110.
  Moderato. Presto non tanto. Aria e Fuga.

Wednesday afternoon, April 20:

Prelude and Fugue in D major..Bach-D'Albert
Sonata, Op. 78..........................Beethoven
  Allegro non troppo—Presto assai.
15 Variations sérieuses, Op. 54....Mendelssonn
Suite in D minor, Op. 91 ....Raff
  Introduzione e Fuga. Giga con Variazioni. Cavatina. Marcia.
Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 3 ....Schubert
Valse, "Man lebt nur einmal"...Strauss-Tausig
Liebestraum, No. 3, } ....Liszt
Rhapsodie Espagnole }
  (Folies d'Espagne e Jota Arragonesa.)

Saturday afternoon, April 23:

Suite Anglaise, No. 6.........................Bach
  Prelude—Allemande—Courante. Sarabande—Gavotte—Gigue.
Rondo in A minor.............................Mozart
Rhapsodie, Op. 79, No. 2....................Brahms
Sonata in B minor, Op. 58...................Chopin
  Allegro—Scherzo—Largo—Finale.
Barcarolle in A minor...................Rubinstein
Sonetto di Petrarca }
"Feux Follets" Etude, } ....Liszt
Tarentelle, "Napoli," }

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 18, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the twenty-third Symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Schumann............Symphony No. 1, in B-flat, op. 38.
Handel.............................Aria from "Alessandro."
Henschel. Suite from the music to Shakspere's "Hamlet."
Massenet.........................Aria from "Hérodiade."
Weber...........................Overture to "Oberon."
Mrs. Georg Henschel was the singer.

We had been promised a symphony by Eugen d'Albert, but it seems the orchestral parts did not arrive in time to have the work put through the due rehearsal, so the ever welcome Schumann symphony was substituted for it. The beautiful Larghetto was admirably played, and we cannot remember hearing the Finale given with such perfection before. In this Allegro animato e grazioso, which has now and then moments of the most tremendous energy and seriousness, Mr. Nikisch had some wonderful inspirations in the way of making sharp contrasts, without in the least impairing the musical coherence of the movement; some of the accents he brought out were a new revelation. We have so often had to differ with Mr. Nikisch on matters of "interpretation," that we are doubly glad now to express our hearty admiration of his conducting of this symphony; it may have been a "reading," but it sounded to us very like the Schumann-pure.

Mr. Henschel's suite from his music to "Hamlet" has a history which it is well to know. The five movements played on Saturday evening were taken from the prelude, entr' actes and incidental music written by Mr. Henschel for Mr. Beerbohm-Tree's production of the tragedy at the Haymarket in London. They comprise—1, Prelude (a tone painting of Hamlet); 2, Prelude to act ii. (tone picture of Ophelia); 3. Interlude before the play scene in act iii. and Pastorale before act v.; 4, Prelude to act iv. (Ophelia's death); 5, Danish March (for the entrance of king and court in act i. and introduced afterward in other scenes). In writing these several numbers Mr. Henschel has made unstinted use of the Leitmotiv, in the Wagnerian sense, almost every theme in the music being associated either with a character or incident in the play. Naturally this quasi-dramatic element falls out, when the suite is given as concert music, as it was last Saturday; but one little touch, which some old theatre-goers may have noticed, is worth speaking of here: in the music descriptive of Ophelia's death, the composer has woven in the themes of some of the songs that stage Ophelias have sung, time out of mind, in the mad scene in act iv. It is not often that music, written with so purely dramatic a purpose as this of Mr. Henschel's, for a special production of a play, can hold its own in the concert room; the meaning of the various themes, which may be perfectly plain to the listener at the theatre, is too liable to be a sealed book to a concert audience. But there is enough of purely musical beauty and strength in this dramatic suite of Mr. Henschel's to make it worth listening to for its own sake. What struck us particularly at this first hearing was the general likeness it bears, in style, melodic character, and sentiment, to much of the quasi-dramatic music that has been written of late by French composers; it is French in the cut of its melody and harmony, French in its grace and poignancy of expression, more than all French in its knowing when it has said what it has to say. But one thing separates it from anything of the sort we have heard lately by French composers, and this is its solidity of musical construction, the admirable workmanship it shows. One finds in it none of that mere "Song without Words" spirit, none of that mere melody with accompaniment, that is the bane of contemporary French music; on the contrary, the themes are often worked out almost contrapuntally, the bass takes cognizance of and responds to what the treble has said, and the middle parts have something to say. It is music that not only pleases, but also interests you; it has consistency and something more than a merely emotional purpose. In a word, it is music worth writing. Mr. Henschel conducted the suite as only a composer can conduct his own music. It was not uninteresting to see him once more at the head of his old orchestra, changed in its membership though it is. The greeting by the audience showed that all present remembered him as the first conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Weber's overture to "Oberon" has surely never had a more brilliant performance here than that under Mr. Nikisch on Saturday evening. It went to a charm; not only was there no fault to be found, but there was everything to praise—and that, too, roundly. Mrs. Henschel sang the Handel air beautifully; Massenet's "Il est bon, il est beau," from "Hérodiade," a little overweighs her vocally, but her singing of it is admirable; she was loudly recalled time after time.

The next programme is: Haydn, Symphony in G major (No. 13, B. and H.); Paganini, Concerto for violin; Brahms, Symphony No. 1, in C minor. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist. With this concert the season will be brought to a close.

Handel and Haydn Society: "The Creation."

Haydn's "Creation" was the oratorio in the Music Hall last evening; the solos were sung by Mrs. Emma Albani, soprano, Mr. Edward Lloyd, tenor, and Mr. Myron W. Whitney, bass. Mr. Carl Zerrahn conducted, and Mr. B. J. Lang presided at the organ. "The Creation" seems to have lost none of its drawing power, for the hall was not only full last evening, but all the standing room had been taken a week beforehand. The performance was excellent, the chorus singing with great firmness and spirit, and the orchestra doing very well indeed. Mrs. Albani sang grandly throughout the concert. It is not often that one hears "With verdure clad" and "On mighty pens" so superbly given; and her florid work in "The Lord is great" was tellingly brilliant. Mr. Lloyd's singing was fine, artistic and effective as ever; one might find his tempo in the last pages of "In native worth" perhaps a trifle over-slow, but Mr. Lloyd has tradition on his side in this matter. Mr. Whitney sang with his wonted dignity and power, and his low D at the end of the worm's sinuous trace brought down the house as usual. We could not, however, help wishing that the "Creation" were given here, as it now is in England, without the third part; not that the third part is especially weak, but that it is certainly weaker than what has gone before, and seems weak by contrast. Those love-duets between Adam and Eve are to be really enjoyed only when one is fresh. The performance, taken as a whole, was very fine. The music wears remarkably well, say what you please against it; only now and then, as in the trite contrapuntal writing of "Achieved is the glorious work," with its eternal "He, sole on high, exalted reigns," does it provoke a not unkindly smile. There is genius enough in it and to spare.

The Kneisel Quartet will give the third and last in the series of chamber concerts at Brattle Hall, Cambridge, tomorrow night. Eugen d'Albert will take part in a work with the quartet and will play pianoforte solos.

Music Hall, Wednesday afternoon, Eugen d'Albert, pianoforte music.
Sanders Theatre, Thursday night, last of series by Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eugen d'Albert assisting.
Music Hall, Saturday afternoon, Eugen d'Albert, pianoforte music, last of the series here.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, APRIL 18. 1892.

The Twenty-third Symphony Concert.

The programme of the 23d Symphony concert, at the Music Hall, on Saturday evening, embraced the following numbers: Schumann's Symphony in B flat, No. 1; Aria from "Alessandro," Handel; Suite from the music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet," Henschel; Aria from "Herodiade," Massenet; Overture to "Oberon," Weber. Mrs. Georg Henschel was the soloist. The feature of the programme was the first performance in America of Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" Suite and the conducting of the work by the composer. The music of the Suite, if lacking in spontaneity, is nevertheless of a high character, and the treatment is that of a composer of marked skill and invention.

The orchestration is also of commendable richness and variety. There were points of melodic value in the "Ophelia" movement and in the "Pastorale" that made the hearer wish the composer had been more prolific in this direction in all the movements. Still, however, if it does lack the vital spark the "Suite" must interest the musician and cause a desire for a further hearing. It is infinitely above and beyond the majority of programme pieces that are dispensed so liberally by the rising generation of composers, for it is not exaggerated in the working out and has much that is reposeful within its borders. It is a work that requires just such masterly playing as it received from the Boston Symphony orchestra, and this in turn was the result of the fine conducting of Mr. Henschel.

Had the representation of the work fallen to the hands of Mr. Nikisch for a rendering it would have no doubt wearied the audience, for it is music that must be accurately and artistically given if the intended effect is to be gained. The coarse, blatant style that characterizes all that Mr. Nikisch conducts would have extinguished what there is that is commendable in its construction. How wonderfully Mr. Henschel has improved in his conducting since he last wielded the baton here. What a fine presence he has before the players; in his face can be traced the ever-varying moods of the music; how graceful, how simple, how reposeful are his movements while conducting. His musical stature and his conducting ability are sufficiently exalted not to require that he poses himself upon two boxes. He stood upon his feet as Gericke did, and was not perched on stilts in an apparent effort to emulate the altitude of the Beethoven statue.

This performance of the orchestra under Mr. Henschel's conducting is the only one, with one exception, that has shown that our orchestra is still the unrivalled body of musicians that it was when Mr. Gericke left us. For five years Gericke had drilled and disciplined the Boston Symphony orchestra, until there was nothing to be desired in its wonderfully perfect playing. At the very first concert under Mr. Nikisch's conducting a demoralization of this discipline was plainly evident, and the degeneration following was of rapid growth, until the playing of this formerly fine body became, as it is today, coarse, careless and unworthy such a combination of skilful performers. How charming it was on Saturday evening to listen to the beautiful expression that Mr. Henschel obtained from the players. The delightful contrasts of tone, the precision in every department of the orchestra, the repose, the real pianissimo, and the gratifying gradations of tone were apparent. We know now where the blame can be laid for all the mediocrity that is identical with the playing of our local orchestra. It isn't with the players themselves. The exception mentioned above, that goes hand in hand with Mr. Henschel's fine effort as a conductor, was the occasion of Mr. Kneisel's conducting last season when Mr. Nikisch was absent from sickness. It is an ill wind that blows no one good, and the critical listeners were benefited by Mr. Kneisel's appearance as conductor if but for once only.

The playing of the orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch, on Saturday evening, was, as usual, rough and without contrast. There was one notable event, however, and that is when the second violins in the last movement of the Symphony got to see-sawing with the first violins in the figure that characterizes that movement, Mr. Nikisch turned towards them and really looked disturbed, and vigorously beat the time at them. I have never seen him recognize similar fumbling with the music before in all the three years he has been here.

The opera overture was played in the now familiar Nikisch style. Mrs. Henschel sang the "Handel" aria in a clear, brilliant manner and was warmly recognized for her happy effort.

The orchestra accompanied her in a most discreet and charming manner. The Massanet aria was a little overheavy for her style and capacity, and the effort with it brought forth the incessant tremolo that marred her singing at the oratorio the evening before. Still, however, Mrs. Henschel is a capable musician, and shows it in her singing. She should keep within her scope, and profit thereby.

Haydn's "Creation" Given by the Handel and Haydn Society.

The Handel and Haydn Society gave Haydn's "Creation" at the Music Hall last evening, with the assistance of Mrs. Albani, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. M. W. Whitney. The orchestra was composed of the Boston Symphony players, with Mr. Kneisel as leader. Mr. Lloyd was still laboring with his hoarseness, but, of course, sang his part in the true artistic manner that marks his style. Mr. Whitney was also suffering from a cold, but, regardless of this drawback, repeated the success he has always attained in his fine rendering of the bass solos and recitatives of this beautiful creation of Haydn's. Mrs. Albani is a noble singer, but much of the effect in both of her solos, "With Verdure Clad" and "On Mighty Pens," was lost in the slow pace at which the movements were taken.

This caused her to drag her voice about at times, to the detriment of her style, which is usually perfect. The effort made for effects, and the pouncing on notes in the middle and lower part of her voice, and thereby forcing the tone out of them, also served in detracting from a complete excellence in her rendering of the soprano part. The majority of her work, however, was done in that broad, noble style that renders her without a rival in the oratorio field.

The chorus singing was admirable, and Conductor Zerrahn should be proud of the success he gained in handling the forces. The slow tempo, however, in some of the numbers, is questionable.

The Music Hall was crowded to the doors, and the society have to rejoice that their Easter festival has proved such a grand success.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, APRIL 19, 1892.

EUGEN D'ALBERT.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert gave yesterday afternoon in Music Hall the first of three pianoforte recitals. The programme was made up of the following compositions of Beethoven: Thirty-two variations in C minor; sonatas op. 53, op. 90, op. 109, op. 110. In response to a recall at the end of the concert, he played the scherzo from op. 31, No. 3.

In 1847 Mortier de Fontaine made a name for himself by playing in public the B flat sonata op. 106 of Beethoven. For the last sonatas of Beethoven were neglected or openly laughed at. They were regarded as the wild experiments of the man who said to Karl Holz that he was through with the pianoforte, "a most unsatisfactory instrument." But in 1881 Dr. Hans Guido Von Buelow went to and fro in Germany playing the last five of the sonatas in one programme. And now it is not unusual to find at least one of these stupendous works in the repertoire of newly fledged pianists.

To play such a programme as that presented yesterday by Mr. D'Albert taxes the strength of pianist and audience. A rich and generous host invites you to dine with him. The courses are served with ceremony, and lo, and behold each course is rare roast beef. Or again there have been men in the world's history with whom a prolonged interview is said to have inspired a certain terror. A long sitting with Gen. Washington is reported to have humbled the spirits of brave men. To hear the sonatas of Beethoven that are compounded of the strangely beautiful, the overwhelmingly solemn, and the perplexing and the enigmatical affects speedily the nerves and the mind of even the most hardened musician. The hearer sympathizes with Artemus Ward, who, having watched for a few minutes the House of Peers, was tempted to call on "the gent in the chair for a comic song." Nor can Mr. D'Albert's programme be considered as educational; for there was no attempt to trace the sonata-growth in Beethoven's career.

D'Albert's playing of the variations was a disappointment. There was a monotony of tone color, an apparent defiance of legitimate effects. The performance of the sonatas was characterized throughout by intense thoughtfulness and by subordination of self. Intellectuality frowned on sensuousness. But this intellectuality grew dry at times, and the tenderness of Beethoven was the sternness of D'Albert. From the mechanical standpoint there was much to wonder at; and yet the pianist was occasionally careless in the use of the pedals, and he was not altogether free from the reproach of thumping.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 110.

TUESDAY, APRIL 19, 1892.

THE D'ALBERT RECITAL.

The first of the three piano recitals, announced by Eugen d'Albert, was given at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, when the programme was confined to the compositions of Beethoven.

The 32 variations in C minor were put down as the opening number, though the choice was not altogether a wise one, for, despite the masterly manner in which they were played, they are poorly adapted for engaging the attention of an incoming audience.

The sonata in C major, op. 53 followed, and by the time he had concluded this composition, D'Albert had his audience with him, and he held their attention from that on by the wonderful skill, intelligence and good taste displayed in the remaining numbers of the programme.

The sonatas E minor, op. 9; E major, op. 109, and A-flat major, op. 110, completed the afternoon's list, and in their interpretation the pianist displayed all the depth of feeling, breadth of style and the intellectual qualities demanded for a full realization of all the beauties of the Beethoven repertoire. D'Albert is unquestionably the most honestly competent Beethoven player now before the public, and his audience yesterday readily realized this fact.

The second recital of the series, tomorrow afternoon, will have as its programme a list made from the compositions of Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, Straus-Tausig and Liszt.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 19, 1892.

The D'Albert Recital.

Before the echoes of Paderewski and De Pachmann have fairly died away, there comes the announcement of a series of piano recitals by Eugen D'Albert, and although we have had a surfeit of choice musical programmes this season, Boston is equal to the emergency and turns out in force to enjoy an afternoon with Beethoven, with the accomplished French musician as master of ceremonies.

A glance at the programme shows the inevitable Volkstein sonata (opus 53) in the second place. Why is it that every pianist feels it his bounden duty to include that beautiful but dreadfully familiar work in his list? Boston audiences have patiently endured its rendition by artists without number, and judging from the enthusiasm with which it was received yesterday, it still holds a warm place in their estimation, but for the sake of novelty, if nothing else, it should be given the rest to which it is so justly entitled.

The balance of the programme consisted of variations in C minor—with which the recital opened, and which served as a fitting introduction of the pianist to those who heard him for the first time—and movements from the sonatas in E minor, op. 90; E major, op. 109, and A flat major, op. 110. Beethoven has few if any better interpreters than D'Albert, and the recital of yesterday afternoon was doubly enjoyable from a knowledge of that fact, and the generous, if somewhat ill-timed applause, showed that the audience appreciated both the music and its rendition.

The next recital is announced for tomorrow afternoon, and the programme is made up of selections from Bach, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, Strauss-Tausig, Liszt and Beethoven.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, APRIL 19.

D'ALBERT'S PIANO RECITALS.

Beethoven Music Only Played in Music Hall Yesterday Afternoon.

Eugen D'Albert gave the first of three recitals in Music Hall, yesterday afternoon. The audience was not nearly so large as on the previous appearance here of the distinguished pianist, but those present were all intelligent admirers of music and derived exceeding pleasure from his interpretation of a programme devoted wholly to Beethoven music.

Bostonians have had such a feast of piano playing this year that it is not surprising that attendance at this class of concerts should show a decided decrease in these, the last weeks of the musical season.

D'Albert, however, is a genius in his way, and his playing differs so materially from that of the other notable pianists who have recently been heard here that the earnest musician can ill afford to miss these opportunities for studying the art of his wonderful performances.

Yesterday's programme consisted of Beethoven's 32 variations in C minor and four sonatas, C major, op. 53; E minor, op. 90; E major, op. 109; A flat major, op. 110.

D'Albert is heard to better advantage in the compositions of Beethoven than in those of any other composer; by many he is considered the ablest of all exponents of the great master of the sonata.

There has been no material change in his playing since he was last heard here, and to give an extended review of his performance at this time would necessitate a repetition of the praises which have in the past been so lavishly bestowed.

The dignity and intelligence of his readings from Beethoven deservedly win the most cordial admiration of all his listeners. There is a welcome lack of affectation in his playing. He is always sincere, and thoroughly artistic. He may seem at times to lack the magnetic qualities and delicate sentimental tone-producing power which are such notable possessions of some other master pianist, but in the matter of technique and mental equipment he is almost unrivalled.

His second recital will be given tomorrow afternoon. The programme will be as follows:

Prelude and fugue in D major	Bach-D'Albert
Sonata, op. 78	Beethoven
15 variations serieuses, op. 54	Mendelssohn
Suite in D minor, op. 91	Raff
Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3	Schubert
Valse, Man lebt nur einmal	Strauss-Tausig
Liebestraum, No. 3	Liszt
Rhapsodie Espagnole

Boston Post

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 19, 1892.

Eugen D'Albert's first pianoforte recital was given at Music Hall, yesterday afternoon, with a Beethoven programme consisting of the thirty-two variations, and the sonatas in C minor, C major, Op. 53; E minor, Op. 90; E major, Op. 109, and A flat major, Op. 110.

It was a grave mistake to begin the series of recitals with such a heavy programme. Beethoven is D'Albert's specialty, and the works chosen were interesting as studies, but as a concert programme it was tiring.

His playing was technically fine, admirable in execution, intelligent in interpretation and excellent as an exhibition of skill. He is an artist, but not a successful programme maker.

The next recital will occur on Wednesday afternoon, at 2:30 o'clock, and the programe promises to give greater opportunities for his powers of expression. He will play his own arrangement of Bach's prelude and fugue in D major, Beethoven's sonata, Op. 78; Mendelssohn's fifteen variations serieuses; Schubert's impromptu, Tausig's arrangement of Strauss's valse, "Man lebt nur einmal," and Liszt's Liebestraum, No. 3, and "Rhapsodie Espagnole."

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, APRIL 19, 1892.

Music Hall: The D'Albert Recitals.

Mr. Eugen d'Albert gave the first of his three pianoforte recitals in the Music Hall, yesterday afternoon, the programme being made up wholly of works by Beethoven; it was as follows:

XXXII. Variations on an original theme, in C minor.
Sonata in C major Op. 53 ("Waldstein").
Sonata in E minor, Op. 90.
Sonata in E major, Op. 109.
Sonata in A-flat major, Op. 110.

It seems a little curious that, when it comes to playing Beethoven sonatas, all the great pianists pitch upon about the same ones. Perhaps pianists do not follow each other's movements very closely, and it is quite possible that neither Pachmann, Paderewski nor D'Albert is aware of how nearly to death the "Waldstein" sonata has been ridden this winter in Boston. One actually trembles when one sees it down on a programme. Luckily each one of these excellent artists uses a different brand of pianoforte; had they all played on the same instrument, one might have looked for something like what happened to the famous Erard in Berlioz's "Soirées de l'orchestre," and have seen a pianoforte going about playing the "Waldstein" sonata all by itself. The two sonatas, opus 109 and 110, too, have not enjoyed much rest of late; beautiful as they are, one begins to feel that one would almost prefer to hear some others in their place, say the mighty one in B-flat, opus 106, the so-called "Hammer-Klavier" sonata, or the one in A major, opus 101. Our recent comparative immunity from the variations in E-flat on a theme from the "Eroica" symphony is, to be sure, something to be grateful for, and no one is ever otherwies than pleased to listen to the C-minor variations; still one could wish to hear the great 33 variations in C major on a waltz by Diabelli, opus 120, oftener than one now has a chance of doing.

But, much as three of the four sonatas on the programme have been dinned into our ears of late, to listen to them once more played by a man like D'Albert can not rightly be called a hardship. His playing of them yesterday afternoon was simply stupendous; except that the closing Prestissimo of the "Waldstein" was taken, to our thinking, rather too slow and heavily, nothing but admiration could be felt. The exquisite sonata in E minor, opus 90, was a boon indeed; it is not often that one hears its bewitching rondo now-a-days. This, too, was played to perfection. We have heard good judges complain of D'Albert's playing of the C minor variations as a thought too monotonous; but with this we can hardly agree. There is a sort of persistency of mood inherent in the very form of variations on an eight-measure theme which demands an even, little varied style of performance. Great variety in touch and tempo might easily do more harm than good.

Coming Concerts.

Eugen d'Albert will give at the Music Hall, tomorrow afternoon, the second of his series of pianoforte concerts. This is the programme: Prelude and fugue, D major, Bach-d'Albert; sonata, op. 78, Beethoven; Serious Variations, Mendelssohn; suite, D minor, op. 91, Raff; impromptu, op. 90, No. 3, Schubert; "Man Lebt nur Einmal," Strauss-Tausig; Love's Dream, No. 3, and Spanish Rhapsody, Liszt.

Sanders Theatre, Thursday night, last of series by Boston Symphony Orchestra, Eugen d'Albert assisting.

Music Hall, Friday afternoon, public rehearsal, Saturday night, concert. Boston Symphony Orchestra, close of the season.

Music Hall, Saturday afternoon, Eugen d'Albert, pianoforte music, last of the series here.

CITIZEN, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 4/14

5

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for April 29 and 30 will be as follows: Overture to "Flying Dutchman," Wagner; aria from "Herodiadi," Massenet, Mrs. Henschel; Symphony No. 8, in B minor—unfinished (allegro moderato, andante con moto), Schubert; fantasy from Act 2, "Tannhauser," "Blick ich umher," Wagner, Mr. Henschel; duet from "Taming of the Shrew," Goetz, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel; Symphony No. 4, in G minor (allegro con brio, adagio, finale—allegro ma non troppo—first time in Brooklyn), Dvorak.

PUBLIC LEDGER, Philadelphia, Penn.

Date 4-15

The programme for the last, this season, of the Boston Symphony Concerts, which will be given at the Academy of Music, on Monday, April 25, is as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
Air from "Herodiade" .... Massenet
Mrs. Henschel.
Symphony No. 8 in F, op. 93 .... Beethoven
Allegro vivace e con brio.
Allegretto scherzando.
Temps di minuetto.
Allegro vivace.
Fantasy from Act II, Tannhauser, "Blich ich Umher" .... Wagner
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Taming of the Shrew" ...... Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes" .... Liszt

A concert matinée is to be given in the Walnut Street Theatre, April 19th, under the direction of Henry F. Greim. Among the numbers on the programme will be a serenade (in three parts), by Frederick Wink, of this city, and a new overture by the same composer.

[illegible]
LOWELL.

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 19.

BEETHOVEN RECITAL.

Lowell was fairly represented at the piano recital of the renowned artist Eugen d'Albert, at Music hall, Boston, yesterday afternoon, and all marveled at the power over the instrument shown by the wiry little man. He played Beethoven's most difficult compositions with great skill and effectiveness, and thoroughly charmed and delighted a large and critical audience. His final appearances are to be at the same hall to-morrow and Saturday afternoons, when the programmes will be rich in the works of modern as well as classic composers. Tickets can be secured by addressing C. A. Ellis, manager, Boston.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 20, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartet at Cambridge.

The third and last concert by the Kneisel Quartet in Cambridge was given at Brattle Hall last evening with the assistance of Eugen d'Albert, before a representative musical Cambridge audience, and nothing more can be said. The programme consisted of Mozart's Quartet in C major, the Kreutzer Sonata and the E-flat Quintet by Schumann. The quartet was played as only the Kneisel Quartet can play when in their best form. The playing of the Kreutzer Sonata by Messrs. d'Albert and Kneisel was a revelation, and the superb rendering of Schumann's quintet was inspiring to the highest degree. The enthusiasm of the audience was something beyond anything shown in Cambridge in years, if ever, by such a cultured audience. In both the sonata and the quintet the applause after each movement was so continued that the players were called up three and four times before they were allowed to go on. It was a most brilliant occasion, in all respects, and one that the fortunate hearers are not likely soon to forget.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring the Sanders Theatre series of concerts to a close tomorrow night. Eugen d'Albert will appear.

Music Hall, Friday afternoon, public rehearsal Saturday night, concert, Boston Symphony Orchestra, close of the season.

Music Hall, Saturday afternoon, Eugen d'Albert, pianoforte music, last of the series here.

The Lowell Daily Courier.

FRIDAY, APRIL 15, 1892.

PIANO RECITALS.

Eugen D'Albert, who may be fitly termed the great light of the impressionist school of pianists, and whose playing has been productive of extraordinary exhibitions of musical enthusiasm, will give three piano recitals at Boston Music hall previous to his final trip with the Symphony orchestra. The first recital takes place Monday afternoon, April 18, and an entire programme of Beethoven's compositions will be given; the others, on the 20th and 23d, are selected from a great range of composers and are among the most magnificent specimens of piano music and ones that only a master could perform. Season and single tickets are to be had at the Boston Music hall.

Boston Post.

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 21, 1892.

Eugen D'Albert gave his second pianoforte recital in Music Hall yesterday afternoon, with a programme of greater interest and an audience more in sympathy with the player. His own arrangement of Bach's prelude and fugue, in D major, was followed by Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 78; Mendelssohn's fifteen variations serieuses, Op. 54, Raff's suite in D minor, Schubert's Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 3, Tausig's arrangement of Strauss's valse "Man libt nur einmal," and Liszt's Lieberstraum, No. 3, and "Rhapsodie Espagnole."

Technique is D'Albert's strong point. He recognizes no difficulties. His execution is brilliant, but his playing at times lacks feeling. He sacrifices delicacy of shading and beauty of expression to vigor of treatment, decision of touch and brilliancy of execution. Raff's suite was just suited to his powers, and its excellent interpretation called forth great enthusiasm. Schubert's impromptu was a revelation. In it he appeared to feel the marvel'ous beauty of the theme, and its rendition was characterized by all the delicacy of touch and shading which his previous numbers lacked. The Strauss valse was equally well done.

Saturday's programme will be the best of the series, containing Bach's Suite Anglaise, No. 6, Mozart's rondo in A minor; Brahms' rhapsodie, Op. 79, No. 2: Chopin's sonata in B minor, Op. 58; Rubinstein's barcarolle in A minor; Liszt's "Sonetto di Petrarca," "Feux Follets" etude, and "Napoli" tarantelle.

Music Notices.

The programme for the eighth and last symphony concert of the Cambridge series, which will take place in Sanders Theatre tonight at 7:45 o'clock, contains Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman;" Chopin's concerto for pianoforte in E minor; Saint-Saens's Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale;" soli for pianoforte, and Schumann's fourth symphony in D minor.

[illegible] Journal.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

The Second Pianoforte Recital of Eugen D'Albert.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert gave the second of his pianoforte recitals yesterday afternoon in Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Prelude and fugue in D major	Bach-D'Albert
Sonata, op. 78	Beethoven
Variations serieuses, op. 54	Mendelssohn
Suite, op. 91	Raff
Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3	Schubert
Valse, "Man Lebt Nur Einmal"	Strauss-Tausig
Liebestraum, No. 3, Rhapsodie Espagnole	Liszt

The prelude and fugue in D major by Bach for the organ show the influence of Dietrich Buxtehude of Lubeck, whom Bach visited in 1705. And indeed he might have been Buxtehude's successor, if he had wedded the daughter of his host; for it was the tradition in Lubeck that the new organist should marry the daughter of his predecessor. The girl was much older than the student, and, according to report, she was as ill-favored as the kine of Pharaoh's dream. Bach could no more stomach the condition than could Handel or Mattheson before him. The organ works of Buxtehude are unfortunately little known in this country; they are original, learned, and at the same time full of tumultuous passion. The toccatas abound in brilliant passages: recitatives are contrasted with surprising chords and polyphonic combinations. The fugues are often composed of several parts, separated by dazzling episodes in which the theme is ingeniously varied. The Bach fugue arranged by D'Albert is generally disdained by German organists. Haupt in his latter years would not give it to his pupils, but it is a favorite concert piece of such organists as Guilmant and Best. As it is originally written the prelude is more difficult than the fugue. It may be said of arrangements of organ compositions for the pianoforte, that as a rule they lose greatly in effect. Bach wrote many preludes and fugues for the pianoforte; and however great the virtuosoship of the player may be, giant strength and digital dexterity cannot bring from pianoforte keys the overwhelming tones of deep chested organ pipes. Mr. D'Albert's arrangement is ingenious and tasteful, and he played it with infinite strength and spirit; but a prelude and a fugue from "The well-tempered Clavichord" would have been more to the purpose.

We know Mendelssohn's opinion of a certain species of variations from a letter written in 1832 to Moscheles. "They give me as little pleasure as rope dancers or acrobats; for with them at least there is the barbarous attraction that one is in constant dread of seeing them break their necks, though they do not do so, after all; but the pianoforte tumblers do not as much as risk their lives, only our ears." Surely his own "Variations serieuses" were not written as a technical exercise, nor is it easy to imagine him, with his poetic and perhaps too sentimental nature, playing the different variations with little observance of the nuances. Mr. D'Albert's reading of the fourteenth variation was one of marvelous beauty, but it seemed yesterday from his performance that in the desire to avoid sentimentalism and ladylike effects he went to the other extreme. For he often disdained the use of colors; certain passages were not clearly defined; and there was occasional harshness. In these variations, as in other numbers of the programme, there was at times an over-employment of the "loud pedal."

On the other hand, how much there was yesterday to wonder at and applaud! It might, therefore, be ungracious to complain of his choice of the sonata or his selection of the Raff suite in its entirety. His performance of the waltz was an astounding feat of virtuosoship, but it was something more than merely the display of bravura. In the Raff jig and in the Schubert impromptu he showed that, when he was so inclined, he could skillfully mix his tone colors. Earnestness, sincerity, and other characteristics of the noblest pianoforte playing were present, even when he met the virtuoso, pure and simple, on his own ground. The Rubinstein study, which he played in response to a recall, was taken at a furious pace, but when it was over there was a recollection left of something more than mere speed and strength. In beauty of tone, in sensuous expression, Mr. D'Albert is not the equal of certain pianists that have visited us. In mental grasp, in virile expression, he is undoubtedly their superior. His individuality may be paradoxically expressed as consisting in his artistic subordination of self to the idea of the composer; and yet, such is his rugged nature, that in the purely sentimental, the graceful and the elegant, he is not as successful as in the intellectual, the abstruse and the heroic. Then enters the old, the eternal question, is music a sensuous or an intellectual enjoyment? This question must be answered by each individual according to his temperament. The harshness and the apparently deliberate dryness that occasionally appear in the playing of Mr. D'Albert and repel one man may give another a strange and a genuine pleasure. In deciding the rival claims of great pianists there is no universally approved Procrustean bed.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sixth Annual Tour, * 1892.

ITINERARY.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 112.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

The Second of the Eugen D'Albert Piano Recitals.

The second of the series of piano recitals by Eugen D'Albert had for its programme a list of compositions well calculated to test the versatility of this great artist, and included about all schools of compositions.

Beginning with his own arrangement of the Bach prelude and fugue in D major, the pianist had again to overcome some difficulties not incidental to his own share in the performance, its accompaniment being the restlessness incidental to the incoming of a belated audience.

The Beethoven sonata op. 78, was, however, played to an attentive audience, and the rare gifts of the player as an interpreter of this composer again held his hearers spellbound. The 15 variations serieuses by Mendelssohn followed, and in the performance of the stupendous difficulties in which the set culminates the player fairly astonished even those familiar with his absolute mastery of the keyboard. It was an exhibition of virtuosity that rose to the greatest heights and commanded the most enthusiastic applause as the task was completed.

Raff's suite in D minor, op. 91, followed, and the playing of each of the four movements caused rare pleasure to the audience, which found such expressions in applause that an encore number was graciously added.

The final group of compositions included the "Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3," Schubert; the valse, "Man Lebt Nur Einmal," Strauss-Tausig; the "Liebestraum, No. 3," and the "Rhapsodie Espagnole," Liszt, in the last of which D'Albert fairly surpassed all his playing during the programme and aroused his audience to the top pitch of enthusiasm. In response to the ovation following this exhibition, a Chopin waltz was played in a fashion to send his hearers away full of admiration for this great player. The last recital is on Saturday.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 21, 1892.

The D'Albert Recital.

D'Albert's playing charms by its virility, and this manly quality was put in evidence in almost every number of yesterday's programme; but amidst all the crashing of heavy chords and thundering of octave passages, one never felt that the pianist was overforcing the instrument, or that he had used up all his reserve force. The only number in which one could find any objection to his masculine vigor was the Bach Fugue in D, which seemed to be modernized in too great a degree by the power and fury with which it was invested. Nevertheless, the long subject was always clear, and the force never degenerated into mere roaring.

Beethoven's Sonata in F sharp, op. 78, is not often given in public, nor is it quite worth the giving; beyond the beauty of the first presentation of the chief theme in each of the two movements, there is nothing impressive in the work. Here, at least, all the commentators agree, and even the Beethoven-mad Marx ceases his fetish-worship to except this work from the examples of the master's genius. Technically, however, it was a wonderful performance. Mendelssohn's Variations Serieuses were nobly played. It is a high tribute in these days of hysterical emotion, to be able to say that D'Albert never sentimentalizes; this fact, together with a not over-romantic personality, may prevent his winning a wildly ecstatic female following, but it gives a musicianly value to his work that cannot be overestimated. These Variations Serieuses are among the best piano variations ever written; only Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques can surpass them, and even the great piano-variations of Beethoven or Brahms are less effective than the Mendelssohnian work. The different presentations of the theme were given in a straightforward, manly fashion, without any attempt to weep over the keyboard just because the work had a sombre tint.

Ruff's Suite was a triumph from beginning to end; the long episodes of the fugue were given in a masterly fashion, and the organ point had a splendid breadth. The Gigue was taken at a slow pace, as if it had been a Loure, but its variations were the more clear in consequence. The Cavatina is not so tuneful as the more celebrated one for violin by the same master, but was attractive, nevertheless, and the final march contained a magnificent crescendo and some bravura octave passages which won the pianist an encore, to which he responded with a most brilliant performance of Rubinstein's Etude in C.

The final group of works was lighter and more romantic, but the Strauss-Tausig waltz was full of bravura, as was also the Spanish rhapsody by Liszt, but the Liebestraum was the gem of this part of the concert, for it was not in the slightest degree mawkish, and yet was infinitely tender; the perfection of legato work. Of course a final encore must be accepted,—that is the latter-day fashion, without which no piano recital would be considered successful. In this case it was Chopin's Waltz in A flat, well played, of course, but the audience was not so wildly insistent upon it that its playing could not have been avoided.

On Saturday afternoon the last of this series will be given, and it is to be hoped that a larger audience than the fair-sized one of yesterday will be present. The recitals certainly deserve abundant recognition.

LOUIS C. [illegible]

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sixth Annual Tour, * 1892.

ITINERARY.

The Morning Times LOWELL.

TUESDAY MORNING, APRIL 19.

BEETHOVEN RECITAL.

Lowell was fairly represented at the piano recital of the renowned artist Eugen d'Albert, at Music hall, Boston, yesterday afternoon, and all marveled at the power over the instrument shown by the wiry little man. He played Beethoven's most difficult compositions with great skill and effectiveness, and thoroughly charmed and delighted a large and critical audience. His final appearances are to be at the same hall to-morrow and Saturday afternoons, when the programmes will be rich in the works of modern as well as classic composers. Tickets can be secured by addressing C. A. Ellis, manager, Boston.

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 20, 1892.

The Kneisel Quartet at Cambridge.

The third and last concert by the Kneisel Quartet in Cambridge was given at Brattle Hall last evening with the assistance of Eugen d'Albert, before a representative musical Cambridge audience, and nothing more can be said. The programme consisted of Mozart's Quartet in C major, the Kreutzer Sonata and the E-flat Quintet by Schumann. The quartet was played as only the Kneisel Quartet can play when in their best form. The playing of the Kreutzer Sonata by Messrs. d'Albert and Kneisel was a revelation, and the superb rendering of Schumann's quintet was inspiring to the highest degree. The enthusiasm of the audience was something beyond anything shown in Cambridge in years, if ever, by such a cultured audience. In both the sonata and the quintet the applause after each movement was so continued that the players were called up three and four times before they were allowed to go on. It was a most brilliant occasion, in all respects, and one that the fortunate hearers are not likely soon to forget.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will bring the Sanders Theatre series of concerts to a close tomorrow night. Eugen d'Albert will appear.

Music Hall, Friday afternoon, public rehearsal Saturday night, concert, Boston Symphony Orchestra, close of the season.

Music Hall, Saturday afternoon, Eugen d'Albert, pianoforte music, last of the series here.

The Lowell Daily Courier.

FRIDAY, APRIL 15, 1892.

PIANO RECITALS.

Eugen D'Albert, who may be fitly termed the great light of the impressionist school of pianists, and whose playing has been productive of extraordinary exhibitions of musical enthusiasm, will give three piano recitals at Boston Music hall previous to his final trip with the Symphony orchestra. The first recital takes place Monday afternoon, April 18, and an entire programme of Beethoven's compositions will be given; the others, on the 20th and 23d, are selected from a great range of composers and are among the most magnificent specimens of piano music and ones that only a master could perform. Season and single tickets are to be had at the Boston Music hall.

Boston Post

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 21, 1892.

Eugen D'Albert gave his second pianoforte recital in Music Hall yesterday afternoon, with a programme of greater interest and an audience more in sympathy with the player. His own arrangement of Bach's prelude and fugue, in D major, was followed by Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 78; Mendelssohn's fifteen variations serieuses, Op. 54, Raff's suite in D minor, Schubert's Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 3, Tausig's arrangement of Strauss's valse "Man libt nur einmal," and Liszt's Lieberstraum, No. 3, and "Rhapsodie Espagnole."

Technique is D'Albert's strong point. He recognizes no difficulties. His execution is brilliant, but his playing at times lacks feeling. He sacrifices delicacy of shading and beauty of expression to vigor of treatment, decision of touch and brilliancy of execution. Raff's suite was just suited to his powers, and its excellent interpretation called forth great enthusiasm. Schubert's impromptu was a revelation. In it he appeared to feel the marvellous beauty of the theme, and its rendition was characterized by all the delicacy of touch and shading which his previous numbers lacked. The Strauss valse was equally well done.

Saturday's programme will be the best of the series, containing Bach's Suite Anglaise, No. 6, Mozart's rondo in A minor; Brahms' rhapsodie, Op. 79, No. 2: Chopin's sonata in B minor, Op. 58; Rubinstein's barcarolle in A minor; Liszt's "Sonetto di Petrarca," "Feux Foilets" etude, and "Napoli" tarantelle.

Music Notices.

The programme for the eighth and last symphony concert of the Cambridge series, which will take place in Sanders Theatre tonight at 7:45 o'clock, contains Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman;" Chopin's concerto for pianoforte in E minor; Saint-Saens's Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale;" soli for pianoforte, and Schumann's fourth symphony in D minor.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

The Second Pianoforte Recital of Eugen D'Albert.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert gave the second of his pianoforte recitals yesterday afternoon in Music Hall. The programme was as follows:

Prelude and fugue in D major	Bach-D'Albert
Sonata, op. 78	Beethoven
Variations serieuses, op. 54	Mendelssohn
Suite, op. 91	Raff
Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3	Schubert
Valse, "Man Lebt Nur Einmal"	Strauss-Tausig
Liebestraum, No. 3, Rhapsodie Espagnole	Liszt

The prelude and fugue in D major by Bach for the organ show the influence of Dietrich Buxtehude of Lubeck, whom Bach visited in 1705. And indeed he might have been Buxtehude's successor, if he had wedded the daughter of his host; for it was the tradition in Lubeck that the new organist should marry the daughter of his predecessor. The girl was much older than the student, and, according to report, she was as ill-favored as the kine of Pharaoh's dream. Bach could no more stomach the condition than could Handel or Mattheson before him. The organ works of Buxtehude are unfortunately little known in this country; they are original, learned, and at the same time full of tumultuous passion. The toccatas abound in brilliant passages; recitatives are contrasted with surprising chords and polyphonic combinations. The fugues are often composed of several parts, separated by dazzling episodes in which the theme is ingeniously varied. The Bach fugue arranged by D'Albert is generally disdained by German organists. Haupt in his latter years would not give it to his pupils, but it is a favorite concert piece of such organists as Guilmant and Best. As it is originally written the prelude is more difficult than the fugue. It may be said of arrangements of organ compositions for the pianoforte, that as a rule they lose greatly in effect. Bach wrote many preludes and fugues for the pianoforte; and however great the virtuosoship of the player may be, giant strength and digital dexterity cannot bring from pianoforte keys the overwhelming tones of deep chested organ pipes. Mr. D'Albert's arrangement is ingenious and tasteful, and he played it with infinite strength and spirit; but a prelude and a fugue from "The well-tempered Clavichord" would have been more to the purpose.

We know Mendelssohn's opinion of a certain species of variations from a letter written in 1832 to Moscheles. "They give me as little pleasure as rope dancers or acrobats; for with them at least there is the barbarous attraction that one is in constant dread of seeing them break their necks, though they do not do so, after all; but the pianoforte tumblers do not as much as risk their lives, only our ears." Surely his own "Variations seriouses" were not written as a technical exercise, nor is it easy to imagine him, with his poetic and perhaps too sentimental nature, playing the different variations with little observance of the nuances. Mr. D'Albert's reading of the fourteenth variation was one of marvelous beauty, but it seemed yesterday from his performance that in the desire to avoid sentimentalism and lady-like effects he went to the other extreme. For he often disdained the use of colors; certain passages were not clearly defined; and there was occasional harshness. In these variations, as in other numbers of the programme, there was at times an over-employment of the "loud pedal."

On the other hand, how much there was yesterday to wonder at and applaud! It might, therefore, be ungracious to complain of his choice of the sonata or his selection of the Raff suite in its entirety. His performance of the waltz was an astounding feat of virtuosoship, but it was something more than merely the display of bravura. In the Raff jig and in the Schubert impromptu he showed that, when he was so inclined, he could skillfully mix his tone colors. Earnestness, sincerity, and other characteristics of the noblest pianoforte playing were present, even when he met the virtuoso, pure and simple, on his own ground. The Rubinstein study, which he played in response to a recall, was taken at a furious pace, but when it was over there was a recollection left of something more than mere speed and strength. In beauty of tone, in sensuous expression, Mr. D'Albert is not the equal of certain pianists that have visited us. In mental grasp, in virile expression, he is undoubtedly their superior. His individuality may be paradoxically expressed as consisting in his artistic subordination of self to the idea of the composer; and yet, such is his rugged nature, that in the purely sentimental, the graceful and the elegant, he is not as successful as in the intellectual, the abstruse and the heroic. Then enters the old, the eternal question, is music a sensuous or an intellectual enjoyment? This question must be answered by each individual according to his temperament. The harshness and the apparently deliberate dryness that occasionally appear in the playing of Mr. D'Albert and repel one man may give another a strange and a genuine pleasure. In deciding the rival claims of great pianists there is no universally approved Procrustean bed.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 112.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

The Second of the Eugen D'Albert Piano Recitals.

The second of the series of piano recitals by Eugen D'Albert had for its programme a list of compositions well calculated to test the versatility of this great artist, and included about all schools of compositions.

Beginning with his own arrangement of the Bach prelude and fugue in D major, the pianist had again to overcome some difficulties not incidental to his own share in the performance, its accompaniment being the restlessness incidental to the incoming of a belated audience.

The Beethoven sonata op. 78, was, however, played to an attentive audience, and the rare gifts of the player as an interpreter of this composer again held his hearers spellbound. The 15 variations serieuses by Mendelssohn followed, and in the performance of the stupendous difficulties in which the set culminates the player fairly astonished even those familiar with his absolute mastery of the keyboard. It was an exhibition of virtuosity that rose to the greatest heights and commanded the most enthusiastic applause as the task was completed.

Raff's suite in D minor, op. 91, followed, and the playing of each of the four movements caused rare pleasure to the audience, which found such expressions in applause that an encore number was graciously added.

The final group of compositions included the "Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3," Schubert; the valse, "Man Lebt Nur Einmal," Strauss-Tausig; the "Liebestraum, No. 3," and the "Rhapsodie Espagnole," Liszt, in the last of which D'Albert fairly surpassed all his playing during the programme and aroused his audience to the top pitch of enthusiasm. In response to the ovation following this exhibition, a Chopin waltz was played in a fashion to send his hearers away full of admiration for this great player. The last recital is on Saturday.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 21, 1892.

The D'Albert Recital.

D'Albert's playing charms by its virility, and this manly quality was put in evidence in almost every number of yesterday's programme; but amidst all the crashing of heavy chords and thundering of octave passages, one never felt that the pianist was overforcing the instrument, or that he had used up all his reserve force. The only number in which one could find any objection to his masculine vigor was the Bach Fugue in D, which seemed to be modernized in too great a degree by the power and fury with which it was invested. Nevertheless, the long subject was always clear, and the force never degenerated into mere roaring.

Beethoven's Sonata in F sharp, op. 78, is not often given in public, nor is it quite worth the giving; beyond the beauty of the first presentation of the chief theme in each of the two movements, there is nothing impressive in the work. Here, at least, all the commentators agree, and even the Beethoven-mad Marx ceases his fetish-worship to except this work from the examples of the master's genius. Technically, however, it was a wonderful performance. Mendelssohn's Variations Serieuses were nobly played. It is a high tribute in these days of hysterical emotion, to be able to say that D'Albert never sentimentalizes; this fact, together with a not over-romantic personality, may prevent his winning a wildly ecstatic female following, but it gives a musicianly value to his work that cannot be overestimated. These Variations Serieuses are among the best piano variations ever written; only Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques can surpass them, and even the great piano-variations of Beethoven or Brahms are less effective than the Mendelssohnian work. The different presentations of the theme were given in a straightforward, manly fashion, without any attempt to weep over the keyboard just because the work had a sombre tint.

Ruff's Suite was a triumph from beginning to end; the long episodes of the fugue were given in a masterly fashion, and the organ point had a splendid breadth. The Gigue was taken at a slow pace, as if it had been a Loure, but its variations were the more clear in consequence. The Cavatina is not so tuneful as the more celebrated one for violin by the same master, but was attractive, nevertheless, and the final march contained a magnificent crescendo and some bravura octave passages which won the pianist an encore, to which he responded with a most brilliant performance of Rubinstein's Etude in C.

The final group of works was lighter and more romantic, but the Strauss-Tausig waltz was full of bravura, as was also the Spanish rhapsody by Liszt, but the Liebestraum was the gem of this part of the concert, for it was not in the slightest degree mawkish, and yet was infinitely tender; the perfection of legato work. Of course a final encore must be accepted,—that is the latter-day fashion, without which no piano recital would be considered successful. In this case it was Chopin's Waltz in A flat, well played, of course, but the audience was not so wildly insistent upon it that its playing could not have been avoided.

On Saturday afternoon the last of this series will be given, and it is to be hoped that a larger audience than the fair-sized one of yesterday will be present. The recitals certainly deserve abundant recognition.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Sixth Annual Tour, * 1892.

ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, April 24, at 7 P.M. New York and New England Depot.
Arrive Philadelphia Monday, April 25, at 7, A.M., Broad Street Station Penna. R. R.
Continental Hotel.
✓Concert at Academy of Music, 8 P.M.
Leave Philadelphia Tuesday, April 26, 9.30 A.M., Baltimore and Ohio Depot, 9th and Green Street.
Arrive in New York at 11.55 A.M.
Park Avenue Hotel.
✓Concert at Chickering Hall, 8.00 P.M.
Leave New York Wednesday, April 27, at 9 A. M. via Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Ferry at Liberty Street.
Arrive Baltimore 2.05 P.M.
Carrollton Hotel.
Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, at 6 P.M.
Arrive Washington 7.05 P.M.
✓Concert at Congregational Church, cor. 10th and G Sts., at 8 P.M.
Leave Washington at 10.45 P.M.
Arrive Baltimore at 11.30 P.M. Supper at Carrollton Hotel.
Rehearsal at Academy Concert Hall, Thursday April 28, at noon.
✓Concert at Academy Concert Hall. at 8 P.M.
Leave Baltimore, Thursday, April 28, at 12.45, midnight. Sleeping Cars ready at eleven o'clock.
Arrive New York Friday, April 29, at 7 A.M.
Park Avenue Hotel.
✓Public Rehearsal at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, at 3 P.M.
✓Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, April 30, 8.15 P.M.
✓Concert at Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, New York, Monday, May 2, at 8.15 P.M.
Leave New York Monday, May 2, directly after the concert, via Delaware, Lackawanna and Western R.R. Depot at Hoboken. Ferry at foot of Christopher Street.
Breakfast at Elmira, at 8.30 A.M.
Arrive Buffalo Tuesday, May 3, at 12.30 P.M.
✓Genesee Hotel.
✓Concert at Star Theatre, at 8 P.M.
Leave Buffalo Wednesday, May 4, at 8 A.M. Nickel Plate Depot.
Arrive Cleveland Thursday, May 4, at 2 P.M.
Hollenden Hotel.
Concert at Music Hall, at 8 P.M.
Leave Cleveland Thursday, May 5, at 8 A.M. Valley R.R. Depot.
Arrive Columbus Thursday, May 5, at 2 P.M.
Chittenden Hotel.
Concert at Grand Opera House, at 8 P.M.
Leave Columbus, Friday, May 6, at 9 A.M. Baltimore and Ohio Depot.
Arrive Cincinnati Friday, May 6, at 1 P.M.
Grand Hotel.
Concert at Odeon, at 8 P.M.
Leave Cincinnati directly after the concert, via Monon Route. Union Depot.
Arrive Chicago Saturday, May 7, at 9 A.M.
Tremont Hotel.
Concert at Central Music Hall, at 8 P.M.
Leave Chicago Monday, May 9, at 8 A.M. Michigan Central Depot.
Arrive Grand Rapids Monday, May 9, at 1.30 P.M.
Morton Hotel.
Concert at Hartman Hall, at 8 P.M.
Leave Grand Rapids Tuesday, May 10, at 1.20 P.M.
Arrive Ann Arbor Tuesday, May 10, at 5.30 P.M.
Supper at Grangers Hall, South State Street.
Concert at University Hall, at 8 P.M.
Leave Ann Arbor directly after concert.
Arrive Detroit Tuesday, May 10, at midnight.
Russell and Wayne Hotels.
Concert at Lyceum Theatre, Wednesday, May 11, at 8 P.M.
Leave Detroit directly after concert via Detroit and Cleveland Steamship Line. Pier at foot of Wayne Street.
Breakfast on board Steamer.
Arrive Cleveland Thursday, May 12, at 8 A.M.
Leave Cleveland directly on arrival of Steamer. Valley R. R. Depot.
Arrive Pittsburg Thursday, May 12, at 2 P.M.
Seventh Avenue Hotel.
Concert at Old City Hall, Thursday, May 12, at 8 P.M.
Concert at Old City Hall, Friday, May 13, at 8 P.M.
Concert at Old City Hall, Saturday, May 14, at 8 P.M.
Leave Pittsburg Saturday, May 14, directly after concert, via Baltimore and Ohio R.R.
Breakfast at Baltimore at 10 A M. Sunday, May 15.
Arrive at New York Sunday, May 15, at 3.30 P.M.
Leave New York Sunday, May 15, via Fall River Line, 5.30 P.M.
Arrive Boston Monday, May 16, at 7 A.M. Providence Depot.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Saturday, April 23, 1892.

---

range of composers and are among the most magnificent specimens of piano music and ones that only a master could perform. Season and single tickets are to be had at the Boston Music hall.

Boston Post.

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 21, 1892.

Eugen D'Albert gave his second pianoforte recital in Music Hall yesterday afternoon, with a programme of greater interest and an audience more in sympathy with the player. His own arrangement of Bach's prelude and fugue, in D major, was followed by Beethoven's Sonata, Op. 78; Mendelssohn's fifteen variations serieuses, Op. 54, Raff's suite in D minor, Schubert's Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 3, Tausig's arrangement of Strauss's valse "Man libt nur einmal," and Liszt's Lieberstraum, No. 3, and "Rhapsodie Espagnole."

Technique is D'Albert's strong point. He recognizes no difficulties. His execution is brilliant, but his playing at times lacks feeling. He sacrifices delicacy of shading and beauty of expression to vigor of treatment, decision of touch and brilliancy of execution. Raff's suite was just suited to his powers, and its excellent interpretation called forth great enthusiasm. Schubert's impromptu was a revelation. In it he appeared to feel the marvel ous beauty of the theme, and its rendition was characterized by all the delicacy of touch and shading which his previous numbers lacked. The Strauss valse was equally well done.

Saturday's programme will be the best of the series, containing Bach's Suite Anglaise, No. 6, Mozart's rondo in A minor; Brahms' rhapsodie, Op. 79, No. 2; Chopin's sonata in B minor, Op. 58; Rubinstein's barcarolle in A minor; Liszt's "Sonetto di Petrarca," "Feux Follets" etude, and "Napoli" tarantelle.

Music Notices.

The programme for the eighth and last symphony concert of the Cambridge series, which will take place in Sanders Theatre tonight at 7:45 o'clock, contains Wagner's overture to the "Flying Dutchman;" Chopin's concerto for pianoforte in E minor; Saint-Saens's Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale;" soli for pianoforte, and Schumann's fourth symphony in D minor.

---

passages were not clearly defined; and there was occasional harshness. In these variations, as in other numbers of the programme, there was at times an over-employment of the "loud pedal."

On the other hand, how much there was yesterday to wonder at and applaud! It might, therefore, be ungracious to complain of his choice of the sonata or his selection of the Raff suite in its entirety. His performance of the waltz was an astounding feat of virtuosoship, but it was something more than merely the display of bravura. In the Raff jig and in the Schubert impromptu he showed that, when he was so inclined, he could skillfully mix his tone colors. Earnestness, sincerity, and other characteristics of the noblest pianoforte playing were present, even when he met the virtuoso, pure and simple, on his own ground. The Rubinstein study, which he played in response to a recall, was taken at a furious pace, but when it was over there was a recollection left of something more than mere speed and strength. In beauty of tone, in sensuous expression, Mr. D'Albert is not the equal of certain pianists that have visited us. In mental grasp, in virile expression, he is undoubtedly their superior. His individuality may be paradoxically expressed as consisting in his artistic subordination of self to the idea of the composer; and yet, such is his rugged nature, that in the purely sentimental, the graceful and the elegant, he is not as successful as in the intellectual, the abstruse and the heroic. Then enters the old, the eternal question, is music a sensuous or an intellectual enjoyment? This question must be answered by each individual according to his temperament. The harshness and the apparently deliberate dryness that occasionally appear in the playing of Mr. D'Albert and repel one man may give another a strange and a genuine pleasure. In deciding the rival claims of great pianists there is no universally approved Procrustean bed.

PHILIP HALE.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 112.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

The Second of the Eugen D'Albert Piano Recitals.

The second of the series of piano recitals by Eugen D'Albert had for its programme a list of compositions well calculated to test the versatility of this great artist, and included about all schools of compositions.

Beginning with his own arrangement of the Bach prelude and fugue in D major, the pianist had again to overcome some difficulties not incidental to his own share in the performance, its accompaniment being the restlessness incidental to the incoming of a belated audience.

The Beethoven sonata op. 78, was, however, played to an attentive audience, and the rare gifts of the player as an interpreter of this composer again held his hearers spellbound. The 15 variations serieuses by Mendelssohn followed, and in the performance of the stupendous difficulties in which the set culminates the player fairly astonished even those familiar with his absolute mastery of the keyboard. It was an exhibition of virtuosity that rose to the greatest heights and commanded the most enthusiastic applause as the task was completed.

Raff's suite in D minor, op. 91, followed, and the playing of each of the four movements caused rare pleasure to the audience, which found such expressions in applause that an encore number was graciously added.

The final group of compositions included the "Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3," Schubert; the valse, "Man Lebt Nur Einmal," Strauss-Tausig; the "Liebestraum, No. 3," and the "Rhapsodie Espagnole," Liszt, in the last of which D'Albert fairly surpassed all his playing during the programme and aroused his audience to the top pitch of enthusiasm. In response to the ovation following this exhibition, a Chopin waltz was played in a fashion to send his hearers away full of admiration for this great player. The last recital is on Saturday.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

THURSDAY MORNING, APRIL 21, 1892.

The D'Albert Recital.

D'Albert's playing charms by its virility, and this manly quality was put in evidence in almost every number of yesterday's programme; but amidst all the crashing of heavy chords and thundering of octave passages, one never felt that the pianist was overforcing the instrument, or that he had used up all his reserve force. The only number in which one could find any objection to his masculine vigor was the Bach Fugue in D, which seemed to be modernized in too great a degree by the power and fury with which it was invested. Nevertheless, the long subject was always clear, and the force never degenerated into mere roaring.

Beethoven's Sonata in F sharp, op. 78, is not often given in public, nor is it quite worth the giving; beyond the beauty of the first presentation of the chief theme in each of the two movements, there is nothing impressive in the work. Here, at least, all the commentators agree, and even the Beethoven-mad Marx ceases his fetish-worship to except this work from the examples of the master's genius. Technically, however, it was a wonderful performance. Mendelssohn's Variations Serieuses were nobly played. It is a high tribute in these days of hysterical emotion, to be able to say that D'Albert never sentimentalizes; this fact, together with a not over-romantic personality, may prevent his winning a wildly ecstatic female following, but it gives a musicianly value to his work that cannot be overestimated. These Variations Serieuses are among the best piano variations ever written; only Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques can surpass them, and even the great piano-variations of Beethoven or Brahms are less effective than the Mendelssohnian work. The different presentations of the theme were given in a straightforward, manly fashion, without any attempt to weep over the keyboard just because the work had a sombre tint.

Ruff's Suite was a triumph from beginning to end; the long episodes of the fugue were given in a masterly fashion, and the organ point had a splendid breadth. The Gigue was taken at a slow pace, as if it had been a Loure, but its variations were the more clear in consequence. The Cavatina is not so tuneful as the more celebrated one for violin by the same master, but was attractive, nevertheless, and the final march contained a magnificent crescendo and some bravura octave passages which won the pianist an encore, to which he responded with a most brilliant performance of Rubinstein's Etude in C.

The final group of works was lighter and more romantic, but the Strauss-Tausig waltz was full of bravura, as was also the Spanish rhapsody by Liszt, but the Liebestraum was the gem of this part of the concert, for it was not in the slightest degree mawkish, and yet was infinitely tender;

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

ELEVENTH SEASON,—1891–92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SERIES.)

THURSDAY EVENING, APRIL 21, AT 7.45.

PROGRAMME.

WAGNER.	OVERTURE. "Flying Dutchman."
CHOPIN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in E minor, op. 11. Allegro maestoso.—Romance; larghetto.—Rondo vivace.
SAINT-SAËNS.	SYMPHONIC POEM. "Le Rouet D'Omphale."
	SOLI for PIANO.
a) RUBINSTEIN,	BARCAROLLE.
b) STRAUSS-TAUSIG.	VALSE. "Man lebt nur Einmal."
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 4, in D minor, op. 120. Introduction (adagio non troppo).—Allegro.— Romance (adagio non troppo).—Scherzo.— Finale (allegro).

SOLOIST:

MR. EUGEN D'ALBERT.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

CHICKERING HALL

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 21,

AT 2.30 O'CLOCK,

LISZT RECITAL

(ORIGINAL WORKS OF THE MASTER-PIANIST,)

—BY—

Vladimir de Pachmann.

Sole Manager of the Pachmann Concerts, - - Mr. F. A. Schwab

THE CHICKERING PIANO USED EXCLUSIVELY.

Providence

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

[illegible] singing of [illegible] Hall the Scene of Another of His Conquests Last Night.

The audience that attended Eugen D'Albert's chamber recital in Blackstone hall last night was repaid by one of the prettiest entertainments to which an audience could listen. Mr. Eugen D'Albert, the now reigning pianist, was heard at his best and most interesting work, and, so far as an exhibition of his own particular abilities are considered, to better advantage than in his late appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

He played Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata," with Violinist Kneisel and with the Kneisel quartet accompanying, and Schuman's quintet in E flat. In each performance every hearer found points of beauty without measure to admire.

D'Albert executed a trio of Chopin's compositions in a way that richly illustrated his versatility as a thorough artist, and excited in the assemblage sensations of electric pleasure. Some fancied that the player did not do so well, artistically, as Paderewski. The difference between the work of the two accomplished virtuosos is so little that the ordinary critic would hardly be liable to perceive or be disturbed by it. D'Albert is indisputably a wonderfully true and intelligent interpreter. He reads music, whether written by Chopin, Beethoven, Schumann or any other of the celebrated masters of score construction, as it is expressed in the notes, and gives to his treatments breadth and brilliance that make his playing so artistically perfect. His other selections were rendered dexterously and ably, and from them the audience gleaned the most exquisite and intensive pleasure.

The quartet performed an Intermezzo by Bazzini, as it always succeeds in doing, minus the minutest flaw in action or the least approach to a deviation from pure and absolute harmony. The Kneisels are without peers in this country as a string quartet.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

D'Albert and the Kneisel Quartet at Blackstone Hall.

The unusual combination of one of the world's greatest pianists with the finest string quintet in America was the attraction offered last night at Blackstone Hall. That it failed to attract an audience even large enough to fill the small hall was probably due to the lateness of the season, the many other musical events of importance occurring just at this time, and the increased demands which society makes upon its devotees with the close of the Lenten season. But the audience, if not large, was a thoroughly appreciative one, composed as it chiefly was of professional musicians and other genuine music lovers, who felt that they could ill afford to lose such a treat. The programme given ran as follows: "Kreutzer Sonata," Beethoven, Mr. d'Albert and Mr. Kneisel; variations from quartet in G major, Haydn, and intermezzo from quartet No. 2, Bazzini, Kneisel Quartet; soli for pianoforte, "Berceuse." Op. 57, "Valse," Op. 42, "Polonaise," Op. 53, Chopin, Mr. d'Albert; quintet in E-flat, Schumann, Mr. d'Albert and the Kneisel Quartet.

The opening number, Beethoven's famous—or, according to Tolstoi, infamous—"Kreutzer," sonata for violin and piano, was played by Messrs. Kneisel and D'Albert in a manner entirely beyond criticism, and it is safe to say that it will serve those who heard it as a standard for a long time to come. It is impossible for the ordinary mind to discover in this work the sensuous meanings which the Russian novelist claims to have found. No musical student has ever regarded it, save in the light of one of the most beautiful works of the greatest music thinker that the world has yet produced. Such it certainly was last evening in the hands of the two artists, and as such their hearers enjoyed every note of its three long movements.

The two numbers by the quartet alone were given with the exquisite finish, fine blending and delicate expression which have put this rare combination of artists at the head of all similar organizations. The variations from the Haydn quartet were upon the melody of the so-called "Emperor's Hymn," or Austrian National Anthem. The Intermezzo was a charming bit of quiet harmony with a touch of originality in its quaint and totally unexpected ending. A vigorous attempt at an encore was made, but the gentlemen, with an evident eye to the time of their train's departure, declined to do more than to repeatedly bow their thanks.

The closest attention was accorded to Mr. Eugen D'Albert while he played his three Chopin selections, of which the first has been already given here by both Paderewski and De Pachmann. It must be said of Mr. D'Albert, that with all his undisputed merit he does not arouse the enthusiasm which follows the playing of the wonderful Polish pianist. The only possible comparison nowadays between pianists of the first rank, hinges upon the personality and temperament of the player. Technique they all have—even many not at all in the first rank—to the fullest and most perfect extent. The time of the dazzling "fireworks" player has gone by. The fireworks are still with us, but they no longer serve as the basis for a reputation. The question now asked of a pianist is, "how much of yourself can you put into your playing, and this not to the mutilating, but rather to the enhancing of the composer's thought?"

Some natures must express themselves upon the emotional side, others upon the intellectual. The favored sons of genius, will be governed by both, and the one who holds them in most perfect balance will wear the crown. Mr. D'Albert is clearly a player whose conceptions of music are controlled by the intellectual side of his temperament. He plays with the most finished perfection, none more so, his readings are those of a cultivated and thorough musician, he is master of all the nuances of expression, but the final touch of a poetic and emotional nature is lacking. He can compel your admiration, but he cannot draw you with the gracious and winning personality of a Paderewski nor can he play the music of Chopin with a mingled sentiment and abandon of De Pachmann. It is easy to see why he has gained a special reputation as an interpreter of Beethoven. The music of that composer is of the intellectual rather than of the emotional type, and as a matter of fact, Mr. D'Albert's best playing last night was done in the "Kreutzer Sonata."

Schumann's Quartet in E-flat, which came last upon the programme, is one of the finest of that composer's few productions in the field of chamber music. It is of considerable difficulty, but that of course counted for nothing with such a group of artists. Mr. D'Albert gave a superb rendition of the piano part, which is rather the leading feature of the work. The scherzo is the most pleasing of the four movements, but all were equally well played. The work of the quartet was quite on a par with that of the great pianist, and so concluded the most brilliant chamber concert, by far, of the season.

The audience was not slow to testify its appreciation and enjoyment, and hearty applause not only followed each number, but every break of any sort in the music. The only encore vouchsafed, however, was at the conclusion of Mr. D'Albert's group of solos, when he returned and played a waltz by Liszt.

[191]

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

ELEVENTH SEASON,—1891–92.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

(LAST OF THE SERIES.)

THURSDAY EVENING, APRIL 21, AT 7.45.

PROGRAMME.

WAGNER.	OVERTURE. "Flying Dutchman."
CHOPIN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE in E minor, op. 11. Allegro maestoso.—Romance: larghetto.—Rondo vivace
SAINT-SAENS.	SYMPHONIC POEM. "Le Rouet D'Omphale."
	SOLI for PIANO.
a) RUBINSTEIN.	BARCAROLLE.
b) STRAUSS-TAUSIG.	VALSE. "Man lebt nur Einmal."
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 4, in D minor, op. 120. Introduction (adagio non troppo).—Allegro.— Romance (adagio non troppo).—Scherzo.— Finale (allegro).

SOLOIST:

MR. EUGEN D'ALBERT.

The Piano used is a Knabe.

CHICKERING HALL

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 21,

AT 2.30 O'CLOCK,

LISZT RECITAL

(ORIGINAL WORKS OF THE MASTER-PIANIST,)

—BY—

Vladimir de Pachmann.

Sole Manager of the Pachmann Concerts, - - Mr. F. A. Schwab

THE CHICKERING PIANO USED EXCLUSIVELY.

Providence

The Telegram.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

[illegible] Hall the Scene of Another of His Conquests Last Night.

The audience that attended Eugen D'Albert's chamber recital in Blackstone hall last night was repaid by one of the prettiest entertainments to which an audience could listen. Mr. Eugen D'Albert, the now reigning pianist, was heard at his best and most interesting work, and, so far as an exhibition of his own particular abilities are considered, to better advantage than in his late appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

He played Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata," with Violinist Kneisel and with the Kneisel quartet accompanying, and Schuman's quintet in E flat. In each performance every hearer found points of beauty without measure to admire.

D'Albert executed a trio of Chopin's compositions in a way that richly illustrated his versatility as a thorough artist, and excited in the assemblage sensations of electric pleasure. Some fancied that the player did not do so well, artistically, as Paderewski. The difference between the work of the two accomplished virtuosos is so little that the ordinary critic would hardly be liable to perceive or be disturbed by it. D'Albert is indisputably a wonderfully true and intelligent interpreter. He reads music, whether written by Chopin, Beethoven, Schumann or any other of the celebrated masters of score construction, as it is expressed in the notes, and gives to his treatments breadth and brilliance that make his playing so artistically perfect. His other selections were rendered dexterously and ably, and from them the audience gleaned the most exquisite and incisive pleasure.

The quartet performed an intermezzo by Bazzini, as it always succeeds in doing, minus the minutest flaw in action or the least approach to a deviation from pure and absolute harmony. The Kneisels are without peers in this country as a string quartet.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

D'Albert and the Kneisel Quartet at Blackstone Hall.

The unusual combination of one of the world's greatest pianists with the finest string quartet in America was the attraction offered last night at Blackstone Hall. That it failed to attract an audience even large enough to fill the small hall was probably due to the lateness of the season, the many other musical events of importance occurring just at this time, and the increased demands which society makes upon its devotees with the close of the Lenten season. But the audience, if not large, was a thoroughly appreciative one, composed as it chiefly was of professional musicians and other genuine music lovers, who felt that they could ill afford to lose such a treat. The programme given ran as follows: "Kreutzer Sonata," Beethoven, Mr. d'Albert and Mr. Kneisel; variations from quartet in G major, Haydn, and intermezzo from quartet No. 2, Bazzini, Kneisel Quartet; soli for pianoforte, "Berceuse." Op. 57, "Valse," Op. 42, "Polonaise," Op. 53, Chopin, Mr. d'Albert; quintet in E-flat, Schumann, Mr. d'Albert and the Kneisel Quartet.

The opening number, Beethoven's famous—or, according to Tolstoi, infamous—"Kreutzer," sonata for violin and piano, was played by Messrs. Kneisel and D'Albert in a manner entirely beyond criticism, and it is safe to say that it will serve those who heard it as a standard for a long time to come. It is impossible for the ordinary mind to discover in this work the sensuous meanings which the Russian novelist claims to have found. No musical student has ever regarded it, save in the light of one of the most beautiful works of the greatest music thinker that the world has yet produced. Such it certainly was last evening in the hands of the two artists, and as such their hearers enjoyed every note of its three long movements.

The two numbers by the quartet alone were given with the exquisite finish, fine blending and delicate expression which have put this rare combination of artists at the head of all similar organizations. The variations from the Haydn quartet were upon the melody of the so-called "Emperor's Hymn," or Austrian National Anthem. The Intermezzo was a charming bit of quiet harmony with a touch of originality in its quaint and totally unexpected ending. A vigorous attempt at an encore was made, but the gentlemen, with an evident eye to the time of their train's departure, declined to do more than to repeatedly bow their thanks.

The closest attention was accorded to Mr. Eugen D'Albert while he played his three Chopin selections, of which the first has been already given here by both Paderewski and De Pachmann. It must be said of Mr. D'Albert, that with all his undisputed merit he does not arouse the enthusiasm which follows the playing of the wonderful Polish pianist. The only possible comparison nowadays between pianists of the first rank, hinges upon the personality and temperament of the player. Technique they all have—even many not at all in the first rank—to the fullest and most perfect extent. The time of the dazzling "fireworks" player has gone by. The fireworks are still with us, but they no longer serve as the basis for a reputation. The question now asked of a pianist is, "how much of yourself can you put into your playing, and this not to the mutilating, but rather to the enhancing of the composer's thought?"

Some natures must express themselves upon the emotional side, others upon the intellectual. The favored sons of genius, will be governed by both, and the one who holds them in most perfect balance will wear the crown. Mr. D'Albert is clearly a player whose conceptions of music are controlled by the intellectual side of his temperament. He plays with the most finished perfection, none more so, his readings are those of a cultivated and thorough musician, he is master of all the nuances of expression, but the final touch of a poetic and emotional nature is lacking. He can compel your admiration, but he cannot draw you with the gracious and winning personality of a Paderewski nor can he play the music of Chopin with a mingled sentiment and abandon of De Pachmann. It is easy to see why he has gained a special reputation as an interpreter of Beethoven. The music of that composer is of the intellectual rather than of the emotional type, and as a matter of fact, Mr. D'Albert's best playing last night was done in the "Kreutzer Sonata."

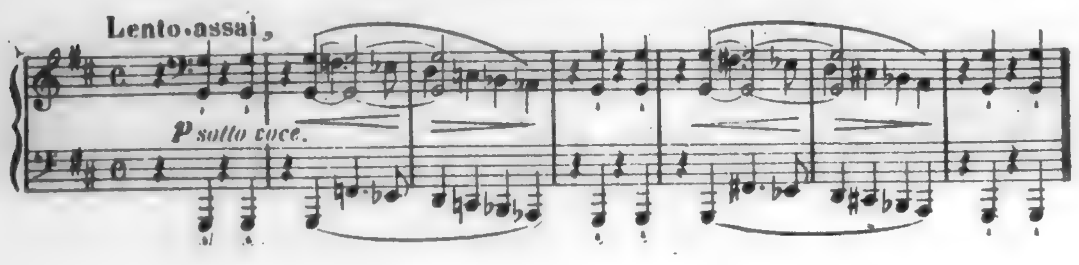
Schumann's Quartet in E-flat, which came last upon the programme, is one of the finest of that composer's few productions in the field of chamber music. It is of considerable difficulty, but that of course counted for nothing with such a group of artists. Mr. D'Albert gave a superb rendition of the piano part, which is rather the leading feature of the work. The scherzo is the most pleasing of the four movements, but all were equally well played. The work of the quartet was quite on a par with that of the great pianist, and so concluded the most brilliant chamber concert, by far, of the season.

The audience was not slow to testify its appreciation and enjoyment, and hearty applause not only followed each number, but every break of any sort in the music. The only encore vouchsafed, however, was at the conclusion of Mr. D'Albert's group of solos, when he returned and played a waltz by Liszt.

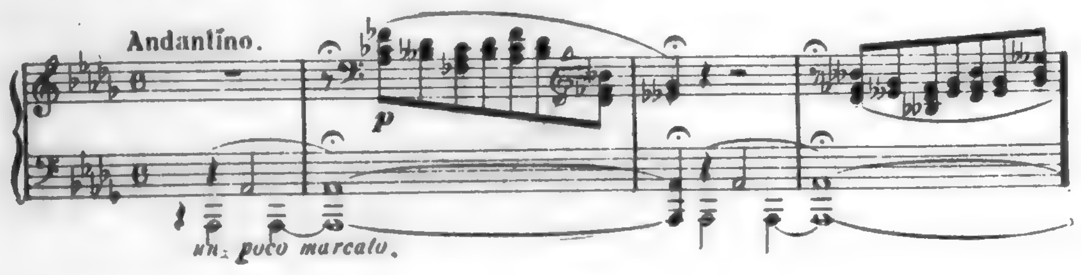
PROGRAMME:

1—SONATA .... LISZT

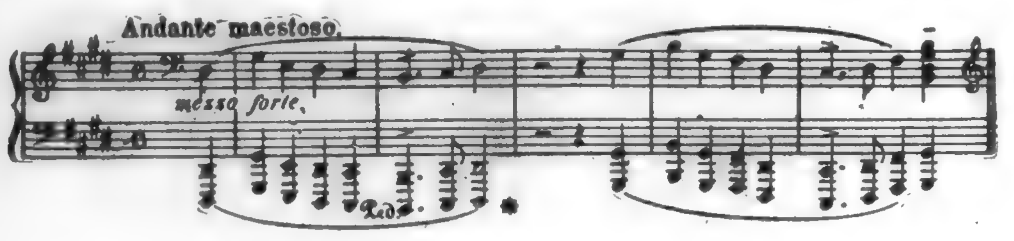
(Dedicated to Robert Schumann.)



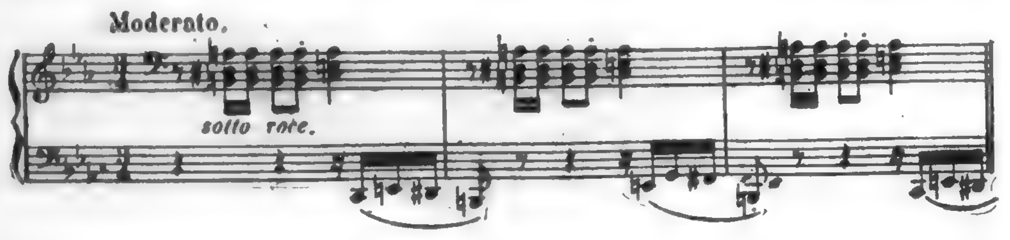
2—"HARMONIES DU SOIR." (Etudes d'Exécution Transcendante) ..... LISZT



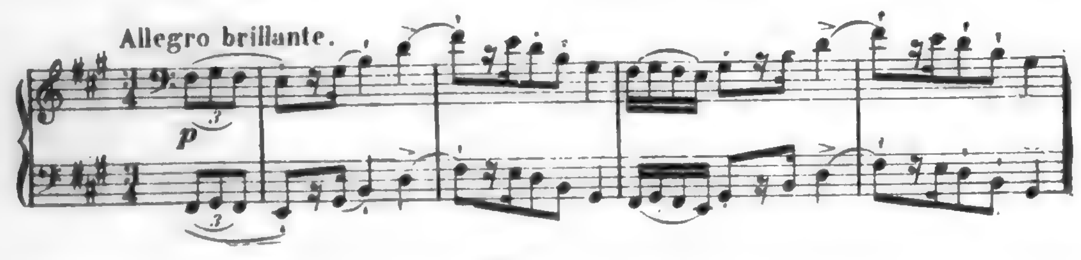
3—LEGENDE, No. 2, "St. François de Paule marchant sur les flots,". .. LISZT



4—POLONAISE, No. 1 .... LISZT

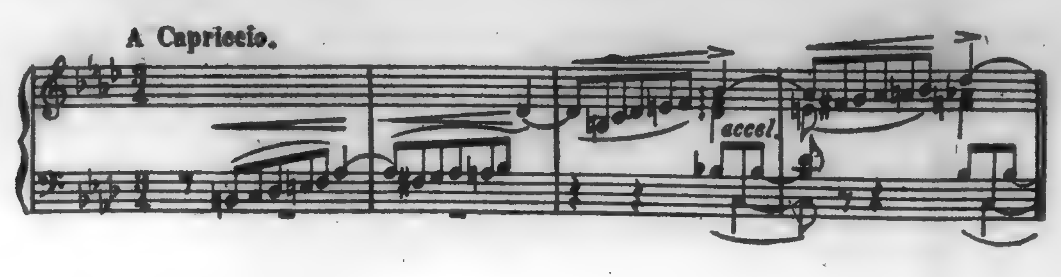


5—MAZURKA BRILLANTE .... LISZT

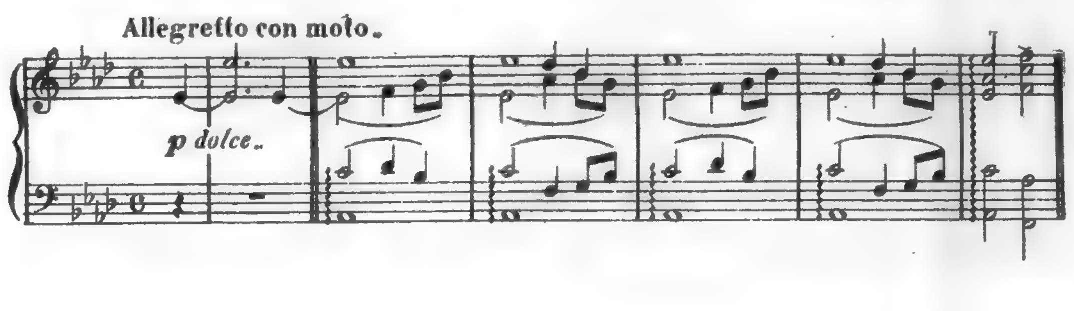


THE CHICKERING PIANO USED EXCLUSIVELY.

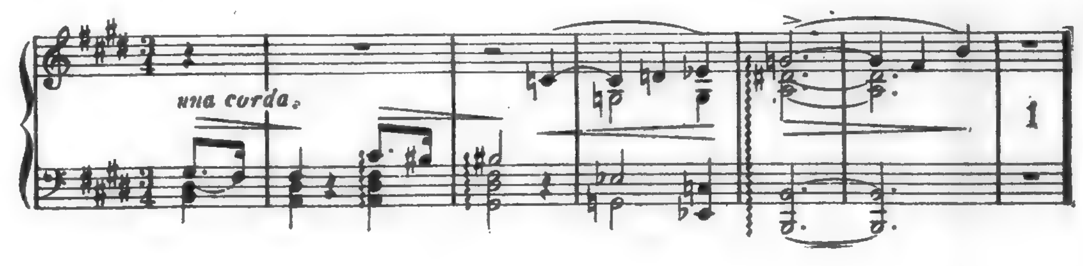
9—ETUDE DE CONCERT, No 2.. ....LISZT



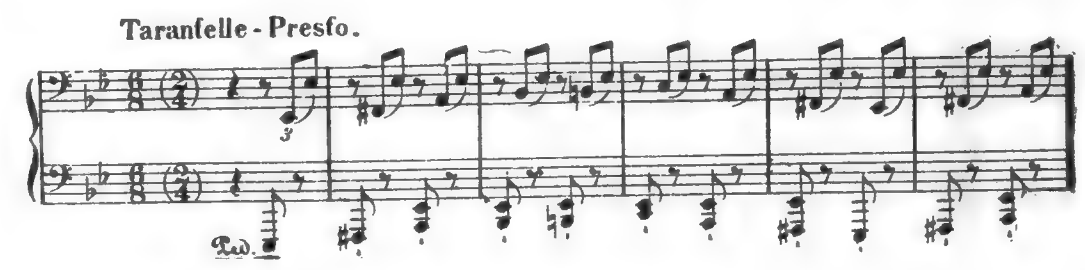
7—EGLOGUE, (Années de Pélérinage) ....LISZT



8—CANTIQUE D'AMOUR, (Harmonies Poétiques) .... LISZT



9—TARANTELLE, "Venezia e Napoli," .... LISZT



THE CHICKERING PIANO USED EXCLUSIVELY.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

singing of

[illegible] Hall the Scene of Another of His Conquests Last Night.

The audience that attended Eugen D'Albert's chamber recital in Blackstone hall last night was repaid by one of the prettiest entertainments to which an audience could listen. Mr. Eugen D'Albert, the now reigning pianist, was heard at his best and most interesting work, and, so far as an exhibition of his own particular abilities are considered, to better advantage than in his late appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

He played Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata," with Violinist Kneisel and with the Kneisel quartet accompanying, and Schuman's quintet in E flat. In each performance every hearer found points of beauty without measure to admire.

D'Albert executed a trio of Chopin's compositions in a way that richly illustrated his versatility as a thorough artist, and excited in the assemblage sensations of electric pleasure. Some fancied that the player did not do so well, artistically, as Paderewski. The difference between the work of the two accomplished virtuosos is so little that the ordinary critic would hardly be liable to perceive or be disturbed by it. D'Albert is indisputably a wonderfully true and intelligent interpreter. He reads music, whether written by Chopin, Beethoven, Schumann or any other of the celebrated masters of score construction, as it is expressed in the notes, and gives to his sentiments breadth and brilliance that make his playing so artistically perfect. His other selections were rendered dexterously and ably, and from them the audience gleaned the most exquisite and intensive pleasure.

The quartet performed an intermezzo by Bazzini, as it always succeeds in doing, minus the minutest flaw in action or the least approach to a deviation from pure and absolute harmony. The Kneisels are without peers in this country as a string quartet.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

D'Albert and the Kneisel Quartet at Blackstone Hall.

The unusual combination of one of the world's greatest pianists with the finest string quartet in America was the attraction offered last night at Blackstone Hall. That it failed to attract an audience even large enough to fill the small hall was probably due to the lateness of the season, the many other musical events of importance occurring just at this time, and the increased demands which society makes upon its devotees with the close of the Lenten season. But the audience, if not large, was a thoroughly appreciative one, composed as it chiefly was of professional musicians and other genuine music lovers, who felt that they could ill afford to lose such a treat. The programme given ran as follows: "Kreutzer Sonata," Beethoven, Mr. d'Albert and Mr. Kneisel; variations from quartet in G major, Haydn, and intermezzo from quartet No. 2, Bazzini, Kneisel Quartet; soli for pianoforte, "Berceuse." Op. 57, "Valse," Op. 42, "Polonaise," Op. 53, Chopin, Mr. d'Albert; quintet in E-flat, Schumann, Mr. d'Albert and the Kneisel Quartet.

The opening number, Beethoven's famous—or, according to Tolstoi, infamous—"Kreutzer," sonata for violin and piano, was played by Messrs. Kneisel and D'Albert in a manner entirely beyond criticism, and it is safe to say that it will serve those who heard it as a standard for a long time to come. It is impossible for the ordinary mind to discover in this work the sensuous meanings which the Russian novelist claims to have found. No musical student has ever regarded it, save in the light of one of the most beautiful works of the greatest music thinker that the world has yet produced. Such it certainly was last evening in the hands of the two artists, and as such their hearers enjoyed every note of its three long movements.

The two numbers by the quartet alone were given with the exquisite finish, fine blending and delicate expression which have put this rare combination of artists at the head of all similar organizations. The variations from the Haydn quartet were upon the melody of the so-called "Emperor's Hymn," or Austrian National Anthem. The Intermezzo was a charming bit of quiet harmony with a touch of originality in its quaint and totally unexpected ending. A vigorous attempt at an encore was made, but the gentlemen, with an evident eye to the time of their train's departure, declined to do more than to repeatedly bow their thanks.

The closest attention was accorded to Mr. Eugen D'Albert while he played his three Chopin selections, of which the first has been already given here by both Paderewski and De Pachmann. It must be said of Mr. D'Albert, that with all his undisputed merit he does not arouse the enthusiasm which follows the playing of the wonderful Polish pianist. The only possible comparison nowadays between pianists of the first rank, hinges upon the personality and temperament [illegible] technique they all have [illegible] all in the first rank [illegible] the fullest and most perfect extent.

The time of the dazzling "fireworks" player has gone by. The fireworks are still with us, but they no longer serve as the basis for a reputation. The question now asked of a pianist is, "how much of yourself can you put into your playing, and this not to the mutilating, but rather to the enhancing of the composer's thought?"

Some natures must express themselves upon the emotional side, others upon the intellectual. The favored sons of genius, will be governed by both, and the one who holds them in most perfect balance will wear the crown. Mr. D'Albert is clearly a player whose conceptions of music are controlled by the intellectual side of his temperament. He plays with the most finished perfection, none more so, his readings are those of a cultivated and thorough musician, he is master of all the nuances of expression, but the final touch of a poetic and emotional nature is lacking. He can compel your admiration, but he cannot draw you with the gracious and winning personality of a Paderewski nor can he play the music of Chopin with a mingled sentiment and abandon of De Pachmann. It is easy to see why he has gained a special reputation as an interpreter of Beethoven. The music of that composer is of the intellectual rather than of the emotional type, and as a matter of fact, Mr. D'Albert's best playing last night was done in the "Kreutzer Sonata."

Schumann's Quartet in E-flat, which came last upon the programme, is one of the finest of that composer's few productions in the field of chamber music. It is of considerable difficulty, but that of course counted for nothing with such a group of artists. Mr. D'Albert gave a superb rendition of the piano part, which is rather the leading feature of the work. The scherzo is the most pleasing of the four movements, but all were equally well played. The work of the quartet was quite on a par with that of the great pianist, and so concluded the most brilliant chamber concert, by far, of the season.

The audience was not slow to testify its appreciation and enjoyment, and hearty applause not only followed each number, but every break of any sort in the music. The only encore vouchsafed, however, was at the conclusion of Mr. D'Albert's group of solos, when he returned and played a waltz by Liszt.

1—SO

2—" H

3—LEG

4 POL

5—MAZ

The CHICKERING PIANO and VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN

Having given upward of one hundred concerts with the Chickering Piano, and tested its merits in every way, the world-renowned virtuoso wrote to Chickering & Sons as follows :

" The Chickering Piano rightfully stands alone, for on this earth it is not only unsurpassed but unequalled. I can give logical and esthetic proofs of my assertion. When one asks : why do these unique manufacturers attain perfection? the answer is : because they have endeavored to secure (as no others have done) and have succeeded in securing the nearest possible approach to the tone of nature, to what is known as the human voice ; the Chickering Piano sings like a lovely voice. This is no compliment, but the expression of my innermost conviction, if I may harbor an opinion on this subject."

CHICKERING & SONS

130 Fifth Avenue, New York.

C. C. HARVEY & CO.,

152 Tremont Street, Boston.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

[illegible] Hall the Scene of Another of His Conquests Last Night.

The audience that attended Eugen D'Albert's chamber recital in Blackstone hall last night was repaid by one of the prettiest entertainments to which an audience could listen. Mr. Eugen D'Albert, the now reigning pianist, was heard at his best and most interesting work, and, so far as an exhibition of his own particular abilities are considered, to better advantage than in his late appearance with the Boston Symphony orchestra.

He played Beethoven's "Kreutzer Sonata," with Violinist Kneisel and with the Kneisel quartet accompanying, and Schuman's quintet in E flat. In each performance every hearer found points of beauty without measure to admire.

D'Albert executed a trio of Chopin's compositions in a way that richly illustrated his versatility as a thorough artist, and excited in the assemblage sensations of electric pleasure. Some fancied that the player did not do so well, artistically, as Paderewski. The difference between the work of the two accomplished virtuosos is so little that the ordinary critic would hardly be liable to perceive or be disturbed by it. D'Albert is indisputably a wonderfully true and intelligent interpreter. He reads music, whether written by Chopin, Beethoven, Schumann or any other of the celebrated masters of score construction, as it is expressed in the notes, and gives to his treatments breadth and brilliance that make his playing so artistically perfect. His other selections were rendered dexterously and ably, and from them the audience gleaned the most exquisite and incisive pleasure.

The quartet performed an intermezzo by Bazzini, as it always succeeds in doing, minus the minutest flaw in action or the least approach to a deviation from pure and absolute harmony. The Kneisels are without peers in this country as a string quartet.

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

D'Albert and the Kneisel Quartet at Blackstone Hall.

The unusual combination of one of the world's greatest pianists with the finest string quartet in America was the attraction offered last night at Blackstone Hall. That it failed to attract an audience even large enough to fill the small hall was probably due to the lateness of the season, the many other musical events of importance occurring just at this time, and the increased demands which society makes upon its devotees with the close of the Lenten season. But the audience, if not large, was a thoroughly appreciative one, composed as it chiefly was of professional musicians and other genuine music lovers, who felt that they could ill afford to lose such a treat. The programme given ran as follows: "Kreutzer Sonata," Beethoven, Mr. d'Albert and Mr. Kneisel; variations from quartet in G major, Haydn, and intermezzo from quartet No. 2, Bazzini, Kneisel Quartet; soli for pianoforte, "Berceuse," Op. 57, "Valse," Op. 42, "Polonaise," Op. 53, Chopin, Mr. d'Albert; quintet in E-flat, Schumann, Mr. d'Albert and the Kneisel Quartet.

The opening number, Beethoven's famous—or, according to Tolstoi, infamous—"Kreutzer," sonata for violin and piano, was played by Messrs. Kneisel and D'Albert in a manner entirely beyond criticism, and it is safe to say that it will serve those who heard it as a standard for a long time to come. It is impossible for the ordinary mind to discover in this work the sensuous meanings which the Russian novelist claims to have found. No musical student has ever regarded it, save in the light of one of the most beautiful works of the greatest music thinker that the world has yet produced. Such it certainly was last evening in the hands of the two artists, and as such their hearers enjoyed every note of its three long movements.

The two numbers by the quartet alone were given with the exquisite finish, fine blending and delicate expression which have put this rare combination of artists at the head of all similar organizations. The variations from the Haydn quartet were upon the melody of the so-called "Emperor's Hymn," or Austrian National Anthem. The Intermezzo was a charming bit of quiet harmony with a touch of originality in its quaint and totally unexpected ending. A vigorous attempt at an encore was made, but the gentlemen, with an evident eye to the time of their train's departure, declined to do more than to repeatedly bow their thanks.

The closest attention was accorded to Mr. Eugen D'Albert while he played his three Chopin selections, of which the first has been already given here by both Paderewski and De Pachmann. It must be said of Mr. D'Albert, that with all his undisputed merit he does not arouse the enthusiasm which follows the playing of the wonderful Polish pianist. The only possible comparison nowadays between pianists of the first rank, hinges upon the personality and temperament of the player. Technique they all have—even many not at all in the first rank—[illegible] most perfect [illegible] The time of the dazzling "fireworks" player has gone by. The fireworks are still with us, but they no longer serve as the basis for a reputation. The question now asked of a pianist is, "how much of yourself can you put into your playing, and this not to the mutilating, but rather to the enhancing of the composer's thought?"

Some natures must express themselves upon the emotional side, others upon the intellectual. The favored sons of genius will be governed by both, and the one who holds them in most perfect balance will wear the crown. Mr. D'Albert is clearly a player whose conceptions of music are controlled by the intellectual side of his temperament. He plays with the most finished perfection, none more so, his readings are those of a cultivated and thorough musician, he is master of all the nuances of expression, but the final touch of a poetic and emotional nature is lacking. He can compel your admiration, but he cannot draw you with the gracious and winning personality of a Paderewski nor can he play the music of Chopin with a mingled sentiment and abandon of De Pachmann. It is easy to see why he has gained a special reputation as an interpreter of Beethoven. The music of that composer is of the intellectual rather than of the emotional type, and as a matter of fact, Mr. D'Albert's best playing last night was done in the "Kreutzer Sonata."

Schumann's Quartet in E-flat, which came last upon the programme, is one of the finest of that composer's few productions in the field of chamber music. It is of considerable difficulty, but that of course counted for nothing with such a group of artists. Mr. D'Albert gave a superb rendition of the piano part, which is rather the leading feature of the work. The scherzo is the most pleasing of the four movements, but all were equally well played. The work of the quartet was quite on a par with that of the great pianist, and so concluded the most brilliant chamber concert, by far, of the season.

The audience was not slow to testify its appreciation and enjoyment, and hearty applause not only followed each number, but every break of any sort in the music. The only encore vouchsafed, however, was at the conclusion of Mr. D'Albert's group of solos, when he returned and played a waltz by Liszt.

[191]

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

Music Hall: The D'Albert Recitals.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert gave the second in his course of three pianoforte recitals in the Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

Prelude and Fugue in D major	Bach-D'Albert
Sonata in F-sharp major, Op. 78	Beethoven
XV. Variations sérieuses, in D minor, Op. 54	Mendelssohn
Suite in D minor, Op. 91	Raff
Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 3	Schubert
Valse-Caprice, "Man lebt nur einmal."	Strauss-Tausig
Liebestraum, No. 3	Liszt
Rhapsodie espagnole (Folies d'Espagne et Jota Aragonesa)	Liszt

A memorable recital! The great pianist must have felt himself well in the mood for playing, for, great things as he did in Beethoven's E-flat concerto, at a recent symphony concert, he surpassed himself yesterday afternoon. Bach's organ prelude and fugue in D major stands, in a certain sense, apart from most of his organ works that are best known to concert-goers. The subject of the fugue seems more pregnant with opportunities for the display of virtuosity than big with the germs of a great composition. It is even curious to note, in the course of the development of the work, how Bach was content to get no more out of his theme than lay in it, how unsuggestive it was to him of brilliant episodes, and how he kept hammering away at it, with harder and harder strokes, to be sure, but still without finding much that was new to say about it. This fugue reminds one of a trait that is more than once apparent in Schumann's writing; a certain quasi-physical delight in whacking and hammering away at a brilliant theme, as if for sheer love of the hard fight, but without making that theme move one inch forward. Were it not for the enormous and dazzling brilliancy of the thing, one might almost incline to think Bach's treatment of this fugue a trifle monotonous; but his fire and vigor carry it all through triumphantly. Of the real excellence of D'Albert's transcription one cannot judge after a single hearing; but of its brilliancy there cannot be the slightest doubt. It gives the player an opportunity for the display of the most transcendent virtuosity, of the most astounding staying power. D'Albert's playing of it was simply stupendous; it took away your breath! We can remember few things in our experience so thrilling.

Beethoven's sonata in F-sharp, opus 78, is one of the least often heard of its whole family. We cannot remember ever hearing it in public before, except, perhaps, in a "Beethoven-Cyclus." It belongs to the period of the full bloom of his second manner; but there are strong hints in it of his third manner, of that new musical essence, the birth of which we generally date roughly with the eighth symphony. D'Albert played it wonderfully. Here was a "novelty" well worth the hearing. But where the great pianist had his greatest triumph was in the Mendelssohn D minor variations. His playing of these was not only wonderful throughout, but at one point (in the slow variation in D major), he made one of the grandest, the most Titanic "strokes" that we can remember in our whole concert-going experience. When an artist does a thing of that sort, there is no need of talking about musical right or wrong; it may have been purely Mendelssohnian, or inveterately unMendelssohnian, for all that we know, or care. It was stupendously grand playing of a passage that is already great in itself, and, as such, can stand against any criticism whatsoever. It was a flash of true genius!

Of D'Albert's playing of the rest of the programme, splendid as it was, we do not care to write; his playing of these three numbers was enough to fill a memorable afternoon full to the brim for us, and for what came after we had no power of appreciation left. Absolutely unalloyed delight it certainly was not. The man has certain habits in playing that we not only think vicious, but do not like. To our mind, he plays the pianoforte—to a certain extent as Beethoven often wrote for it—with too little regard for its special character, with too little care for beauty of tone, and for that sensuous charm which is an important element in the impression all music legitimately makes upon us. He uses the pedal, too, we will not say too recklessly, but too much and unintermittently for our taste; he seems to us too fond of "tachiste" effects, so to speak; in many passages his playing sounds somewhat blurred, as if the brass and wood-wind in an orchestra held their sustained chords too forcibly, and did not allow the figuration in the strings to show the outline of the music with quite enough distinctness. But with and in spite of this, he is a grand and noble player, one fit to cope triumphantly with the greatest, the most sublime, tasks that composers have imposed upon a pianist. For one thing, he has given us, personally, a tremendous sensation; and that, too, at a time when—after a pretty wearing season—we had thought ourselves tolerably blasés.

The programme of the last symphony rehearsal and concert of the season, tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night, includes Haydn's G major symphony (No. 13, B and H); Paganini's concerto for violin (Wilhelmj arrangement); and Brahms's symphony No. 1, C major. Mr. Kneisel will be the violinist.

The third and last of the D'Albert pianoforte concert recitals will be given in Music Hall Saturday afternoon. This is the programme: Suite Anglaise No. 6, Bach; Rondo, A minor, Mozart; Rhapsodie, op. 79, No. 2, Brahms; Sonata, B. minor, op. 58, Chopin; Barcarolle, A minor, Rubinstein; Sonetto di Petrarca, "Feux Follets:" Study and tarantelle, "Napoli," Liszt,

---

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 20, 1892.

BOSTON NEWS.

Boston Office of The Musical Courier,
157 Tremont Street, April 16, 1892.

THE program for the twenty-third Symphony concert this evening was:

Symphony No. 1, in B flat, op. 38	Schumann
Aria, "Alessandro"	Händel
Suite from the music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet," op. 50	Henschel
Prelude ("Hamlet").
Prelude to Act. II. ("Ophelia")
Interlude, Act III., and pastorale, Act V.
Prelude to Act IV. ("Ophelia's" death).
Danish March.
(First performance in America. Conducted by the composer.)
Aria from "Herodiade"	Massenet
Overture, "Oberon"	Weber

The soloist was Mrs. Georg Henschel.

The performance of the d'Albert symphony, announced for this concert, was postponed on account of the non-arrival of the orchestral parts from Europe.

Although the Schumann symphony, selected by Mr. Nikisch as a substitute for the d'Albert work, is and will ever be a favorite, there was considerable disappointment expressed because of the unfortunate circumstance which precluded all possibility of hearing the d'Albert symphony this season.

The Schumann symphony was given an animated and energetic reading by Mr. Nikisch. The orchestra, however, was somewhat rough, particularly in the first two movements. On the other hand, the "larghetto" was smoothly and carefully performed and may be considered quite as satisfactory as any playing during the evening.

Owing to its novelty the Henschel suite from the "Music to Shakespeare's 'Hamlet'" was the feature of the program in which was centred the greater interest.

Although the composition is artistically conceived, fully, effectively and even richly scored, it could not be called original by the composer's most enthusiastic admirer. The short and commonplace themes were repeated again and again, and but for the colored instrumentation would have been tiresome to a degree. The pastorale seemed to be the only bit unsuggestive of "midnight oil," and gave evident pleasure to its hearers. The orchestra played each movement excellently well. Mr. Henschel conducted, and in a firm, graceful, dignified manner. That he had improved since his absence from Boston was seen at once, and the increased control which he had acquired, both over himself and his men, was plainly apparent.

Mrs. Henschel, however, has not improved. Not that there was a deal of room for it at the time she was last heard here, as her singing was ever finished and satisfying as far as the limitations of voice permitted. In her second selection, the Massenet aria from "Herodiade," these limitations were especially noticeable. Though cleverly sung it sadly needed the breadth and impressive force which this aria requires in order to be most effective.

The last concert of the present season will be given next Saturday evening, and the program as announced will be: Symphony in G, Haydn; concerto for violin, Paganini, and Brahms' symphony No. 1. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

* * * *

D'Albert.

D'ALBERT'S second recital, which took place on Thursday afternoon, April 7, was certainly a crusher! The "little giant" was in his best form, and the way he went at it was enough to do one's heart good. At the first recital on Tuesday we were still too much under the sweet, hypnotic influence of Paderewski to be able immediately to become absorbed in a personality so entirely opposite to his. But by Thursday the transition was made, and we were all ready to enjoy the prodigious talent of his successor. Le roi est mort, vive le roi! It is no use trying to be faithful to one idol; life is too full for that, particularly in New York, where there is so much to claim our attention.

Paderewski and d'Albert are as wide asunder as the poles (no pun intended) in their playing, as in their appearance and manner before the public. Paderewski steals out with slow and languid grace, as if he had scarce strength enough to move, while d'Albert comes on like a little soldier, with quick and energetic tread and with a directness of purpose that is unmistakable. Paderewski inclines his head gently many times in response to the applause of the audience, while d'Albert gives one abrupt bow and then seats himself instantly at the piano. Paderewski plunges into a few powerful chords, and then waits till all is quiet before he begins his piece, while d'Albert does not seem to be in the least incommoded by late comers, but preludes in the most exquisite way for a long time and looks around at the people as they come down the aisles. Before they are in their seats finally he begins to play. Originality, variety and deep feeling are the three great points in Paderewski's playing, whereas in d'Albert's they are freshness, virility and sincerity. D'Albert has grandeur, immense tone and dazzling brilliancy; at times also great poetry and sentiment, but these last are not the predominating qualities of his playing. It is his power and his magnificent way of doing things that take hold of one. One feels in him the splendor of youth and strength, and it seems as if he had an inexhaustible reservoir to draw upon, and as if he could not contain himself for very richness and abundance. The public has no scruples in making him play any number of encores, for he is perfectly able to stand it. The idea that he can be fatigued seems absurd.

The first number on the program of Thursday afternoon was to me the most delightful. It was Bach's prelude and fugue in D major, arranged by d'Albert, and it was absorbingly interesting. How old Bach could make himself sound so young and fresh after 200 years is a mystery, and it reminds one of Longfellow's acute remark in "Hyperion," that "geniuses of the first rank are in advance not only of their own age but of all ages." No doubt the modern dress into which d'Albert put the prelude and fugue and his vigorous handling of it contributed to its effect. The deep basses made it very grand and were as good as organ pedals.

Following the Bach was Beethoven's sonata, op. 78, in F sharp major. This was Tausig's favorite, and indeed Beethoven himself thought a good deal of it, for speaking one day of the "Moonlight" sonata he remarked impatiently, "People are always talking about the 'Moonlight' sonata. I have done better things than that. The F sharp major sonata is something very different." D'Albert played it magnificently, and it was the finest Beethoven playing he did, except the op. 109 in the preceding concert.

Mendelssohn's "Variations sérieuses" were the third number, and although Paderewski has played them a great deal this season and in a manner that seemed unapproachable, d'Albert's rendering of them was equally good. If lacking in Paderewski's tenderness of touch he made up for it in breadth and nobility. His playing of the simple variation in chords was so earnest that it called out a burst of applause from the audience.

Raff's suite in D major gave d'Albert full opportunity to show his immense virtuosity and brilliancy, while not specially interesting as a composition. In sharp contrast to this overpowering brilliancy, at the close of the second movement he made a pianissimo the delicacy of which could not be excelled. It was really gossamery in texture, and was a surprise, coming from him.

Schubert's impromptu, op. 90, No. 3, was a disappointment, and sounded cold and monotonous. D'Albert played it very slowly and with big tone in the melody, but it was destitute of charm and was too coarse. The lovely water-like accompaniment which should murmur softly beneath the melody he made nothing of. In the Strauss-Tausig waltz, "Man Lebt nur Einmal," he was again at home as a virtuoso, and Liszt's little gem, the "Liebestraum," a veritable "dream of love," was exquisite—all feeling and warmth. The difficult cadenza just rippled off d'Albert's finger ends in the most delicious way.

Liszt's rarely heard "Spanish Rhapsody" closed a program which was beautifully arranged and of great variety. The "Spanish Rhapsody," as its name denotes, is composed on Spanish themes, instead of Hungarian ones. It is fascinating, as all Liszt's rhapsodies are, and d'Albert played it with such terrific fire and rush that his audience was nearly carried off its feet and recalled him again and again. Truly he is amazing.

Amy Fay.

The Last Nikisch Concert.—The last concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, takes place next Tuesday evening, the 26th inst., at Chickering Hall. Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the soloists.

Music in Baltimore.

Baltimore, April 17, 1892.

THE recital of Eugene d'Albert on Monday last was an important event in the estimation of every true lover of music in this city. The honesty of purpose, the sincerity and devotion to his work, and the technical perfection of his performance were the chief characteristics of d'Albert on this occasion. This was his program:

Prelude and fugue, D major	Bach-D'Albert
Sonata, op. 109	Beethoven
Variations sérieuses, op. 54	Mendelssohn
Nocturne, op. 9, No. 3 Valse, op. 42	Chopin
Suite, op. 91	Raff
"Sonetta di Petrarca" 'Feux Follets" etude 'Rhapsodie Espagnole	Liszt

The recital was a great success, and everyone hopes for an early return of the wonderful pianist.

The Auditorium Company, with a capital stock of $200,000, has been incorporated here for the purpose of building a large music hall—just what is needed here.

Hans Slick.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

Music Hall: The D'Albert Recitals.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert gave the second in his course of three pianoforte recitals in the Music Hall yesterday afternoon, the programme being as follows:

Prelude and Fugue in D major	Bach-D'Albert
Sonata in F-sharp major, Op. 78	Beethoven
XV. Variations sérieuses, in D minor, Op. 54	Mendelssohn
Suite in D minor, Op. 91	Raff
Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 3	Schubert
Valse-Caprice, "Man lebt nur einmal."	Strauss-Tausig
Liebestraum, No. 3	Liszt
Rhapsodie espagnole (Folies d'Espagne et Jota Aragonesa)	Liszt

A memorable recital! The great pianist must have felt himself well in the mood for playing, for, great things as he did in Beethoven's E-flat concerto, at a recent symphony concert, he surpassed himself yesterday afternoon. Bach's organ prelude and fugue in D major stands, in a certain sense, apart from most of his organ works that are best known to concert-goers. The subject of the fugue seems more pregnant with opportunities for the display of virtuosity than big with the germs of a great composition. It is even curious to note, in the course of the development of the work, how Bach was content to get no more out of his theme than lay in it, how unsuggestive it was to him of brilliant episodes, and how he kept hammering away at it, with harder and harder strokes, to be sure, but still without finding much that was new to say about it. This fugue reminds one of a trait that is more than once apparent in Schumann's writing; a certain quasi-physical delight in whacking and hammering away at a brilliant theme, as if for sheer love of the hard fight, but without making that theme move one inch forward. Were it not for the enormous and dazzling brilliancy of the thing, one might almost incline to think Bach's treatment of this fugue a trifle monotonous; but his fire and vigor carry it all through triumphantly. Of the real excellence of D'Albert's transcription one cannot judge after a single hearing; but of its brilliancy there cannot be the slightest doubt. It gives the player an opportunity for the display of the most transcendent virtuosity, of the most astounding staying power. D'Albert's playing of it was simply stupendous; it took away your breath! We can remember few things in our experience so thrilling.

Beethoven's sonata in F-sharp, opus 78, is one of the least often heard of its whole family. We cannot remember ever hearing it in public before, except, perhaps, in a "Beethoven-Cyclus." It belongs to the period of the full bloom of his second manner; but there are strong hints in it of his third manner, of that new musical essence, the birth of which we generally date roughly with the eighth symphony. D'Albert played it wonderfully. Here was a "novelty" well worth the hearing. But where the great pianist had his greatest triumph was in the Mendelssohn D minor variations. His playing of these was not only wonderful throughout, but at one point (in the slow variation in D major), he made one of the grandest, the most Titanic "strokes" that we can remember in our whole concert-going experience. When an artist does a thing of that sort, there is no need of talking about musical right or wrong; it may have been purely Mendelssohnian, or inveterately unMendelssohnian, for all that we know, or care. It was stupendously grand playing of a passage that is already great in itself, and, as such, can stand against any criticism whatsoever. It was a flash of true genius!

Of D'Albert's playing of the rest of the programme, splendid as it was, we do not care to write; his playing of these three numbers was enough to fill a memorable afternoon full to the brim for us, and for what came after we had no power of appreciation left. Absolutely unalloyed delight it certainly was not. The man has certain habits in playing that we not only think vicious, but do not like. To our mind, he plays the pianoforte—to a certain extent as Beethoven often wrote for it—with too little regard for its special character, with too little care for beauty of tone, and for that sensuous charm which is an important element in the impression all music legitimately makes upon us. He uses the pedal, too, we will not say too recklessly, but too much and unintermittently for our taste; he seems to us too fond of "tachiste" effects, so to speak; in many passages his playing sounds somewhat blurred, as if the brass and wood-wind in an orchestra held their sustained chords too forcibly, and did not allow the figuration in the strings to show the outline of the music with quite enough distinctness. But with and in spite of this, he is a grand and noble player, one fit to cope triumphantly with the greatest, the most sublime, tasks that composers have imposed upon a pianist. For one thing, he has given us, personally, a tremendous sensation; and that, too, at a time when—after a pretty wearing season—we had thought ourselves tolerably blasés.

The programme of the last symphony rehearsal and concert of the season, tomorrow afternoon and Saturday night, includes Haydn's G major symphony (No. 13, B and H); Paganini's concerto for violin (Wilhelmj arrangement); and Brahms's symphony No. 1, C major. Mr. Kneisel will be the violinist.

The third and last of the D'Albert pianoforte concert recitals will be given in Music Hall Saturday afternoon. This is the programme: Suite Anglaise No. 6, Bach; Rondo, A minor, Mozart; Rhapsodie, op. 79, No. 2, Brahms; Sonata, B. minor, op. 58, Chopin; Barcarolle, A minor, Rubinstein; Sonetto di Petrarca, "Feux Follets:" Study and tarantelle, "Napoli," Liszt,

---

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 20, 1892.

BOSTON NEWS.

BOSTON OFFICE OF THE MUSICAL COURIER,
157 TREMONT STREET, April 16, 1892.

THE program for the twenty-third Symphony concert this evening was:

Symphony No. 1, in B flat, op. 38	Schumann
Aria, "Alessandro"	Händel
Suite from the music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet," op. 50	Henschel
Prelude ("Hamlet").
Prelude to Act. II. ("Ophelia")
Interlude, Act III., and pastorale, Act V.
Prelude to Act IV. ("Ophelia's" death).
Danish March.
(First performance in America. Conducted by the composer.)
Aria from "Herodiade"	Massenet
Overture, "Oberon"	Weber

The soloist was Mrs. Georg Henschel.

The performance of the d'Albert symphony, announced for this concert, was postponed on account of the non-arrival of the orchestral parts from Europe.

Although the Schumann symphony, selected by Mr. Nikisch as a substitute for the d'Albert work, is and will ever be a favorite, there was considerable disappointment expressed because of the unfortunate circumstance which precluded all possibility of hearing the d'Albert symphony this season.

The Schumann symphony was given an animated and energetic reading by Mr. Nikisch. The orchestra, however, was somewhat rough, particularly in the first two movements. On the other hand, the "larghetto" was smoothly and carefully performed and may be considered quite as satisfactory as any playing during the evening.

Owing to its novelty the Henschel suite from the "Music to Shakespeare's 'Hamlet'" was the feature of the program in which was centred the greater interest.

Although the composition is artistically conceived, fully, effectively and even richly scored, it could not be called original by the composer's most enthusiastic admirer. The short and commonplace themes were repeated again and again, and but for the colored instrumentation would have been tiresome to a degree. The pastorale seemed to be the only bit unsuggestive of "midnight oil," and gave evident pleasure to its hearers. The orchestra played each movement excellently well. Mr. Henschel conducted, and in a firm, graceful, dignified manner. That he had improved since his absence from Boston was seen at once, and the increased control which he had acquired, both over himself and his men, was plainly apparent.

Mrs. Henschel, however, has not improved. Not that there was a deal of room for it at the time she was last heard here, as her singing was ever finished and satisfying as far as the limitations of voice permitted. In her second selection, the Massenet aria from "Herodiade," these limitations were especially noticeable. Though cleverly sung it sadly needed the breadth and impressive force which this aria requires in order to be most effective.

The last concert of the present season will be given next Saturday evening, and the program as announced will be: Symphony in G, Haydn; concerto for violin, Paganini, and Brahms' symphony No. 1. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the soloist.

* * * *

D'Albert.

D'ALBERT'S second recital, which took place on Thursday afternoon, April 7, was certainly a crusher! The "little giant" was in his best form, and the way he went at it was enough to do one's heart good. At the first recital on Tuesday we were still too much under the sweet, hypnotic influence of Paderewski to be able immediately to become absorbed in a personality so entirely opposite to his. But by Thursday the transition was made, and we were all ready to enjoy the prodigious talent of his successor. Le roi est mort, vive le roi! It is no use trying to be faithful to one idol; life is too full for that, particularly in New York, where there is so much to claim our attention.

Paderewski and d'Albert are as wide asunder as the poles (no pun intended) in their playing, as in their appearance and manner before the public. Paderewski steals out with slow and languid grace, as if he had scarce strength enough to move, while d'Albert comes on like a little soldier, with quick and energetic tread and with a directness of purpose that is unmistakable. Paderewski inclines his head gently many times in response to the applause of the audience, while d'Albert gives one abrupt bow and then seats himself instantly at the piano. Paderewski plunges into a few powerful chords, and then waits till all is quiet before he begins his piece, while d'Albert does not seem to be in the least incommoded by late comers, but preludes in the most exquisite way for a long time and looks around at the people as they come down the aisles. Before they are in their seats finally he begins to play. Originality, variety and deep feeling are the three great points in Paderewski's playing, whereas in d'Albert's they are freshness, virility and sincerity. D'Albert has grandeur, immense tone and dazzling brilliancy; at times also great poetry and sentiment, but these last are not the predominating qualities of his playing. It is his power and his magnificent way of doing things that take hold of one. One feels in him the splendor of youth and strength, and it seems as if he had an inexhaustible reservoir to draw upon, and as if he could not contain himself for very richness and abundance. The public has no scruples in making him play any number of encores, for he is perfectly able to stand it. The idea that he can be fatigued seems absurd.

The first number on the program of Thursday afternoon was to me the most delightful. It was Bach's prelude and fugue in D major, arranged by d'Albert, and it was absorbingly interesting. How old Bach could make himself sound so young and fresh after 200 years is a mystery, and it reminds one of Longfellow's acute remark in "Hyperion," that "geniuses of the first rank are in advance not only of their own age but of all ages." No doubt the modern dress into which d'Albert put the prelude and fugue and his vigorous handling of it contributed to its effect. The deep basses made it very grand and were as good as organ pedals.

Following the Bach was Beethoven's sonata, op. 78, in F sharp major. This was Tausig's favorite, and indeed Beethoven himself thought a good deal of it, for speaking one day of the "Moonlight" sonata he remarked impatiently, "People are always talking about the 'Moonlight' sonata. I have done better things than that. The F sharp major sonata is something very different." D'Albert played it magnificently, and it was the finest Beethoven playing he did, except the op. 109 in the preceding concert.

Mendelssohn's "Variations sérieuses" were the third number, and although Paderewski has played them a great deal this season and in a manner that seemed unapproachable, d'Albert's rendering of them was equally good. If lacking in Paderewski's tenderness of touch he made up for it in breadth and nobility. His playing of the simple variation in chords was so earnest that it called out a burst of applause from the audience.

Raff's suite in D major gave d'Albert full opportunity to show his immense virtuosity and brilliancy, while not specially interesting as a composition. In sharp contrast to this overpowering brilliancy, at the close of the second movement he made a pianissimo the delicacy of which could not be excelled. It was really gossamery in texture, and was a surprise, coming from him.

Schubert's impromptu, op. 90, No. 3, was a disappointment, and sounded cold and monotonous. D'Albert played it very slowly and with big tone in the melody, but it was destitute of charm and was too coarse. The lovely water-like accompaniment which should murmur softly beneath the melody he made nothing of. In the Strauss-Tausig waltz, "Man Lebt nur Einmal," he was again at home as a virtuoso, and Liszt's little gem, the "Liebestraum," a veritable "dream of love," was exquisite—all feeling and warmth. The difficult cadenza just rippled off d'Albert's finger ends in the most delicious way.

Liszt's rarely heard "Spanish Rhapsody" closed a program which was beautifully arranged and of great variety. The "Spanish Rhapsody," as its name denotes, is composed on Spanish themes, instead of Hungarian ones. It is fascinating, as all Liszt's rhapsodies are, and d'Albert played it with such terrific fire and rush that his audience was nearly carried off its feet and recalled him again and again. Truly he is amazing.

AMY FAY.

The Last Nikisch Concert.—The last concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, takes place next Tuesday evening, the 26th inst., at Chickering Hall. Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the soloists.

Music in Baltimore.

BALTIMORE, April 17, 1892.

THE recital of Eugene d'Albert on Monday last was an important event in the estimation of every true lover of music in this city. The honesty of purpose, the sincerity and devotion to his work, and the technical perfection of his performance were the chief characteristics of d'Albert on this occasion. This was his program:

Prelude and fugue, D major	Bach-D'Albert
Sonata, op. 109	Beethoven
Variations sérieuses, op. 54	Mendelssohn
Nocturne, op. 9, No. 3	Chopin
Valse, op. 42
Suite, op. 91	Raff
"Sonetta di Petrarca"	Liszt
'Feux Follets" etude
'Rhapsodie Espagnole

The recital was a great success, and everyone hopes for an early return of the wonderful pianist.

The Auditorium Company, with a capital stock of $200,000, has been incorporated here for the purpose of building a large music hall—just what is needed here.

HANS SLICK.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, - Philadelphia,

Monday Evening, April 25, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

6

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets with reserved seats now on sale at 1119 Chestnut Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Chickering Hall, - - New York,

Tuesday Evening, April 26, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

6

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.
F. A. SCHWAB, Acting Manager New York Concerts.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Congregational Church, - Corner Tenth and G Streets,

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE MUSIC COMMITTEE.

Wednesday Evening, April 27, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

5

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at J. F. ELLIS & Co.'s, 937 Penna. Avenue.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy of Music, - Brooklyn.

Friday Afternoon, April 29, at 3 o'clock.
Saturday Evening, April 30, at 8.15 o'clock.

Under the auspices of the PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY OF BROOKLYN.

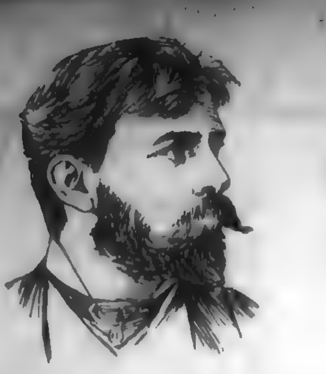
BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

6

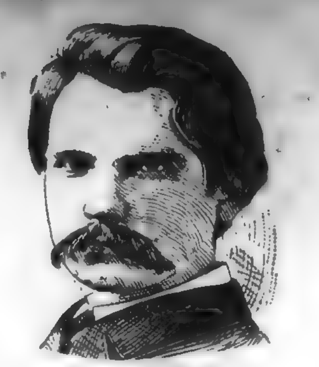
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.



NIKISCH.

STAR THEATRE,
BUFFALO,
Tuesday Evening, May 3,
AT EIGHT.



D'ALBERT.

Only Concert by the famous

Boston Symphony Orchestra

70 PERFORMERS.

Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

. . SOLOISTS . .

ALWIN SCHROEDER, Violoncellist,

. . . AND . . .

EUGEN · D'ALBERT,

The Renowned Piano Virtuoso.

PROGRAMME.

BERLIOZ, ... Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"
CHOPIN, ... Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, Op. 11
Allegro maestoso.
Romance — larghetto.
Rondo vivace.
Mr. D'ALBERT.

WAGNER, ... Prelude, "Lohengrin"
TSCHAIKOWSKY, Last Movement (Theme with Variations) from Suite, Op. 55
Soli for Violoncello.
a CHOPIN. Nocturne.
b SCHUBERT. Moment Musical.
c KLENGEL. Capriccioso.
Mr. SCHROEDER.

DVORAK, ... Symphony No. 4, in G major
Allegro con brio.
Adagio.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale; Allegro ma non troppo.

Tickets, $1.50 and $1.00, and analytical programme books at the Star Theatre, on and after Monday, April 25.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.
403 Washington Street, Boston, Mass.
SATURDAY, APRIL 23,

THE D'ALBERT RECITALS.

The success of the D'Albert pianoforte recitals this week has been of the worthiest kind. Eugen D'Albert represents the art of pianoforte playing in a manner that especially commends itself to the most conscientious class of students. True, he is not so note perfect in his performances as was Tausig, the only one of the great pianists of whom it is possibly true that "he was never known to strike a wrong note in public," as Bernsdorf once wrote of him. In this respect Arthur Friedheim is more of a Tausigean than any contemporaneous pianist, but Eugen D'Albert's fidelity to the composers of his choice is of a far more interesting and even worthier kind. He never aims at absolute literalness at an expense of any such higher qualities of performance as a pianist of his genius is any time justified in assuming. Therefore his playing of the 32 variations, the sonata, op. 53, and other works of Beethoven in Music Hall at his first recital on Monday afternoon was just such playing as artists who prefer a conservatively subjective treatment of classical works most enjoy. He seemed as if invariably compelling the spirit of the work to follow his own feelings, while he was none the less constant in reciprocating the composer.

The manly heart and bright, glowing, burning fancy of the pianist were seldom observed in the nobler qualities of the interpreter. With the sonata opus 90, he seemed more or less influenced by the humor of the moment, yet there was no investing the "conversation with the beloved one," of which Marx tells us, with the slightest sentimentality, and the "struggle between head and heart" was exceptionally well set forth. Perhaps the worthiest performances of the recital were with the opus 109 and op. 110, both of which works were marvelously well played, and with an absolute void of any such psychical importations as would doubtless have misdirected popular attention from the music as Beethoven wrote it to the mere individualism of the performer.

Yet there none the less poured forth a perfect flood of new and charming ideas, which to all spiritual intents and purposes were the composer's own. In brief, throughout the recital each interpretation seemed to have been thoroughly conceived, systematized and regulated from the standpoint of the ethical and intellectual principles of art, while accompanying the artistic result of this preconception was all the spontaneity and virtuosal means that could reasonably be desired. Such qualities were none the less noticeable at the concert on Wednesday afternoon when the composers chosen were Bach-d'Albert, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Raff, Schubert, Strauss-Tausig, and Liszt,

Again in all that he did his musical perceptions and conceptions were of the highest order, the performances as a whole being quite beyond praise, so clear, so flawlessly legato, refined, finished, tasteful and elevating was the artist's playing.

HANDEL AND HAYDN SOCIETY.

The very excellent performance of "The Messiah" by the Handel and Haydn Society, under the direction of Mr. Zerrahn, was followed on Good Friday evening by an equally notable performance of the "Passion Music" of Bach. The soloists were Mrs. Henschel, soprano; Mrs. Joachim, alto; Messrs. Lloyd and Parker, tenors, and Messrs. Henschel and Lamson, bassos. Mr. Lang was the organist and Mr. Tucker was at the piano. The society also had the assistance of a chorus of boys from the choirs of Emmanuel, St. Paul's and Harvard College. Mr. Lloyd sang the music of the Evangelist, and in spite of his continued indisposition, to him belonged the honors of the evening. Mrs. Henschel's voice lost something of its beauty by being heard in so large a place and in such trying music, still her work for the most part was done with sympathy and good understanding. Mrs. Joachim's singing was characterized by the same intellectual charm and vocal faultiness that was noticed in her previous work. Mr. Henschel sang the music of "Jesus" with much dignity and impressiveness but with a sentiment that seemed slightly exaggerated. His peculiar method of producing his voice shows him to less advantage in this style of music than in the dramatic. Mr. Parker sang with great intelligence and expression if a trifle roughly, and Mr. Lamson's work was unevenly good. The work of the chorus and orchestra was generally excellent. The performance was very long and lifeless owing to the request that there should be no applause. The soloists were in black as were the members of the chorus with one or two exceptions, which all contributed to the general gloom.

Quite in contrast was the performance of "The Creation" on Easter Sunday night. On this occasion all was brilliant, even the lighting of the hall had been improved in a manner that was little short of dazzling in contrast with what generally obtains there, and after the heavy and at times tiresome music of "The Passion," the simple flowing melodies of "The Creation" were a delight. The soloists were Mme. Albani, soprano, Mr. Lloyd, tenor, and Mr. Whitney, bass. The pleasure of Mme. Albani's singing during the evening was almost without alloy. Artist as she is in opera, her work in oratorio is even more beautiful, and she sings with a sustained power, vigor and fervor that are convincing and satisfying. Mr. Lloyd's singing was as it has been all through, fine at all points, finer than usual if such a thing were possible, and his rendering of "In Nature Worth" was simply exquisite, a thing to be long remembered by those who had the good fortune to hear it. Mr. Whitney sang the music of Raphael and Adam with that earnestness, dignity and expression which are so characteristic of all his work. Chorus and orchestra did fine work under Mr. Zerrahn's direction, and their appreciation of his efforts in their behalf took the tangible form of a very beautiful floral harp.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert added an unexpected delight to the last of the Kneisel concerts, given in Brattle Hall, Cambridge on Tuesday, by his performance, in conjunction with Mr. Franz Kneisel, of the Kreutzer Sonata, besides other selections. The musical treat called out a most cultivated audience.

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 23, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

In considering Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" suite, which had the central place on the twenty-third Symphony programme, the fact should be kept in mind that this music was written for a theatre and should not be subjected to as exigent examination as if it had been composed independently and for the concert-room. Not only is the best theatre band less in numbers and effect to a full concert orchestra, but the time assigned to its share in a composite performance is necessarily limited in conformity to the prime requirements of the stage. If the composer of music for a spectacle or a standard drama outlines moods and suggests characters which are ultimately to be shown in words and acts, or accompanies them allusively, he has done his duty; if his music will bear translation to an entirely different locale and environment, he has succeeded in doing more than this. Nobody, we are sure, would be more prompt than Mr. Henschel to say this "Hamlet" music, prepared under commission to introduce and accompany certain parts of the play, is just what he would have made it if he had set out de proprio motu and under inspiration, as one might say, to create a suite or fantasy after Shakespeare. That it maintains itself so well, indicates so clearly those elements of the tragedy with which it is to be connected, and is wrought out in such excellent and musicianly ways, is in itself high praise and honor. To ask from it the fulness of a free composition and the expansion of unrestricted time, is unreasonable. All the same, we should like to hear it as it was meant to be heard, with the influences of speech and action blent into its own, before judging it absolutely. But if it be not inspired, it is certainly well moulded upon substantial and sensible subjects, and the chief exception that criticism can find with it is its brevity of development, its occasional slight weakness of assertion, and its narrow range of effect in scoring. The suite includes a general introduction of variable character, preparatory to the presentation of the fluctuant Prince of Denmark; a softer and sweeter prelude to the second act, intended to be typical of Ophelia, although we thought it somewhat sombre and dense for this; an interlude, relative to the first prelude, preceding the third act; an elegiac introduction to the fourth act, significant of Ophelia's fate, and a pastoral episode following it, indicative of the calm, rural nature of the churchyard, together with a Danish march for some professional purposes. The music is honest and interesting, and ought to be of unusual value in its place, besides showing the knowledge and care of the wise student of orchestral scores. The other instrumental numbers were the "Oberon" overture, in a generally commendable reading, and Schumann's first symphony, some parts of which were admirably done, while others were harsh, hard and almost pugnaciously assertive of the conductor's personal notions. [It may be noted in passing that this symphony was given because the parts for Mr. D'Albert's, which had been promised, did not arrive in time, and that Mr. Henschel conducted his suite and had nothing less than an ovation from the audience.] Mrs. Henschel sang airs from Handel's "Alessandro" and Massenet's "Herodiade" in her delightful style, but of course with too little power for the hall.

The season will end tonight with Haydn's G-minor and Brahms's first symphonies, with a Paganini violin concerto for Mr. Kneisel sandwiched between them.

D'ALBERT.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert will end this afternoon with a programme of important miscellaneous selections the short series of recitals appointed for the Music Hall, the previous concerts having taken place there on the afternoons of Monday and Wednesday, and the former day having been devoted to Beethoven alone. The enormous number of concerts already given since last autumn has not so far exhausted the purses or the minds of the musical public, but that large patronage, close attention and flattering applause have been bestowed upon the recitals, which will leave behind them a stronger and better impression of the pianist's powers than he has ever made before. There is no need to dwell now upon any great artist's command of the instrument; for while each of many who are famous and commanding use it after his own peculiar fashion and to his own ends, each appears the peer of the others in technical mastery of all the resources which that "box of wires" possesses. What remains for the critic to consider is the pianist's apparent intention and the correspondence between this and his demonstration of it. Coming immediately after the romantic and intensely personal Paderewski, D'Albert seems even more strict and impersonal than he is, and his occasional disregard of the capacity of the instrument for tender tones and sustained phrases seems almost like intentional harshness. With him the intellectal predominates over the emotional, logic over suggestion, demonstration over persuasion. He is at times rugged almost to roughness, decided almost to severity, urgent almost to ingenuousness. His lights soften into no corona, his shadows into no penumbra; in his musical exposition a spade is a spade, and a fundamental idea must be set forth as nearly as possibly as a nuda veritas. He is firm even to rigidity, exact to formality, and insistent to unyieldingness. But his honesty, his consistency and power of conviction are absolute, and if he is rarely eloquent, he is almost always masterful. He offends sensibility and displeases judgment sometimes; but, on the other hand, he sometimes almost overwhelms and often astonishes by the rush and weight of his climaxes and delights by his flashing splendor. He does not attempt to overlay a composer's writing with his own interpretation, wresting the text to support him; but he puts himself and all his powers at the service of the author as he understands him, and therefore his errors and insufficiencies lie in the spiritual coldness which can be felt through the eagerness of his delivery. Yet he has also a feeling for beauty, although perhaps preferably for beauty of form than of sentiment, and grace, elegance and lightness of touch and phrase are no rarities in his style. He deserves his standing among the chief concert pianists of the world, and the judicious student can learn much from him, as he is sure to give the layman great and worthy pleasure.

ORATORIO.

The second of the Handel and Haydn Society's spring concerts consisted of three hours of the Bach Passion music, which is quite as much of an almost unbroken series of minor modes as the average listener can bear. One insatiate writer did indeed express his personal regret that the work could not have been given unabridged; he, perhaps, could live through an uncut "Hamlet" or "Richard III.," but less gifted mortals could not, so that it is just as well for humanity in general that consistent and reasonable abbreviations are to be continued. The performance, although by no means flawless, may be accepted as the best which Boston has had, and the soloists, if not always ideally excellent, were certainly eminent and honorable. Mr. Lloyd, although he had not recovered evenness of voice, gave the many recitatives of the Evangelist in a beautifully sincere and impressive manner, while the tenor airs were intelligently and earnestly read by Mr. George J. Parker, who might have borrowed something of the great Englishman's perfect placidity of style with advantage. A similar comment may be made upon the bass music: Mr. Henschel, for all that his voice has not the natural qualities which one desires to hear in the singer of Jesus, yet delivered his text with mastery and gravity, while Mr. Lamson seemed to try a little too hard to be dramatically expressive and so diffused his tone and made his reading unequal. Mrs. Henschel's exquisite method, her delicacy and her taste sustained her singing of the soprano music when her voice was in itself inadequate in volume and intensity to the duty imposed upon it. Mme. Joachim was very disappointing in the contralto part, in spite of the size and solidity of much of her voice. Without dwelling upon the falsity of her intonation and the hollow and vague quality of many even loud tones, it is enough to note that her delivery was formal, rigid and unimpassioned to a degree quite surprising to those who had heard her in lieder only. The fact that perfect intonation and agreeable, plastic tones are really the first requisites in a singer, and that inflexible time-keeping is quite possible to a mere music-box, appeared, however, to have no weight with one daily contemporary, which declared, in its pet and now trite exaggeration that her contribution was "utterly superb"—a laudation which will be taken with some qualification when it is remembered that its chief critic recently declared in print, over his own signature, that of vocal music he knew nothing. The chorus sang almost always with readiness and correctness, and some weakness of the middle voices, when it was divided into eight parts, was quite excusable. The orchestra also was generally attentive and correct, and the choir-boys, who were adjoined for a few choruses, sang from the side balcony a lusty obbligato, which quite dominated all the other parts. A rather foolish invitation was given to the audience to get up and assist in some of the chorals; the getting up was all very well, for it gave relief to the long stretch of sitting, but the singing was a flat failure, as the evening was devoted to a concert and not to a praise-meeting. We have seen the objection raised that those who tried to sing took up the parts appropriate to their own individual voices, the implication being that they should have sung the air as a German congregation would in a church service. But then as Bach wrote out these chorals in vocal harmonies, and set them down for his choirs to sing so, the objection seems rather fantastical and finical.

The third concert was Haydn's "Creation," which has not been sung for several years. The choir did remarkably good work, their singing being almost invariably prompt, firm and balanced, and more attention than usual being paid to effects of light and shade. The first honors should be pretty equally divided between Mr. Lloyd and Mr. Whitney. The former had almost entirely recovered purity of tone in all his compass, while the latter was a little cloudy of intonation at first. But each read his music with dignity, expressiveness and becoming variety of emphasis, Mr. Lloyd adhering inflexibly to the most conservative readings, but Mr. Whitney yielding to the popular craving for the introduced low D's—which, let us whisper in his ear, are audible from him, but not solid or sonorous in Music Hall. Mme. Albani gave to the soprano music a vivid dramatic coloring, but she took many operatic liberties in phrasing and reading which detracted both from the pleasure and the worth of her singing. That music should be sung elastically but not variably, and the same kind of reproof which is meted out to him who tempers with the integrity of a classic symphony is deserved by the singer who disports herself in the measures of an oratorio. The third part—the connubial confidences, mutual admirations and united worshipfulness of Adam and Eve—sounds, as others have said, rather tame and thin after the nobler and sturdier music which has preceded it, and if America should follow English example in omitting it, perhaps no grave loss would be experienced; there would certainly be no lessening of real pleasure, for these last pages produce the effect of an anti-climax.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy Concert Hall, - Baltimore,

Thursday Evening, April 28, at 8.

SEASON - 1891-92

PROGRAMME

6

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's ticket office, 13 North Charles Street.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 23, 1892.

THE 22D SYMPHONY CONCERT was made up of two standard overtures, one old and the other modern, the Egmont of Beethoven, and the Sakuntala of Goldmark. Between them, to the credit alike of composer and orchestra, came J. K. Paine's Spring Symphony, not heard for the first time, though new with this orchestra. This has been called the most important of American works. The Adagio and Allegro, which suggest valedictory snow-swirls and peeping crocuses, is indeed expressive. The May Night Fantasy hints an insectivorous atmosphere rather more suggestive of June. The Springtime Romance hardly equals the other movements; but we all rejoice in the Spring Glorys which come with the final Allegro.

HANDEL AND HAYDN CONCERTS IN HOLY WEEK.

150th Anniversary of the Messiah Commemorated in Boston.

[Boston Staff Correspondence.]

THERE were three. First, on Wednesday, April 13, came the extra performance of the Messiah, to commemorate the 150th anniversary of its original production in Dublin. This was 85th performance by our Boston society, one more than a yearly performance since the Handel and Haydns first ventured upon it in 1818, in Boylston Hall.

Myron Whitney sang the bass parts, as so often before, beginning his work right royally, but wearying toward the end.

Mrs. Genevra Johnstone Bishop met with varying success in the soprano solos, singing "Come unto me" finely, and taking the runs in "Rejoice greatly" with attractive half tones, of a pure and bell-like quality. One experienced public singer declares that he knows of no Boston soprano who could excel this lady from Chicago.

Mrs. Carl Alves was at her best in "He was despised," though careful listeners felt disposed to criticize her peculiar pronunciation of that little word a. Her voice and presence were much admired.

After he had overcome certain shortcomings of the vocal organs, Edward Lloyd blazed out magnificently, and in one great solo he fairly dashed "them in pieces."

IT is the general opinion that the chorus never did better, especially in "Unto us a child is born." As for so many years, Zerrahn directed, Lang was at the elevated organ, Muller sounded the critical trumpet.

The second of the triplet of concerts was on Good Friday, a magnificent performance of Bach's Saint Matthew Passion Music. The serried ranks of the chorus showed not a vacant spot. In front of them were picked members from the Symphony Orchestra, with Kneisel at their head, to play the bit of violin over Peter's lament. In the upper balcony could be seen the boys from the three choirs of Emmanuel and Saint Paul churches and Harvard College, under the direction of George L. Osgood and Warren A. Locke, to unite in the chorals, especially in the opening chorus, with its exultant strains, which set a royal key to the evening.

Music Hall was crowded, and there was general response to the printed request that the congregation should rise and join in four or five of the hymns.

Out of the 78 numbers written by Bach, all but 12 were sung, 66 in all, lasting from 7–30 till 10–30, with no delay except for the usual tardy posse after the first number, and a few brief minutes between the two parts, after number 37. The differences between the text of the recitatives and the program were very marked, the singers using the common Bible language; but in the chorals and special passages John S. Dwight's translation was followed.

The choral work was all grand. "Ye lightnings, ye thunders, in clouds are ye vanished," made a section of the audience forget the request for no applause, a prohibition always reluctantly complied with, and one which must be trying to singers, who learn (more than they realize) to depend upon the stimulus of public approval. The quick shouts of the multitude were wonderfully rendered, especially the name Barabbas, in reply to Pilate's question, who should be freed at the Passover feast.

The alto solos were sung by Madame Joachim, for whom I have great admiration; but she disappointed my expectations. This music is widely different from the German lieder. Perhaps she was hampered by the English language, which she spoke much more distinctly than the other songstress. At any rate, it was not till the Petrine Denial Lament that she fully struck the sympathetic chord.

Mrs. Henschel's sweet voice, with its delicate tremolo, is not best adapted to such work, and her words were often very indefinite, but she was in her elements in the soprano air, "From love unbounded," with birdlike flute obligato.

Mr. Henschel, as first basso, sang the many and difficult Jesus passages, to my ear often hewing close to, but not quite on the line musically, but always giving force to the language, notably in the pathetic passages towards the close and the eucharistic sentences.

The parts of Judas, Pilate, Peter, and the Highpriest were assigned to the second basso, G. S. Lamson, who not only attacked them with artistic vigor, but sang with nice appreciation of their meaning. This is peculiarly true of Peter's boast of steadfastness. If in some points he fell below the line, it was pleasurable to hear his decided vocal strokes, dealt by a man in earnest.

George J. Parker sang the tenor arias very satisfactorily, though both our fellow citizens grew weary before their three hours' work was over, as well they might. Mr. Parker was particularly effective in the Zion recitative, "Oh grief! No comfort! Ah, no helper near!" which was a fitting prelude to the great work of the chorus in the line, "Ah, from my sins they all their sting do borrow." Why Jesu should be given with the initial consonant sounded like y, in the German fashion, is not apparent, since in familiar texts Yesu has a foreign sound, and seemingly Jesus would fit the music equally well.

The brunt of the vocal work fell upon Mr. Lloyd as the Narrator, whose work is endless and nervously exacting. Right well he bore it. To be sure his voice was throaty at times and his delivery uneven, but at other points its rich outburst was unsurpassed in beauty. Jesus' dying exclamation, "Why hast thou forsaken me?" was given with a depth of feeling equal to the clarion ascent of his voice, as if it followed the departing spirit. Another perfect musical expression was over the words, "He went out and wept bitterly," which brought upon the house a silence which might be felt.

Thomas Hooper, Jr., a member of the chorus, sang the short additional bass part of the Priest. In the last dialogue number Messrs. Lamson and Parker and both the ladies sang consecutively the short solos which lead to the choral refrain, "Sweet Jesus, good night!" This number was given with delicate power.

This is the 77th season of our great choral society, and this was the 683d concert. Bach's great work was first produced in Leipsic, on Good Friday, April 15, 1729, 163 years ago to day, and the present was its ninth performance by the Handel and Haydn Society, beginning with 1874. Mr. Zerrahn is reported as declaring that no better rounded performance of Bach's great work was ever given even in Europe.

It seems queer enough to remember that when the Handel and Haydn Society was founded, in 1815, Boston was not yet a city, cows were still grazing on Boston Common, and Haydn had been in his grave only half a dozen years. In 1819, four years after its formation, the young society gave Haydn's Creation, which had been first produced in Vienna only ten years earlier. For this year's Easter the oratorio had its 65th performance by our society. Again the hall was crowded. the only changes being in the soloists. Mr. Lloyd, however, was again the tenor, and sang the Uriel numbers with varying success, his voice occasionally ruffled, and then expanding in crystalline beauty,–a little tame in sending "Hell's spirits into the abyss," but grand in his portrayal of sun, moon and stars, and of man's creation, his enunciation always distinct.

Myron Whitney also was distinct in utterance. He was applauded when he touched his deepest notes, though he did it with less vigor than of yore. One forgets slight variations from the ideal when such an artist sings so expressively of beasts and serpents, purling streams and death. How sympathetically he and Madame Albani sang together the Adam and Eve duets. With her sweet voice and winning ways, one cares little whether she does or does not strike a certain high note at which she aims, for there is height enough in her poetic vocal thought. Her pronunciation was often indistinct, but it is worth something to see her gracefully bow her acknowledgments. You miss something when she sings of soaring eagles; but nothing could be more perfect than her emphasis of the phrases fragant bloom and cooing dove, unless it be her marvellous expression of the cloud, when she sang Elijah here a few years ago.

A member of the chorus, Eleanor V. Tufts, took part in the closing quartet.

It is refreshing to retreat from Brahms and Wagner into the satisfying melodies of Haydn, with his gems of orchestral suggestion, especially when such a performance is to be heard. You feel that you are indeed in a new created world.

The Easter applause was plentiful and cordial, and a handsome floral harp was presented by the Society to its able conductor.

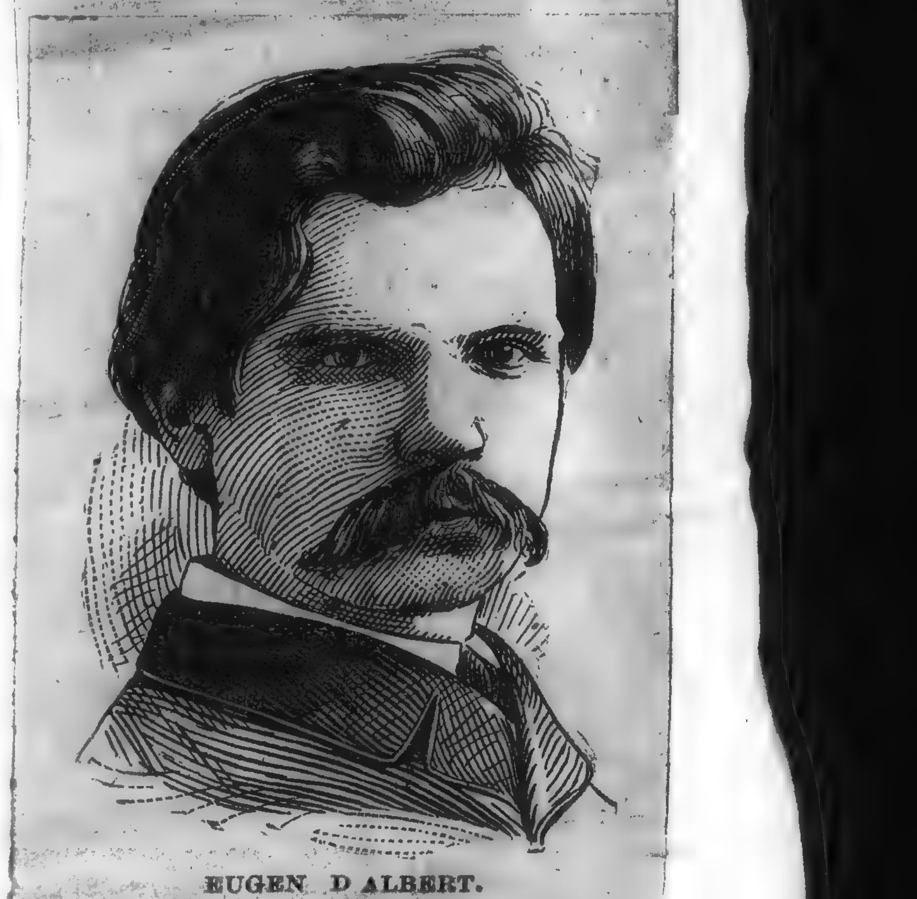
J. H. W.

HERR EUGEN D'ALBERT, the distinguished pianist, has given three recitals at the Madison Square Concert Hall. The virtuoso received a warm welcome from his many admirers and made new friends through his brilliant display of pianistic ability. D'Albert certainly impresses us as having improved in his playing, since his former visit. He displays more scholarship and solid musicianly playing and rather avoids the excess of sensationalism for which he was so generally criticized at that time. His Beethoven programme on Tuesday afternoon led to genuine surprise and many expressions of approval on the part of the critical audience. D'Albert's Beethoven playing is a treat, he plays in the broadly massive style that to musicians is the only true exposition of the great composer, avoids any sensational display and yet gives a power, virility and fire to his readings that is eminently gratifying.

There is one point, however, that one would like to have improved, and that is the slow movements; D'Albert never could get at the true broad cantabile style of playing. It is not that he lacks tone, but that he fails in the matter of touch. The art of touching the key so as to obtain a full singing tone of sympathetic quality is understood by but few pianists, and to use this art so as to play an adagio that will find an echo for every phrase in the hearts of the audience is another thing, but he only who can accomplish this difficult feat can play Beethoven with true dignity and feeling. The success of each recital was greater than the last, and the program on Saturday afternoon included some of D'Albert's favorite display pieces by Liszt, which aroused a furore. His best playing was, however, done in Bach's Suite Anglaise No. 6, which he gave superbly.

Saturday Vox Populi

LOWELL, MASS., APRIL 23, 1892.



EUGEN D ALBERT.

It will be with great pleasure that the musical portion of the community will learn of the recital which is to be given at the Opera House on Tuesday evening by the distinguished pianist, Eugen D'Albert, whose concerts in New York, Boston, and the other larger cities of the country have been a prominent feature of the musical season.

He is of French parentage, but was born in Glasgow, his father being a musician and bandmaster of note. Being at an early age placed under the best instructors, and being prompt to learn, he acquired while yet very young considerable reputation as a pianist, which has been constantly added to. About two years ago he made his first appearance in this country, immediately creating a sensation by the brilliancy and technical skill of his performances.

D'ALBERT RECITAL.

Programme.

Prelude and Fugue, in D major,	Bach-D'Albere
Sonata in C major. Op. 53,	Beethoven
Allegro con brio, introduzione et Rondo.
Berceuse. Op. 57,	Chopin
Valse. Op. 42,
Nocturne. Op. 9, No. 3,
Impromptu. Op. 36,
Polonaise. Op. 53,
Impromptu. Op. 90, No. 3,	Schubert
Barcarolle, in A minor,	Rubinstein
Valse, "Man leb nur einmal,"	Strauss-Tausig

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy Concert Hall, - Baltimore,

Thursday Evening, April 28, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92

PROGRAMME

6

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's ticket office, 13 North Charles Street.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

FOUNDED IN 1863 BY HENRY C. WATSON.

WM. M. THOMS, Editor.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 23, 1892.

THE 22D SYMPHONY CONCERT was made up of two standard overtures, one old and the other modern, the Egmont of Beethoven, and the Sakuntala of Goldmark. Between them, to the credit alike of composer and orchestra, came J. K. Paine's Spring Symphony, not heard for the first time, though new with this orchestra. This has been called the most important of American works. The Adagio and Allegro, which suggest valedictory snow-swirls and peeping crocuses, is indeed expressive. The May Night Fantasy hints an insectivorous atmosphere rather more suggestive of June. The Springtime Romance hardly equals the other movements; but we all rejoice in the Spring Glorys which come with the final Allegro.

HANDEL AND HAYDN CONCERTS IN HOLY WEEK.

150th Anniversary of the Messiah Commemorated in Boston.

[Boston Staff Correspondence.]

THERE were three. First, on Wednesday, April 13, came the extra performance of the Messiah, to commemorate the 150th anniversary of its original production in Dublin. This was 85th performance by our Boston society, one more than a yearly performance since the Handel and Haydns first ventured upon it in 1818, in Boylston Hall.

Myron Whitney sang the bass parts, as so often before, beginning his work right royally, but wearying toward the end.

Mrs. Genevra Johnstone Bishop met with varying success in the soprano solos, singing "Come unto me" finely, and taking the runs in "Rejoice greatly" with attractive half tones, of a pure and bell-like quality. One experienced public singer declares that he knows of no Boston soprano who could excel this lady from Chicago.

Mrs. Carl Alves was at her best in "He was despised," though careful listeners felt disposed to criticize her peculiar pronunciation of that little word a. Her voice and presence were much admired.

After he had overcome certain shortcomings of the vocal organs, Edward Lloyd blazed out magnificently, and in one great solo he fairly dashed "them in pieces."

IT is the general opinion that the chorus never did better, especially in "Unto us a child is born." As for so many years, Zerrahn directed, Lang was at the elevated organ, Muller sounded the critical trumpet.

The second of the triplet of concerts was on Good Friday, a magnificent performance of Bach's Saint Matthew Passion Music. The serried ranks of the chorus showed not a vacant spot. In front of them were picked members from the Symphony Orchestra, with Kneisel at their head, to play the bit of violin over Peter's lament. In the upper balcony could be seen the boys from the three choirs of Emmanuel and Saint Paul churches and Harvard College, under the direction of George L. Osgood and Warren A. Locke, to unite in the chorals, especially in the opening chorus, with its exultant strains, which set a royal key to the evening.

Music Hall was crowded, and there was general response to the printed request that the congregation should rise and join in four or five of the hymns.

Out of the 78 numbers written by Bach, all but 12 were sung, 66 in all, lasting from 7–30 till 10–30, with no delay except for the usual tardy posse after the first number, and a few brief minutes between the two parts, after number 37. The differences between the text of the recitatives and the program were very marked, the singers using the common Bible language; but in the chorals and special passages John S. Dwight's translation was followed.

The choral work was all grand. "Ye lightnings, ye thunders, in clouds are ye vanished," made a section of the audience forget the request for no applause, a prohibition always reluctantly complied with, and one which must be trying to singers, who learn (more than they realize) to depend upon the stimulus of public approval. The quick shouts of the multitude were wonderfully rendered, especially the name Barabbas, in reply to Pilate's question, who should be freed at the Passover feast.

The alto solos were sung by Madame Joachim, for whom I have great admiration; but she disappointed my expectations. This music is widely different from the German lieder. Perhaps she was hampered by the English language, which she spoke much more distinctly than the other songstress. At any rate, it was not till the Petrine Denial Lament that she fully struck the sympathetic chord.

Mrs. Henschel's sweet voice, with its delicate tremolo, is not best adapted to such work, and her words were often very indefinite, but she was in her elements in the soprano air, "From love unbounded," with birdlike flute obligato.

Mr. Henschel, as first basso, sang the many and difficult Jesus passages, to my ear often hewing close to, but not quite on the line musically, but always giving force to the language, notably in the pathetic passages towards the close and the eucharistic sentences.

The parts of Judas, Pilate, Peter, and the Highpriest were assigned to the second basso, G. S. Lamson, who not only attacked them with artistic vigor, but sang with nice appreciation of their meaning. This is peculiarly true of Peter's boast of steadfastness. If in some points he fell below the line, it was pleasurable to hear his decided vocal strokes, dealt by a man in earnest.

George J. Parker sang the tenor arias very satisfactorily, though both our fellow citizens grew weary before their three hours' work was over, as well they might. Mr. Parker was particularly effective in the Zion recitative, "Oh grief! No comfort! Ah, no helper near!" which was a fitting prelude to the great work of the chorus in the line, "Ah, from my sins they all their sting do borrow." Why Jesu should be given with the initial consonant sounded like y, in the German fashion, is not apparent, since in familiar texts Yesu has a foreign sound, and seemingly Jesus would fit the music equally well.

The brunt of the vocal work fell upon Mr. Lloyd as the Narrator, whose work is endless and nervously exacting. Right well he bore it. To be sure his voice was throaty at times and his delivery uneven, but at other points its rich outburst was unsurpassed in beauty. Jesus' dying exclamation, "Why hast thou forsaken me?" was given with a depth of feeling equal to the clarion ascent of his voice, as if it followed the departing spirit. Another perfect musical expression was over the words, "He went out and wept bitterly," which brought upon the house a silence which might be felt.

Thomas Hooper, Jr., a member of the chorus, sang the short additional bass part of the Priest. In the last dialogue number Messrs. Lamson and Parker and both the ladies sang consecutively the short solos which lead to the choral refrain, "Sweet Jesus, good night!" This number was given with delicate power.

This is the 77th season of our great choral society, and this was the 683d concert. Bach's great work was first produced in Leipsic, on Good Friday, April 15, 1729, 163 years ago to day, and the present was its ninth performance by the Handel and Haydn Society, beginning with 1874. Mr. Zerrahn is reported as declaring that no better rounded performance of Bach's great work was ever given even in Europe.

It seems queer enough to remember that when the Handel and Haydn Society was founded, in 1815, Boston was not yet a city, cows were still grazing on Boston Common, and Haydn had been in his grave only half a dozen years. In 1819, four years after its formation, the young society gave Haydn's Creation, which had been first produced in Vienna only ten years earlier. For this year's Easter the oratorio had its 65th performance by our society. Again the hall was crowded. the only changes being in the soloists. Mr. Lloyd, however, was again the tenor, and sang the Uriel numbers with varying success, his voice occasionally ruffled, and then expanding in crystalline beauty,–a little tame in sending "Hell's spirits into the abyss," but grand in his portrayal of sun, moon and stars, and of man's creation, his enunciation always distinct.

Myron Whitney also was distinct in utterance. He was applauded when he touched his deepest notes, though he did it with less vigor than of yore. One forgets slight variations from the ideal when such an artist sings so expressively of beasts and serpents, purling streams and death. How sympathetically he and Madame Albani sang together the Adam and Eve duets. With her sweet voice and winning ways, one cares little whether she does or does not strike a certain high note at which she aims, for there is height enough in her poetic vocal thought. Her pronunciation was often indistinct, but it is worth something to see her gracefully bow her acknowledgments. You miss something when she sings of soaring eagles; but nothing could be more perfect than her emphasis of the phrases fragant bloom and cooing dove, unless it be her marvellous expression of the cloud, when she sang Elijah here a few years ago.

A member of the chorus, Eleanor V. Tufts, took part in the closing quartet.

It is refreshing to retreat from Brahms and Wagner into the satisfying melodies of Haydn, with his gems of orchestral suggestion, especially when such a performance is to be heard. You feel that you are indeed in a new created world.

The Easter applause was plentiful and cordial, and a handsome floral harp was presented by the Society to its able conductor.

J. H. W.

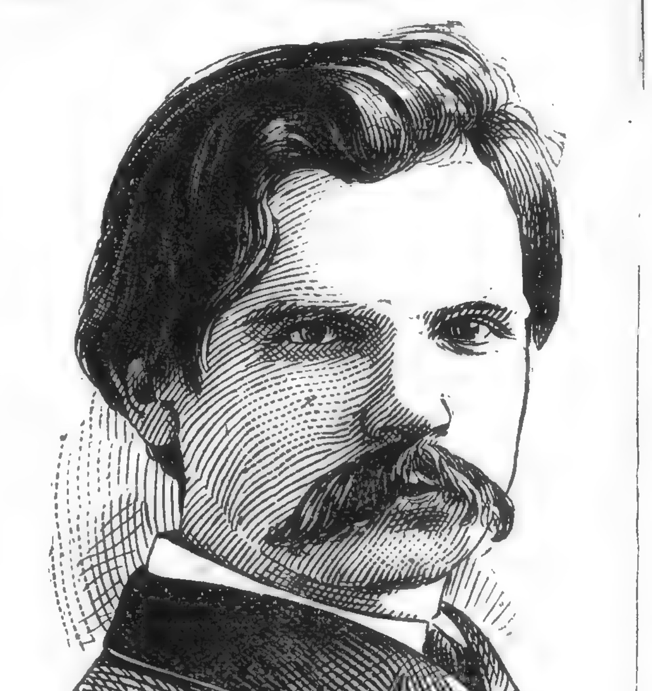
* * *

HERR EUGEN D'ALBERT, the distinguished pianist, has given three recitals at the Madison Square Concert Hall. The virtuoso received a warm welcome from his many admirers and made new friends through his brilliant display of pianistic ability. D'Albert certainly impresses us as having improved in his playing, since his former visit. He displays more scholarship and solid musicianly playing and rather avoids the excess of sensationalism for which he was so generally criticized at that time. His Beethoven programme on Tuesday afternoon led to genuine surprise and many expressions of approval on the part of the critical audience. D'Albert's Beethoven playing is a treat, he plays in the broadly massive style that to musicians is the only true exposition of the great composer, avoids any sensational display and yet gives a power, virility and fire to his readings that is eminently gratifying.

There is one point, however, that one would like to have improved, and that is the slow movements; D'Albert never could get at the true broad cantabile style of playing. It is not that he lacks tone, but that he fails in the matter of touch. The art of touching the key so as to obtain a full singing tone of sympathetic quality is understood by but few pianists, and to use this art so as to play an adagio that will find an echo for every phrase in the hearts of the audience is another thing, but he only who can accomplish this difficult feat can play Beethoven with true dignity and feeling. The success of each recital was greater than the last, and the program on Saturday afternoon included some of D'Albert's favorite display pieces by Liszt, which aroused a furore. His best playing was, however, done in Bach's Suite Anglaise No. 6, which he gave superbly.

Saturday Vox Populi

LOWELL, MASS., APRIL 23, 1892.



EUGEN D ALBERT.

It will be with great pleasure that the musical portion of the community will learn of the recital which is to be given at the Opera House on Tuesday evening by the distinguished pianist, Eugen D'Albert, whose concerts in New York, Boston, and the other larger cities of the country have been a prominent feature of the musical season.

He is of French parentage, but was born in Glasgow, his father being a musician and bandmaster of note. Being at an early age placed under the best instructors, and being prompt to learn, he acquired while yet very young considerable reputation as a pianist, which has been constantly added to. About two years ago he made his first appearance in this country, immediately creating a sensation by the brilliancy and technical skill of his performances.

D'ALBERT RECITAL.

Programme.

Prelude and Fugue, in D major,	Bach-D'Albere
Sonata in C major. Op. 53, Allegro con brio, introduzione et Rondo.	Beethoven
Berceuse. Op. 57,	Chopin
Valse. Op. 42,
Nocturne. Op. 9, No. 3,
Impromptu. Op. 36,
Polonaise. Op. 53,
Impromptu. Op. 90, No. 3,	Schubert
Barcarolle, in A minor,	Rubinstein
Valse, "Man leb nur einmal,"	Strauss-Tausig

BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 24, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-THIRD CONCERT.

The twenty-third concert by the Symphony orchestra was given in Music hall Saturday, April 16. The programme:

Schumann. Symphony No. 1, in B flat, op. 38.
Andante un poco maestoso.—Allegro molto vivace.—Larghetto—Scherzo, molto vivace with Trio I. & Trio II.—Allegro animato e grazioso.
Handel. Aria. "Alessandro."
Henschel. Suite from the Music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet," op.50. (First performance in America. Conducted by the Composer.)
Massenet. Aria from "Herodiade."
Weber. Overture. "Oberon."
Soloist: Mrs. Georg Henschel.

The Schumann Spring symphony is, perhaps, the most melodiously beautiful of all this celebrated author's compositions. We are told it was written at that happy period of his life, on the eve of his marriage with that remarkable woman and renowned pianist, Clara Wiek. He had met with great opposition from the stern old father, because he looked upon Schumann as a nobody who had never done anything, and, in his opinion, never would. Schumann, put to his mettle, composed this symphony and, through its beauties and success, gained the father's consent to marry the daughter. This music is such as to prove attractive to all classes of music lovers. There seems to be no use in expending powder on Mr. Nikisch's overwrought, bombastic, brass-band noise, for he does not heed the united efforts of the critics who have kindly suggested that he modify his ideas and discriminate between mere noise and music. However, as most of the critics are consistent, they will continue to offer their advice and no doubt Mr. Nikisch will continue to disregard it. The first movement of the symphony was not entirely ruined by sensational effects, though it was too demonstrative to prove as effective as it might under a more conservative director. It is not in the nature of Mr. Nikisch to be anything but demonstrative, except in his pianoforte accompaniments, which are truly models of elegant refinement. The lovely second movement was delightfully played, and deserves all possible praise. The scherzo, also, was given a very fair representation, giving real pleasure to the general listener. It is bright, lively and effective. The fourth movement, allegro animato, requires vigorous treatment by the orchestra, and it received it; aye, more than this, it was boisterous in the extreme. A little more subdued calmness would have commanded more attention and represented more truthfully the music in hand.

With due respect for Mr. Henschel's ability as musician and composer, we were not particularly pleased with this Suite of his. Without doubt the music is far more beautiful when presented in connection with the accessory stage effects, and it is, perhaps, unfair to speak without first hearing it in this connection; but if a composer puts his music before the public regardless of fitness, he must accept the consequences.

The Oberon overture was splendidly played, without cause for faultfinding. All of Weber's overtures are delightful as music, and "Oberon" is the best of them.

The singing of Mrs. Henschel furnished pleasurable delight. She is charming in appearance, an artiste of exquisite taste and of perfection in vocal art. There are few, if any, who can compare with her in the singing of songs and ballads which come within her reach. She does not attempt more, and therefore succeeds in captivating her hearers. She is claimed as a Bostonione, and it may truly be said that Boston is very proud of her. She was recalled again and again after each song.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Mr. C. A. Ellis has arranged with Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel to give a series of six concerts in Chickering hall next season.

THE D'ALBERT RECITALS.

The three pianoforte recitals last week in Music hall by Eugen D'Albert have not been of that exciting character to which the public has been accustomed this season from virtuosi whose unquestioned genius he has conspicuously surpassed in that "infinite capacity for taking pains" that may cause, for example, the "three great B's" to be remembered long after such unique and charming personalities in musical art as Chopin, Liszt and Rubinstein are forgotten.

There are important reasons why such pianoforte playing as has been heard from D'Albert during the past week should receive the highest praise. That he possesses a technique that is simply colossal, that it is a broader and stronger technique than any that has been witnessed here this season, that it is almost equally responsive to the most delicate requirements though more prominently obedient to the most powerful demands, would not alone entitle him to the unrivalled reputation that he enjoys among musicians. In fact, it will not be seriously questioned that the superb technique of our latest "greatest pianist among musicians" is his least praiseworthy possession, although it is all the more worthy of admiration in that it is used so subserviently as a means. Eugen D'Albert is certainly at his best in works which not only make heavy demands on the fingers but which strongly appeal to the intellect and feelings. Apart from mechanism, he seems to be imbued with dramatic feeling, sense of contrast and imaginative power.

His programme for Monday afternoon was devoted to Beethoven and included 32 Variations in C minor, Sonata in C major, op. 53 (Allegro con brio—introduzione [illegible]), Sonata in E minor, op. 90, (allegro [illegible]—moderato cantabile), Sonata in E major, op. 109 (Introduzione, prestissimo, aria con variazione), Sonata in A-flat major, op. 110 (moderato, presto non tanto, aria e fuga).

The variations were given in a most finished and refined manner, while the Sonata, op. 53, was expounded with wonderful clearness, and a devotion to detail that avoided all pedantry in the heartfelt expression with which it was all accomplished. The sonatas, op. 109 and op. 110, were performed with a clear intellectual grasp and an easy command of their formidable difficulties.

On Wednesday afternoon the programme was:

Prelude and Fugue in D major..Bach-D'Albert
Sonata, Op. 78..........................Beethoven
Allegro non troppo—Presto assai.
15 Variations sérieuses, Op. 54....Mendelssohn
Suite in D minor, Op. 91...........................Raff
Introduzione e Fuga
Giga con Variazioni.
Cavatina.
Marcia.
Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 3................Schubert
Valse, "Man lebt nur einmal"...Strauss-Tausig
Liebestraum, No. 3 } .... Liszt
Rhapsodie Espagnole }
(Folies d'Espagne e Jota Arragonesa)

Splendid insight and judgment combined with technical attainments of the highest order were the prevailing characteristics of the recital. His performance of the Mendelssohn Variations was simply perfect, and with the Raff Suite, too, it would not seem that the great artist could possibly have been surpassed. With the Liszt pieces the recital brilliantly ended. As a performer of Liszt's music Mr. D'Albert, with a left hand so proficient that it seems a second right, and with the other great essentials that a modern pianist requires, unquestionably has a splendid place. His climaxes are superb, and not only in the most boisterous tempests of the Lisztean music, but in the gentlest echoes of sound, he invariably holds his audience as if by magic.

The third concert was given yesterday afternoon, and the same wonderful ability was displayed. Mr. D'Albert will always find appreciation in a Boston audience.

C. L. CAPEN.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 24.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

The Symphony Concert.

Last evening the twenty-fourth and last concert of the eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall. The programme was Symphony G major (No. 13 B. & H. edition), Haydn; Concerto for violin, Paganini; and Symphony No. 1, C-minor, Brahms. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist. The audience was very large and filled even every available bit of standing room. When Mr. Nikisch came to the conductor's stand, he was received with cordial and prolonged applause. The Haydn Symphony was admirably read and was played in a clean cut and sympathetic maner. The tempi were excellent throughout. The delightful work was, on the whole, one of the most satisfying performances of the season. The Brahms symphony was given with much richness and variety of tone color, and with remarkable sustained fire. Occasionally there was a noisiness that caused the music to become obscure, but taken altogether, the rendering was interesting and highly effective. Mr. Kneisel played the concerto with exquisite finish and purity of style, and with faultless taste. The technical difficulties were overcome with apparent ease, and the force and elegance of the whole were charming. The performance was greeted with tremendous applause, and the artist received five of the stormiest recalls we have ever heard in Music Hall, and was presented with a huge wreath and some flowers.

The season just closed was, on the whole, less interesting than any of its predecessors, and it has witnessed a steady deterioration in the efficiency of the orchestra. The programmes were, with but few exceptions, weak. The music that was heard for the first time at these concerts consisted of: A Suite by Tschaikowski, the prelude to "Cavalleria Rusticana;" "Don Juan," by Strauss; Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture; Svensden's "Carnival in Paris; a suite by Mr. E. A. MacDowell; a Concerto for strings and wind, by Handel; a prelude and fugue, by Florsheim; a symphonic suite, by F. B. Busoni; Tschaikowski's "Hamlet" overture; Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" suite; a violin concerto, by Mr. C. M. Loeffler; Dvorak's symphony No. 4; and Bruch's violin concerto No. 3. The soloists were: Mad. Nordica, Mr. A. Grunfeld, Mr. F. B. Busoni, Miss Marguerite Hall, Paderewski, Mad. Fursch-Madi, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mr. W. Winch, Mr. W. H. Sherwood, Mad. Camille Urso, Mr. E. D'Albert, Mad. Joachim, Mrs. Georg Henschel, and for the "Manfred" music Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman, Mr. W. Heinrich, Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. G. S. Lamson, Mr. Sargent, and Mr. I. Morawski. The members of the orchestra who appeared as soloists were Mr. A. Schroeder, Mr. C. M. Loeffler, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. C. Molé, Mr. H. Schuecker, and Mr. F. Kneisel.

The performances of the orchestra were never up to the splendid standard to which Mr. Gericke had brought them. In fact, since his departure, the fine state of discipline in which he left it has slowly but surely degenerated. Its attack has become ragged, its precision has to a great extent disappeared, and its perfect finish of style has fallen away to a painful roughness. Delicate gradations of tone color have become almost unknown to it and its characteristic has, to a great extent, become noise. These evils have been supplemented by the extraordinary manner in which Mr. Nikisch has seen fit to "improve" the older masters by foisting upon their music new and incongruous readings. It would appear that he can only view music through an operatic medium, and the result is that a cantabile in a symphony or in a concert overture is distorted by the devices peculiar to the opera tenor or the opera prima donna. In other words Mr. Nikisch seems to be unable to resist indulging in a ritardando whenever the temptation offers, and the effect is invariably the vulgarizing of the music. In his propensity to give a new aspect to an old work at any cost, he boldly disregards the composer's express directions and subjects him to unwarrantable indignity. His treatment of the opening of the Mozart symphony in G-minor, and of the opening of the Mendelssohn Scotch symphony, are flagrant instances of his predilections in this direction. Another of his peculiarities is to find some unimportant passage given by the composer to the second violins or the violas, and to bring it into a prominence manifestly never meant, but which wholly disturbs the balance of effect originally intended, and causes the theme to give way to a mere accompaniment. This tasteless and inartistic fumbling with great masterpieces is not the result of musicianly conscience or of fine art feeling, and to the thoughtful observer, charitably inclined, it looks more like ignorance and presumption than anything else. We have expressed our sentiments so frequently and so freely on this fever of Mr. Nikisch to compress the giants of musical art into a space only fitted to hold a dwarf, that it would be supererogation to dwell at any greater length on the subject. We have not been singular in the views we have held regarding the liberties taken by him with the great masters. The bulk of reputable critical opinion has set steadily in the same direction that we have held. In fact, criticism has seldom been so thoroughly in accord has it has been this season regarding the performances of the orchestra and the eccentricities of its conductor. It is but just to state, however, that Mr. F. P. Bacon and Mr. W. F. Apthorp have been in harmonious companionship on the other side.

We recall clearly that now and then we felt it our duty to censure even Mr. Gericke for some innovations he made in respect to the tempi of certain works, but he never indulged in such radical misreadings as those of which Mr. Nikisch is constantly guilty, and which wholly change the character of the music. We have also found fault with Mr. Gericke for over much of rigidity in respect to style, but this shortcoming may be more easily pardoned than can the wild looseness of style into which Mr. Nikisch falls much too frequently. After all, there is nothing perfect under the sun; but there are degrees in all things, and the few faults of Mr. Gericke, even at their worst, were far less misleading and inexcusable than are those of Mr. Nikisch, and, moreover, he disciplined his orchestra to a point that entitled it to rank among the finest in the world.

If this noble orchestra is to fulfil its mission as an educator, some change in the course that has been pursued during the past three years is necessary. Its playing should be restored to the high plane of efficiency in which it was left at the end of Mr. Gericke's term, and the works of the master composers of the era before Wagner imposed his baleful influence on musical art should be read and performed as they were written. The music of to-day gives the conductor ample opportunity to gratify his wildest aspirations for the noisy and the bizarre, and to this he should be content to confine his taste for the new and the novel. Here there is a full opening for baton flourishing of every description, and for permitting the conductor to glorify himself at the expense of the composer. Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann, however, should be treated with respectful homage, and conducted with dignity. If their music does not sound like the high-seasoned music of our time, it is because they wrote when music had not sunk into sensationalism; and to shower pepper and other pungent spices on it by way of giving it a modern flavor, in order that callous palates may be made to tingle, is to be disloyal to art. To mar a beautiful statue is scarcely less reprehensible than to break it. Let us hear the master musicians as they made it clear they wished to be heard. If a conductor has ideas that he is ambitious to illustrate, let him write a symphony or a suite or an overture, and give full vent in it to the music that is in him. It would be infinitely better than to doctor the works of the immortals. We understand that Mr. Nikisch does not read any of the criticisms that are written about him. This is to be regretted, for no man is above criticism, and least of all a comparatively young man on the threshold of a career in which his experience has not been large. We are convinced that if he were to give some of his valuable time to reading and reflecting on the more serious criticisms that are made on him, he could hardly fail to learn something useful from them, and would avoid the mistakes into which he heedlessly falls through inexperience and over-confidence. He might not increase the esteem in which his warmest admirers hold him; but he would win the esteem of those who wish heartily for justification to join the ranks of his warmest admirers.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert gave three pianoforte recitals in Music Hall on the afternoons of Monday, Wednesday and Saturday. The attendance was not large on any of these occasions, but that may be accounted for on the ground that the musical public had been surfeited with piano playing. The Monday recital was devoted wholly to Beethoven, when the thirty-two variations in C, and the sonatas, op. 53, op. 90, op. 109 and op. 110, were given. Mr. D'Albert is a remarkably fine Beethoven player, and though four sonatas in one concert make a severe tax on the hearer, it may be frankly conceded that the artist's reading and performance of them kept the interest of his audience thoroughly absorbed. We have heard the variations when they were given with a arger variety of expression than D'Albert accorded them; but in point of technique, his rendering of them was literally perfect. The sonatas were magnificently played, though we could have wished a more discreet use of the loud pedal, and we must confess that the "Waldstein" sonata is becoming somewhat hackneyed and wearisome from too frequent repetition. At Wednesday's recital Mr. D'Albert vouchsafed some of the finest playing we have heard this season; and in fact, we are inclined to rank him as the most musicianly of the great pianists who have visited us recently. His technique is fully as wonderful as is that of any of his eminent rivals, and he has in addition a broader and more eclectic style than they have. In his arrangement of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D, he gave one of the most amazing exhibitions of technique that the season has brought forth. We did not greatly admire his performance of the Mendelssohn "Variations Serieuses," op. 54. He fell into the same fault here that marked his playing of the Beethoven variations at the previous recital, giving them in a colorless and perfunctory manner, except in the fourteenth variation which was exquisitely read. In the Raff Suite, op. 91, an over-long and not steadily interesting work, his playing of the Gigue with variations was astonishing in its virtuosity. A lovely performance of the Schubert Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3, was among the delightful features of this recital. His rendering of the Strauss-Tausig waltz, "Man lebt nur enimal" was another marvellous display of finger gymnastics, but it was also fully as admirable in the grace and the variety of expression with which he invested it. The most astonishing bit of technique, however, was his performance of the Rubinstein octave study. It was dazzling in its brilliancy, but here again, the intelligent musician was not sunk in the mere virtuoso. Yesterday's recital was, perhaps, the best of the three. The artist was seen in a wider variety of styles, his programme represented Bach, Mozart, Chopin, Brahms, Rubinstein and Liszt. The conclusion to be drawn from these recitals is that D'Albert if not equal in singing quality of tone and tender warmth of sentiment to Paderewski and Pachmann, is stronger than either of them in versatility of styles, manliness of expression and intellectuality. In common with them, he has a tremendous technique, but he subordinates it to the composer. It must be owned that in the purely graceful he is not wholly at home, but the fire and passion of his playing are irresistible. He is not an artist who makes an immediate impression on his hearers. That was evidenced by these recitals, for at the first he was listened to coolly, and was not applauded with any special heartiness. At the second recital his audience was more deeply interested, and broke forth frequently into loud applause, while yesterday the ice was completely broken, and he excited a genuine enthusiasm.

The season of the Handel and Haydn Society closed last Sunday evening with a performance of Haydn's "The Creation." The chorus admirably sustained its fine record of the season, acquitting itself with precision, excellent discretion in respect to light and shade, and smoothness and efficiency generally. Mr. Lloyd was in better voice than he was in the previous performances, though he had not wholly recovered from his severe cold. His musical phrasing, the purity of his taste, and the artistic dignity that invariably distinguish his singing, made it a delight to listen to it. His reading of "In Native Worth" was notably beautiful. Mr. M. W. Whitney was also heard to marked advantage in his solos, though we could have wished for something more of warmth in point of style, and could have spared one of the innovating descents to the lowest depths of his voice. Madam Albani has sung here with more satisfying results than were attained by her in the soprano solos. Over many liberties were taken with the tempi, her phrasing was not always judicious, and too much of an operatic color was given to the music by retarding and pauses. If the oratorio should be given again, it would be well to omit the third part, which is weak and uninteresting in comparison with what goes before, particularly in connection with the almost didactic goody-goodiness of Adam and Eve. The season, on the whole, has been highly creditable to the society in every direction.

DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 25, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

It was rather a peculiar programme for the end of a season, for it gave a rather simple symphony for its first number, and a very abstruse one for its finale. The Haydn symphony in G, No. 13 of Breitkopf & Haertel's edition, presented a few of the faults to which we are beginning to become accustomed; the first violins were too violent in the first movement, and the contrasts were a trifle too brusque. Apart from these defects the performance was a notably good one; the largo was full of breadth and true legato effects, the trio of the minuet had just the right Musette effect with its characteristic drone-bass, and the geniality of the chief theme of the finale was excellently caught up. The tempi also call for praise; a Haydn allegro is not like a modern one, and a largo is not greatly different from an andante of the present; this conservative application of terms Mr. Nikisch seemed to appreciate and the result was a good one which deserved the liberal recognition it received.

Not so the Brahms symphony (which however was equally applauded) for in this there was much that differed radically from the accepted readings. Messrs. Henschel and Gericke may both be accepted as having the sanction of the composer in their readings, and neither of them made such a drawl of the beginning of the pizzicato phrase of the finale, or such a tumult of the coda. Perhaps this very fact won more applause for the work than it has ever received here before, for even in a symphony audience there are many, too many, who can be caught by blatancy. Let the orchestra play the hurly-burly which ends the "Peer Gynt" suite or an arrangement of a Liszt rhapsody, and they will win still greater applause. The encomiums of a large miscellaneous audience are not always a safe guide save to pecuniary results. Yet at the end of the season it is but justice to pay tribute to the virilty of much of the work; it is a good quality in itself, but it is a pity that it has so often led into the bizarre and sensational. Mr. Nikisch breathes the atmosphere of the footlights into the pure realm of classical music, and loss of perfect ensemble is a high price to pay for vigorous treatment.

The hero of the concert, however, was the soloist, Mr. Franz Kneisel. He played the Paganini Concerto in D, in such a manner that he was recalled four times amid an enthusiasm seldom seen in these concerts recently. Judged from the technical standpoint the work was well nigh perfect. The only point of adverse criticism that could be made was that the harmonics were not broad enough. But the rapid double-stopping, the high positions, the swift scale work, the difficult skips, the broad theme on the G string, the trying cadenza (composed by the player himself) and in short, the various points of virtuosity and bravura with which the work fairly bristles were overcome in noble style. But at the end of it all the musician finds himself asking, was it all worth the doing? Reduced to hard fact, and stripped of all its glitter, the work has nothing musical to say; it is in violin music what "Bel Raggio" is in vocal; it is a great display of tonal fireworks. Paganini was not a musician, he was only a virtuoso, and the whole difficult work sinks out of sight when compared with Bruch's G minor concerto, or even the well-worn violin concerto by Mendelssohn. The French and Belgian school of technicalities have led to a high grade of execution, but they have also led away from the true beauty and expressive power of the noblest of instruments. Bach's Chaconne teaches us the lesson that technical difficulty is not incompatible with musical ideas. Paganini's work shows us on the contrary, that it is possible and even easy, to win a popular triumph by bravura alone, and that musical thought is not absolutely essential to violin music. It is, however, certain that Mr. Kneisel by his performance, proved himself a giant in the technique of his instrument.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The D'Albert Recital.

Eugen d'Albert gave his third and final piano recital of the season in Boston to a large audience in Music Hall, Saturday afternoon, and left the hall with the pleasant din of applause, vigorously, even enthusiastically given, ringing in his ears. The programme was such a one as Paderewski has delighted in giving us, and was made up of a mingling of the romantic with the flowery or bravura type. Without detracting in the slightest from M. d'Albert's performance, it may be said that not a little of the pleasure of the occasion was yielded by the instrument. That the attachment of all these master pianists for a particular make of pianos, induced by weighty consideration, has a disagreeable taste to those who see something of a surrender of art in it, is easily understood, and yet in the case of the Knabe piano, which D'Albert has engaged to use on his tours, the objection undoubtedly loses a great deal of its force. The one used last Saturday was a noble instrument indeed, and responded with equal expression in the most pianissimo passages as in the heaviest melody-fraught arpeggios.

The first number, Bach's Suite Anglaise, No. 6, was a brilliantly performed introduction to a brilliant programme, and Mozart's light and rapid rondo in A minor followed and then Brahms' soulful rhapsodie, op. 79, No. 2, admirably rendered and warmly received. The longest number was the sonata in B minor, Chopin's op. 58, in four movements, delightfully comprehensive and musical. The familiar barcarolle in A minor, by Rubinstein, and a Liszt selection of three pieces, the brief and tender Sonetto di Petrarca, "Feux Follets" etude, and the tarantelle, "Napoli," closed the afternoon.

Music Notes.

The Musical Courier, in the criticism of the D'Albert recitals in New York, says: "Mr. D'Albert was more than ably aided by the magnificent Knabe grand he played upon. Its singing qualities were as mellow as Lassalle's most mellow baritone notes, it thundered when d'Albert smote it in Liszt's brilliant pyrotechnics, and it responded perfectly to the delicate embroidery of Chopin's pearly runs. It was a remarkable instrument; Messrs. Knabe & Sons can congratulate themselves on that point."

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, APRIL 24, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-THIRD CONCERT.

The twenty-third concert by the Symphony orchestra was given in Music hall Saturday, April 16. The programme:

Schumann.	Symphony No. 1, in B flat, op. 38. Andante un poco maestoso.—Allegro molto vivace.—Larghetto—Scherzo, molto vivace with Trio I. & Trio II.—Allegro animato e grazioso.
Handel.	Aria. "Alessandro."
Henschel.	Suite from the Music to Shakespeare's "Hamlet," op.50.
(First performance in America. Conducted by the Composer.)
Massenet.	Aria from "Herodiade."
Weber.	Overture. "Oberon."

Soloist: Mrs. Georg Henschel.

The Schumann Spring symphony is, perhaps, the most melodiously beautiful of all this celebrated author's compositions. We are told it was written at that happy period of his life, on the eve of his marriage with that remarkable woman and renowned pianist, Clara Wiek. He had met with great opposition from the stern old father, because he looked upon Schumann as a nobody who had never done anything, and, in his opinion, never would. Schumann, put to his mettle, composed this symphony and, through its beauties and success, gained the father's consent to marry the daughter. This music is such as to prove attractive to all classes of music lovers. There seems to be no use in expending powder on Mr. Nikisch's overwrought, bombastic, brass-band noise, for he does not heed the united efforts of the critics who have kindly suggested that he modify his ideas and discriminate between mere noise and music. However, as most of the critics are consistent, they will continue to offer their advice and no doubt Mr. Nikisch will continue to disregard it. The first movement of the symphony was not entirely ruined by sensational effects, though it was too demonstrative to prove as effective as it might under a more conservative director: It is not in the nature of Mr. Nikisch to be anything but demonstrative, except in his pianoforte accompaniments, which are truly models of elegant refinement. The lovely second movement was delightfully played, and deserves all possible praise. The scherzo, also, was given a very fair representation, giving real pleasure to the general listener. It is bright, lively and effective. The fourth movement, allegro animato, requires vigorous treatment by the orchestra, and it received it; aye, more than this, it was boisterous in the extreme. A little more subdued calmness would have commanded more attention and represented more truthfully the music in hand.

With due respect for Mr. Henschel's ability as musician and composer, we were not particularly pleased with this Suite of his. Without doubt the music is far more beautiful when presented in connection with the accessory stage effects, and it is, perhaps, unfair to speak without first hearing it in this connection; but if a composer puts his music before the public regardless of fitness, he must accept the consequences.

The Oberon overture was splendidly played, without cause for faultfinding. All of Weber's overtures are delightful as music, and "Oberon" is the best of them.

The singing of Mrs. Henschel furnished pleasurable delight. She is charming in appearance, an artiste of exquisite taste and of perfection in vocal art. There are few, if any, who can compare with her in the singing of songs and ballads which come within her reach. She does not attempt more, and therefore succeeds in captivating her hearers. She is claimed as a Bostonione, and it may truly be said that Boston is very proud of her. She was recalled again and again after each song.

JAMES M. TRACY.

* * *

Mr. O. A. Ellis has arranged with Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel to give a series of six concerts in Chickering hall next season.

THE D'ALBERT RECITALS.

The three pianoforte recitals last week in Music hall by Eugen D'Albert have not been of that exciting character to which the public has been accustomed this season from virtuosi whose unquestioned genius he has conspicuously surpassed in that "infinite capacity for taking pains" that may cause, for example, the "three great B's" to be remembered long after such unique and charming personalities in musical art as Chopin, Liszt and Rubinstein are forgotten.

There are important reasons why such pianoforte playing as has been heard from D'Albert during the past week should receive the highest praise. That he possesses a technique that is simply colossal, that it is a broader and stronger technique than any that has been witnessed here this season, that it is almost equally responsive to the most delicate requirements though more prominently obedient to the most powerful demands, would not alone entitle him to the unrivalled reputation that he enjoys among musicians. In fact, it will not be seriously questioned that the superb technique of our latest "greatest pianist among musicians" is his least praiseworthy possession, although it is all the more worthy of admiration in that it is used so subserviently as a means. Eugen D'Albert is certainly at his best in works which not only make heavy demands on the fingers but which strongly appeal to the intellect and feelings. Apart from mechanism, he seems to be imbued with dramatic feeling, sense of contrast and imaginative power.

His programme for Monday afternoon was devoted to Beethoven and included 32 Variations in C minor, Sonata in C major, op. 53, (allegro con brio—introduzione e rondo), Sonata in E minor, op. 90, (allegro moderato—moderato cantabile), Sonata in E major, op. 109 (introduzione, prestissimo, aria con variazione), Sonata in A-flat major, op. 110 (moderato, presto non tanto, aria e fuga).

The variations were given in a most finished and refined manner, while the Sonata, op. 53, was expounded with wonderful clearness, and a devotion to detail that avoided all pedantry in the heartfelt expression with which it was all accomplished. The sonatas, op. 109 and op. 110, were performed with a clear intellectual grasp and an easy command of their formidable difficulties.

On Wednesday afternoon the programme was:

Prelude and Fugue in D major	Bach-D'Albert
Sonata, Op. 78	Beethoven
Allegro non troppo—Presto assai.
15 Variations sérieuses, Op. 54	Mendelssohn
Suite in D minor, Op. 91 Introduzione e Fuga Giga con Variazioni. Cavatina. Marcia.	Raff
Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 3	Schubert
Valse, "Man lebt nur einmal"	Strauss-Tausig
Liebestraum, No. 3 Rhapsodie Espagnole (Folies d'Espagne e Jota Arragonesa)	Liszt

Splendid insight and judgment combined with technical attainments of the highest order were the prevailing characteristics of the recital. His performance of the Mendelssohn Variations was simply perfect, and with the Raff Suite, too, it would not seem that the great artist could possibly have been surpassed. With the Liszt pieces the recital brilliantly ended. As a performer of Liszt's music Mr. D'Albert, with a left hand so proficient that it seems a second right, and with the other great essentials that a modern pianist requires, unquestionably has a splendid place. His climaxes are superb, and not only in the most boisterous tempests of the Lisztean music, but in the gentlest echoes of sound, he invariably holds his audience as if by magic.

The third concert was given yesterday afternoon, and the same wonderful ability was displayed. Mr. D'Albert will always find appreciation in a Boston audience.

C. L. CAPEN.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 24.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

The Symphony Concert.

Last evening the twenty-fourth and last concert of the eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall. The programme was Symphony G major (No. 13 B. & H. edition), Haydn; Concerto for violin, Paganini; and Symphony No. 1, C minor, Brahms. Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist. The audience was very large and filled even every available bit of standing room. When Mr. Nikisch came to the conductor's stand, he was received with cordial and prolonged applause. The Haydn Symphony was admirably read and was played in a clean cut and sympathetic maner. The tempi were excellent throughout. The delightful work was, on the whole, one of the most satisfying performances of the season. The Brahms symphony was given with much richness and variety of tone color, and with remarkable sustained fire. Occasionally there was a noisiness that caused the music to become obscure, but taken altogether, the rendering was interesting and highly effective. Mr. Kneisel played the concerto with exquisite finish and purity of style, and with faultless taste. The technical difficulties were overcome with apparent ease, and the force and elegance of the whole were charming. The performance was greeted with tremendous applause, and the artist received five of the stormiest recalls we have ever heard in Music Hall, and was presented with a huge wreath and some flowers.

The season just closed was, on the whole, less interesting than any of its predecessors, and it has witnessed a steady deterioration in the efficiency of the orchestra. The programmes were, with but few exceptions, weak. The music that was heard for the first time at these concerts consisted of: A Suite by Tschaikowski, the prelude to "Cavalleria Rusticana;" "Don Juan," by Strauss; Lalo's "Le Roi d'Ys" overture; Svensden's "Carnival in Paris; a suite by Mr. E. A. MacDowell; a Concerto for strings and wind, by Handel; a prelude and fugue, by Florsheim; a symphonic suite, by F. B. Busoni; Tschaikowski's "Hamlet" overture; Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" suite; a violin concerto, by Mr. C. M. Loeffler; Dvorak's symphony No. 4; and Bruch's violin concerto No. 3. The soloists were: Mad. Nordica, Mr. A. Grunfeld, Mr. F. B. Busoni, Miss Marguerite Hall, Paderewski, Mad. Fursch-Madi, Mrs. H. H. A. Beach, Mr. W. Winch, Mr. W. H. Sherwood, Mad. Camille Urso, Mr. E. D'Albert, Mad. Joachim, Mrs. Georg Henschel, and for the "Manfred" music Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman, Mr. W. Heinrich, Mr. H. Meyn, Mr. G. S. Lamson, Mr. Sargent, and Mr. I. Morawski. The members of the orchestra who appeared as soloists were Mr. A. Schroeder, Mr. C. M. Loeffler, Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. C. Molé, Mr. H. Schuecker, and Mr. F. Kneisel.

The performances of the orchestra were never up to the splendid standard to which Mr. Gericke had brought them. In fact, since his departure, the fine state of discipline in which he left it has slowly but surely degenerated. Its attack has become ragged, its precision has to a great extent disappeared, and its perfect finish of style has fallen away to a painful roughness. Delicate gradations of tone color have become almost unknown to it and its characteristic has, to a great extent, become noise. These evils have been supplemented by the extraordinary manner in which Mr. Nikisch has seen fit to "improve" the older masters by foisting upon their music new and incongruous readings. It would appear that he can only view music through an operatic medium, and the result is that a cantabile in a symphony or in a concert overture is distorted by the devices peculiar to the opera tenor or the opera prima donna. In other words Mr. Nikisch seems to be unable to resist indulging in a ritardando whenever the temptation offers, and the effect is invariably the vulgarizing of the music. In his propensity to give a new aspect to an old work at any cost, he boldly disregards the composer's express directions and subjects him to unwarrantable indignity. His treatment of the opening of the Mozart symphony in G minor, and of the opening of the Mendelssohn Scotch symphony, are flagrant instances of his predilections in this direction. Another of his peculiarities is to find some unimportant passage given by the composer to the second violins or the violas, and to bring it into a prominence manifestly never meant, but which wholly disturbs the balance of effect originally intended, and causes the theme to give way to a mere accompaniment. This tasteless and inartistic fumbling with great masterpieces is not the result of musicianly conscience or of fine art feeling, and to the thoughtful observer, charitably inclined, it looks more like ignorance and presumption than anything else. We have expressed our sentiments so frequently and so freely on this fever of Mr. Nikisch to compress the giants of musical art into a space only fitted to hold a dwarf, that it would be supererogation to dwell at any greater length on the subject. We have not been singular in the views we have held regarding the liberties taken by him with the great masters. The bulk of reputable critical opinion has set steadily in the same direction that we have held. In fact, criticism has seldom been so thoroughly in accord has it has been this season regarding the performances of the orchestra and the eccentricities of its conductor. It is but just to state, however, that Mr. F. P. Bacon and Mr. W. F. Apthorp have been in harmonious companionship on the other side.

We recall clearly that now and then we felt it our duty to censure even Mr. Gericke for some innovations he made in respect to the tempi of certain works, but he never indulged in such radical misreadings as those of which Mr. Nikisch is constantly guilty, and which wholly change the character of the music. We have also found fault with Mr. Gericke for over much of rigidity in respect to style, but this shortcoming may be more easily pardoned than can the wild looseness of style into which Mr. Nikisch falls much too frequently. After all, there is nothing perfect under the sun; but there are degrees in all things, and the few faults of Mr. Gericke, even at their worst, were far less misleading and inexcusable than are those of Mr. Nikisch, and, moreover, he disciplined his orchestra to a point that entitled it to rank among the finest in the world.

If this noble orchestra is to fulfil its mission as an educator, some change in the course that has been pursued during the past three years is necessary. Its playing should be restored to the high plane of efficiency in which it was left at the end of Mr. Gericke's term, and the works of the master composers of the era before Wagner imposed his baleful influence on musical art should be read and performed as they were written. The music of to-day gives the conductor ample opportunity to gratify his wildest aspirations for the noisy and the bizarre, and to this he should be content to confine his taste for the new and the novel. Here there is a full opening for baton flourishing of every description, and for permitting the conductor to glorify himself at the expense of the composer. Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert and Schumann, however, should be treated with respectful homage, and conducted with dignity. If their music does not sound like the high-seasoned music of our time, it is because they wrote when music had not sunk into sensationalism; and to shower pepper and other pungent spices on it by way of giving it a modern flavor,, in order that callous palates may be made to tingle, is to be disloyal to art. To mar a beautiful statue is scarcely less reprehensible than to break it. Let us hear the master musicians as they made it clear they wished to be heard. If a conductor has ideas that he is ambitious to illustrate, let him write a symphony or a suite or an overture, and give full vent in it to the music that is in him. It would be infinitely better than to doctor the works of the immortals. We understand that Mr. Nikisch does not read any of the criticisms that are written about him. This is to be regretted, for no man is above criticism, and least of all a comparatively young man on the threshold of a career in which his experience has not been large. We are convinced that if he were to give some of his valuable time to reading and reflecting on the more serious criticisms that are made on him, he could hardly fail to learn something useful from them, and would avoid the mistakes into which he heedlessly falls through inexperience and over-confidence. He might not increase the esteem in which his warmest admirers hold him; but he would win the esteem of those who wish heartily for justification to join the ranks of his warmest admirers.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert gave three pianoforte recitals in Music Hall on the afternoons of Monday, Wednesday and Saturday. The attendance was not large on any of these occasions, but that may be accounted for on the ground that the musical public had been surfeited with piano playing. The Monday recital was devoted wholly to Beethoven, when the thirty-two variations in C, and the sonatas, op. 53, op. 90, op. 109 and op. 110, were given. Mr. D'Albert is a remarkably fine Beethoven player, and though four sonatas in one concert make a severe tax on the hearer, it may be frankly conceded that the artist's reading and performance of them kept the interest of his audience thoroughly absorbed. We have heard the variations when they were given with a larger variety of expression than D'Albert accorded them; but in point of technique, his rendering of them was literally perfect. The sonatas were magnificently played, though we could have wished a more discreet use of the loud pedal, and we must confess that the "Waldstein" sonata is becoming somewhat hackneyed and wearisome from too frequent repetition. At Wednesday's recital Mr. D'Albert vouchsafed some of the finest playing we have heard this season; and in fact, we are inclined to rank him as the most musicianly of the great pianists who have visited us recently. His technique is fully as wonderful as is that of any of his eminent rivals, and he has in addition a broader and more eclectic style than they have. In his arrangement of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D, he gave one of the most amazing exhibitions of technique that the season has brought forth. We did not greatly admire his performance of the Mendelssohn "Variations Serieuses," op. 54. He fell into the same fault here that marked his playing of the Beethoven variations at the previous recital, giving them in a colorless and perfunctory manner, except in the fourteenth variation which was exquisitely read. In the Raff Suite, op. 91, an over-long and not steadily interesting work, his playing of the Gigue with variations was astonishing in its virtuosity. A lovely performance of the Schubert Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3, was among the delightful features of this recital. His rendering of the Strauss-Tausig waltz, "Man lebt nur einmal" was another marvellous display of finger gymnastics, but it was also fully as admirable in the grace and the variety of expression with which he invested it. The most astonishing bit of technique, however, was his performance of the Rubinstein octave study. It was dazzling in its brilliancy, but here again, the intelligent musician was not sunk in the mere virtuoso. Yesterday's recital was, perhaps, the best of the three. The artist was seen in a wider variety of styles, his programme represented Bach, Mozart, Chopin, Brahms, Rubinstein and Liszt. The conclusion to be drawn from these recitals is that D'Albert if not equal in singing quality of tone and tender warmth of sentiment to Paderewski and Pachmann, is stronger than either of them in versatility of style, manliness of expression and intellectuality. In common with them, he has a tremendous technique, but he subordinates it to the composer. It must be owned that in the purely graceful he is not wholly at home, but the fire and passion of his playing are irresistible. He is not an artist who makes an immediate impression on his hearers. That was evidenced by these recitals, for at the first he was listened to coolly, and was not applauded with any special heartiness. At the second recital his audience was more deeply interested, and broke forth frequently into loud applause, while yesterday the ice was completely broken, and he excited a genuine enthusiasm.

The season of the Handel and Haydn Society closed last Sunday evening with a performance of Haydn's "The Creation." The chorus admirably sustained its fine record of the season, acquitting itself with precision, excellent discretion in respect to light and shade, and smoothness and efficiency generally. Mr. Lloyd was in better voice than he was in the previous performances, though he had not wholly recovered from his severe cold. His musical phrasing, the purity of his taste, and the artistic dignity that invariably distinguish his singing, made it a delight to listen to it. His reading of "In Native Worth" was notably beautiful. Mr. M. W. Whitney was also heard to marked advantage in his solos, though we could have wished for something more of warmth in point of style, and could have spared one of the innovating descents to the lowest depths of his voice. Madam Albani has sung here with more satisfying results than were attained by her in the soprano solos. Over many liberties were taken with the tempi, her phrasing was not always judicious, and too much of an operatic color was given to the music by retarding and pauses. If the oratorio should be given again, it would be well to omit the third part, which is weak and uninteresting in comparison with what goes before, particularly in connection with the almost didactic goody-goodiness of Adam and Eve. The season, on the whole, has been highly creditable to the society in every direction.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 25, 1892.

The Symphony Concert.

It was rather a peculiar programme for the end of a season, for it gave a rather simple symphony for its first number, and a very abstruse one for its finale. The Haydn symphony in G, No. 13 of Breitkopf & Haertel's edition, presented a few of the faults to which we are beginning to become accustomed; the first violins were too violent in the first movement, and the contrasts were a trifle too brusque. Apart from these defects the performance was a notably good one; the largo was full of breadth and true legato effects, the trio of the minuet had just the right Musette effect with its characteristic drone-bass, and the geniality of the chief theme of the finale was excellently caught up. The tempi also call for praise; a Haydn allegro is not like a modern one, and a largo is not greatly different from an andante of the present; this conservative application of terms Mr. Nikisch seemed to appreciate and the result was a good one which deserved the liberal recognition it received.

Not so the Brahms symphony (which however was equally applauded) for in this there was much that differed radically from the accepted readings. Messrs. Henschel and Gericke may both be accepted as having the sanction of the composer in their readings, and neither of them made such a drawl of the beginning of the pizzicato phrase of the finale, or such a tumult of the coda. Perhaps this very fact won more applause for the work than it has ever received here before, for even in a symphony audience there are many, too many, who can be caught by blatancy. Let the orchestra play the hurly-burly which ends the "Peer Gynt" suite or an arrangement of a Liszt rhapsody, and they will win still greater applause. The encomiums of a large miscellaneous audience are not always a safe guide save to pecuniary results. Yet at the end of the season it is but justice to pay tribute to the virilty of much of the work; it is a good quality in itself, but it is a pity that it has so often led into the bizarre and sensational. Mr. Nikisch breathes the atmosphere of the footlights into the pure realm of classical music, and loss of perfect ensemble is a high price to pay for vigorous treatment.

The hero of the concert, however, was the soloist, Mr. Franz Kneisel. He played the Paganini Concerto in D, in such a manner that he was recalled four times amid an enthusiasm seldom seen in these concerts recently. Judged from the technical standpoint the work was well nigh perfect. The only point of adverse criticism that could be made was that the harmonics were not broad enough. But the rapid double-stopping, the high positions, the swift scale work, the difficult skips, the broad theme on the G string, the trying cadenza (composed by the player himself) and in short, the various points of virtuosity and bravura with which the work fairly bristles were overcome in noble style. But at the end of it all the musician finds himself asking, was it all worth the doing? Reduced to hard fact, and stripped of all its glitter, the work has nothing musical to say; it is in violin music what "Bel Raggio" is in vocal; it is a great display of tonal fireworks. Paganini was not a musician, he was only a virtuoso, and the whole difficult work sinks out of sight when compared with Bruch's G minor concerto, or even the well-worn violin concerto by Mendelssohn. The French and Belgian school of technicalities have led to a high grade of execution, but they have also led away from the true beauty and expressive power of the noblest of instruments. Bach's Chaconne teaches us the lesson that technical difficulty is not incompatible with musical ideas. Paganini's work shows us on the contrary, that it is possible and even easy, to win a popular triumph by bravura alone, and that musical thought is not absolutely essential to violin music. It is, however, certain that Mr. Kneisel by his performance, proved himself a giant in the technique of his instrument.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

The D'Albert Recital.

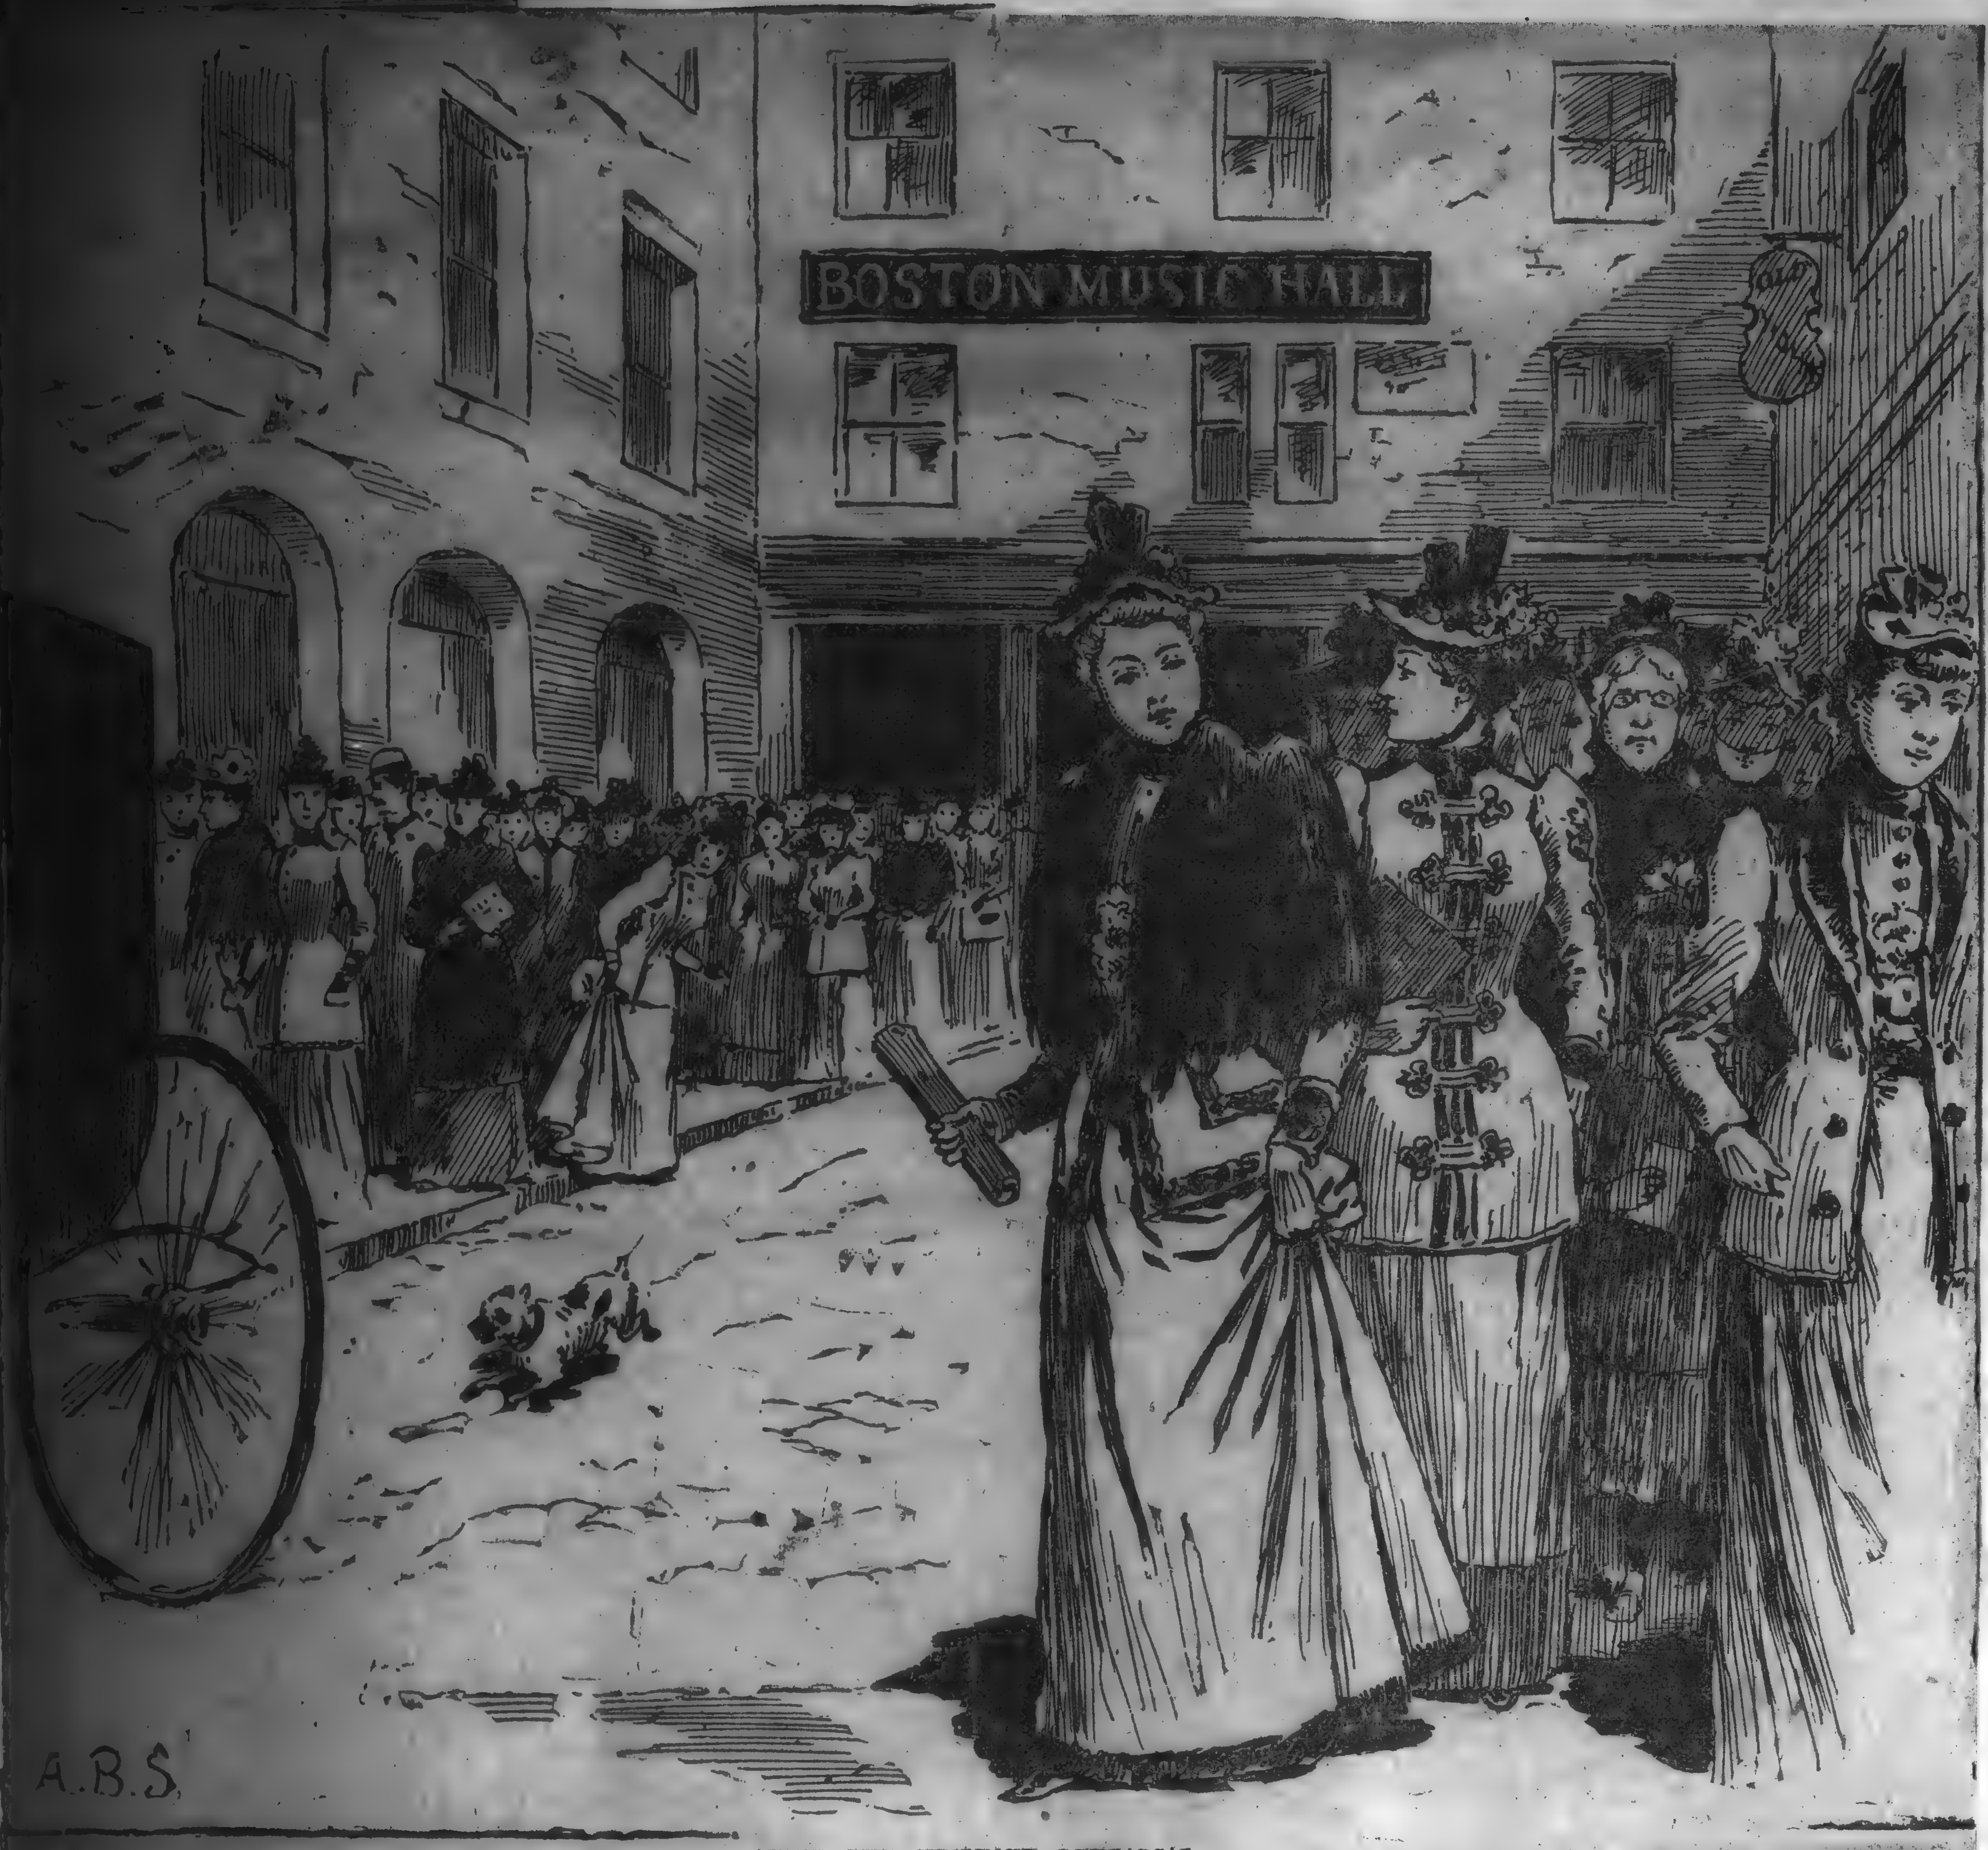
Eugen d'Albert gave his third and final piano recital of the season in Boston to a large audience in Music Hall, Saturday afternoon, and left the hall with the pleasant din of applause, vigorously, even enthusiastically given, ringing in his ears. The programme was such a one as Paderewski has delighted in giving us, and was made up of a mingling of the romantic with the flowery or bravura type. Without detracting in the slightest from M. d'Albert's performance, it may be said that not a little of the pleasure of the occasion was yielded by the instrument. That the attachment of all these master pianists for a particular make of pianos, induced by a weighty consideration, has a disagreeable taste to those who see something of a surrender of art in it, is easily understood, and yet in the case of the Knabe piano, which D'Albert has engaged to use on his tours, the objection undoubtedly loses a great deal of its force. The one used last Saturday was a noble instrument indeed, and responded with equal expression in the most pianissimo passages as in the heaviest melody-fraught arpeggios.

The first number, Bach's Suite Anglaise, No. 6, was a brilliantly performed introduction to a brilliant programme, and Mozart's light and rapid rondo in A minor followed and then Brahms' soulful rhapsodie, op. 79, No. 2, admirably rendered and warmly received. The longest number was the sonata in B minor, Chopin's op. 58, in four movements, delightfully comprehensive and musical. The familiar barcarolle in A minor, by Rubinstein, and a Liszt selection of three pieces, the brief and tender Sonetto di Petrarca, "Feux Follets" etude, and the tarantelle, "Napoli," closed the afternoon.

Music Notes.

The Musical Courier, in the criticism of the D'Albert recitals in New York, says: "Mr. D'Albert was more than ably aided by the magnificent Knabe grand he played upon. Its singing qualities were as mellow as Lassalle's most mellow baritone notes, it thundered when d'Albert smote it in Liszt's brilliant pyrotechnics, and it responded perfectly to the delicate embroidery of Chopin's pearly runs. It was a remarkable instrument; Messrs. Knabe & Sons can congratulate themselves on that point."

[illegible]
[illegible] EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 115.
SUNDAY, APRIL 24, 1892.



AFTER THE SYMPHONY REHEARSAL.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 24th and last of the 11th season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction.

Haydn's symphony in C major made the first number of the programme, and its simple, but tuneful and most enjoyable movements were splendidly played throughout.

Mr. Kneisel was the soloist, and this faithful, devoted artist, to whom so much of the good work of the string players is due, has good reason for pride in the spontaneous and hearty enthusiasm shown in the greeting given him as he stepped to the soloists' stand to begin his performance of the concerto for violin and orchestra, in D major, by Paganini.

It would be difficult to imagine a better performance of the difficult solo movements of this composition, which included the additions by Wilhelmj, than that given by Mr. Kneisel, for in tone, technical perfection, expression and brilliancy his playing called for the highest commendation. It was withal such an unassuming display of virtuosity that a distinct added charm was given to the performnance, and, all in all, the honest merit of Mr. Kneisel's work fully warranted the ovation which rewarded his efforts, the applause continuing until he had repeatedly bowed his acknowledgments.

Mr. Kneisel's associates gave him splendid support throughout the concerto, and that these men were keenly alive to the excellence of their leader's playing was fully demonstrated by the hearty way in which they joined in the demonstration in his honor.

The concert ended with a performance of Mr. Brahms' mistake, or, as it has sometimes been called the "Tenth" symphony. It is curious how a reputation once gained will cling to an individual or thing. It is quite likely that when this symphony was first produced its composer prepared an analysis of what he thought he had written, and that the critic who called it the "Tenth" missed his car, or fell asleep, or something, and was compelled to write about it without having heard it at all. Probably feeling sure from the analysis that no one would know what its composer was driving at, and well knowing that overpraise escapes criticism easier than censure, he dubbed Brahms the successor of Beethoven, and went home and slept peacefully.

There is one thing about the repeated performances of Mr. Brahms' first symphony that should be attended to. Admitting that it is a revelation of beauties in musical construction and orchestral treatment, that it is the work of a master musician which repays all the study demanded to understand its algebraical combinations, and that to decry its merits is to admit ignorance: admitting all these things, how is the great public to be educated upon these points, unless the doors of the hall are locked and guarded by officers familiar with the treatment of insanity?

[illegible] serious question for Mr. Nikisch to consider. The asylums for the weak and [illegible] of mind are already overcrowded. [illegible] this class of patients even if [illegible] Brahms symphony does get a gene- [illegible] the adoption of the "once in [illegible] series that have been so successful [illegible] the Lowell Institute lectures.

[illegible] announced that the opening concert [illegible] season will be given [illegible] Oct. 15.

D'ALBERT'S FAREWELL.

Eugen D'Albert, the pianist, made his farewell appearance before his Boston admirers at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, and upon this occasion he prepared the most interesting of all the programmes in which he has been heard here.

The compositions chosen were the "Suite Anglaise," No. 6, Bach; the rondo in A minor, Mozart; the rhapsodie, Op. 79, No. 2, Brahms; the sonata in B minor, Op. 58, Chopin; the barcarolle in A minor, Rubinstein; and "Sonetto di Petrarca," "Feux Follets etude, and the tarentelle, "Napoli," Liszt.

The player was heard at his best in this most interesting list of compositions, and his audience was held spell-bound by the masterly interpretations given the several numbers. He was made the recipient of a grand ovation as he ended his programme, and leaves behind him a fine reputation as a masterly pianist and musician.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The sixth annual tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, follows immediately upon the conclusion of its Boston series of 24 public rehearsals and concerts, the organization leaving Boston for Philadelphia this Sunday evening. It is well known that the regular season of the orchestra just now ended has exceeded in its financial success that of any known since its establishment 11 years ago, and this fact, viewed in the light of the unprecedented competition it has been forced to meet is uncontrovertible evidence of the high artistic standard maintained in all its appearances and also of the great popularity of its accomplished conductor.

The substantial character of the indorsement of the Boston orchestra is well shown also by the limited financial risk assumed in the coming tour, despite the fact that the organization will travel with 81 people, mainly by special trains, and with such soloists as Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Eugen D'Albert. With the exception of three concerts, a handsome surplus over the expense is guaranteed for every appearance of the orchestra throughout the tour, a fact that removes any doubt as to the value of the organization in the estimation of the musical publics in all the leading eastern cities.

In the arrangement of the tours of this orchestra care has always been taken to make the travel as easy as possible for the men independent of any question of expense, and Manager Charles A. Ellis, who has been identified with the organization from its formation, has again been so successful that only five nights in the three weeks will be passed on the road. As in former years, Manager Ellis, whose executive ability has put him in the front rank of his associates in this country, goes in advance of the orchestra, and his able assistant, Mr. Fred R. Comee, will personally direct the affairs of the tour in charge of the orchestra.

The first week of the tour is utilized in completing the series of concerts announced for the season in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, the engagements in the last named city being of the same character as in the home concerts, a public rehearsal occurring on Friday afternoon and the regular concert on Saturday evening.

On Monday evening, May 2, the orchestra appears in New York at the new Madison Square Concert Hall to afford D'Albert an appearance with the organization in that city, and the first week in May will be given to concerts in Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, O., Cincinnati and Chicago.

The week of May 9 to 14 will be given to one concert each in Grand Rapids, Mich., Ann Arbor, Mich., and Detroit, and a series of three concerts in Pittsburg, Pa. Leaving Pittsburg directly after the concert of Saturday, May 14, the organization returns home, arriving Monday morning, May 16.

It is good evidence in favor of the standing of the orchestra in other cities that these engagements include a fifth annual appearance with the Mozart Club of Pittsburg, a fifth annual appearance in the Star Course at Cleveland, a third annual appearance with the University Club at Ann Arbor, and second annual appearances with the Cincinnati College of Music and the Orpheus Club of Columbus.

NEWS NOTES AND GOSSIP.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch has in many ways shown an appreciation of America and Americans all too uncommon among musicians whose residence in this country has been as limited as his has been. Upon the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the formation of the New York Philharmonic Society, last Thursday, he gave another notable instance of this characteristic feeling of friendship for the profession with which he is associated in his adopted home, by taking the initiative in sending a floral offering to the New York Philharmonics from the Boston Symphony orchestra.

A concert of unusual merit will unquestionably be given on the occasion of the annual benefit in aid of the Carney Hospital at the Columbia Theatre next Sunday evening, as the committee in charge have the assurance that Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano; Miss Lena Little, contralto; Mr. George J Parker, tenor; Mr. Bernhard Listemann, violinist; Mr. Fritz Giese, 'celloist; Mr. John C. Mullaly and an orchestra of 30 men will participate. Many of the private boxes have already been bought and paid for, and seats are now for sale at the theatre box office.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 25, 1892.

Eugen D'Albert gave his farewell recital in Music Hall Saturday afternoon to a large audience, whose enthusiasm won more than one extra number. The programme was more interesting than those of the preceding recitals: it presented greater variety and afforded opportunities to enjoy his delicacy of touch as well as his power of treatment.

His wonderful technique is conceded by all. His execution is excellent, his touch is firm, but he lacks emotion. His performances during the last week have been brilliant, but cold. The enthusiasm on Saturday reached a climax after his admirable interpretation of the three Liszt numbers, which closed the programme. The other numbers were the "Suite Anglaise," No. 6, by Bach; the rondo in A minor, Mozart; Brahms's rhapsodie; Chopin's sonata and Rubinstein's barcarolle in A minor.

The Last Symphony Concert.

The man who could find fault with either the programme or the rendition at Saturday night's concert in Music Hall must indeed be hard to please.

Haydn's symphony in C major, Paganini's concerto for violin and Brahms's splendid first symphony in C minor made up a programme of unusual strength and brilliancy.

The appearance of Franz Kneisel, the soloist of the evening, was greeted with prolonged applause. He has been rightly named the "tenderest of violinists," but the expression does not express enough; it conveys no idea of the mellowness of the notes which follow the movement of the bow, of the sweetness of each tone. It would be difficult to imagine a more finished performance, his purity of tone and brilliancy of execution meriting all the applause he received with such a modest and unassuming air. The orchestra gave him able support throughout the number.

The Brahms symphony was grandly performed, the whole beauty of this splendid organization coming home with new emphasis to the audience, which year after year has noted the general excellence of the performances, but rarely appreciated to the full the many fine points necessary for this degree of excellence.

It is announced that the opening concert of the orchestra's twelfth season will be given Oct. 15.

The sixth annual tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will close the season with unusual brilliancy. Eighty-one people connected with the organization left last night for Philadelphia, where the first concert of the tour is to be given. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Eugen D'Albert will be the soloists. New York, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati, Chicago, Grand Rapids, Ann Arbor, Detroit and Pittsburg will be visited in due order, and at 7 o'clock Monday morning, May 16, the large company will be in Boston.

The Music Hall promenade concerts will open for the summer season of 1892 on Tuesday, June 1.

VIVIAN.

[illegible]

Date 4-22

CONCERT OF THE RUBINSTEIN CLUB.

The friends of the Rubinstein Club turned out in force last night to attend the third private concert of that organization at Music Hall. The stage was decorated with flowers and palms, which formed a tasteful frame to the picture formed by the women of the club, who, 301 in number, occupied raised seats in the centre. William R. Chapman conducted the singing, which was loudly applauded. The incidental solos were sung by Miss Louise Cowles, Miss Feilding Roselle and Mrs. Alice Stoddard-Hollister, members of the club. George Henschel, the baritone, was heard in several pleasing selections, including "The Erl King" and "The Grenadiers." He accompanied himself on the piano, according to his usual custom. M. Henri Joubert, of Paris, played several selections on the violin. Victor Harris was the accompanist, and Louis R. Dressler performed upon the organ.

The officers of the club are: President, Frederick W. Devoe; vice-presidents, Mrs. W. Lanman Bull and Mrs. George C. Clark; secretary, Mrs. Henry M. Humphrey; treasurer, Mrs. A. M. Dodge; musical director, William R. Chapman.

---

ping from

Eve. Post, New York, N.Y.

te 4-21

Notes.

The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season occurs at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening next. The programme is as follows: (1) Symphonic Poem, "The Youth of Hercules," Saint Saëns; (2) Aria from "Herodiade," Massenet; (3) Concerto for violin, in D major, Paganini, revised by Wilhelmj; (4) Fantasy from "Tannhäuser," Act II., Wagner; (5) Duet from "The Taming of the Shrew," Goetz; (6) Symphony No. 4, Dvorák. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will be the soloists.

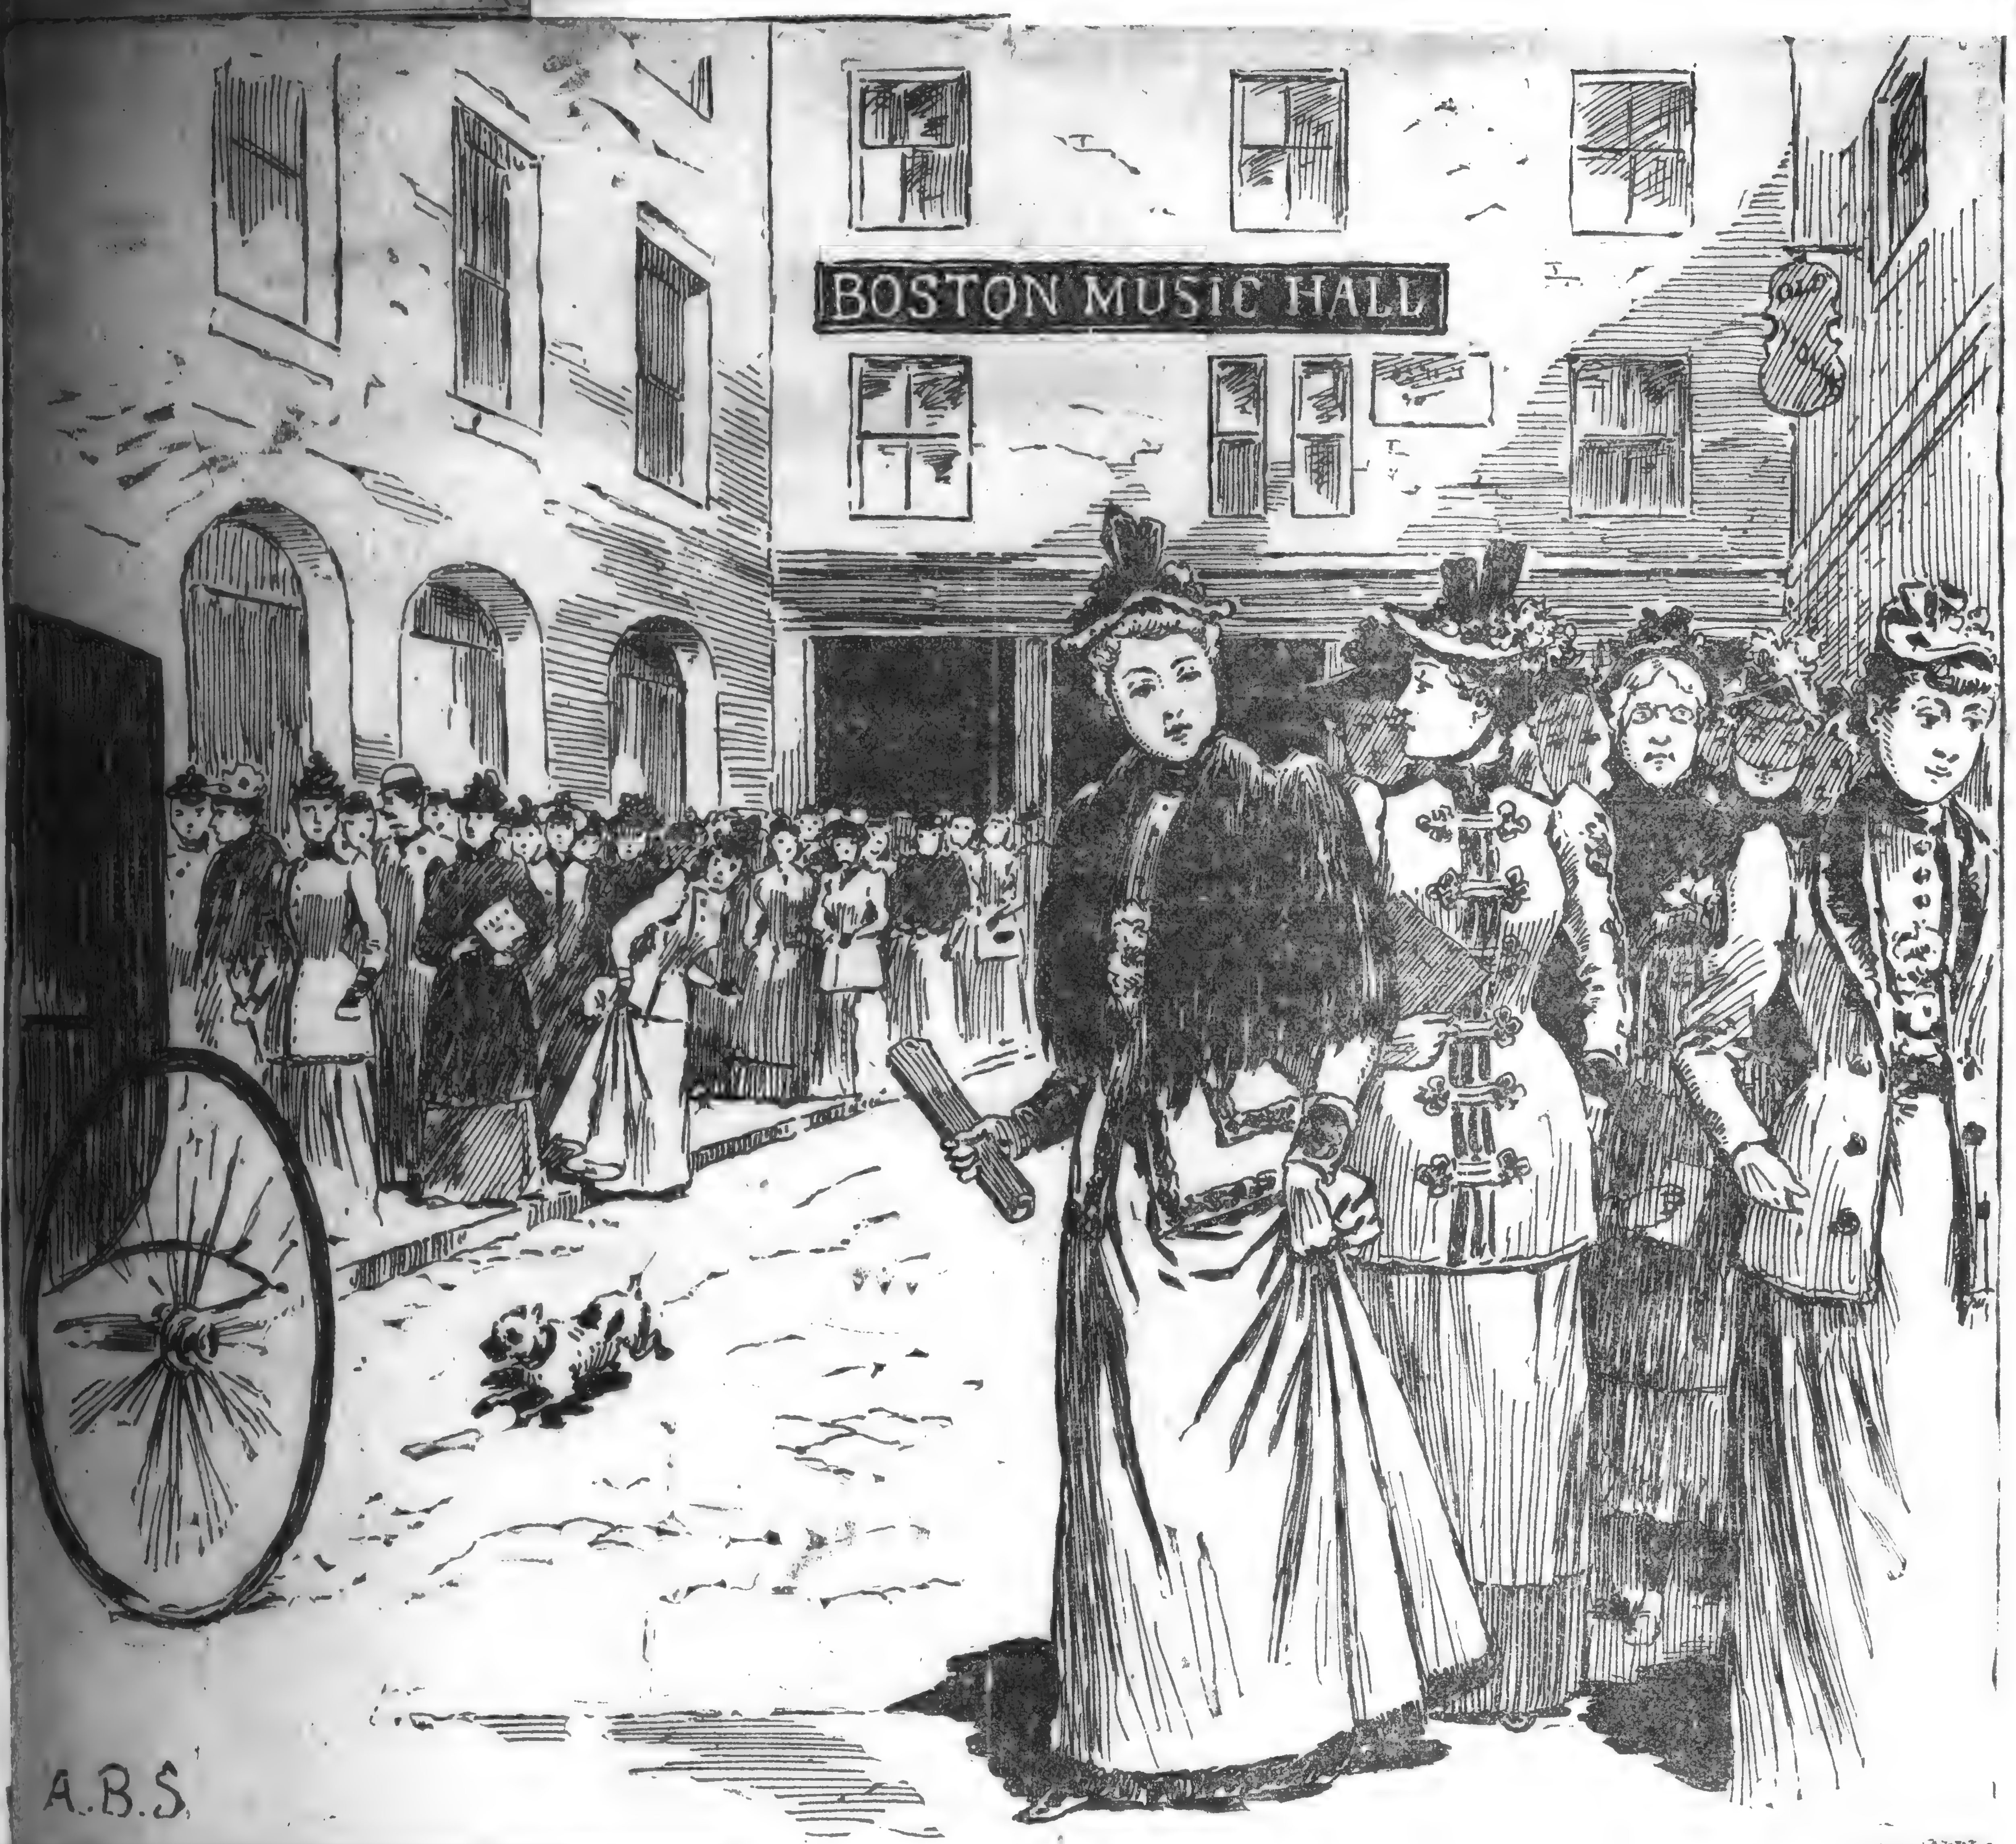
The programme for the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Eugene d'Albert at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, on Monday evening, May 2, is as follows: (1) Overture "Sakuntala," Goldmark; (2) Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, Opus 11, Chopin; (3) Introduction to Act III., Dance of Apprentices, Procession of Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs, "Meistersinger," Wagner; (4) Pilgrims' March, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz; (5) Concerto for piano in E flat, Liszt.

[illegible]

4/20

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Grand Rapids, May 9. An attempt is being made to organize a party from Kalamazoo to attend the concert. The list is in the hands of Mr. Theron Sebring of the Kalamazoo National bank.

NDAY HERALD.
UBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 115.
SUNDAY, APRIL 24, 1892.



AFTER THE SYMPHONY REHEARSAL

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The 24th and last of the 11th season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch's direction.

Haydn's symphony in C major made the first number of the programme, and its simple, but tuneful and most enjoyable movements were splendidly played throughout.

Mr. Kneisel was the soloist, and this faithful, devoted artist, to whom so much of the good work of the string players is due, has good reason for pride in the spontaneous and hearty enthusiasm shown in the greeting given him as he stepped to the soloists' stand to begin his performance of the concerto for violin and orchestra, in D major, by Paganini.

It would be difficult to imagine a better performance of the difficult solo movements of this composition, which included the additions by Wilhelmj, than that given by Mr. Kneisel, for in tone, technical perfection, expression and brilliancy his playing called for the highest commendation. It was withal such an unassuming display of virtuosity that a distinct added charm was given to the performnance, and, all in all, the honest merit of Mr. Kneisel's work fully warranted the ovation which rewarded his efforts, the applause continuing until he had repeatedly bowed his acknowledgments.

Mr. Kneisel's associates gave him splendid support throughout the concerto, and that these men were keenly alive to the excellence of their leader's playing was fully demonstrated by the hearty way in which they joined in the demonstration in his honor.

The concert ended with a performance of Mr. Brahms' mistake, or, as it has sometimes been called the "Tenth" symphony. It is curious how a reputation once gained will cling to an individual or thing. It is quite likely that when this symphony was first produced its composer prepared an analysis of what he thought he had written, and that the critic who called it the "tenth" missed his car, or fell asleep, or something, and was compelled to write about it without having heard it at all. Probably feeling sure from the analysis that no one would know what its composer was driving at, and well knowing that overpraise escapes criticism easier than censure, he dubbed Brahms the successor of Beethoven, and went home and slept peacefully.

There is one thing about the repeated performances of Mr. Brahms' first symphony that should be attended to. Admitting that it is a revelation of beauties in musical construction and orchestral treatment, that it is the work of a master musician which repays all the study demanded to understand its algebraical combinations, and that to decry its merits is to admit ignorance—admitting all these things, how is the great public to be educated upon these points, unless the doors of the hall are locked and guarded by officers familiar with the treatment of insanity?

This is a serious question for Mr. Nikisch to consider. The asylums for the weak and infirm of mind are already overcrowded. Why increase this class of patients even if the first Brahms symphony does get a general hearing by the adoption of the "once in stay in" rules that have been so successful at some of the Lowell Institute lectures.

It is announced that the opening concert of the orchestra's 12th season will be given on Saturday evening, Oct. 15.

D'ALBERT'S FAREWELL.

Eugen D'Albert, the pianist, made his farewell appearance before his Boston admirers at Music Hall yesterday afternoon, and upon this occasion he prepared the most interesting of all the programmes in which he has been heard here.

The compositions chosen were the "Suite Anglaise," No. 6, Bach; the rondo in A minor, Mozart; the rhapsodie, Op. 79, No. 2, Brahms; the sonata in B minor, Op. 58, Chopin; the barcarolle in A minor, Rubinstein; and "Sonetto di Petrarca," "Feux Follets etude, and the tarentelle, "Napoli," Liszt.

The player was heard at his best in this most interesting list of compositions, and his audience was held spell-bound by the masterly interpretations given the several numbers. He was made the recipient of a grand ovation as he ended his programme, and leaves behind him a fine reputation as a masterly pianist and musician.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The sixth annual tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, follows immediately upon the conclusion of its Boston series of 24 public rehearsals and concerts, the organization leaving Boston for Philadelphia this Sunday evening. It is well known that the regular season of the orchestra just now ended has exceeded in its financial success that of any known since its establishment 11 years ago, and this fact, viewed in the light of the unprecedented competition it has been forced to meet is uncontrovertible evidence of the high artistic standard maintained in all its appearances and also of the great popularity of its accomplished conductor.

The substantial character of the indorsement of the Boston orchestra is well shown also by the limited financial risk assumed in the coming tour, despite the fact that the organization will travel with 81 people, mainly by special trains, and with such soloists as Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Eugen D'Albert. With the exception of three concerts, a handsome surplus over the expense is guaranteed for every appearance of the orchestra throughout the tour, a fact that removes any doubt as to the value of the organization in the estimation of the musical publics in all the leading eastern cities.

In the arrangement of the tours of this orchestra care has always been taken to make the travel as easy as possible for the men independent of any question of expense, and Manager Charles A. Ellis, who has been identified with the organization from its formation, has again been so successful that only five nights in the three weeks will be passed on the road. As in former years, Manager Ellis, whose executive ability has put him in the front rank of his associates in this country, goes in advance of the orchestra, and his able assistant, Mr. Fred R. Comee, will personally direct the affairs of the tour in charge of the orchestra.

The first week of the tour is utilized in completing the series of concerts announced for the season in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, the engagements in the last named city being of the same character as in the home concerts, a public rehearsal occurring on Friday afternoon and the reg-

On Monday evening, May 2, the orchestra appears in New York at the new Madison Square Concert Hall to afford D'Albert an appearance with the organization in that city, and the first week in May will be given to concerts in Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, O., Cincinnati and Chicago.

The week of May 9 to 14 will be given to one concert each in Grand Rapids, Mich., Ann Arbor, Mich., and Detroit, and a series of three concerts in Pittsburg, Pa. Leaving Pittsburg directly after the concert of Saturday, May 14, the organization returns home, arriving Monday morning, May 16.

It is good evidence in favor of the standing of the orchestra in other cities that these engagements include a fifth annual appearance with the Mozart Club of Pittsburg, a fifth annual appearance in the Star Course at Cleveland, a third annual appearance with the University Club at Ann Arbor, and second annual appearances with the Cincinnati College of Music and the Orpheus Club of Columbus.

NEWS NOTES AND GOSSIP.

Mr. Arthur Nikisch has in many ways shown an appreciation of America and Americans all too uncommon among musicians whose residence in this country has been as limited as his has been. Upon the occasion of the 50th anniversary of the formation of the New York Philharmonic Society, last Thursday, he gave another notable instance of this characteristic feeling of friendship for the profession with which he is associated in his adopted home, by taking the initiative in sending a floral offering to the New York Philharmonics from the Boston Symphony orchestra.

A concert of unusual merit will unquestionably be given on the occasion of the annual benefit in aid of the Carney Hospital at the Columbia Theatre next Sunday evening, as the committee in charge have the assurance that Miss Gertrude Franklin, soprano; Miss Lena Little, contralto; Mr. George J Parker, tenor; Mr. Bernhard Listemann, violinist; Mr. Fritz Giese, 'celloist; Mr. John C. Mullaly and an orchestra of 30 men will participate. Many of the private boxes have already been bought and paid for, and seats are now for sale at the theatre box office.

Tribune, New York, N.Y.
Date 4-22

CONCERT OF THE RUBINSTEIN CLUB.

The friends of the Rubinstein Club turned out in force last night to attend the third private concert of that organization at Music Hall. The stage was decorated with flowers and palms, which formed a tasteful frame to the picture formed by the women of the club, who, 301 in number, occupied raised seats in the centre. William R. Chapman conducted the singing, which was loudly applauded. The incidental solos were sung by Miss Louise Cowles, Miss Feilding Roselle and Mrs. Alice Stoddard-Hollister, members of the club. Georg Henschel, the baritone, was heard in several pleasing selections, including "The Erl King" and "The Grenadiers." He accompanied himself on the piano, according to his usual custom. M. Henri Joubert, of Paris, played several selections on the violin. Victor Harris was the accompanist, and Louis R. Dressler performed upon the organ.

The officers of the club are: President, Frederick W. Devoe; vice-presidents, Mrs. W. Lanman Bull and Mrs. George C. Clark; secretary, Mrs. Henry M. Humphrey; treasurer, Mrs. A. M. Dodge; musical director, William R. Chapman.

Eve. Post, New York, N.Y.
te 4-21

Notes.

The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season occurs at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening next. The programme is as follows: (1) Symphonic Poem, "The Youth of Hercules," Saint Saëns; (2) Aria from "Herodiade," Massenet; (3) Concerto for violin, in D major, Paganini, revised by Wilhelmj; (4) Fantasy from "Tannhäuser," Act II., Wagner; (5) Duet from "The Taming of the Shrew," Goetz; (6) Symphony No. 4, Dvorák. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will be the soloists.

The programme for the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Eugene d'Albert at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, on Monday evening, May 2, is as follows: (1) Overture "Sakuntala," Goldmark; (2) Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, Opus 11, Chopin; (3) Introduction to Act III., Dance of Apprentices, Procession of Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs, "Meistersinger," Wagner; (4) Pilgrims' March, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz; (5) Concerto for piano in E flat, Liszt.

4/20

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a concert in Grand Rapids, May 9. An attempt is being made to organize a party from Kalamazoo to attend the concert. The list is in the hands of Mr. Theron Sebring of the Kalamazoo National bank.

Boston Post
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 25, 1892.

Eugen D'Albert gave his farewell recital in Music Hall Saturday afternoon to a large audience, whose enthusiasm won more than one extra number. The programme was more interesting than those of the preceding recitals; it presented greater variety and afforded opportunities to enjoy his delicacy of touch as well as his power of treatment.

His wonderful technique is conceded by all. His execution is excellent, his touch is firm, but he lacks emotion. His performances during the last week have been brilliant, but cold. The enthusiasm on Saturday reached a climax after his admirable interpretation of the three Liszt numbers, which closed the programme. The other numbers were the "Suite Anglaise," No. 6, by Bach; the rondo in A minor, Mozart; Brahms's rhapsodie; Chopin's sonata and Rubinstein's barcarolle in A minor.

The Last Symphony Concert.

The man who could find fault with either the programme or the rendition at Saturday night's concert in Music Hall must indeed be hard to please.

Haydn's symphony in C major, Paganini's concerto for violin and Brahms's splendid first symphony in C minor made up a programme of unusual strength and brilliancy.

The appearance of Franz Kneisel, the soloist of the evening, was greeted with prolonged applause. He has been rightly named the "tenderest of violinists," but the expression does not express enough; it conveys no idea of the mellowness of the notes which follow the movement of the bow, of the sweetness of each tone. It would be difficult to imagine a more finished performance, his purity of tone and brilliancy of execution meriting all the applause he received with such a modest and unassuming air. The orchestra gave him able support throughout the number.

The Brahms symphony was grandly performed, the whole beauty of this splendid organization coming home with new emphasis to the audience, which year after year has noted the general excellence of the performances, but rarely appreciated to the full the many fine points necessary for this degree of excellence.

It is announced that the opening concert of the orchestra's twelfth season will be given Oct. 15.

The sixth annual tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will close the season with unusual brilliancy. Eighty-one people connected with the organization left last night for Philadelphia, where the first concert of the tour is to be given. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Eugen D'Albert will be the soloists. New York, Baltimore, Washington, Brooklyn, Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati, Chicago, Grand Rapids, Ann Arbor, Detroit and Pittsburg will be visited in due order, and at 7 o'clock Monday morning, May 16, the large company will be in Boston.

The Music Hall promenade concerts will open for the summer season of 1892 on Tuesday, June 1.

VIVIAN.

[197]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 24, 1892.

THE LAST SYMPHONY.

The Symphony concerts did not end in a blaze of glory as they were wont to do under Mr. Gericke's leadership; but the closing one was intensely interesting, nevertheless, and the performance was worthy of our orchestra, its concertmaster and conductor. Haydn's symphony in G, No. 13, of Breithopf and Hartel's edition, and Brahms's first symphony were separated by Paganini's concerto in D major; these three numbers completing the list, and making an admirably balanced programme.

A Haydn symphony is always welcome, especially at this time of year. One can listen to such music without straining every nerve, enjoy its easy flow of melody, its piquant rhythms, its naturally resulting harmonies, its apt and expressive orchestration with the ease and contentment that one enjoys a pretty comedy.

The symphonies are all pretty much alike; one has to be on terms of solid intimacy with them to readily know one from the other, just as one has to be with the Liszt rhapsodies. The one in question was delightfully played, the strings doing some especially fine work.

It is something of a leap from a Haydn symphony to Brahms's first. But what a tremendous work this last is! To us it is the greatest and most interesting of the four, the one most pregnant with meaning. The strength of the first movement in particular seems more and more titanic with each successive hearing, while hitherto unobserved beauties of form and expression throughout the work are constantly claiming attention. The performance was a noble one in breadth, clearness and expressiveness and it received the closest attention from the audience.

Mr. Kneisel met with an ovation as he stepped forward just before the opening tutti of the concerto and it was well deserved. The character of his artistic work during the years of his residence in Boston fully entitles him to the secure place he holds in the affections of the cultivated musical people of the city. The performance by him of any important work at the symphony concerts has invariably demonstrated preparation of the most exhaustive kind. His wonderfully fine playing in the Paganini concerto was not only an added proof of this fact, but proof also that he more than holds his own as a violinist; that he is still growing in his art. Such clear, pure, masterly technical work, exquisite and expressive phrasing, are rarely heard. His talent as a musician was also shown in his cadenza, which was artistically conceived and put together. The whole performance was a triumph. Mr. Kneisel was recalled again and again. The concerto itself is a coherent and attractive work in one long movement; it was given according to Wilheimj's revision.

"THE CREATION."

Another immense audience attended the Easter concert of the Handel and Haydn Society, at Music Hall, last Sunday evening. The oratorio was "The Creation," and Mrs. Emma Albani, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Myron W. Whitney were the soloists; Mr. Zerrahn conductor and Mr. Lang organist. Considered as a whole, the performance was a fine one. The singing of the chorus was fully up to its standard of the now past season. Its delivery of the choruses was distinguished by purity and splendid fullness of tone, promptness of attack, and abundant reserve power; its finished and effective phrasing would have been creditable to a much smaller and more highly trained body of singers. The larger choruses were given with fine effect, "The Heavens are Telling" notably so, although the tempo did seem a shade too fast. Mrs. Albani's singing was as a rule very enjoyable, and was almost invariably governed by artistic judgment and sincerity of feeling. At times a tendency to sing for mere effect was noticeable, for instance, her exaggerated phrasing and undue prolongation of the fermati in "On mighty pens." Her execution of this number was also lacking in fluency. "With verdure clad" was beautifully rendered, except that it grew a little too slow toward the end; and her singing in the concerted numbers was delightful. The condition of Mr. Lloyd's voice at this concert showed marked improvement. Of his delivery of the numerous tenor recitatives, and his interpretation of "In native worth" too much cannot be said in praise. He has acquired the art of concealing his art to a wonderful extent. Mr. Whitney did some noble work in his recitatives; and the airs, "Rolling in foaming billows" and "Now Heaven in fullest glory shone," were sung with great breadth and flexibility of style. The society may well feel proud of its season's work. The determination to give first rate performances has been manifested by all concerned and the liberality displayed in the engagement of soloists merits warm commendation. Evidently the present management of the Handel and Haydn is a wide-awake one.

D'ALBERT.

On Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons of the past week Mr. Eugen D'Albert gave pianoforte recitals in Music Hall. It may be said at once that they by no means attracted the attention they merited. For D'Albert is unquestionably one of the few great pianists of the day; and he has never before in Boston given more convincing proof of this fact. It is more than probable that his programmes have had considerable to do with the lack of interest which has been displayed. That of Monday was devoted wholly to Beethoven. Now, it is not likely that that in itself caused much fault-finding; but different works might have been chosen by this great Beethoven interpreter. The variations in C minor and the sonatas opus, 53, 109 and 110, have been performed many times within the last few years. These with the "Appassionata" and the last sonata in C minor have been so persistently thrust forward that even opus 1 or 2, or the "Pathetique" would be a relief and pleasure. But there are others to choose from. The "Moonlight," conservatory hack as it is, has not been played here by a great pianist, if Rummel be excepted, since the visit of von Bulow with the Beethoven cyclus; and this is true also of the opus 31, in D minor, and the "Les adieux." To be sure D'Albert made a happy selection in the charming opus 90; and he really worked wonders with the generally avoided and ordinarily uninteresting opus 78. His broad treatment of the allegro of this last sonata, and the amount of expression he extorted from it were a revelation.

What were the principal numbers of the succeeding programmes? Bach's sixth English Suite, Mozart's rondo in A minor, Mendelssohn's fifteen variations, Raff's suite opus 91 (with the variations; this work and the Mendelssohn on the same programme), Chopin's B minor sonata, Schubert's impromptu opus 90, in G, Brahms's second rhapsody, Rubinstein's barcarolle in A minor, No. 5, the Strauss-Tausig waltz, "Man lebt nur einmal," Liszt's "Sonetto di Petrarca," "Feux Follets" study, Liebestraume. No. 3, "Napoli" tarantelle, and Spanish rhapsody. Of these the numbers by Bach, Raff, and the first two by Liszt are heard comparatively seldom in the concert room; the rest have been played and played. Now, why did not Mr. D'Albert present works of these composers that are less known? Why did he not let us hear works of other composers that he has recently played in Europe, and some of those of the modern Russians, and some of his own compositions? Moreover, Mr. D'Albert played a good many of the above mentioned works at his own concerts of two seasons ago. Surely, absorbingly interesting as his playing during this past week has been, it would undoubtedly have been still more so if he had infused more novelty into his programmes.

But if fault may be reasonably found with D'Albert's seeming indifference in this respect, little can be said against his playing, while some of it was above praise. His tone was full, noble and tender. His passage playing was a marvel of strength, clearness and velocity; his wrist staccato and octaves are almost indescribable. There were times, it is true, when his carelessness in the use of the damper pedal seriously marred the effect of his wonderful technical work, and this is to be the more regretted because it was needless. It also seemed as if he were loath to put himself to the trouble of infusing into his playing any considerable variety of touch or phrasing, and for an artist of his ability his tone was too often forced and explosive. Apparently he thought that delicacy and variety of shading and subtlety of tone effect are thrown away in Music Hall; but if he could have realized the ineffable beauty of his playing when he was betrayed into giving free rein to his great power of musical expression—as in parts of the adagios of the sonatas in the Mendelssohn variation in D major, the Schubert impromptu, the Liszt Liebestraum—he would have seen his mistake.

Still it seems ungracious to find fault with such generally great technical work. And after all the immense breadth and virility of his interpretations cause one speedily to forget any minor shortcomings. D'Albert's playing is truly heroic. His attack is simply resistless; one feels that all things must yield to him. He marches through a composition like a conquering hero. And it must be added here that though he has not always in the past shown himself a considerate one as well, this time he has fully redeemed himself; for he has neither pounded his instrument nor given exaggerated readings. His Beethoven playing was truly noble, although it seemed as if his evident deliberate sinking of self acted as a damper to his inspiration. In the Mendelssohn and Raff numbers he did some notably fine work; and in his own arrangement of a prelude and fugue in D Major, by Bach, the Tausig and Liszt pieces, and Rubinstein's staccato study, his display of virtuosity was marvellous.

On the whole, he was at his best yesterday afternoon. His treatment of the Bach suite was firm, free and vigorous, and his reading of the Chopin sonata in B minor was at once manly and poetic. We have never before heard the Liszt Tarantelle played as D'Albert played it. It fairly glowed with color and carried all before it. The audience was especially enthusiastic at this recital and three additional numbers were given—Chopin's polonaise in A flat and nocturne in B major and Liszt's waltz in A flat.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The sixth annual tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, follows immediately upon the conclusion of its Boston series of twenty-four public rehearsals and concerts, the organization leaving Boston for Philadelphia this Sunday evening. It is well known that the regular season of the orchestra just now ended has exceeded in its financial success that of any known since its establishment eleven years ago, and this fact, viewed in the light of the unprecedented competition it has been forced to meet is uncontrovertible evidence of the high artistic standard maintained in all its appearances and also of the great popularity of its accomplished conductor. The substantial character of the indorsement of the Boston orchestra is well shown also by the limited financial risk assumed in the coming tour despite the fact that the organization willl travel with eighty-one people, mainly by special trains, and with such soloists as Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Eugen D'Albert. With the exception of three concerts, a handsome surplus over the expense is guaranteed for every appearance of the orchestra throughout the tour, a fact that removes any doubt as to the value of the organization in the estimation of the musical publics in all the leading Eastern cities. In the arrangement of the tours of this orchestra care has always been taken to make the travel as easy as possible for the men independent of any question of expense, and Manager Charles A. Ellis, who has been identified with the organization from its formation, has again been so successful that only five nights in the three weeks will be passed on the road. As in former years, Manager Ellis, whose executive ability has put him in the front rank of his associates in this country, goes in advance of the orchestra and his able assistant, Mr. Fred R. Comee, will personally direct the affairs of the tour in charge of the orchestra.

The first week of the tour is utilized in completing the series of concerts announced for the season in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, the engagements in the last named city being of the same character as in the home concerts, a public rehearsal occurring on Friday afternoon and the regular concert on Saturday evening. On Monday evening, May 2, the orchestra appears at the new Madison Square Concert Hall in New York, to afford D'Albert an appearance with the organization in that city, and the first week in May will be given to concerts in Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, O., Cincinnati and Chicago. The week of May 9 to 14 will be given to one concert each in Grand Rapids, Mich., Ann Arbor, Mich., and Detroit, and a series of three concerts in Pittsburg, Pa. Peaving Pittsburg directly after the concert of Saturday, May 15, the organization returns home, arriving Monday morning, May 16. It is good evidence in favor of the standing of the orchestra in other cities that these engagements include a fifth annual appearance with the Mozart Club, of Pittsburg, a fifth annual appearance in the Star Course at Cleveland, a third annual appearance with the University Club at Ann Arbor, and second annual appearance with the Cincinnati College of Music and the Orpheus Club, of Columbus.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, APRIL 25, 1892.

CAUSERIE.

The Last Concert of the Symphony Series.

Thoughts Suggested by the Close of the Season.

The Last Pianoforte Recital of Eugen D'Albert.

The programme of the 24th and last concert of the Symphony Orchestra, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony, G major, No. 13, B. & H.	Haydn
Concerto (in one movement) for violin, D major (Revised and with additions by Wilhelmj.)	Paganini
Symphony No. 1, C minor, op. 68	Brahms

Mr. Kneisel was the solo violinist.

⁂

The Haydn symphony, sometimes called the "Letter V," was written in 1787 for Paris, where it was given by the society known as the Concert de la Loge Olympique. It is a delightful example of the spontaneity and skill of the composer, and it was played exceedingly well. David Strauss, in his "Old and New Faith," says that if a Haydn symphony does not please an audience the fault is always in the performance. "And it happens easily that the best orchestras, so-called, play it the worst. For they delight in spending their means of effect, such as rough and sudden changes in strength of tone and in tempo (on which so many modern compositions depend) on music to which only the simplest execution does justice." The reading of Mr. Nikisch was free from exaggeration, and the mechanism of the orchestra was worthy of high praise. So, too, was the performance of the Brahms symphony admirable in many respects; and all in all, this concert, both in sane interpretation and in technical finish, was one of the most satisfactory of the season. Mr. Nikisch was greeted at the beginning of the concert with hearty and long continued applause.

⁂

Paganini left to his only son Achille, the child of the singer Antonia Bianchi de Como, beside two million francs and valuable instruments, the manuscripts of many incomplete compositions. Four violin concertos were found, with the orchestral accompaniments, and four were unfinished. The first concerto is in E flat major for the orchestra, but the solo part is written in D major, and the strings are tuned a half tone higher. The arrangement of the Wilhelmj, played by Mr. Kneisel, abounds in modernization, and there are in it occasional reminiscences of Wagner. It is an effective composition, and even its difficulties are not ungrateful to the player. These difficulties were surmounted by Mr. Kneisel with such apparent ease that the hearer did not lose in enjoyment by the thought of the task of the player. His performance was also distinguished by elegance and by feeling that was artistically controlled. It is interesting to note in this connection that, according to tradition, the tone of Paganini was pure and beautiful, but it was not great, "except in certain effects where the exertion to gain extraordinary results was marked." Mr. Kneisal was most enthusiastically applauded by the audience and his colleagues. He was recalled several times, and he received a wreath and flowers. It was a fitting tribute to the eminent talent of the violinist.

⁂

Now that the eleventh series of these concerts is a matter of historical record, it is neither impertinent nor irrelevant to consider briefly the character of the programmes and the present condition of the orchestra. Without doubt the concerts have given many agreeable amusement, for the outward and conventional manifestations of delight have followed the performance of various selections. If this organization existed merely for the purpose of amusing the public, it would be idle to consider seriously the character of the performances or the taste of the public; for it would then be simply a matter between the manager and the hearer. It might be said, however, that in this case the experiment of gratifying the general public is attended with many risks. The popular taste is capricious. As it was in the time of the Jesuit Father Louis Bertrand Castel, so it is to-day. "The pleasure derived from a popular concert is only real for a certain number of connoisseurs and zealous amateurs. Many in the audience are bored, and they go, as to a theatre, from force of habit, because it is the fashion, or from a desire to be anywhere except at home. The rapture of the majority is a moderate pleasure, which often comes from the sight of the crowd, or circumstances that are foreign to the music. One is tired of hearing always cantatas, and one wishes sonatas; tired of sonatas, he wishes motetts; wearied by French music, he longs for the Italian school; bored by the violinist, he yearns for the sound of the viol."

⁂

But these concerts are not promenade or "grand operatic" concerts. They were designed to serve, at least in a measure, an educational purpose. They should make for musical righteousness. With this end in view, the programme should be chosen with great care and at the same time with catholicism of taste. The worthy compositions of the so-called classical school, the romantic and even the ultra-radical should be heard in due proportion. The programme should be neither frivolous nor dull. Legitimate amusement should go hand in hand with positive education. The making of an ideal programme is a difficult task. It is almost impossible to gratify in one concert the varied tastes of the members of the audience. But it is not impossible to make a programme of well contrasted numbers. Take at random the programmes of the Sunday concerts in Paris, say the concerts of January 24. At the Conservatory the following pieces were heard: Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony," Meyerbeer's Pater Noster, Widor's fantasie for pianoforte and orchestra, the "Egmont" music of Beethoven. Colonne arranged this programme: Schubert's C major symphony, Beethoven's "King Stephan" overture, Saint-Saen's Danse Macabre, two airs by Godard and Pauline Viardot and pieces for the clavecin by Couperin, Rameau and Bach. Lamowreux was more inclined to the radical school: Fourth symphony of Beethoven, overture "Polyeucte," Durkas; Liszt's E flat concerto for pianoforte, fragments of "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz; funeral march from "Goetterdaemmerung" and Saint-Saen's "Ronet d'Omphale." Now, I do not say that these programmes are faultless; and it will be seen at once that they are too long; but in historical interest, in educational value and in pleasing contrast the programmes of the French conductors are throughout the season superior to the programmes of Mr. Nikisch. Nor is it perhaps necessary to cross the ocean. Mr. Nikisch showed during the past season liberality in his taste; he welcomed French, Russian, Italian and American composers. But he has not yet learned the art of arranging his programmes. One concert is a pyrotechnical display from the opening explosion to the final apotheosis. Another concert is a treatise on the symphony in three volumes, with various readings of text and italicized foot notes by the editor. Contrast is too often neglected, and the hearer then leaves the hall jaded and not refreshed.

[illegible] conductor if a singer or a player of an instrument is found unworthy of the reputation that preceded the arrival and the appearance. But it is the fault of the conductor if there is a marked deterioration in the quality of the work of the men under his control. It is said that when Mr. Nikisch first listened to the Boston Symphony Orchestra he was so delighted with the perfection of its mechanism that he hailed the opportunity of being at once a "poetical conductor" without preliminary drudgery. Eternal vigilance, however, is the price of musical liberty. He has shown himself a poet and not a disciplinarian; the quality of the poetry has not always been above reproach; and his ingenious imitations of the old masters have not yet superseded the original models. Romantic spirit, startling effects, surprising readings do not atone for carelessness in attack and a general lack of precision. At times, as on Saturday evening in the Haydn symphony, the mechanism of the orchestra is characterized by the finish that in former days was the just pride of this city, but too often one is reminded of the remark of Mozart in answer to Frederick William II. of Prussia. "What do you think of my orchestra?" said the monarch. "It is made up of the best of virtuosos, your Majesty, and if the gentlemen would only play together the effect would be marvelous."

⁂

Now Mr. Nikisch was taken from the opera house at Leipsic and placed suddenly in Music Hall. His experience as a conductor was gained chiefly in the theatre. He is apparently by nature a theatrical—or lest that word be regarded as objectionable—a dramatic conductor. He still breathes the hot air of the opera house. He is ever anxious for effects. In his desire to gain these effects he is apt to slur the detail, to exaggerate the simplest cantabile, to fail in discriminating between ancient and modern style, to mistake noise for sound. He is impatient of all grades of tone between piano and a forte that borders on fortissimo. The crescendo is very dear to him, and he uses it so freely and so recklessly that he often anticipates the climax of the composer. His treatment of the ritardando and of the fermata is frequently marked by sensational exaggeration. But it would be tedious to repeat the exceptions that have already been taken in The Journal to his musical rulings. He has during his engagement given brilliant performances of ultra modern works; he has shown that if he thinks it advisable he can subordinate himself and follow the indications of the composer; but he is happiest when he "rides in the whirlwind and directs the storm." Many of his readings of the masters of the so-called classic period have been false to the original text and without gain in the perversion.

⁂

Let it be granted cheerfully that the display of his own individuality leads often to orchestral results of an exciting nature; that in certain compositions congenial to his temperament he sweeps all before him; it still remains true that the performance of the orchestra, week in and week out, is not so distinguished by its nobility and purity of tone, its precision, its exquisite finish, its reverent treatment of the composer as in October, 1889. Nor is it to be wondered at if the student and the amateur, who frequent these concerts for the purpose of musical instruction, lose, little by little, the faculty of discrimination, regard Mozart and Wagner as contemporaries, disdain in their own performances the dynamic indications of a composer and strive, in their turn, for effect at any cost. For mighty is the influence of men in high places.

PHILIP HALE.

THE D'ALBERT RECITAL.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert gave the third and last of his pianoforte recitals in Music Hall Saturday afternoon. The programme was as follows:

Suite Anglaise, No. 6	Bach
Rondo, A minor	Mozart
Rhapsodie, Op. 79, No. 2	Brahms
Sonata, B minor, Op. 58	Chopin
Barcarolle, A minor	Rubinstein
Sonetto di Petrarca, "Feux Follets" Etude, Tarentelle, "Napoli,"	Liszt

It is a pleasure to state that there was a large audience in Music Hall Saturday afternoon, although it is late in the season and there have been pianoforte recitals without end; for the playing of Mr. D'Albert was a most admirable exhibition of the highest art. Perhaps his delivery of the Mozart rondo was a little inflexible and at times too stern, but in the other numbers of the programme his performance calls for unstinted praise. The Bach suite was nobly played with vigor, freedom and absence of exaggeration or sentimentalism. The Chopin sonata was both virile and poetic, and in the Liszt numbers the brilliant virtuosoship of the pianist was fully displayed. The audience was enthusiastic, and in response to the applause Mr. D'Albert played Chopin's polonaise in A flat and nocturne in B major and Liszt's waltz in A flat.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 4-21

The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, occurs at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening next. The programme is as follows: 1. Symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," Saint-Saens. 2. Aria from "Herodiade," Massenet. 3. Concerto for violin, in D major, Paganini, revised by Wilhelmj. 4. Fantasy from "Tannhauser," act second, Wagner. 5. Duet from "The Taming of the Shrew," Goetz. 6. Symphony No. 4, Dvorak. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will be the soloists.

The programme for the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Eugen d'Albert at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on Monday evening, May 2, is as follows: 1. Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark. 2. Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, opus 11, Chopin. 3. Introduction to act third, Dance of Apprentices, Procession of Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs, "Meistersinger," Wagner. 4. Pilgrims' March, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz. 5. Concerto for piano in E flat, Liszt.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 24, 1892.

THE LAST SYMPHONY.

The Symphony concerts did not end in a blaze of glory as they were wont to do under Mr. Gericke's leadership; but the closing one was intensely interesting, nevertheless, and the performance was worthy of our orchestra, its concertmaster and conductor. Haydn's symphony in G, No. 13, of Breithopf and Hartel's edition, and Brahms's first symphony were separated by Paganini's concerto in D major; these three numbers completing the list, and making an admirably balanced programme.

A Haydn symphony is always welcome, especially at this time of year. One can listen to such music without straining every nerve, enjoy its easy flow of melody, its piquant rhythms, its naturally resulting harmonies, its apt and expressive orchestration with the ease and contentment that one enjoys a pretty comedy. The symphonies are all pretty much alike; one has to be on terms of solid intimacy with them to readily know one from the other, just as one has to be with the Liszt rhapsodies. The one in question was delightfully played, the strings doing some especially fine work.

It is something of a leap from a Haydn symphony to Brahms's first. But what a tremendous work this last is! To us it is the greatest and most interesting of the four, the one most pregnant with meaning. The strength of the first movement in particular seems more and more titanic with each successive hearing, while hitherto unobserved beauties of form and expression throughout the work are constantly claiming attention. The performance was a noble one in breadth, clearness and expressiveness and it received the closest attention from the audience.

Mr. Kneisel met with an ovation as he stepped forward just before the opening tutti of the concerto and it was well deserved. The character of his artistic work during the years of his residence in Boston fully entitles him to the secure place he holds in the affections of the cultivated musical people of the city. The performance by him of any important work at the symphony concerts has invariably demonstrated preparation of the most exhaustive kind. His wonderfully fine playing in the Paganini concerto was not only an added proof of this fact, but proof also that he more than holds his own as a violinist; that he is still growing in his art. Such clear, pure, masterly technical work, exquisite and expressive phrasing, are rarely heard. His talent as a musician was also shown in his cadenza, which was artistically conceived and put together. The whole performance was a triumph. Mr. Kneisel was recalled again and again. The concerto itself is a coherent and attractive work in one long movement; it was given according to Wilheimj's revision.

"THE CREATION."

Another immense audience attended the Easter concert of the Handel and Haydn Society, at Music Hall, last Sunday evening. The oratorio was "The Creation," and Mrs. Emma Albani, Mr. Edward Lloyd and Mr. Myron W. Whitney were the soloists; Mr. Zerrahn conductor and Mr. Lang organist. Considered as a whole, the performance was a fine one. The singing of the chorus was fully up to its standard of the now past season. Its delivery of the choruses was distinguished by purity and splendid fullness of tone, promptness of attack, and abundant reserve power; its finished and effective phrasing would have been creditable to a much smaller and more highly trained body of singers. The larger choruses were given with fine effect, "The Heavens are Telling" notably so, although the tempo did seem a shade too fast. Mrs. Albani's singing was as a rule very enjoyable, and was almost invariably governed by artistic judgment and sincerity of feeling. At times a tendency to sing for mere effect was noticeable, for instance, her exaggerated phrasing and undue prolongation of the fermati in "On mighty pens." Her execution of this number was also lacking in fluency. "With verdure clad" was beautifully rendered, except that it grew a little too slow toward the end; and her singing in the concerted numbers was delightful. The condition of Mr. Lloyd's voice at this concert showed marked improvement. Of his delivery of the numerous tenor recitatives, and his interpretation of "In native worth" too much cannot be said in praise. He has acquired the art of concealing his art to a wonderful extent. Mr. Whitney did some noble work in his recitatives; and the airs, "Rolling in foaming billows" and "Now Heaven in fullest glory shone," were sung with great breadth and flexibility of style. The society may well feel proud of its season's work. The determination to give first rate performances has been manifested by all concerned and the liberality displayed in the engagement of soloists merits warm commendation. Evidently the present management of the Handel and Haydn is a wide-awake one.

D'ALBERT.

On Monday, Wednesday and Saturday afternoons of the past week Mr. Eugen D'Albert gave pianoforte recitals in Music Hall. It may be said at once that they by no means attracted the attention they merited. For D'Albert is unquestionably one of the few great pianists of the day; and he has never before in Boston given more convincing proof of this fact. It is more than probable that his programmes have had considerable to do with the lack of interest which has been displayed. That of Monday was devoted wholly to Beethoven. Now, it is not likely that that in itself caused much fault-finding; but different works might have been chosen by this great Beethoven interpreter. The variations in C minor and the sonatas opus, 53, 109 and 110, have been performed many times within the last few years. These with the "Appassionata" and the last sonata in C minor have been so persistently thrust forward that even opus 1 or 2, or the "Pathetique" would be a relief and pleasure. But there are others to choose from. The "Moonlight," conservatory hack as it is, has not been played here by a great pianist, if Rummel be excepted, since the visit of von Bulow with the Beethoven cyclus; and this is true also of the opus 31, in D minor, and the "Les adieux." To be sure D'Albert made a happy selection in the charming opus 90; and he really worked wonders with the generally avoided and ordinarily uninteresting opus 78. His broad treatment of the allegro of this last sonata, and the amount of expression he extorted from it were a revelation.

What were the principal numbers of the succeeding programmes? Bach's sixth English Suite, Mozart's rondo in A minor, Mendelssohn's fifteen variations, Raff's suite opus 91 (with the variations; this work and the Mendelssohn on the same programme), Chopin's B minor sonata, Schubert's impromptu opus 90, in G, Brahms's second rhapsody, Rubinstein's barcarolle in A minor, No. 5, the Strauss-Tausig waltz, "Man lebt nur einmal," Liszt's "Sonetto di Petrarca," "Feux Follets" study, Liebestraume. No. 3, "Napoli" tarantelle, and Spanish rhapsody. Of these the numbers by Bach, Raff, and the first two by Liszt are heard comparatively seldom in the concert room; the rest have been played and played. Now, why did not Mr. D'Albert present works of these composers that are less known? Why did he not let us hear works of other composers that he has recently played in Europe, and some of those of the modern Russians, and some of his own compositions? Moreover, Mr. D'Albert played a good many of the above mentioned works at his own concerts of two seasons ago. Surely, absorbingly interesting as his playing during this past week has been, it would undoubtedly have been still more so if he had infused more novelty into his programmes.

But if fault may be reasonably found with D'Albert's seeming indifference in this respect, little can be said against his playing, while some of it was above praise. His tone was full, noble and tender. His passage playing was a marvel of strength, clearness and velocity; his wrist staccato and octaves are almost indescribable. There were times, it is true, when his carelessness in the use of the damper pedal seriously marred the effect of his wonderful technical work, and this is to be the more regretted because it was needless. It also seemed as if he were loath to put himself to the trouble of infusing into his playing any considerable variety of touch or phrasing, and for an artist of his ability his tone was too often forced and explosive. Apparently he thought that delicacy and variety of shading and subtlety of tone effect are thrown away in Music Hall; but if he could have realized the ineffable beauty of his playing when he was betrayed into giving free rein to his great power of musical expression—as in parts of the adagios of the sonatas in the Mendelssohn variation in D major, the Schubert impromptu, the Liszt Liebestraum—he would have seen his mistake.

Still it seems ungracious to find fault with such generally great technical work. And after all the immense breadth and virility of his interpretations cause one speedily to forget any minor shortcomings. D'Albert's playing is truly heroic. His attack is simply resistless; one feels that all things must yield to him. He marches through a composition like a conquering hero. And it must be added here that though he has not always in the past shown himself a considerate one as well, this time he has fully redeemed himself; for he has neither pounded his instrument nor given exaggerated readings. His Beethoven playing was truly noble, although it seemed as if his evident deliberate sinking of self acted as a damper to his inspiration. In the Mendelssohn and Raff numbers he did some notably fine work; and in his own arrangement of a prelude and fugue in D Major, by Bach, the Tausig and Liszt pieces, and Rubinstein's staccato study, his display of virtuosity was marvellous.

On the whole, he was at his best yesterday afternoon. His treatment of the Bach suite was firm, free and vigorous, and his reading of the Chopin sonata in B minor was at once manly and poetic. We have never before heard the Liszt Tarantelle played as D'Albert played it. It fairly glowed with color and carried all before it. The audience was especially enthusiastic at this recital and three additional numbers were given—Chopin's polonaise in A flat and nocturne in B major and Liszt's waltz in A flat.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The sixth annual tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, follows immediately upon the conclusion of its Boston series of twenty-four public rehearsals and concerts, the organization leaving Boston for Philadelphia this Sunday evening. It is well known that the regular season of the orchestra just now ended has exceeded in its financial success that of any known since its establishment eleven years ago, and this fact, viewed in the light of the unprecedented competition it has been forced to meet is uncontrovertible evidence of the high artistic standard maintained in all its appearances and also of the great popularity of its accomplished conductor. The substantial character of the indorsement of the Boston orchestra is well shown also by the limited financial risk assumed in the coming tour despite the fact that the organization willl travel with eighty-one people, mainly by special trains, and with such soloists as Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Eugen D'Albert. With the exception of three concerts, a handsome surplus over the expense is guaranteed for every appearance of the orchestra throughout the tour, a fact that removes any doubt as to the value of the organization in the estimation of the musical publics in all the leading Eastern cities. In the arrangement of the tours of this orchestra care has always been taken to make the travel as easy as possible for the men independent of any question of expense, and Manager Charles A. Ellis, who has been identified with the organization from its formation, has again been so successful that only five nights in the three weeks will be passed on the road. As in former years, Manager Ellis, whose executive ability has put him in the front rank of his associates in this country, goes in advance of the orchestra and his able assistant, Mr. Fred R. Comee, will personally direct the affairs of the tour in charge of the orchestra.

The first week of the tour is utilized in completing the series of concerts announced for the season in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, the engagements in the last named city being of the same character as in the home concerts, a public rehearsal occurring on Friday afternoon and the regular concert on Saturday evening. On Monday evening, May 2, the orchestra appears at the new Madison Square Concert Hall in New York, to afford D'Albert an appearance with the organization in that city, and the first week in May will be given to concerts in Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, O., Cincinnati and Chicago. The week of May 9 to 14 will be given to one concert each in Grand Rapids, Mich., Ann Arbor, Mich., and Detroit, and a series of three concerts in Pittsburg, Pa. Peaving Pittsburg directly after the concert of Saturday, May 15, the organization returns home, arriving Monday morning, May 16. It is good evidence in favor of the standing of the orchestra in other cities that these engagements include a fifth annual appearance with the Mozart Club, of Pittsburg, a fifth annual appearance in the Star Course at Cleveland, a third annual appearance with the University Club at Ann Arbor, and second annual appearance with the Cincinnati College of Music and the Orpheus Club, of Columbus.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, APRIL 25, 1892.

CAUSERIE.

The Last Concert of the Symphony Series.

Thoughts Suggested by the Close of the Season.

The Last Pianoforte Recital of Eugen D'Albert.

The programme of the 24th and last concert of the Symphony Orchestra, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Symphony, G major, No. 13, B. & H.	Haydn
Concerto (in one movement) for violin, D major (Revised and with additions by Wilhelmj.)	Paganini
Symphony No. 1, C minor, op. 68	Brahms

Mr. Kneisel was the solo violinist.

⁂

The Haydn symphony, sometimes called the "Letter V," was written in 1787 for Paris, where it was given by the society known as the Concert de la Loge Olympique. It is a delightful example of the spontaneity and skill of the composer, and it was played exceedingly well. David Strauss, in his "Old and New Faith," says that if a Haydn symphony does not please an audience the fault is always in the performance. "And it happens easily that the best orchestras, so-called, play it the worst. For they delight in spending their means of effect, such as rough and sudden changes in strength of tone and in tempo (on which so many modern compositions depend) on music to which only the simplest execution does justice." The reading of Mr. Nikisch was free from exaggeration, and the mechanism of the orchestra was worthy of high praise. So, too, was the performance of the Brahms symphony admirable in many respects; and all in all, this concert, both in sane interpretation and in technical finish, was one of the most satisfactory of the season. Mr. Nikisch was greeted at the beginning of the concert with hearty and long continued applause.

⁂

Paganini left to his only son Achille, the child of the singer Antonia Bianchi de Como, beside two million francs and valuable instruments, the manuscripts of many incomplete compositions. Four violin concertos were found, with the orchestral accompaniments, and four were unfinished. The first concerto is in E flat major for the orchestra, but the solo part is written in D major, and the strings are tuned a half tone higher. The arrangement of the Wilhelmj, played by Mr. Kneisel, abounds in modernization, and there are in it occasional reminiscences of Wagner. It is an effective composition, and even its difficulties are not ungrateful to the player. These difficulties were surmounted by Mr. Kneisel with such apparent ease that the hearer did not lose in enjoyment by the thought of the task of the player. His performance was also distinguished by elegance and by feeling that was artistically controlled. It is interesting to note in this connection that, according to tradition, the tone of Paganini was pure and beautiful, but it was not great, "except in certain effects where the exertion to gain extraordinary results was marked." Mr. Kneisal was most enthusiastically applauded by the audience and his colleagues. He was recalled several times, and he received a wreath and flowers. It was a fitting tribute to the eminent talent of the violinist.

⁂

Now that the eleventh series of these concerts is a matter of historical record, it is neither impertinent nor irrelevant to consider briefly the character of the programmes and the present condition of the orchestra. Without doubt the concerts have given many agreeable amusement, for the outward and conventional manifestations of delight have followed the performance of various selections. If this organization existed merely for the purpose of amusing the public, it would be idle to consider seriously the character of the performances or the taste of the public; for it would then be simply a matter between the manager and the hearer. It might be said, however, that in this case the experiment of gratifying the general public is attended with many risks. The popular taste is capricious. As it was in the time of the Jesuit Father Louis Bertrand Castel, so it is to-day. "The pleasure derived from a popular concert is only real for a certain number of connoisseurs and zealous amateurs. Many in the audience are bored, and they go, as to a theatre, from force of habit, because it is the fashion, or from a desire to be anywhere except at home. The rapture of the majority is a moderate pleasure, which often comes from the sight of the crowd, or circumstances that are foreign to the music. One is tired of hearing always cantatas, and one wishes sonatas; tired of sonatas, he wishes motetts; wearied by French music, he longs for the Italian school; bored by the violinist, he yearns for the sound of the viol."

⁂

But these concerts are not promenade or "grand operatic" concerts. They were designed to serve, at least in a measure, an educational purpose. They should make for musical righteousness. With this end in view, the programme should be chosen with great care and at the same time with catholicism of taste. The worthy compositions of the so-called classical school, the romantic and even the ultra-radical should be heard in due proportion. The programme should be neither frivolous nor dull. Legitimate amusement should go hand in hand with positive education. The making of an ideal programme is a difficult task. It is almost impossible to gratify in one concert the varied tastes of the members of the audience. But it is not impossible to make a programme of well contrasted numbers. Take at random the programmes of the Sunday concerts in Paris, say the concerts of January 24. At the Conservatory the following pieces were heard: Mozart's "Jupiter Symphony," Meyerbeer's Pater Noster, Widor's fantasie for pianoforte and orchestra, the "Egmont" music of Beethoven. Colonne arranged this programme: Schubert's C major symphony, Beethoven's "King Stephan" overture, Saint-Saen's Danse Macabre, two airs by Godard and Pauline Viardot and pieces for the clavecin by Couperin, Rameau and Bach. Lamowreux was more inclined to the radical school: Fourth symphony of Beethoven, overture "Polyeucte," Durkas; Liszt's E flat concerto for pianoforte, fragments of "Romeo and Juliet," Berlioz; funeral march from "Goetterdaemmerung" and Saint-Saen's "Ronet d'Omphale." Now, I do not say that these programmes are faultless; and it will be seen at once that they are too long; but in historical interest, in educational value and in pleasing contrast the programmes of the French conductors are throughout the season superior to the programmes of Mr. Nikisch. Nor is it perhaps necessary to cross the ocean. Mr. Nikisch showed during the past season liberality in his taste; he welcomed French, Russian, Italian and American composers. But he has not yet learned the art of arranging his programmes. One concert is a pyrotechnical display from the opening explosion to the final apotheosis. Another concert is a treatise on the symphony in three volumes, with various readings of text and italicized foot notes by the editor. Contrast is too often neglected, and the hearer then leaves the hall jaded and not refreshed.

⁂

A lack of experience may be an excuse for occasional errors of judgment in the arrangement of a programme, and time may bring improvement in this respect. Nor is it the fault of a conductor if a singer or a player of an instrument is found unworthy of the reputation that preceded the arrival and the appearance. But it is the fault of the conductor if there is a marked deterioration in the quality of the work of the men under his control. It is said that when Mr. Nikisch first listened to the Boston Symphony Orchestra he was so delighted with the perfection of its mechanism that he hailed the opportunity of being at once a "poetical conductor" without preliminary drudgery. Eternal vigilance, however, is the price of musical liberty. He has shown himself a poet and not a disciplinarian; the quality of the poetry has not always been above reproach; and his ingenious imitations of the old masters have not yet superseded the original models. Romantic spirit, startling effects, surprising readings do not atone for carelessness in attack and a general lack of precision. At times, as on Saturday evening in the Haydn symphony, the mechanism of the orchestra is characterized by the finish that in former days was the just pride of this city, but too often one is reminded of the remark of Mozart in answer to Frederick William II. of Prussia. "What do you think of my orchestra?" said the monarch. "It is made up of the best of virtuosos, your Majesty, and if the gentlemen would only play together the effect would be marvelous."

⁂

Now Mr. Nikisch was taken from the opera house at Leipsic and placed suddenly in Music Hall. His experience as a conductor was gained chiefly in the theatre. He is apparently by nature a theatrical—or lest that word be regarded as objectionable—a dramatic conductor. He still breathes the hot air of the opera house. He is ever anxious for effects. In his desire to gain these effects he is apt to slur the detail, to exaggerate the simplest cantabile, to fail in discriminating between ancient and modern style, to mistake noise for sound. He is impatient of all grades of tone between piano and a forte that borders on fortissimo. The crescendo is very dear to him, and he uses it so freely and so recklessly that he often anticipates the climax of the composer. His treatment of the ritardando and of the fermata is frequently marked by sensational exaggeration. But it would be tedious to repeat the exceptions that have already been taken in The Journal to his musical rulings. He has during his engagement given brilliant performances of ultra modern works; he has shown that if he thinks it advisable he can subordinate himself and follow the indications of the composer; but he is happiest when he "rides in the whirlwind and directs the storm." Many of his readings of the masters of the so-called classic period have been false to the original text and without gain in the perversion.

⁂

Let it be granted cheerfully that the display of his own individuality leads often to orchestral results of an exciting nature; that in certain compositions congenial to his temperament he sweeps all before him; it still remains true that the performance of the orchestra, week in and week out, is not so distinguished by its nobility and purity of tone, its precision, its exquisite finish, its reverent treatment of the composer as in October, 1889. Nor is it to be wondered at if the student and the amateur, who frequent these concerts for the purpose of musical instruction, lose, little by little, the faculty of discrimination, regard Mozart and Wagner as contemporaries, disdain in their own performances the dynamic indications of a composer and strive, in their turn, for effect at any cost. For mighty is the influence of men in high places.

PHILIP HALE.

THE D'ALBERT RECITAL.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert gave the third and last of his pianoforte recitals in Music Hall Saturday afternoon. The programme was as follows:

Suite Anglaise, No. 6	Bach
Rondo, A minor	Mozart
Rhapsodie, Op. 79, No. 2	Brahms
Sonata, B minor, Op. 58	Chopin
Barcarolle, A minor	Rubinstein
Sonetto di Petrarca, "Feux Follets" Etude, Tarentelle, "Napoli,"	Liszt

It is a pleasure to state that there was a large audience in Music Hall Saturday afternoon, although it is late in the season and there have been pianoforte recitals without end; for the playing of Mr. D'Albert was a most admirable exhibition of the highest art. Perhaps his delivery of the Mozart rondo was a little inflexible and at times too stern, but in the other numbers of the programme his performance calls for unstinted praise. The Bach suite was nobly played with vigor, freedom and absence of exaggeration or sentimentalism. The Chopin sonata was both virile and poetic, and in the Liszt numbers the brilliant virtuosoship of the pianist was fully displayed. The audience was enthusiastic, and in response to the applause Mr. D'Albert played Chopin's polonaise in A flat and nocturne in B major and Liszt's waltz in A flat.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date 4-21

The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season, occurs at Chickering Hall on Tuesday evening next. The programme is as follows: 1. Symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," Saint-Saens. 2. Aria from "Herodiade," Massenet. 3. Concerto for violin, in D major, Paganini, revised by Wilhelmj. 4. Fantasy from "Tannhauser," act second, Wagner. 5. Duet from "The Taming of the Shrew," Goetz. 6. Symphony No. 4, Dvorak. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will be the soloists.

The programme for the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Eugen d'Albert at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on Monday evening, May 2, is as follows: 1. Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark. 2. Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, opus 11, Chopin. 3. Introduction to act third, Dance of Apprentices, Procession of Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs, "Meistersinger," Wagner. 4. Pilgrims' March, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz. 5. Concerto for piano in E flat, Liszt.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

End of the Season Regretted by Thousands of Music Lovers.

The last of this season's symphony concerts was given in Music Hall, last night, and then, as on the occasion of the last rehearsal Friday afternoon, the hall was crowded to its capacity. With the goodbyes to Conductor Nikisch were hearty expressions of good will and tokens of appreciation for his efforts to maintain the standard of the orchestra and please the taste of its patrons.

To have always satisfied such exacting audiences as have attended these concerts, would have been a task almost beyond accomplishment, so it is not surprising that there should have been some fault finding with the character of Mr. Nikisch's programme, and his manner of presenting them.

But all must agree that he was sincere and earnest in his efforts to present what he believed to be best for the musical culture and enjoyment of his audiences. Possibly another season may bring him more general and favorable recognition.

Yesterday's programme consisted of Haydn's symphony in G, No. 13; Paganini's concerto in D major for violin, and Brahm's symphony No. 1 in C minor.

Mr. Kneisel was the soloist, and his playing of Paganini's difficult and brilliant concerto won most demonstrative expressions of approval. It is not remembered that the playing of any soloist at previous concerts of this season has created greater enthusiasm.

Mr. Kneisel is generally accepted as the most popular of resident violinists, and the regard that Boston has for him is well merited.

His playing yesterday was characterized by the same brilliancy, purity of tone and mastery of technique that made his previous performances so enjoyable.

The Haydn symphony was read by Mr. Nikisch with excellent taste, and it was played with splendid spirit and expression.

The gorgeous orchestral adornments which Brahms has given his No. 1 symphony were presented with admirable effect. Especially spirited and expressive was the performance of the magnificent fourth movement, and the dainty, graceful passages of the preceding movement were exquisitely played by the strings.

ORCHESTRA TOUR.

Conductor Nikisch and His Band to be Heard in Other Cities.

The sixth annual tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, follows immediately upon the conclusion of its Boston series of 24 public rehearsals and concerts, the organization leaving Boston for Philadelphia this (Sunday) evening.

It is well known that the regular season of the orchestra just now ended has exceeded in its financial success that of any known since its establishment 11 years ago, and this fact, viewed in the light of the unprecedented competition it has been forced to meet is incontrovertible evidence of the high artistic standard maintained in all its appearances and also of the great popularity of its accomplished conductor.

The substantial character of the indorsement of the Boston orchestra is well shown also by the limited financial risk assumed in the coming tour, despite the fact that the organization will travel with 81 people, mainly by special trains, and with such soloists as Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Eugen D'Albert.

With the exception of three concerts, a handsome surplus over the expense is guaranteed for every appearance of the orchestra throughout the tour, a fact that removes any doubt as to the value of the organization in the estimation of the musical publics in all the leading Eastern cities.

In the arrangement of the tours of this orchestra care has always been taken to make the travel as easy as possible for the men independent of any question of expense, and Manager Charles A. Ellis, who has been identified with the organization from its formation, has again been so successful that only five nights in the three weeks will be passed on the road.

As in former years, Manager Ellis, whose executive ability has put him in the front rank of his associates in this country, goes in advance of the orchestra, and his able assistant, Mr. Fred R. Comee, will personally direct the affairs of the tour in charge of the orchestra.

The first week of the tour is utilized in completing the series of concerts announced for the season in Philadelphia, New York, Washington and Baltimore and Brooklyn, the engagements in the last named city being of the same character as in the home concerts, a public rehearsal occurring on Friday afternoon and the regular concert on Saturday evening.

On Monday evening, May 2, the orchestra appears at the new Madison Square Concert Hall in New York, to afford D'Albert an appearance with the organization in that city, and the first week in May will be given to concerts in Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, O., Cincinnati and Chicago.

The week of May 9 to 14 will be given to one concert each in Grand Rapids, Mich., Ann Arbor, Mich., and Detroit, and a series of three concerts in Pittsburg, Penn. Leaving Pittsburg directly after the concert of Saturday, May 14, the organization returns home, arriving Monday morning, May 16.

It is good evidence in favor of the standing of the orchestra in other cities that these engagements include a fifth annual appearance with the Mozart Club of Pittsburg, a fifth annual appearance in the Star course at Cleveland, a third annual appearance with the University Club at Ann Arbor and second annual appearances with the Cincinnati College of Music and the Orpheus Club of Columbus.

Last D'Albert Piano Recital

The recital given by Mr. D'Albert yesterday afternoon was the last of the series, and was listened to by an unusually large audience. The programme was extensive, and sufficiently varied to test the versatility of the artist, who, in its interpretation, showed himself to be the disciple of no particular school, but an all-round pianist of extraordinary merit.

The recital began with Bach's "Suite Anglaise," the six movements of which were given with splendid effect. The dainty gavotte and the brilliant gigue, in particular, calling forth the warm plaudits of the audience.

This was followed by Mozart's ondo in A minor, Brahm's rhapsodie, op. 79, No. 2, which was rendered in Mr. D'Albert's best and manliest style, and Chopin's sonata in B minor.

In the latter the performer again aroused the enthusiasm of his hearers, and had to respond to an imperative encore.

The second part of the programme consisted of Rubinstein's barcarolle, in A minor, which well displayed the player's perfect mastery of the keyboard, and was rendered in a manner that could hardly fail to please the great composer-virtuoso himself.

[illegible] with the [illegible] was insisted upon, Mr. D'Albert [illegible] responding with another of Chopin's compositions.

The entire effect of the concert was such that Mr. D'Albert need have no fear of wearing out his welcome with Boston audiences, who are quick to appreciate sterling worth in an artist whose playing is an illustration of faultless technique, and whose bearing is at once so modest and manly.

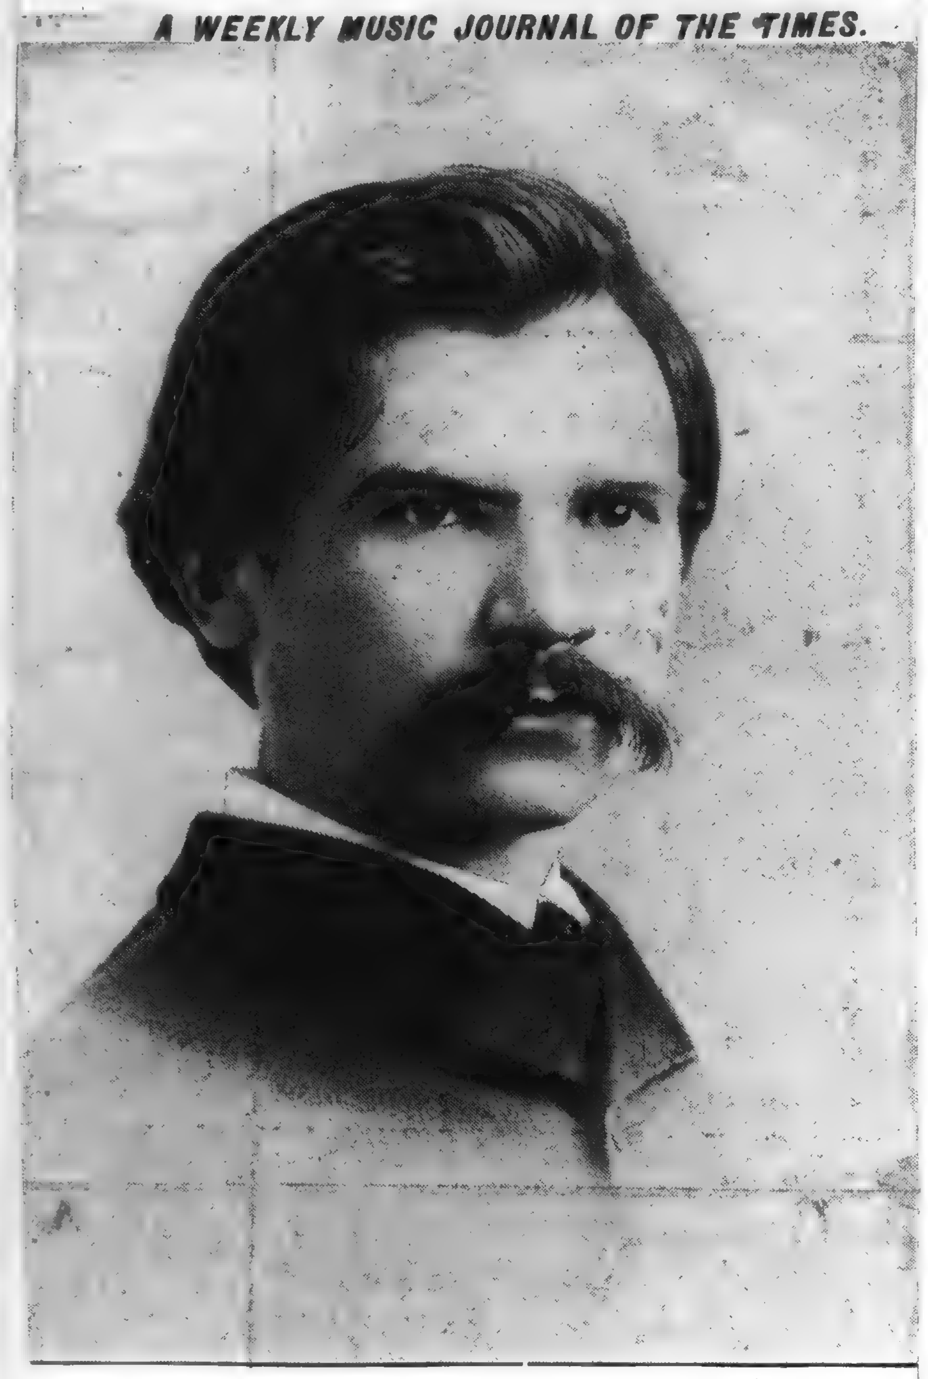
The Music Hall promenade concerts will be open for the summer season of 1892 on Tuesday, June 1.

——At the first D'Albert recital Monday afternoon at Music Hall there was a surprisingly large audience, considering the lateness of the season and the very recent departure of Paderewski, who had gathered in the dollars from the music-loving public at such a remorseless rate. In the hall Monday, among the many society and musical folk, were Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. C. E. Inches, with Mr. Dwight, Mr. Josiah Bradlee, Mrs. Seth Sprague and Miss Hooper, Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger, Prof. Ernest Fenollosa, Mrs. John H. Thorndike, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. Perabo, Mrs. Harris Hooper, Mr. Eliot Pratt, Mr. B. L. Whelpley and Mr. John Orth.

THE · PRESTO ·

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

A WEEKLY MUSIC JOURNAL OF THE TIMES.



EUGEN D'ALBERT.

Even at the risk of making myself a bore to those people who worship Paderewski and think that piano playing and artistic interpretation have reached their highest point in him, I wish to call attention to the marvelous success this little giant, Eugen D'Albert, has won with the thinking musicians. Those who admire a pianist with a good, hearty, healthy mind, with unrivalled technical powers and artistic perceptions of the acutest, but devoid of mawkish sentimentality, have found in Eugen D'Albert their ideal. There is something so forceful, and such a tremendous earnestness about his playing that the attention is riveted and one is compelled to think. To the general public this last operation is not an agreeable one, but to the earnest student or full-fledged artist, such a forcing of recognition is gratifying. I am not a hero worshipper; I have found too many of my idols in the past have not had feet of clay alone, they have been mostly all clay and a very ordinary quality of mud at that, but I do most heartily admire a man of brains in any department of life's work, and in the realm of musical art, I believe Eugen D'Albert is a giant in intellect.

D. E. F.

Boston [illegible]

MONDAY, APRIL 25, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-fourth and last concert of the elventh season was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Haydn: Symphony in G major (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 13.)
Paganini: Violin Concerto in D major (revised, and with additions by Wilhelmj.)
Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.

Mr. Eranz Kneisel was the violinist.

The Haydn symphony used to be a prime favorite here in the days of the Harvard Musical Association; we remember well the impression made by its final Allegro con spirito at its first performance in the Music Hall. It seemed to the audience for the moment, as if they had never heard anything so charming before. And now, over twenty years later, the work is as fresh, lovely and sparkling as then. It was admirably played, and heartily enjoyed; especially good was the way in which the Trio of the Minuet was given.

Brahms's C-minor symphony, once famous as "The 10th Symphony," is a horse of another color, but none the worse for not being of the same. The more we hear this astounding work, the greater does it seem: every fresh hearing brings with it some new revelation of beauty or strength. There seems to us little need of calling it the greatest symphony since Beethoven; that would be leaving out Mendelssohn and Schumann, which we are not quite ready to do. No doubt, Brahms has planned this first symphony of his on a larger, broader scale than any of the Mendelssohn or Schumann symphonies, and has, moreover, kept himself steadily up to the magnitude of his plan; one can say, too, that, since Beethoven's C minor and "Pastoral," —which latter, by the way, is of a totally different character—no symphonic first movement has appeared which shows such admirably close, what the French call "serré," workmanship as this one. Still, it should be said on the other hand that Brahms shows in his work far less melodic invention than either Mendelssohn or Schumann, less clearness of purpose and treatment, a less pervasive sense for the beautiful. Upon the whole, superlatives are misleading; this symphony is great enough, in all conscience, to afford not to be "greatest." The performance was wonderfully fine—one of the grandest Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra have ever given us. No more triumphant close of a season could be desired.

We do not know the Paganini concerto well enough in its original shape to be sure how much, or what, Wilhelmj has done for it in the way of retouching; we suspect, however, that he has done a good deal, especially to the orchestral portions, and that what he has done is wholly to the advantage of the work. It seems to us, nevertheless, that it is rather futile to play Paganini in any shape nowadays; the man was a player entirely sui generis, he wrote his compositions for his own playing, and both internal and external evidence go to show that the main secret of their effectiveness lay in his performance. Paganini, as a player, had much of the Liszt magnetism in him; but with the important difference that, whereas Liszt played almost everything under the sun, and about equally superbly, Paganini was musically in touch with no composer but himself. All competent authorities agree that Paganini's playing of other people's music was pretty bad. In this respect he was far more like Gottschalk than like Liszt; he was at home only on his own ground, and there he worked wonders. As Gottschalk's music virtually died with him, past all hope of resurrection, so did Paganini's also die with him; he carried the secret of its effectiveness to the grave. No matter how superbly any violinist today may play a concerto of his, of one thing we may be quite sure; that what we hear is really "Hamlet" with the part of Hamlet left out. That dæmonic, and often demoniacal, personality, which was the true gist of the whole business, is perforce absent. And to speak the downright truth, what is left, after the elimination of that personality, does not seem to us of great importance or value. Mr. Kneisel fairly outdid himself; it was an utterly magnificent performance at every point; it cannot be praised too highly. But Mr. Kneisel is perhaps the last man in the world to play like Paganini; we may all be heartily thankful for that, for, if he could play like Paganini, it is as certain as certain can be, it even would follow as a necessary consequence, that he could not play the Beethoven, Mendelssohn, nor Joachim concertos as he now does, and could not play in quartets at all. The one precludes the other; if you do not believe it, just think for a moment of Ole Bull—this is certainly no logical proof of our proposition, but it proves it better than logic. And, as for our single self, we far prefer Mr. Kneisel with this one limitation; if he cannot do what Paganini did, he can do a thousand times better. He is thrown away on the Paganini concerto; que diable aussi allait-il faire dans cette maudite galère? But then a man cannot go on playing classic concertos forever! "Wanted: A concerto!" This placard has been up in every violinist's front window for a good while, and will probably stay up for some time to come.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra set out, Sunday night, on its sixth annual tour, the first week of which will be devoted to the completion of the series of concerts laid out for Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, in turn. Thence westward, the following named cities will be visited in turn and will have one concert each, with the exception of Pittsburg, where three concerts will be given: Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati, Chicago, Grand Rapids, Ann Arbor, Detroit and Pittsburg. The itinerary ends with the arrival of the orchestra at Boston, Providence station, at 7 o'clock, A. M., May 16. Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. d'Albert will go with the orchestra. On May 2, a concert will be given with Mr. d'Albert at the Madison Square Garden. Mr. Charles A. Ellis will go on in advance of the band and Mr. Fred R. Comee will be with the orchestra. Altogether eighty-one people will be in the company, and special trains will mainly be used. Only five nights in the three weeks will be passed on the road. With the exception of three concerts, a surplus over the expense is guaranteed for every concert. It is evidence in favor of the standing of the orchestra in cities that the engagements include the fifth annual appearance with the Mozart Club of Pittsburg, the fifth in the Star course at Cleveland, the third with the University Club at Ann Arbor, the second with the Cincinnati College of Music and the Orpheus Club of Columbus.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Gossip and News About the Music World and Its People.

Phila. Pa.

Patti will appear at the Academy of Music on Tuesday evening in a performance entire of Flotow's Martha, assisted by Mlle. Fabri, M. Guille, Signor Novara and Signor Carbone. The mere announcement of this interesting event will be sufficient to draw forth a brilliant audience that will test the seating capacity of the Academy.

The doors of the Eleventh Street Opera House close to-night for the season.

"Nana" continues to be as great an attraction as ever. Thousands have viewed the picture and have been delighted with it. The great popularity of the painting has induced the management to keep it on exhibition for a short time longer, and this opportunity will doubtless be taken advantage of by many.

4/23

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its closing concert for the season at the Academy of Music Monday evening. Mr. Nikisch will, of course, conduct, and the programme will comprise Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F, op. 93. The soloists will be Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, who will sing separately "Blich ich umber" from Tannhäuser and an air from Massenet's Heroidade, and together a duet from Goetz's Taming of the Shrew. The ticket office is at No. 1119 Chestnut street.

NY Tribune
4/24

The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season occurrs at Chickering Hall, on Tuesday evening next. The programme is as follows: symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," Saint-Saens; aria from "Heradiade," Massenet; concerto for violin, in D major, Paganini, revised by Wilhelmj; fantasy from "Tannhauser," Act II, Wagner; duet from "The Taming of the Shrew," Goetz; Symphony No. 4, Dvorak. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will sing and Mr. Kneisel will play Paganini's concerto.

The programme of the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Eugen d'Albert at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, on Monday evening, May 2, is as follows: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; concerto for pianoforte, in E minor, opus 11, Chopin; introduction to Act III, dance of apprentices, procession of mastersingers and homage to Hans Sachs, "Meistersinger," Wagner; pilgrims' march, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz; concerto for piano in E-flat, Liszt.

POST, Pittsburg, Penn.

Date.........4-22.........

For the May Music Festival.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been secured by the Mozart club as one of the attractions at the May music festival to be given at old city hall on May 12, 13 and 14. This organization is composed of 80 pieces and is under the directorship of Arthur Nikisch. George Henschel, the eminent bass soloist from London, founder of the Boston Symphony, Mrs. George Henschel, Eugen D'Albert, the great piano virtuoso, George Lamson, E. H. McDermitt and Paul Zimmerman compose the list of soloists secured for the occasion.

THE WORCESTER TELEGRAM.

Published Daily and Sunday.

TUESDAY, APRIL 26, 1892.

D'ALBERT THE PIANIST.

An Itinerant Cornetist Interrupts His Recital in Association Hall.

Eugen D'Albert, the pianistic virtuoso, played, last night, in Association hall, to a fairly large audience and delighted all. That does not mean that Mr. D'Albert is the greatest pianist that has fingered a keyboard in the 19th century, or even that he is the finest performer that has played in Worcester, but, leaving out such giants as Paderewski and Pachmann, who were heard here only a few weeks ago, D'Albert last night was quite an interesting contribution to the music of the season. His recital was poorly managed. First of all, there were no programs, and, although the audience that listened to D'Albert was intelligent, it was impossible for them to follow the performer through the labryinth of a dozen classical composers.

D'Albert impressed the audience at once as a man strictly intent on business. He was in evening dress and he wore his hair long, and during his recital he frequently dipped it into the piano. He showed throughout wonderful technique and a firm touch. He was not, however, picturesque as Paderewski was, nor emotional and feeling as was Pachmann. His playing was more muscular than anything else, but both audience and piano survived the hour and a half through which he played.

A funny incident marked the concert when it was about half over. An itinerant musician on Pearl street began to blow a popular tune through a cornet just as D'Albert was about to begin one of his selections. The pianist paused at the unwonted sounds, lifted his hands from the keyboard and then left the platform in disgust. At this point, a gentleman who was sitting at the rear of the hall threw up a window and cried to the street musician: "Shut up."

In reply to this invitation the cornetist blew a louder blast and the audience in Association hall laughed more heartily than ever. Then somebody went out and gave the cornet player a quarter, and he went round the corner.

D'Albert's performance, though muscular and robust, appeared to be greatly enjoyed by the audience. He was heartily applauded all through the evening and encores were frequent.

Boston Sunday Globe

SUNDAY, APRIL 24, 1892.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

End of the Season Regretted by Thousands of Music Lovers.

The last of this season's symphony concerts was given in Music Hall, last night, and then, as on the occasion of the last rehearsal Friday afternoon, the hall was crowded to its capacity. With the goodbyes to Conductor Nikisch were hearty expressions of good will and tokens of appreciation for his efforts to maintain the standard of the orchestra and please the taste of its patrons.

To have always satisfied such exacting audiences as have attended these concerts, would have been a task almost beyond accomplishment, so it is not surprising that there should have been some fault finding with the character of Mr. Nikisch's programme, and his manner of presenting them.

But all must agree that he was sincere and earnest in his efforts to present what he believed to be best for the musical culture and enjoyment of his audiences. Possibly another season may bring him more general and favorable recognition.

Yesterday's programme consisted of Haydn's symphony in G. No. 13; Paganini's concerto in D major for violin, and Brahm's symphony No. 1 in C minor.

Mr. Kneisel was the soloist, and his playing of Paganini's difficult and brilliant concerto won most demonstrative expressions of approval. It is not remembered that the playing of any soloist at previous concerts of this season has created greater enthusiasm.

Mr. Kneisel is generally accepted as the most popular of resident violinists, and the regard that Boston has for him is well merited.

His playing yesterday was characterized by the same brilliancy, purity of tone and mastery of technique that made his previous performances so enjoyable.

The Haydn symphony was read by Mr. Nikisch with excellent taste, and it was played with splendid spirit and expression.

The gorgeous orchestral adornments which Brahms has given his No. 1 symphony were presented with admirable effect. Especially spirited and expressive was the performance of the magnificent fourth movement, and the dainty, graceful passages of the preceding movement were exquisitely played by the strings.

ORCHESTRA TOUR.

Conductor Nikisch and His Band to be Heard in Other Cities.

The sixth annual tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, follows immediately upon the conclusion of its Boston series of 24 public rehearsals and concerts, the organization leaving Boston for Philadelphia this (Sunday) evening.

It is well known that the regular season of the orchestra just now ended has exceeded in its financial success that of any known since its establishment 11 years ago, and this fact, viewed in the light of the unprecedented competition it has been forced to meet is incontrovertible evidence of the high artistic standard maintained in all its appearances and also of the great popularity of its accomplished conductor.

The substantial character of the indorsement of the Boston orchestra is well shown also by the limited financial risk assumed in the coming tour, despite the fact that the organization will travel with 81 people, mainly by special trains, and with such soloists as Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Eugen D'Albert.

With the exception of three concerts, a handsome surplus over the expense is guaranteed for every appearance of the orchestra throughout the tour, a fact that removes any doubt as to the value of the organization in the estimation of the musical publics in all the leading Eastern cities.

In the arrangement of the tours of this orchestra care has always been taken to make the travel as easy as possible for the men independent of any question of expense, and Manager Charles A. Ellis, who has been identified with the organization from its formation, has again been so successful that only five nights in the three weeks will be passed on the road.

As in former years, Manager Ellis, whose executive ability has put him in the front rank of his associates in this country, goes in advance of the orchestra, and his able assistant, Mr. Fred R. Comee, will personally direct the affairs of the tour in charge of the orchestra.

The first week of the tour is utilized in completing the series of concerts announced for the season in Philadelphia, New York, Washington and Baltimore and Brooklyn, the engagements in the last named city being of the same character as in the home concerts, a public rehearsal occurring on Friday afternoon and the regular concert on Saturday evening.

On Monday evening, May 2, the orchestra appears at the new Madison Square Concert Hall in New York, to afford D'Albert an appearance with the organization in that city, and the first week in May will be given to concerts in Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, O., Cincinnati and Chicago.

The week of May 9 to 14 will be given to one concert each in Grand Rapids, Mich., Ann Arbor, Mich., and Detroit, and a series of three concerts in Pittsburg, Penn. Leaving Pittsburg directly after the concert of Saturday, May 14, the organization returns home, arriving Monday morning, May 16.

It is good evidence in favor of the standing of the orchestra in other cities that these engagements include a fifth annual appearance with the Mozart Club of Pittsburg, a fifth annual appearance in the Star course at Cleveland, a third annual appearance with the University Club at Ann Arbor and second annual appearances with the Cincinnati College of Music and the Orpheus Club of Columbus.

Last D'Albert Piano Recital

The recital given by Mr. D'Albert yesterday afternoon was the last of the series, and was listened to by an unusually large audience. The programme was extensive, and sufficiently varied to test the versatility of the artist, who, in its interpretation, showed himself to be the disciple of no particular school, but an all-round pianist of extraordinary merit.

The recital began with Bach's "Suite Anglaise," the six movements of which were given with splendid effect. The dainty gavotte and the brilliant gigue, in particular, calling forth the warm plaudits of the audience.

This was followed by Mozart's ondo in A minor, Brahm's rhapsodie, op. 79, No. 2, which was rendered in Mr. D'Albert's best and manliest style, and Chopin's sonata in B minor.

In the latter the performer again aroused the enthusiasm of his hearers, and had to respond to an imperative encore.

The second part of the programme consisted of Rubinstein's barcarolle, in A minor, which well displayed the player's perfect mastery of the keyboard, and was rendered in a manner that could hardly fail to please the great composer-virtuoso

A suite by Liszt concluded [illegible] gramme, but the audience was so [illegible] with the concluding Tarentelle that a recall was insisted upon, Mr. D'Albert graciously responding with another of Chopin's compositions.

The entire effect of the concert was such that Mr. D'Albert need have no fear of wearing out his welcome with Boston audiences, who are quick to appreciate sterling worth in an artist whose playing is an illustration of faultless technique, and whose bearing is at once so modest and manly.

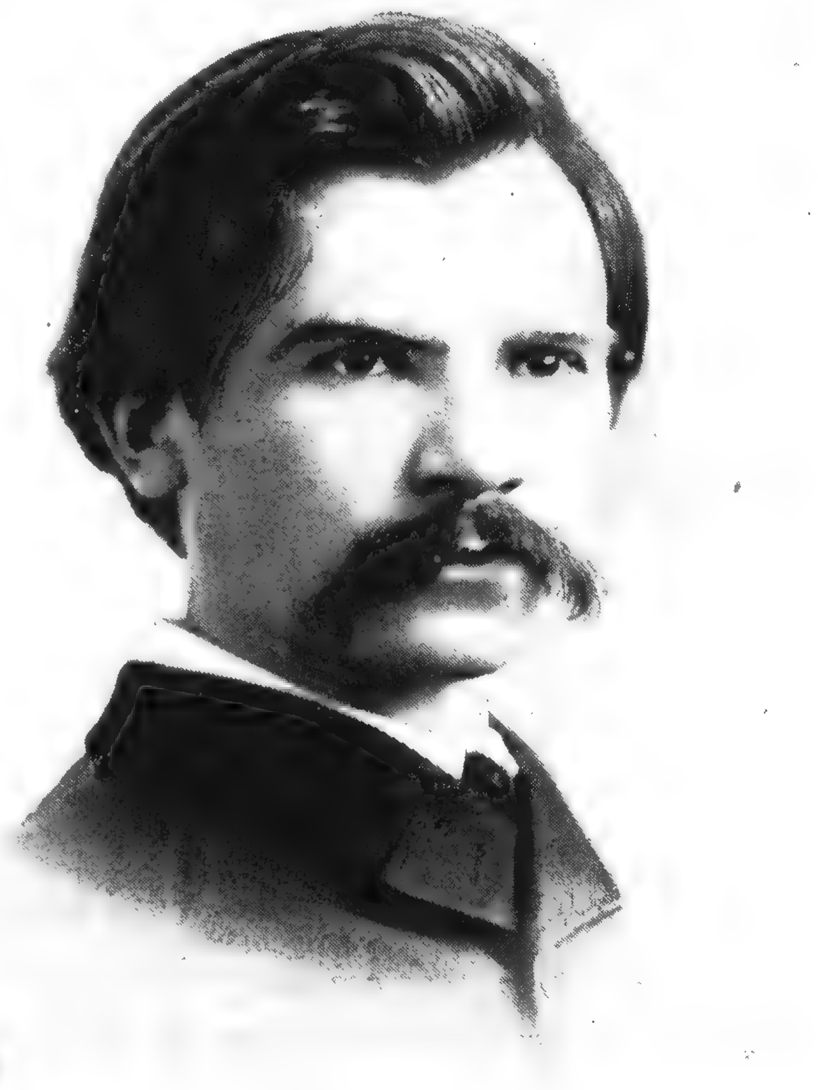
The Music Hall promenade concerts will be open for the summer season of 1892 on Tuesday, June 1.

—At the first D'Albert recital Monday afternoon at Music Hall there was a surprisingly large audience, considering the lateness of the season and the very recent departure of Paderewski, who had gathered in the dollars from the music-loving public at such a remorseless rate. In the hall Monday, among the many society and musical folk, were Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. C. E. Inches, with Mr. Dwight, Mr. Josiah Bradlee, Mrs. Seth Sprague and Miss Hooper, Mrs. Barthold Schlesinger, Prof. Ernest Fenollosa, Mrs. John H. Thorndike, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. Perabo, Mrs. Harris Hooper, Mr. Eliot Pratt, Mr. B. L. Whelpley and Mr. John Orth.

THE · PRESTO ·

THURSDAY, APRIL 21, 1892.

A WEEKLY MUSIC JOURNAL OF THE TIMES.



EUGEN D'ALBERT.

Even at the risk of making myself a bore to those people who worship Paderewski and think that piano playing and artistic interpretation have reached their highest point in him, I wish to call attention to the marvelous success this little giant, Eugen D'Albert, has won with the thinking musicians. Those who admire a pianist with a good, hearty, healthy mind, with unrivalled technical powers and artistic perceptions of the acutest, but devoid of mawkish sentimentality, have found in Eugen D'Albert their ideal. There is something so forceful, and such a tremendous earnestness about his playing that the attention is riveted and one is compelled to think. To the general public this last operation is not an agreeable one, but to the earnest student or full-fledged artist, such a forcing of recognition is gratifying. I am not a hero worshipper; I have found too many of my idols in the past have not had feet of clay alone, they have been mostly all clay and a very ordinary quality of mud at that, but I do most heartily admire a man of brains in any department of life's work, and in the realm of musical art, I believe Eugen D'Albert is a giant in intellect. D. E. F.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 25, 1892.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The twenty-fourth and last concert of the eleventh season was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Haydn: Symphony in G major (Breitkopf & Härtel, No. 13.)
Paganini: Violin Concerto in D major (revised, and with additions by Wilhelmj.)
Brahms: Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.

Mr. Eranz Kneisel was the violinist.

The Haydn symphony used to be a prime favorite here in the days of the Harvard Musical Association; we remember well the impression made by its final Allegro con spirito at its first performance in the Music Hall. It seemed to the audience for the moment, as if they had never heard anything so charming before. And now, over twenty years later, the work is as fresh, lovely and sparkling as then. It was admirably played, and heartily enjoyed; especially good was the way in which the Trio of the Minuet was given.

Brahms's C-minor symphony, once famous as "The 10th Symphony," is a horse of another color, but none the worse for not being of the same. The more we hear this astounding work, the greater does it seem: every fresh hearing brings with it some new revelation of beauty or strength. There seems to us little need of calling it the greatest symphony since Beethoven; that would be leaving out Mendelssohn and Schumann, which we are not quite ready to do. No doubt, Brahms has planned this first symphony of his on a larger, broader scale than any of the Mendelssohn or Schumann symphonies, and has, moreover, kept himself steadily up to the magnitude of his plan; one can say, too, that, since Beethoven's C minor and "Pastoral,"—which latter, by the way, is of a totally different character—no symphonic first movement has appeared which shows such admirably close, what the French call "serré," workmanship as this one. Still, it should be said on the other hand that Brahms shows in his work far less melodic invention than either Mendelssohn or Schumann, less clearness of purpose and treatment, a less pervasive sense for the beautiful. Upon the whole, superlatives are misleading; this symphony is great enough, in all conscience, to afford not to be "greatest." The performance was wonderfully fine—one of the grandest Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra have ever given us. No more triumphant close of a season could be desired.

We do not know the Paganini concerto well enough in its original shape to be sure how much, or what, Wilhelmj has done for it in the way of retouching; we suspect, however, that he has done a good deal, especially to the orchestral portions, and that what he has done is wholly to the advantage of the work. It seems to us, nevertheless, that it is rather futile to play Paganini in any shape nowadays; the man was a player entirely sui generis, he wrote his compositions for his own playing, and both internal and external evidence go to show that the main secret of their effectiveness lay in his performance. Paganini, as a player, had much of the Liszt magnetism in him; but with the important difference that, whereas Liszt played almost everything under the sun, and about equally superbly, Paganini was musically in touch with no composer but himself. All competent authorities agree that Paganini's playing of other people's music was pretty bad. In this respect he was far more like Gottschalk than like Liszt; he was at home only on his own ground, and there he worked wonders. As Gottschalk's music virtually died with him, past all hope of resurrection, so did Paganini's also die with him; he carried the secret of its effectiveness to the grave. No matter how superbly any violinist today may play a concerto of his, of one thing we may be quite sure; that what we hear is really "Hamlet" with the part of Hamlet left out. That dœmonic, and often demoniacal, personality, which was the true gist of the whole business, is perforce absent. And to speak the downright truth, what is left, after the elimination of that personality, does not seem to us of great importance or value. Mr. Kneisel fairly outdid himself; it was an utterly magnificent performance at every point; it cannot be praised too highly. But Mr. Kneisel is perhaps the last man in the world to play like Paganini; we may all be heartily thankful for that, for, if he could play like Paganini, it is as certain as certain can be, it even would follow as a necessary consequence, that he could not play the Beethoven, Mendelssohn, nor Joachim concertos as he now does, and could not play in quartets at all. The one precludes the other; if you do not believe it, just think for a moment of Ole Bull—this is certainly no logical proof of our proposition, but it proves it better than logic. And, as for our single self, we far prefer Mr. Kneisel with this one limitation; if he cannot do what Paganini did, he can do a thousand times better. He is thrown away on the Paganini concerto; que diable aussi allait-il faire dans cette maudite galère? But then a man cannot go on playing classic concertos forever! "Wanted: A concerto!" This placard has been up in every violinist's front window for a good while, and will probably stay up for some time to come.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra set out, Sunday night, on its sixth annual tour, the first week of which will be devoted to the completion of the series of concerts laid out for Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, in turn. Thence westward, the following named cities will be visited in turn and will have one concert each, with the exception of Pittsburg, where three concerts will be given: Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati, Chicago, Grand Rapids, Ann Arbor, Detroit and Pittsburg. The itinerary ends with the arrival of the orchestra at Boston, Providence station, at 7 o'clock, A. M., May 16. Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. d'Albert will go with the orchestra. On May 2, a concert will be given with Mr. d'Albert at the Madison Square Garden. Mr. Charles A. Ellis will go on in advance of the band and Mr. Fred R. Comee will be with the orchestra. Altogether eighty-one people will be in the company, and special trains will mainly be used. Only five nights in the three weeks will be passed on the road. With the exception of three concerts, a surplus over the expense is guaranteed for every concert. It is evidence in favor of the standing of the orchestra in cities that the engagements include the fifth annual appearance with the Mozart Club of Pittsburg, the fifth in the Star course at Cleveland, the third with the University Club at Ann Arbor, the second with the Cincinnati College of Music and the Orpheus Club of Columbus.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Gossip and News About the Music World and Its People.

Patti will appear at the Academy of Music on Tuesday evening in a performance entire of Flotow's Martha, assisted by Mlle. Fabri, M. Guille, Signor Novara and Signor Carbone. The mere announcement of this interesting event will be sufficient to draw forth a brilliant audience that will test the seating capacity of the Academy.

The doors of the Eleventh Street Opera House close to-night for the season.

"Nana" continues to be as great an attraction as ever. Thousands have viewed the picture and have been delighted with it. The great popularity of the painting has induced the management to keep it on exhibition for a short time longer, and this opportunity will doubtless be taken advantage of by many.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its closing concert for the season at the Academy of Music Monday evening. Mr. Nikisch will, of course, conduct, and the programme will comprise Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" and Beethoven's Eighth Symphony in F, op. 93. The soloists will be Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, who will sing separately "Blich ich umber" from Tannhäuser and an air from Massenet's Heroidade, and together a duet from Goetz's Taming of the Shrew. The ticket office is at No. 1119 Chestnut street.

The sixth and last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season occurs at Chickering Hall, on Tuesday evening next. The programme is as follows: symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," Saint-Saens; aria from "Heradiade," Massenet; concerto for violin, in D major, Paganini, revised by Wilhelmj; fantasy from "Tannhauser," Act II, Wagner; duet from "The Taming of the Shrew," Goetz; Symphony No. 4, Dvorak. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will sing and Mr. Kneisel will play Paganini's concerto.

The programme of the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Eugen d'Albert at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, on Monday evening, May 2, is as follows: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; concerto for pianoforte, in E minor, opus 11, Chopin; introduction to Act III, dance of apprentices, procession of mastersingers and homage to Hans Sachs, "Meistersinger," Wagner; pilgrims' march, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz; concerto for piano in E-flat, Liszt.

POST, Pittsburg, Penn.

Date 4-22

For the May Music Festival.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been secured by the Mozart club as one of the attractions at the May music festival to be given at old city hall on May 12, 13 and 14. This organization is composed of 80 pieces and is under the directorship of Arthur Nikisch. George Henschel, the eminent bass soloist from London, founder of the Boston Symphony, Mrs. George Henschel, Eugen D'Albert, the great piano virtuoso, George Lamson, E. H. McDermitt and Paul Zimmerman compose the list of soloists secured for the occasion.

THE WORCESTER TELEGRAM.

Published Daily and Sunday.

TUESDAY, APRIL 26, 1892.

D'ALBERT THE PIANIST.

An Itinerant Cornetist Interrupts His Recital in Association Hall.

Eugen D'Albert, the pianistic virtuoso, played, last night, in Association hall, to a fairly large audience and delighted all. That does not mean that Mr. D'Albert is the greatest pianist that has fingered a keyboard in the 19th century, or even that he is the finest performer that has played in Worcester, but, leaving out such giants as Paderewski and Pachmann, who were heard here only a few weeks ago, D'Albert last night was quite an interesting contribution to the music of the season. His recital was poorly managed. First of all, there were no programs, and, although the audience that listened to D'Albert was intelligent, it was impossible for them to follow the performer through the labryinth of a dozen classical composers.

D'Albert impressed the audience at once as a man strictly intent on business. He was in evening dress and he wore his hair long, and during his recital he frequently dipped it into the piano. He showed throughout wonderful technique and a firm touch. He was not, however, picturesque as Paderewski was, nor emotional and feeling as was Pachmann. His playing was more muscular than anything else, but both audience and piano survived the hour and a half through which he played.

A funny incident marked the concert when it was about half over. An itinerant musician on Pearl street began to blow a popular tune through a cornet just as D'Albert was about to begin one of his selections. The pianist paused at the unwonted sounds, lifted his hands from the keyboard and then left the platform in disgust. At this point, a gentleman who was sitting at the rear of the hall threw up a window and cried to the street musician: "Shut up."

In reply to this invitation the cornetist blew a louder blast and the audience in Association hall laughed more heartily than ever. Then somebody went out and gave the cornet player a quarter, and he went round the corner.

D'Albert's performance, though muscular and robust, appeared to be greatly enjoyed by the audience. He was heartily applauded all through the evening and encores were frequent.

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, APRIL 25, 1892.

LAST OF THE SERIES.

Close of This Year's Symphony Concerts.

Mr. Kneisel's Fine Playing of Paganini's Concerto.

A Review of the Orchestra's Work Under Mr. Nikisch.

The last of this year's series of Symphony concerts took place at the Music Hall on Saturday evening. The programme was as follows: Haydn's Symphony No. 18; concerto for violin in D, Paganini, with Wilhelmj's revision and additions, and cadenzas by Kneisel; Symphony No. 1, C minor, Brahms. The playing of the orchestra was more satisfactory than generally, and Mr. Kneisel's performance of the concerto was of the highest description in every particular. Among the many admirable performances that this fine artist has given us, none have surpassed his playing upon this occasion. He was recalled again and again, and presented with a magnificent wreath and a large bouquet of flowers.

Contrary to the hopes of many Mr. Nikisch will continue as conductar of the orchestra another season. We are sorry that this is so, for sharing the opinion of many others, we do not believe that Mr. Nikisch is a competent person to fill the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony, in all that that term should imply. When he came here three years ago, he began in a bombastic manner to display at the very first concert a coarse and theatric vulgarity of interpretation that has marked his career ever since, in all that he has done.

The orchestra, which was perfect under his predecessor, Mr. Gericke, began at once to degenerate, and has continued in such a state to the present time of writing. Noise is the prevailing element that has characterized Mr. Nikisch's leading. Coarseness in the strings and blatancy in the wind, with an infernal pounding of the drums, are the elements that seem to satisfy the yearnings of his musical soul. Add to his the persistant attempt to moderize the classics to suit the mawkishness of his notions, and you have a fair idea of the standard that he has tried to establish as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has not improved one iota since he came here three years ago, and if he remains here three years more I don't believe he will show any advancement towards the point of ability that the position he holds should command of its incumbent.

To be sure after a good sound belaboring by the majority of the critics, he has modified the eccentricities and violence of his manner in certain compositions; for instance he probably will never indulge again in such a musical bullfight, as his first performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Still, however, his mania for noise has been tempered but slightly, and then in rare cases only. From the first he has broken down all artistic barriers, and rushed through the compositions in hand regardless of the necessities for contrast of movement, contrast of power, repose, precision and a well defined gradation in dynamics. In all the time he has been here he has not showed that there is any difference between f and ffff's; between mezzoforte, piano and pianissimo.

Stuck up on two boxes he has posed before the audience and beat the air with his baton while the orchestra went on through the music, sometime aparently regardless of his gyrations.

When we stop to think how that superb drillmaster and eminent conductor Wilhelm Gericke had trained and perfected the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is easy enough to see how any one with a fair schooling in music could stand up before it and play as well as Nikisch has the part of a conductor. The orchestra can play without a conductor if necessary, and quite as well as they often have done under the present incumbent. To control and wield the orchestra is quite another thing. This Mr. Gericke did on every occasion. When Mr. Gericke ruled every player had to keep one eye on the music and one on the conductor, and Mr. Gericke's eye was upon every player. Not the slightest mistake escaped his observation.

Strict attention and the most rigid discipline prevailed. Since Mr. Nikisch has been attached the contrary has been the rule. The players converse and laugh together, and, for long spells at a time, do not look at the conductor, nor pay heed to his movements. Instruments play out of tune, and mistakes are made and no attention is paid to them. I have seen the conductor beating at one time, the orchestra playing at another, and the soloists at still another. Many a fine solo has been ruined through a rough, ragged and noisy accompaniment because the orchestra paid no heed to the situation and Mr. Nikisch paid no heed to the necessity of controlling the players. If Theodore Thomas and Wilhelm Gericke are conductors then Mr. Nikisch is not a conductor.

A conductor should be an exact time beater; he should have the constant and undivided attention of the players; he should guide and control all the movements of the orchestra; he should have a keen sense of contrasts and of gradations of tone; he should have, above all, the ability to impart repose to his renderings; he should have a discriminating taste and draw a sharp line between the purity of the classics and the sensuousness of modern composition; he should also be autocrat of the situation and hold his orchestra in an iron grip. In none of these particulars has Mr. Nikisch distinguished himself, and in most of them he has totally failed.

During the three years that Mr. Nikisch has been attached to the orchestra I have discovered but two elements over which he has control, and these are the violence of the brasses and the infernal pounding of the drums. He excites these departments to the most fearful distortion of their parts, and glows in apparent delight at the consequence thereof. To be sure, Mr. Nikisch does not stand up before the audience with his hand on his hip and his arm akimbo, like a common peasant, as he did when he first came here, but otherwise I cannot see that his three years' experience has improved him in the least as a conductor, either in appearance or in results tending towards a refinement of the coarseness of performance he brought with him from his theatre in Leipsic. On the contrary, observe what experience has done for Mr. Henschel.

There are hundreds of musical students in this country who can stand up before the Boston Symphony Orchestra and do as well, or as ill, as Mr. Nikisch has done, with the probability that they will improve with experience but the position does not demand that class of individual. The taste of the public needs cultivating, not vitiating, and it is Mr. Higginson's duty to see to it that he obtains the best that can be had in pursuing his noble enterprise. Art calls for bread, but this this time he has given it a stone. The independent and discriminating critic of the Beacon exposes the situation in a clear light when he writes:

> It is a thousand pities that Mr. Higginson—whose noble initiative and sustaining power in the matter of these concerts cannot be too much commended or too well remembered—cannot make up his mind to replace his too bumptious conductor with a man who knows more and is consequently more reasonable ....Unfortunately a large part of the Symphony audiences do not know what is right—they attend the concerts in hope of learning—and another large part do not dare to protest. But the wrong Mr. Nikisch is allowed to do may become irreparable, unless at great cost of pains and labor, if he be not brought into subjection or dismissed.

Throughout the season the press have been almost unanimous in condemning the programmes and deficiencies of Mr. Nikisch and it would seem that in the end, if Mr. Higginson cares for the advancement of art, he must take cognizance of this opinion and find a more competent person for the position.

WARREN DAVENPOT.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, APRIL 26, 1892.

OF MUSICAL INTEREST.

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, gave its sixth and last concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening. As upon every previous occasion, a very large audience was present, and with an excellent programme, splendidly rendered, the concert made a fitting close to a signally successful series. Mr. Nikisch's arrangement of music included just six numbers, equally divided between the orchestra and Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, the soloists. In the first division there were Goldmark's impassioned and glowing "Sakuntala" overture, Beethoven's eighth symphony and Liszt's "Preludes," and each was an unalloyed delight. All three of these widely-differing compositions have been made familiar to concert-goers by frequent repetition, but last night all three were played in such a way as to endow them with fresh beauty and new significance. The Goldmark overture, with its wide range of emotion and its superbly poetic coloring, was rendered with a fervor of feeling and a splendor of tone which gave it its full value and meaning, and rendered it deeply impressive. With the symphony, so different in spirit and manner from its immediate predecessors, Mr. Nikisch seemed to be perfectly in touch, and his reading of it, in its lightness, gayety, elegance, mobility and sparkle, was the most satisfying of any interpretation of Beethoven which he has given here. His liking for the "tempo rubato," dangerous in the fifth symphony, could be and was advantageously indulged in the eighth. It was, however, in the "Preludes" that the orchestra was heard at its best, and its rendering of this, Liszt's most inspired and spontaneous work, in its technical brilliancy, its magnificent verve and entrain, and in a kind of spiritual elevation was indescribably and unsurpassably fine. The listener was made to feel that he was really hearing the music for the first time. The Henschels, who sang, separately and together, music by Massenet, Wagner and Goetz, are distinctively and essentially chamber singers, and while they gave pleasure and were well received, they made a very deep impression.

Lowell Opera House.

EUGEN D'ALBERT'S

PIANO RECITAL

Tuesday Evening, April 26, 1892, at 8.

..PROGRAMME..

Prelude and Fugue, D major,	Bach-D'Albert
Sonata, C major, Op. 53, Allegro con brio. Introduzione e Rondo.	Beethoven
Berceuse, Op. 57,	Chopin
Valse, Op. 42,
Nocturne, Op. 9, No. 3,
Impromptu, Op. 36,
Polonaise, Op. 53,
Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 3,	Schubert
BARCAROLLE, A minor,	Rubinstein
VALSE, "Man lebt nur einmal,"	Strauss-Tausig

THE "KNABE" PIANOS USED IN ALL D'ALBERT CONCERTS.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Press

TUESDAY, APRIL 26, 1892.

The Henschels at the Last Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began last evening its last concert of this season in Philadelphia by playing Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. One has been led to expect from this orchestra work so nearly perfect that one is disturbed by small flaws in the performance—flaws which, in the playing of many organizations would pass unnoticed. Last evening the rendering of the overture, though good, was not quite perfect; the opening passages did not go smoothly, and throughout there did not seem to be that perfect unity of execution which usually is so striking a feature of the playing of this orchestra. In the rendering of the symphony—Beethoven's Eighth—the orchestra recovered its form, the second and especially the fourth movements being performed with the utmost accuracy. The shading in these passages was varied and delicate. The interpretation that the leader gave, if somewhat personal, was decidedly effective. In the closing piece of the programme, the symphony poem "Les Preludes," by Liszt, the playing was exceedingly spirited. The vigorous crescendos in the rendering of the "tempest" passages were smooth, and the "triumphant" passage with which the piece closes was given with splendid verve.

Mrs. Henschel in her solo, the aria from "Herodiade," sang more dramatically than ever before in this city. Her voice though not great in volume is remarkably rich and sweet. Her singing is most exquisitely artistic. Mr. Henschel's method of singing is also surpassingly fine. In fact, last evening he affected the audience more strongly than his wife did, though his voice is not as agreeable as hers. In singing his solo, "Blich ich umber," from "Tannhauser" he was most dramatic. The dignified passage, "The Edlen," etc., he sang superbly. The enunciation of both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel is remarkably distinct. In the duet from "The Taming of the Shrew" both singers lost a little of their animation, but the rendering was satisfactory even if not enrapturing.

The audience completely filled the chairs. It furnished a curious accompaniment to part of the duet by turning over the leaves of the programmes in order to follow the words. The enthusiasm did not run as high as the excellence of the performance warranted. Before Lent both soloists would have been encored; as it was, Mr. Henschel was recalled three times and Mrs. Henschel twice.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 26, 1892.

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch Closes His Season in Philadelphia Brilliantly.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought a very large house to the Academy of Music—it seemed, indeed, like an opera night. It was a proof of the hold that Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra have gained, of the absolute certainty of their position, for, except for the announcement of the soloists, the programme contained nothing of unusual interest. Room was found for only three instrumental numbers—the "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark, the Beethoven Symphony No. 8, in F major, and Liszt's "Preludes." In the "Sakuntala" overture, indeed, Mr. Nikisch's method reaches its highest attraction. He understands this dreamy, half-Wagnerian composition perfectly and brings out its beauties with the utmost delicacy of accentuation. But the Beethoven symphony, though one of the gayest of all, is not one of the most specially noted, and as to the allurement of the "Preludes" there is room for difference of opinion. Their delivery, however, proved how well founded is the confidence that is felt in Mr. Nikisch's programmes, no matter how they are made up. Rarely has he been heard to such advantage in Beethoven. The warmest applause of the evening was brought out by the second movement of the symphony, which was taken with a grace and accuracy quite peculiar to the Bostonians.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were the soloists, and they were received with evident friendliness. Mrs. Henschel was charming in her aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," and Mr. Henschel strong and satisfactory in the "Blich ichu mher," from the second act of "Tannhauser." But their greatest success was in the duo from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," which was a veritable surprise in its execution.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, April 26, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last—and best—concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Academy of Music. Beethoven's eighth symphony was charmingly rendered, and Liszt's "Preludes" has never been more superbly given here. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel contributed three songs to the programme.

A COSMOPOLITAN CITIZEN.

A Chat with Georg Henschel, the Eminent German Baritone.

"While I am of foreign birth, and while my home at present is in London, Eng., I delight in calling myself a cosmopolitan with very decided United States tendencies." The speaker was the eminent German baritone, Georg Henschel who with his wife (born Lillian Bailey, of Columbus, O.,) are to sing at the grand symphony orchestra concert at the Detroit Rink this evening. He continued: "I have lived so much in this country, and that life has been, uniformly, so very agreeable and satisfactory, that I would be less than human did I not have very strong prejudices in favor of this land and its people."

"How long have you been in this country?"

"Our present tour began about two months ago under the management of C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Boston Music Hall—the same man who conducted the tours of D'Albert and Nordica. I had lived here before for a period of about four years in Boston. My wife and I have appeared repeatedly in all of the leading cities in this country and with the chief musical organizations in America. We began our present tour with recitals in Chickering Hall last March, since which time we have sung in Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, and all the important cities in the west."

"You were at one time, I believe, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?"

"Yes, I take pride in being recognized as the musical founder of that organization. I worked hard during the formative period of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and no one finds greater pleasure in noting the superb position in the hearts of American lovers of music which it has won and so well maintains than myself. It is not too much to say that it is a great orchestra fairly comparable to the great orchestras of the old world. While this fact is a satisfactory one, there is the better fact that the people of the United States are at last wide awake, sincere and full of the glorious enthusiasm of this country in their support of it and all good things in music."

"Then you think music in America is advancing?"

"Unquestionably. A notable proof of this fact is provided by the holding of music festivals all over the country, at which the best choral works are produced and in a creditable manner. Look at the eminent artists who have made the American tour this year. D'Albert, von Bulow, Paderewski, de Pachmann, Scharwenka and so on, and in each large city you will find a progressive, earnest choral society doing good work while in most cities there exist small orchestras of praiseworthy character. Then, too, there is the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Arthur Nikish at its head, Theo. Thomas and his orchestra in Chicago, the Philharmonic Orchestra, of Philadelphia, and similar high class organizations in New York and elsewhere. Of course the cause of music is advancing in this country. You had good proof of the fact at your own concert at the rink this evening. The rendition of "Gallia" was superb and the work of the orchestra was excellent."

"I suppose you expect to return to the old country?"

"We must. I have my regular work in London, as orchestral director, to which I must return, and then, too, my wife and myself have our regular music fest engagements in the various European capitals, which we are obliged to fill."

"How long have you been before the public as an artist?"

"Since I was 6 years old (laughing) I was first introduced as a somewhat remarkable pianist, and ever since that time my profession has been that of music, as pianist, orchestral director and vocalist. Just at present, however, my wife and myself have our time wholly filled with engagements, either for concerts such as the one to be given by your own musical society to-morrow (this) evening or for song recitals."

"Are not the average 'recitals,' whether of vocal or instrumental music, coming to be somewhat of a bore?"

"Possibly your qualification: 'the average' saves your inquiry because a great many recitals are tedious; but the real artist invariably keeps faith with the theory that good art must triumph. More than that he or she avoids all fictitious features, at the same time giving good variety and catering to the pleasure of those that are to be entertained."

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, who are to take part in the Symphony Orchestra concert at the Detroit Rink this evening, will sing the duetto buffo from "Don Pasquale." Mrs. Henschel's numbers will be an aria from Massenet's "Herodiad," the "Glen of Kenmare," (an old Irish song) and "May Song" by A. Hervey. Mr. Henschel's solos will be "Revenge, Timotheus cries," by Handel, "The Erl King" by Loewe and "The Grenadiers" by Schumann.

THE CICOTTE DROWNING.

[200]

Boston Daily Traveller

MONDAY, APRIL 25, 1892.

LAST OF THE SERIES.

Close of This Year's Symphony Concerts.

Mr. Kneisel's Fine Playing of Paganini's Concerto.

A Review of the Orchestra's Work Under Mr. Nikisch.

The last of this year's series of Symphony concerts took place at the Music Hall on Saturday evening. The programme was as follows: Haydn's Symphony No. 13; concerto for violin in D, Paganini, with Wilhelmj's revision and additions, and cadenzas by Kneisel; Symphony No. 1, C minor, Brahms. The playing of the orchestra was more satisfactory than generally, and Mr. Kneisel's performance of the concerto was of the highest description in every particular. Among the many admirable performances that this fine artist has given us, none have surpassed his playing upon this occasion. He was recalled again and again, and presented with a magnificent wreath and a large bouquet of flowers.

Contrary to the hopes of many Mr. Nikisch will continue as conductar of the orchestra another season. We are sorry that this is so, for sharing the opinion of many others, we do not believe that Mr. Nikisch is a competent person to fill the position of conductor of the Boston Symphony, in all that that term should imply. When he came here three years ago, he began in a bombastic manner to display at the very first concert a coarse and theatric vulgarity of interpretation that has marked his career ever since, in all that he has done.

The orchestra, which was perfect under his predecessor, Mr. Gericke, began at once to degenerate, and has continued in such a state to the present time of writing. Noise is the prevailing element that has characterized Mr. Nikisch's leading. Coarseness in the strings and blatancy in the wind, with an infernal pounding of the drums, are the elements that seem to satisfy the yearnings of his musical soul. Add to this the persistant attempt to moderize the classics to suit the mawkishness of his notions, and you have a fair idea of the standard that he has tried to establish as the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He has not improved one iota since he came here three years ago, and if he remains here three years more I don't believe he will show any advancement towards the point of ability that the position he holds should command of its incumbent.

To be sure after a good sound belaboring by the majority of the critics, he has modified the eccentricities and violence of his manner in certain compositions; for instance he probably will never indulge again in such a musical bullfight, as his first performance of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Still, however, his mania for noise has been tempered but slightly, and then in rare cases only. From the first he has broken down all artistic barriers, and rushed through the compositions in hand regardless of the necessities for contrast of movement, contrast of power, repose, precision and a well defined gradation in dynamics. In all the time he has been here he has not showed that there is any difference between f and ffff's; between mezzoforte, piano and pianissimo.

Stuck up on two boxes he has posed before the audience and beat the air with his baton while the orchestra went on through the music, sometime aparently regardless of his gyrations.

When we stop to think how that superb drillmaster and eminent conductor Wilhelm Gericke had trained and perfected the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it is easy enough to see how any one with a fair schooling in music could stand up before it and play as well as Nikisch has the part of a conductor. The orchestra can play without a conductor if necessary, and quite as well as they often have done under the present incumbent. To control and wield the orchestra is quite another thing. This Mr. Gericke did on every occasion. When Mr. Gericke ruled every player had to keep one eye on the music and one on the conductor, and Mr. Gericke's eye was upon every player. Not the slightest mistake escaped his observation.

Strict attention and the most rigid discipline prevailed. Since Mr. Nikisch has been attached the contrary has been the rule. The players converse and laugh together, and, for long spells at a time, do not look at the conductor, nor pay heed to his movements. Instruments play out of tune, and mistakes are made and no attention is paid to them. I have seen the conductor beating at one time, the orchestra playing at another, and the soloists at still another. Many a fine solo has been ruined through a rough, ragged and noisy accompaniment because the orchestra paid no heed to the situation and Mr. Nikisch paid no heed to the necessity of controlling the players. If Theodore Thomas and Wilhelm Gericke are conductors then Mr. Nikisch is not a conductor.

A conductor should be an exact time beater; he should have the constant and undivided attention of the players; he should guide and control all the movements of the orchestra; he should have a keen sense of contrasts and of gradations of tone; he should have, above all, the ability to impart repose to his renderings; he should have a discriminating taste and draw a sharp line between the purity of the classics and the sensuousness of modern composition; he should also be autocrat of the situation and hold his orchestra in an iron grip. In none of these particulars has Mr. Nikisch distinguished himself, and in most of them he has totally failed.

During the three years that Mr. Nikisch has been attached to the orchestra I have discovered but two elements over which he has control, and these are the violence of the brasses and the infernal pounding of the drums. He excites these departments to the most fearful distortion of their parts, and glows in apparent delight at the consequence thereof. To be sure, Mr. Nikisch does not stand up before the audience with his hand on his hip and his arm akimbo, like a common peasant, as he did when he first came here, but otherwise I cannot see that his three years' experience has improved him in the least as a conductor, either in appearance or in results tending towards a refinement of the coarseness of performance he brought with him from his theatre in Leipsic. On the contrary, observe what experience has done for Mr. Henschel.

There are hundreds of musical students in this country who can stand up before the Boston Symphony Orchestra and do as well, or as ill, as Mr. Nikisch has done, with the probability that they will improve with experience but the position does not demand that class of individual. The taste of the public needs cultivating, not vitiating, and it is Mr. Higginson's duty to see to it that he obtains the best that can be had in pursuing his noble enterprise. Art calls for bread, but this this time he has given it a stone. The independent and discriminating critic of the Beacon exposes the situation in a clear light when he writes:

> It is a thousand pities that Mr. Higginson—whose noble initiative and sustaining power in the matter of these concerts cannot be too much commended or too well remembered—cannot make up his mind to replace his too bumptious conductor with a man who knows more and is consequently more reasonable ....Unfortunately a large part of the Symphony audiences do not know what is right—they attend the concerts in hope of learning—and another large part do not dare to protest. But the wrong Mr. Nikisch is allowed to do may become irreparable, unless at great cost of pains and labor, if he be not brought into subjection or dismissed.

Throughout the season the press have been almost unanimous in condemning the programmes and deficiencies of Mr. Nikisch and it would seem that in the end, if Mr. Higginson cares for the advancement of art, he must take cognizance of this opinion and find a more competent person for the position.

WARREN DAVENPOT.

The North American

PHILADELPHIA, PA.

TUESDAY, APRIL 26, 1892.

OF MUSICAL INTEREST.

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, gave its sixth and last concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening. As upon every previous occasion, a very large audience was present, and with an excellent programme, splendidly rendered, the concert made a fitting close to a signally successful series. Mr. Nikisch's arrangement of music included just six numbers, equally divided between the orchestra and Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, the soloists. In the first division there were Goldmark's impassioned and glowing "Sakuntala" overture, Beethoven's eighth symphony and Liszt's "Preludes," and each was an unalloyed delight. All three of these widely-differing compositions have been made familiar to concert-goers by frequent repetition, but last night all three were played in such a way as to endow them with fresh beauty and new significance. The Goldmark overture, with its wide range of emotion and its superbly poetic coloring, was rendered with a fervor of feeling and a splendor of tone which gave it its full value and meaning, and rendered it deeply impressive. With the symphony, so different in spirit and manner from its immediate predecessors, Mr. Nikisch seemed to be perfectly in touch, and his reading of it, in its lightness, gayety, elegance, mobility and sparkle, was the most satisfying of any interpretation of Beethoven which he has given here. His liking for the "tempo rubato," dangerous in the fifth symphony, could be and was advantageously indulged in the eighth. It was, however, in the "Preludes" that the orchestra was heard at its best, and its rendering of this, Liszt's most inspired and spontaneous work, in its technical brilliancy, its magnificent verve and entrain, and in a kind of spiritual elevation was indescribably and unsurpassably fine. The listener was made to feel that he was really hearing the music for the first time. The Henschels, who sang, separately and together, music by Massenet, Wagner and Goetz, are distinctively and essentially chamber singers, and while they gave pleasure and were well received, they made a very deep impression.

Lowell Opera House.

EUGEN D'ALBERT'S

PIANO RECITAL

Tuesday Evening, April 26, 1892, at 8.

.. PROGRAMME ..

Prelude and Fugue, D major,	Bach-D'Albert
Sonata, C major, Op. 53, Allegro con brio. Introduzione e Rondo.	Beethoven
Berceuse, Op. 57, Valse, Op. 42, Nocturne, Op. 9, No. 3, Impromptu, Op. 36, Polonaise, Op. 53,	Chopin
Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 3,	Schubert
BARCAROLLE, A minor,	Rubinstein
VALSE, "Man lebt nur einmal,"	Strauss-Tausig

THE "KNABE" PIANOS USED IN ALL D'ALBERT CONCERTS.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

The Press

TUESDAY, APRIL 26, 1892.

The Henschels at the Last Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began last evening its last concert of this season in Philadelphia by playing Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. One has been led to expect from this orchestra work so nearly perfect that one is disturbed by small flaws in the performance—flaws which, in the playing of many organizations would pass unnoticed. Last evening the rendering of the overture, though good, was not quite perfect; the opening passages did not go smoothly, and throughout there did not seem to be that perfect unity of execution which usually is so striking a feature of the playing of this orchestra. In the rendering of the symphony—Beethoven's Eighth—the orchestra recovered its form, the second and especially the fourth movements being performed with the utmost accuracy. The shading in these passages was varied and delicate. The interpretation that the leader gave, if somewhat personal, was decidedly effective. In the closing piece of the programme, the symphony poem "Les Preludes," by Liszt, the playing was exceedingly spirited. The vigorous crescendos in the rendering of the "tempest" passages were smooth, and the "triumphant" passage with which the piece closes was given with splendid verve.

Mrs. Henschel in her solo, the aria from "Herodiade," sang more dramatically than ever before in this city. Her voice though not great in volume is remarkably rich and sweet. Her singing is most exquisitely artistic. Mr. Henschel's method of singing is also surpassingly fine. In fact, last evening he affected the audience more strongly than his wife did, though his voice is not as agreeable as hers. In singing his solo, "Blich ich umber," from "Tannhauser" he was most dramatic. The dignified passage, "The Edlen," etc., he sang superbly. The enunciation of both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel is remarkably distinct. In the duet from "The Taming of the Shrew" both singers lost a little of their animation, but the rendering was satisfactory even if not enrapturing.

The audience completely filled the chairs. It furnished a curious accompaniment to part of the duet by turning over the leaves of the programmes in order to follow the words. The enthusiasm did not run as high as the excellence of the performance warranted. Before Lent both soloists would have been encored; as it was, Mr. Henschel was recalled three times and Mrs. Henschel twice.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, APRIL 26, 1892.

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch Closes His Season in Philadelphia Brilliantly.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought a very large house to the Academy of Music—it seemed, indeed, like an opera night. It was a proof of the hold that Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra have gained, of the absolute certainty of their position, for, except for the announcement of the soloists, the programme contained nothing of unusual interest. Room was found for only three instrumental numbers—the "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark, the Beethoven Symphony No. 8, in F major, and Liszt's "Preludes." In the "Sakuntala" overture, indeed, Mr. Nikisch's method reaches its highest attraction. He understands this dreamy, half-Wagnerian composition perfectly and brings out its beauties with the utmost delicacy of accentuation. But the Beethoven symphony, though one of the gayest of all, is not one of the most specially noted, and as to the allurement of the "Preludes" there is room for difference of opinion. Their delivery, however, proved how well founded is the confidence that is felt in Mr. Nikisch's programmes, no matter how they are made up. Rarely has he been heard to such advantage in Beethoven. The warmest applause of the evening was brought out by the second movement of the symphony, which was taken with a grace and accuracy quite peculiar to the Bostonians.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were the soloists, and they were received with evident friendliness. Mrs. Henschel was charming in her aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," and Mr. Henschel strong and satisfactory in the "Blich ichu mher," from the second act of "Tannhauser." But their greatest success was in the duo from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," which was a veritable surprise in its execution.

THE RECORD.

Philadelphia, April 26, 1892.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The last—and best—concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Academy of Music. Beethoven's eighth symphony was charmingly rendered, and Liszt's "Preludes" has never been more superbly given here. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel contributed three songs to the programme.

A COSMOPOLITAN CITIZEN.

A Chat with Georg Henschel, the Eminent German Baritone.

"While I am of foreign birth, and while my home at present is in London, Eng., I delight in calling myself a cosmopolitan with very decided United States tendencies." The speaker was the eminent German baritone, Georg Henschel who with his wife (born Lillian Bailey, of Columbus, O.,) are to sing at the grand symphony orchestra concert at the Detroit Rink this evening. He continued: "I have lived so much in this country, and that life has been, uniformly, so very agreeable and satisfactory, that I would be less than human did I not have very strong prejudices in favor of this land and its people."

"How long have you been in this country?"

"Our present tour began about two months ago under the management of C. A. Ellis, manager of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and of the Boston Music Hall—the same man who conducted the tours of D'Albert and Nordica. I had lived here before for a period of about four years in Boston. My wife and I have appeared repeatedly in all of the leading cities in this country and with the chief musical organizations in America. We began our present tour with recitals in Chickering Hall last March, since which time we have sung in Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Washington, and all the important cities in the west."

"You were at one time, I believe, the director of the Boston Symphony Orchestra?"

"Yes, I take pride in being recognized as the musical founder of that organization. I worked hard during the formative period of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and no one finds greater pleasure in noting the superb position in the hearts of American lovers of music which it has won and so well maintains than myself. It is not too much to say that it is a great orchestra fairly comparable to the great orchestras of the old world. While this fact is a satisfactory one, there is the better fact that the people of the United States are at last wide awake, sincere and full of the glorious enthusiasm of this country in their support of it and all good things in music."

"Then you think music in America is advancing?"

"Unquestionably. A notable proof of this fact is provided by the holding of music festivals all over the country, at which the best choral works are produced and in a creditable manner. Look at the eminent artists who have made the American tour this year. D'Albert, von Bulow, Paderewski, de Pachmann, Scharwenka and so on, and in each large city you will find a progressive, earnest choral society doing good work while in most cities there exist small orchestras of praiseworthy character. Then, too, there is the Boston Symphony Orchestra with Arthur Nikish at its head, Theo. Thomas and his orchestra in Chicago, the Philharmonic Orchestra, of Philadelphia, and similar high class organizations in New York and elsewhere. Of course the cause of music is advancing in this country. You had good proof of the fact at your own concert at the rink this evening. The rendition of "Gallia" was superb and the work of the orchestra was excellent."

"I suppose you expect to return to the old country?"

"We must. I have my regular work in London, as orchestral director, to which I must return, and then, too, my wife and myself have our regular music fest engagements in the various European capitals, which we are obliged to fill."

"How long have you been before the public as an artist?"

"Since I was 6 years old (laughing) I was first introduced as a somewhat remarkable pianist, and ever since that time my profession has been that of music, as pianist, orchestral director and vocalist. Just at present, however, my wife and myself have our time wholly filled with engagements, either for concerts such as the one to be given by your own musical society to-morrow (this) evening or for song recitals."

"Are not the average 'recitals,' whether of vocal or instrumental music, coming to be somewhat of a bore?"

"Possibly your qualification: 'the average' saves your inquiry because a great many recitals are tedious; but the real artist invariably keeps faith with the theory that good art must triumph. More than that he or she avoids all fictitious features, at the same time giving good variety and catering to the pleasure of those that are to be entertained."

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, who are to take part in the Symphony Orchestra concert at the Detroit Rink this evening, will sing the duetto buffo from "Don Pasquale." Mrs. Henschel's numbers will be an aria from Massenet's "Herodiad," the "Glen of Kenmare," (an old Irish song) and "May Song" by A. Hervey. Mr. Henschel's solos will be "Revenge, Timotheus cries," by Handel, "The Erl King" by Loewe and "The Grenadiers" by Schumann.

THE CICOTTE DROWNING

TUESDAY, APRIL 26, 1892.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

the Season at the Academy of Music.

Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the this year's series of concerts at the last night. The house was filled part. The program was as follows:

............Overture, "Sakuntala"
............Aria from "Herodiade"
Mrs. Henschel.
Beethoven .....Symphony No. 8, in F major
Wagner..Fantasie from Act II, "Tannhaeuser," "Blich ich umher."
Mr. Henschel.
Goetz....Duet from "Taming of the Shrew"
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Liszt.....Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

The familiar "Sakuntala" overture received a more vigorous treatment than is Mr. Nikisch's wont. The Eastern tale translated into modern music is as interesting as it is novel. The symphony was played with spirit. This is one of Beethoven's most joyous productions. Though as melancholy as ever when it was written, he seems to have gotten outside of himself long enough to leave on record one large work without a tinge of sadness in it. It is the kind of composition that this orchestra can do full justice to under Mr. Nikisch's direction, and the result was satisfactory.

The Liszt number, like all of the symphonic poems, is open to the criticism that it is an attempt to carry out an idea to too great lengths. It falls below the symphony in this respect: that one idea is supposed to be continuous, and the audience is supposed to follow it from one stage to another, without any artificial aid. This is asking too much of the average audience. It is an important work, and in the main satisfactory, but it is a risk to produce it in a concert like this.

The Henschels sang well, but did not make the impression that they did in ballad singing, which is their forte. Mr. Henschel sang the "Tannhaeuser" number very well, but Mrs. Henschel's voice was not large enough for the building.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Tuesday, April 26, 1892.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The close of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's local season, in the Academy of Music, last evening, was marked by the attendance of an audience whose size and character showed conclusively the popularity attained by the fine organization which Mr. Nikisch directs so carefully. The concert offered nothing particularly novel, but it was a thoroughly interesting affair, principally owing to the playing of Beethoven's eighth (F Major) symphony and the appearance of those admirable artists, Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel—whom to hear is a liberal education in the way of vocal culture. The programme opened with a virile, picturesque performance of the "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark, and the succeeding instrumental numbers comprised the Beethoven symphony and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." The treatment of the symphony displayed, among other things, the finesse of the band and the almost military precision with which everything is done by the musicians, who are quick to interpret every look—one might say every thought—of the watchful conductor. It would be difficult to imagine a more exquisitely delicate presentation of the allegretto scherzando or the minuet, while the allegro vivace was given with all needed gaiety of spirit and brilliancy. The whole work is one unusually well suited to the refined, dainty methods of the Boston Orchestra, and it was therefore done full justice.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were heard singly and together, and it was quite evident that they had many friends in the large audience. The aria from "Herodiade" that the latter sang was not altogether a happy selection for her, yet Mrs. Henschel is an artiste who does everything well, and so she acquitted herself most pleasantly. Mr. Henschel's singing of the fantasy "Blich ich Umher," from the second act of "Tannhauser," was (to those of his admirers who were unfamiliar with his ability as a Wagnerian exponent) a striking proof of his versatility. He earned some of the heartiest applause of the evening for this successful effort.

Buffalo apr 23
Commercial

—Buffalo will again have an opportunity of hearing the pianist D'Albert on May 3d, at the Star Theatre, the Boston Symphony Orchestra appearing there on that date. D'Albert will give Chopin's Concerto in E minor. The other soloist will be the 'cellist Mr. Schroeder, who will play Chopin's Nocturne, Schubert's "Moment Musical" and a Capriccioso by Kluengel. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nickisch, will give a symphony of Dvorak's, the Lohengrin Prelude and Berlioz's overture "Benvenuto Cellini."

—Mr. and Mrs. George Henshels will appear at the Academy of Music May twenty-fifth.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 4-24

Henschel's music to "Hamlet," written for Henry Irving's production of the play, was given by the Boston symphony orchestra at its home concert last night. Boston has been full of music lately, Pachmann, D'Albert, the Kneisel quartet, Mele, the united choirs, with orchestra, and a number of other singers and players, having been engaged there in concert and recital.

[201]

COMMERCIAL, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 4/23

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, that peerless musical organization, closes its Boston season today and starts on its brief annual tour in which Buffalo is included. This orchestra is the pride of the whole country for it is not only the finest we have but it probably has a higher standing than any other in the world. Our people have heard it in former seasons and know what delight it performances afford, and what perfection and beauty characterize its concerts under Mr. Nikisch's baton. D'Albert the pianist, accompanies it on this tour. His superb playing with the orchestra as told in the New York and Boston press may be readily understood for his recital here recently was one of the finest exhibitions of piano playing we have had. A great program has been arranged and the performance takes place May 3d in the Star Theatre. Seats go on sale Monday.

TIMES, Philadelphia, Penn.

Date 4-24

The Academy of Music will be the scene of a number of important musical entertainments this week, beginning with the last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-morrow evening. For this occasion Mr. Nikisch has prepared a most attractive programme, embracing Goldmark's beautiful "Sakuntala" overture, the brilliant eighth symphony of Beethoven, and "Les Preludes" of Liszt. The soloists will be Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, whose exquisite song recitals a few weeks ago have quickened the desire to hear them again with the orchesta. Mrs. Henschel sings the aria from "Herodiade," Mr. Henschel "Blich ich umher," from "Tannhauser," and their duet is from "The Taming of the Shrew," of Goetz.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed last week its regular home series of twenty-four public rehearsals and concerts at Music Hall and with the concert here to-morrow night starts on its sixth annual tour. The season is said to have been the most prosperous in its history and the tour promises to be uncommonly successful. After closing the regular series of concerts in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, the orchestra will go West, giving concerts in Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Chicago, thence to Grand Rapids, Ann Arbor and Detroit and back for three concerts at Pittsburg, closing on May 16. Mr. Ellis, the successful manager of this fine organization, goes in advance, his assistant, Mr. Comee, traveling in charge of the orchestra. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Eugen d'Albert are the soloists at these spring concerts.

TIMES, Buffalo, N. Y.

4/23 4/2

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city is an event always eagerly anticipated by the music public who recognize it as an important feature of each musical season. This organization under its distinguished young conductor, Arthur Nikisch, will give a single concert at the Star theater, on Tuesday evening, May 3. Seventy-five performers will appear in the ranks and a superb programme is promised. The management have been unusually fortunate this year in securing as soloist Eugen d'Albert, considered by many the first pianist of the age. The concert offers a wealth of attractions to the musical and will undoubtedly pack the theater to the doors. The sale of tickets and boxes opens next Monday.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 4-26

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, gave its sixth and last concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening. As upon every previous occasion, a very large audience was present, and with an excellent programme, splendidly rendered, the concert made a fitting close to a signally successful series. Mr. Nikisch's arrangement of music included just six numbers, equally divided between the orchestra and Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, the soloists. In the first division there were Goldmark's impassioned and glowing "Sakuntala" overture, Beethoven's eighth symphony and Liszt's "Preludes," and each was an unalloyed delight. All three of these widely-differing compositions have been made familiar to concert-goers by frequent repetition, but last night all three were played in such a way as to endow them with fresh beauty and new significance. The Goldmark overture, with its wide range of emotion and its superbly poetic coloring, was rendered with a fervor of feeling and a splendor of tone which gave it its full value and meaning, and rendered it deeply impressive. With the symphony, so different in spirit and manner from its immediate predecessors, Mr. Nikisch seemed to be perfectly in touch, and his reading of it, in its lightness, gayety, elegance, mobility and sparkle, was the most satisfying of any interpretation of Beethoven which he has given here. His liking for the "tempo rubato," dangerous in the fifth symphony, could be and was advantageously indulged in the eighth. It was, however, in the "Preludes" that the orchestra was heard at its best, and its rendering of this, Liszt's most inspired and spontaneous work, in its technical brilliancy, its magnificent verve and entrain, and in a kind of spiritual elevation was indescribably and unsurpassably fine. The listener was made to feel that he was really hearing the music for the first time. The Henschels, who sang, separately and together, Massenet, Wagner and [illegible] and essentially

---

PUBLIC LEDGER, Philadelphia, Penn.

Date 4-26

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The close of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's local season, in the Academy of Music, last evening, was marked by the attendance of an audience whose size and character showed conclusively the popularity attained by the fine organization which Mr. Nikisch directs so carefully. The concert offered nothing particularly novel, but it was a thoroughly interesting affair, principally owing to the playing of Beethoven's eighth (F Major) symphony and the appearance of those admirable artists, Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel—whom to hear is a liberal education in the way of vocal culture. The programme opened with a virile, picturesque performance of the "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark, and the succeeding instrumental numbers comprised the Beethoven symphony and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." The treatment of the symphony displayed, among other things, the finesse of the band and the almost military precision with which everything is done by the musicians, who are quick to interpret every look—one might say every thought—of the watchful conductor. It would be difficult to imagine a more exquisitely delicate presentation of the allegretto scherzando or the minuet, while the allegro vivace was given with all needed gaiety of spirit and brilliancy. The whole work is one unusually well suited to the refined, dainty methods of the Boston Orchestra, and it was therefore done full justice.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were heard singly and together, and it was quite evident that they had many friends in the large audience. The aria from "Herodiade" that the latter sang was not altogether a happy selection for her, yet Mrs. Henschel is an artiste who does everything well, and so she acquitted herself most pleasantly. Mr. Henschel's singing of the fantasy "Blich ich Umher," from the second act of "Tannhauser," was (to those of his admirers who were unfamiliar with his ability as a Wagnerian exponent) a striking proof of his versatility. He earned some of the heartiest applause of the evening for this successful effort.

TELEGRAPH, Philadelphia, Penn.

Date 4-26

THE LAST CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last concert in the Boston Symphony Season was given before a full audience at the Academy of Music last evening. The programme which was offered contained nothing new nor of such particular merit as might have accompanied the closing appearance of this sterling musical organization. The symphony part of the entertainment was somewhat overshadowed by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, who had three numbers out of the six. These artists were accorded the same warm reception which they received here earlier in the year, and maintained the favorable impression which they created at that time. Mrs. Henschel sang alone in an aria from Heriodade; Mr. Henschel rendered the beautiful fantasy from Act II of Tannhauser, "Blich ich umher," and the two together sang a duet and vocal dialogue from Taming of the Shrew. In this last number the true scope and melody of Mr. Henschel's voice were heard at fine advantage, and Mrs. Henschel's, if any, the less pleasing, was owing to her manner, which is a trifle dramatic and less free than her husband's. The orchestra played Goldmark's overture, Sakuntala, Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F Major, and Liszt's symphonic poem Les Preludes. The Eighth Symphony is full of brilliant expression, especially in the second movement. There is a grace about the theme here that few orchestras except Mr. Nikisch's have ever interpreted with such feeling and thorough poetic skill. Liszt's Les Preludes is always welcome. The warmth and animation in this piece is of a very freshening kind, and the composition is of the sort calculated to bring out the full strength of an orchestra. The fine balance of string and brass which Mr. Nikisch maintains in his organization was never more plainly apparent. The musical people of Philadelphia will regret that the enjoyable season is ended, and will hope that these visits from Mr. Nikisch, which have come to be a feature of every entertainment season, will be as happily continued next year.

---

from Phila Times

4-26

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch Closes His Season in Philadelphia Brilliantly.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought a very large house to the Academy of Music—it seemed, indeed, like an opera night. It was a proof of the hold that Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra have gained, of the absolute certainty of their position, for, except for the announcement of the soloists, the programme contained nothing of unusual interest. Room was found for only three instrumental numbers—the "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark, the Beethoven Symphony No. 8, in F major, and Liszt's "Preludes." In the "Sakuntala" overture, indeed, Mr. Nikisch's method reaches its highest attraction. He understands this dreamy, half-Wagnerian composition perfectly and brings out its beauties with the utmost delicacy of accentuation. But the Beethoven symphony, though one of the gayest of all, is not one of the most specially noted, and as to the allurement of the "Preludes" there is room for difference of opinion. Their delivery, however, proved how well founded is the confidence that is felt in Mr. Nikisch's programmes, no matter how they are made up. Rarely has he been heard to such advantage in Beethoven. The warmest applause of the evening was brought out by the second movement of the symphony, which was taken with a grace and accuracy quite peculiar to the Bostonians.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were the soloists, and they were received with evident friendliness. Mrs. Henschel was charming in her aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," and Mr. Henschel strong and satisfactory in the "Blich ichu mher," from the second act of "Tannhauser." But their greatest success was in the duo from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," which was a veritable surprise in its execution.

Clipping from Tribune
Cambridge Ma

Date 4-23

Symphony Concert.

The eighth and last of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given in Sanders theatre, Thursday evening, with this programme:

Wagner, Overture to the "Flying Dutchman."
Chopin, Concerto for piano in E minor, Op. 11.
Saint Saëns....Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet D'Omphale."
Soli for Piano.
Rubenstein.......................Barcarolle
Strauss-Tausig ....."Man lebt nur Einmal."
Schumann...........Symphony in D minor.
Mr. Eugen D'Albert was the pianist.

Wagner's Overture to the "Flying Dutchman" is so characteristic of the opera, that after hearing it, one has an irresistible desire to see the curtain rise, with the blood-red sails and black masts of the terrible ship in the distance. Under Mr. Nikisch's vivid touch, one heard the motifs of the curse, the restless motion of the sea, the angels' message, the yo-ho of the crew, and Senta's phrase, treated like a hymn of triumph. It was superbly played, and warmly applauded. Mr. D'Albert gave a most virile performance of Tausig's arrangement of Chopin's E minor Concerto, his astonishing technique being more than equal to all the demands of the composer. If the rendering of the beautiful Romanza was not as deeply poetical as one might have wished, the unaffected manly playing of the artist, and his beautiful, limpid touch deserved the warmest admiration. The Finale was delighfully played, with charming rhythm, while the concluding passages by Tausig in double octaves, were worked up to a truly stupendous climax. Mr. D'Albert was recalled several times with great enthusiasm. The orchestral accompaniment was exquisitely played. Saint-Saëns Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet D'Omphale" (the Spinning-wheel of Omphale), was the first of a group of four pieces to introduce a new era in orchestral playing into France, and to establish a Frenchman with a masterly and picturesque method. This fascinating composition is supposed to depict Hercules' love for Omphale, and the spinning wheel is simply introduced to give the necessary form and motion to the three subjects which Saint-Saëns wished to illustrate, viz: "The power of feminine allurement," "Hercules in bondage," "Omphale deriding the vain efforts of the hero." It was played to a charm, and it is not to be wondered at that even Hercules could not resist the spell.

The chef d'œuvre of the concert, however, was Schumann's glorious symphony in D minor, which has been made doubly interesting this winter by the performance of the "original version." We must prefer the changes which Schumann made, for although they do not affect the great outline of the symphony, the wind parts are much more beautiful in consequence. The genius and temperament of Mr. Nikisch are so closely allied with the greatest romantic composer of modern times, that he seizes instinctively each change of mood, which his absolute mastery over his orchestra enables him to express to perfection. The performance of this symphony was a fitting ending to one of the most beautiful series of concerts ever given in Cambridge. It is definitely announced that next year will inaugurate the custom of twelve symphony concerts in Sanders theatre.

C. R.

Clipping from News
Muskegon-Mich

Date 4-24

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Muskegon Will Be Represented at the Musical Event in Grand Rapids.

The Boston symphony orchestra will give a concert at Hartman's hall, in Grand Rapids, Monday evening, May 9. It will be the musical event of the season in western Michigan and Muskegon will be represented. Tickets will be good on the regular train on the M. G. R. & I. Monday afternoon, and a special train will bring the party back after the concert. The railway fare has been placed at $1.40 for the round trip, and the tickets to the concert will be $1.50 Tickets can be obtained here of Mr. T. C. Clark, at his office. Among those who signified their intention yesterday of going are:

Messrs. and Mesdames A. J. Shaw, F. A. Nims, A. Bruegger, N. Friedman, C. H. Hills, L. G. Mason, J. W. Strong, D. D. Erwin, Thos. Munroe, W. B. McLaughlin, L. R. Marvin, H. O. Lange, W. H. Barney, J. E. Montgomery, J. J. Emery, Jr., L. B. Smith, E. A. Worden, D. A. Wilson, A. F. Temple, C. C. Howell, L. E. Chase.

Misses Ray, Erwin, McIntyre, Nims.

Messrs. George A. McKay, T. C. Clark, J. F. Hobbes, W. F. Ayres, W. H. Wilson, R. A. Fleming, G. S. Williams, C. H. Kimball, Fred Torrent, S. Rosen, Chas. L. Griffin.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY, APRIL 26, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Close of the Season at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the last of this year's series of concerts at the Academy last night. The house was filled in every part. The program was as follows:

Goldmark............Overture, "Sakuntala"
Massenet............Aria from "Herodiade"
Mrs. Henschel.
Beethoven......Symphony No. 8, in F major
Wagner..Fantasie from Act II, "Tannhaeuser," "Blich ich umher."
Mr. Henschel.
Goetz....Duet from "Taming of the Shrew"
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Liszt.....Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes."

The familiar "Sakuntala" overture received a more vigorous treatment than is Mr. Nikisch's wont. The Eastern tale translated into modern music is as interesting as it is novel. The symphony was played with spirit. This is one of Beethoven's most joyous productions. Though as melancholy as ever when it was written, he seems to have gotten outside of himself long enough to leave on record one large work without a tinge of sadness in it. It is just the kind of composition that this orchestra can do full justice to under Mr. Nikisch's direction, and the result was satisfactory.

The Liszt number, like all of the symphonic poems, is open to the criticism that it is an attempt to carry out an idea to too great lengths. It falls below the symphony in this respect: that one idea is supposed to be continuous, and the audience is supposed to follow it from one stage to another, without any artificial aid. This is asking too much of the average audience. It is an important work, and in the main satisfactory, but it is a risk to produce it in a concert like this.

The Henchels sang well, but did not make the impression that they did in ballad singing, which is their forte. Mr. Henschel sang the "Tannhaeuser" number very well, but Mrs. Henschel's voice was not large enough for the building.

LEDGER AND TRANSCRIPT.

Philadelphia, Tuesday, April 26, 1892.

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The close of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's local season, in the Academy of Music, last evening, was marked by the attendance of an audience whose size and character showed conclusively the popularity attained by the fine organization which Mr. Nikisch directs so carefully. The concert offered nothing particularly novel, but it was a thoroughly interesting affair, principally owing to the playing of Beethoven's eighth (F Major) symphony and the appearance of those admirable artists, Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel—whom to hear is a liberal education in the way of vocal culture. The programme opened with a virile, picturesque performance of the "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark, and the succeeding instrumental numbers comprised the Beethoven symphony and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." The treatment of the symphony displayed, among other things, the finesse of the band and the almost military precision with which everything is done by the musicians, who are quick to interpret every look—one might say every thought—of the watchful conductor. It would be difficult to imagine a more exquisitely delicate presentation of the allegretto scherzando or the minuet, while the allegro vivace was given with all needed gaiety of spirit and brilliancy. The whole work is one unusually well suited to the refined, dainty methods of the Boston Orchestra, and it was therefore done full justice.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were heard singly and together, and it was quite evident that they had many friends in the large audience. The aria from "Herodiade" that the latter sang was not altogether a happy selection for her, yet Mrs. Henschel is an artiste who does everything well, and so she acquitted herself most pleasantly. Mr. Henschel's singing of the fantasy "Blich ich Umher," from the second act of "Tannhauser," was (to those of his admirers who were unfamiliar with his ability as a Wagnerian exponent) a striking proof of his versatility. He earned some of the heartiest applause of the evening for this successful effort.

Commercial

—Buffalo will again have an opportunity of hearing the pianist D'Albert on May 3d, at the Star Theatre, the Boston Symphony Orchestra appearing there on that date. D'Albert will give Chopin's Concerto in E minor. The other soloist will be the 'cellist Mr. Schroeder, who will play Chopin's Nocturne, Schubert's "Moment Musical" and a Capriccioso by Kluengel. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nickisch, will give a symphony of Dvorak's, the Lohengrin Prelude and Berlioz's overture "Benvenuto Cellini."

—Mr. and Mrs. George Henshels will appear at the Academy of Music May twenty-fifth.

Date 4-24

Henschel's music to "Hamlet," written for Henry Irving's production of the play, was given by the Boston symphony orchestra at its home concert last night. Boston has been full of music lately, Pachmann, D'Albert, the Kneisel quartet, Mr. Mele, the united choirs, with orchestra, and a number of other singers and players, having been engaged there in concert and recital.

[201]

COMMERCIAL, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 4/23

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, that peerless musical organization, closes its Boston season today and starts on its brief annual tour in which Buffalo is included. This orchestra is the pride of the whole country for it is not only the finest we have but it probably has a higher standing than any other in the world. Our people have heard it in former seasons and know what delight it performances afford, and what perfection and beauty characterize its concerts under Mr. Nikisch's baton. D'Albert the pianist, accompanies it on this tour. His superb playing with the orchestra as told in the New York and Boston press may be readily understood for his recital here recently was one of the finest exhibitions of piano playing we have had. A great program has been arranged and the performance takes place May 3d in the Star Theatre. Seats go on sale Monday.

TIMES, Philadelphia, Penn.

Date 4-24

The Academy of Music will be the scene of a number of important musical entertainments this week, beginning with the last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to-morrow evening. For this occasion Mr. Nikisch has prepared a most attractive programme, embracing Goldmark's beautiful "Sakuntala" overture, the brilliant eighth symphony of Beethoven, and "Les Preludes" of Liszt. The soloists will be Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, whose exquisite song recitals a few weeks ago have quickened the desire to hear them again with the orchesta. Mrs. Henschel sings the aria from "Herodiade," Mr. Henschel "Blich ich umher," from "Tannhauser," and their duet is from "The Taming of the Shrew," of Goetz.

=

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed last week its regular home series of twenty-four public rehearsals and concerts at Music Hall and with the concert here to-morrow night starts on its sixth annual tour. The season is said to have been the most prosperous in its history and the tour promises to be uncommonly successful. After closing the regular series of concerts in Philadelphia, New York, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn, the orchestra will go West, giving concerts in Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Chicago, thence to Grand Rapids, Ann Arbor and Detroit and back for three concerts at Pittsburg, closing on May 16. Mr. Ellis, the successful manager of this fine organization, goes in advance, his assistant, Mr. Comee, traveling in charge of the orchestra. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Eugen d'Albert are the soloists at these spring concerts.

TIMES, Buffalo, N. Y.

4/23

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The annual visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city is an event always eagerly anticipated by the music public who recognize it as an important feature of each musical season. This organization under its distinguished young conductor, Arthur Nikisch, will give a single concert at the Star theater, on Tuesday evening, May 3. Seventy-five performers will appear in the ranks and a superb programme is promised. The management have been unusually fortunate this year in securing as soloist Eugen d'Albert, considered by many the first pianist of the age. The concert offers a wealth of attractions to the musical and will undoubtedly pack the theater to the doors. The sale of tickets and boxes opens next Monday.

NORTH AMERICAN, Philadelphia, Pa.

Date 4-26

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy of Music.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Nikisch, gave its sixth and last concert for the season at the Academy of Music last evening. As upon every previous occasion, a very large audience was present, and with an excellent programme, splendidly rendered, the concert made a fitting close to a signally successful series. Mr. Nikisch's arrangement of music included just six numbers, equally divided between the orchestra and Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, the soloists. In the first division there were Goldmark's impassioned and glowing "Sakuntala" overture, Beethoven's eighth symphony and Liszt's "Preludes," and each was an unalloyed delight. All three of these widely-differing compositions have been made familiar to concert-goers by frequent repetition, but last night all three were played in such a way as to endow them with fresh beauty and new significance. The Goldmark overture, with its wide range of emotion and its superbly poetic coloring, was rendered with a fervor of feeling and a splendor of tone which gave it its full value and meaning, and rendered it deeply impressive. With the symphony, so different in spirit and manner from its immediate predecessors, Mr. Nikisch seemed to be perfectly in touch, and his reading of it, in its lightness, gayety, elegance, mobility and sparkle, was the most satisfying of any interpretation of Beethoven which he has given here. His liking for the "tempo rubato," dangerous in the fifth symphony, could be and was advantageously indulged in the eighth. It was, however, in the "Preludes" that the orchestra was heard at its best, and its rendering of this, Liszt's most inspired and spontaneous work, in its technical brilliancy, its magnificent verve and entrain, and in a kind of spiritual elevation was indescribably and unsurpassably fine. The listener was made to feel that he was really hearing the music for the first time. The Henschels, who sang, separately and together, music by Massenet, Wagner and Goetz, are distinctively and essentially chamber singers, and while they gave pleas-

---

PUBLIC LEDGER, Philadelphia, Penn.

Date 4-26

Academy of Music—Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The close of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's local season, in the Academy of Music, last evening, was marked by the attendance of an audience whose size and character showed conclusively the popularity attained by the fine organization which Mr. Nikisch directs so carefully. The concert offered nothing particularly novel, but it was a thoroughly interesting affair, principally owing to the playing of Beethoven's eighth (F Major) symphony and the appearance of those admirable artists, Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel—whom to hear is a liberal education in the way of vocal culture. The programme opened with a virile, picturesque performance of the "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark, and the succeeding instrumental numbers comprised the Beethoven symphony and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." The treatment of the symphony displayed, among other things, the finesse of the band and the almost military precision with which everything is done by the musicians, who are quick to interpret every look—one might say every thought—of the watchful conductor. It would be difficult to imagine a more exquisitely delicate presentation of the allegretto scherzando or the minuet, while the allegro vivace was given with all needed gaiety of spirit and brilliancy. The whole work is one unusually well suited to the refined, dainty methods of the Boston Orchestra, and it was therefore done full justice.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were heard singly and together, and it was quite evident that they had many friends in the large audience. The aria from "Herodiade" that the latter sang was not altogether a happy selection for her, yet Mrs. Henschel is an artiste who does everything well, and so she acquitted herself most pleasantly. Mr. Henschel's singing of the fantasy "Blich ich Umher," from the second act of "Tannhauser," was (to those of his admirers who were unfamiliar with his ability as a Wagnerian exponent) a striking proof of his versatility. He earned some of the heartiest applause of the evening for this successful effort.

TELEGRAPH, Philadelphia, Penn.

Date 4-26

d spirited work.

THE LAST CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last concert in the Boston Symphony Season was given before a full audience at the Academy of Music last evening. The programme which was offered contained nothing new nor of such particular merit as might have accompanied the closing appearance of this sterling musical organization. The symphony part of the entertainment was somewhat overshadowed by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, who had three numbers out of the six. These artists were accorded the same warm reception which they received here earlier in the year, and maintained the favorable impression which they created at that time. Mrs. Henschel sang alone in an aria from Heriodade; Mr. Hensche rendered the beautiful fantasy from Act II of Tannhauser, "Blich ich umher," and the two together sang a duet and vocal dialogue from Taming of the Shrew. In this last number the true scope and melody of Mr. Henschel's voice were heard at fine advantage, and Mrs. Henschel's, if any, the less pleasing, was owing to her manner, which is a trifle dramatic and less free than her husband's. The orchestra played Goldmark's overture, Sakuntala, Beethoven's Symphony No. 8 in F Major, and Liszt's symphonic poem Les Preludes. The Eighth Symphony is full of brilliant expression, especially in the second movement. There is a grace about the theme here that few orchestras except Mr. Nikisch's have ever interpreted with such feeling and thorough poetic skill. Liszt's Les Preludes is always welcome. The warmth and animation in this piece is of a very freshening kind, and the composition is of the sort calculated to bring out the full strength of an orchestra. The fine balance of string and brass which Mr. Nikisch maintains in his organization was never more plainly apparent. The musical people of Philadelphia will regret that the enjoyable season is ended, and will hope that these visits from Mr. Nikisch, which have come to be a feature of every entertainment season, will be as happily continued next year.

---

from Phila Times

4-26

THE LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Nikisch Closes His Season in Philadelphia Brilliantly.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought a very large house to the Academy of Music—it seemed, indeed, like an opera night. It was a proof of the hold that Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra have gained, of the absolute certainty of their position, for, except for the announcement of the soloists, the programme contained nothing of unusual interest. Room was found for only three instrumental numbers—the "Sakuntala" overture of Goldmark, the Beethoven Symphony No. 8, in F major, and Liszt's "Preludes." In the "Sakuntala" overture, indeed, Mr. Nikisch's method reaches its highest attraction. He understands this dreamy, half-Wagnerian composition perfectly and brings out its beauties with the utmost delicacy of accentuation. But the Beethoven symphony, though one of the gayest of all, is not one of the most specially noted, and as to the allurement of the "Preludes" there is room for difference of opinion. Their delivery, however, proved how well founded is the confidence that is felt in Mr. Nikisch's programmes, no matter how they are made up. Rarely has he been heard to such advantage in Beethoven. The warmest applause of the evening was brought out by the second movement of the symphony, which was taken with a grace and accuracy quite peculiar to the Bostonians.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were the soloists, and they were received with evident friendliness. Mrs. Henschel was charming in her aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," and Mr. Henschel strong and satisfactory in the "Blich ichu mher," from the second act of "Tannhauser." But their greatest success was in the duo from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," which was a veritable surprise in its execution.

Clipping from Tribune
Cambridge Ma

Date 4-23

Symphony Concert.

The eighth and last of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given in Sanders theatre, Thursday evening, with this programme:

Wagner, Overture to the "Flying Dutchman."
Chopin, Concerto for piano in E minor, Op. 11.
Saint Saëns....Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet D'Omphale."
Soli for Piano.
Rubenstein..........................Barcarolle
Strauss-Tausig ......"Man lebt nur Einmal."
Schumann............Symphony in D minor.
Mr. Eugen D'Albert was the pianist.

Wagner's Overture to the "Flying Dutchman" is so characteristic of the opera, that after hearing it, one has an irresistible desire to see the curtain rise, with the blood-red sails and black masts of the terrible ship in the distance. Under Mr. Nikisch's vivid touch, one heard the motifs of the curse, the restless motion of the sea, the angels' message, the yo-ho of the crew, and Senta's phrase, treated like a hymn of triumph. It was superbly played, and warmly applauded. Mr. D'Albert gave a most virile performance of Tausig's arrangement of Chopin's E minor Concerto, his astonishing technique being more than equal to all the demands of the composer. If the rendering of the beautiful Romanza was not as deeply poetical as one might have wished, the unaffected manly playing of the artist, and his beautiful, limpid touch deserved the warmest admiration. The Finale was delighfully played, with charming rhythm, while the concluding passages by Tausig in double octaves, were worked up to a truly stupendous climax. Mr. D'Albert was recalled several times with great enthusiasm. The orchestral accompaniment was exquisitely played. Saint-Saëns Symphonic Poem, "Le Rouet D'Omphale" (the Spinning-wheel of Omphale), was the first of a group of four pieces to introduce a new era in orchestral playing into France, and to establish a Frenchman with a masterly and picturesque method. This fascinating composition is supposed to depict Hercules' love for Omphale, and the spinning wheel is simply introduced to give the necessary form and motion to the three subjects which Saint-Saëns wished to illustrate, viz: "The power of feminine allurement," "Hercules in bondage," "Omphale deriding the vain efforts of the hero." It was played to a charm, and it is not to be wondered at that even Hercules could not resist the spell.

The chef d œuvre of the concert, however, was Schumann's glorious symphony in D minor, which has been made doubly interesting this winter by the performance of the "original version." We must prefer the changes which Schumann made, for although they do not affect the great outline of the symphony, the wind parts are much more beautiful in consequence. The genius and temperament of Mr. Nikisch are so closely allied with the greatest romantic composer of modern times, that he seizes instinctively each change of mood, which his absolute mastery over his orchestra enables him to express to perfection. The performance of this symphony was a fitting ending to one of the most beautiful series of concerts ever given in Cambridge. It is definitely announced that next year will inaugurate the custom of twelve symphony concerts in Sanders theatre.

C. R.

Clipping from News
Muskegon-Mich

Date 4-24

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Muskegon Will Be Represented at the Musical Event in Grand Rapids.

The Boston symphony orchestra will give a concert at Hartman's hall, in Grand Rapids, Monday evening, May 9. It will be the musical event of the season in western Michigan and Muskegon will be represented. Tickets will be good on the regular train on the M. G. R. & I. Monday afternoon, and a special train will bring the party back after the concert. The railway fare has been placed at $1.40 for the round trip, and the tickets to the concert will be $1.50 Tickets can be obtained here of Mr. T. C. Clark, at his office. Among those who signified their intention yesterday of going are:

Messrs. and Mesdames A. J. Shaw, F. A. Nims, A. Bruegger, N. Friedman, C. H. Hills, L. G. Mason, J. W. Strong, D. D. Erwin, Thos. Munroe, W. B. McLaughlin, L. R. Marvin, H. O. Lange, W. H. Barney, J. E. Montgomery, J. J. Emery, Jr., L. B. Smith, E A. Worden, D. A. Wilson, A. F. Temple, C. C. Howell, L. E. Chase.

Misses Ray, Erwin, McIntyre, Nims.

Messrs. George A. McKay, T. C. Clark, J. F. Hobbes, W. F. Ayres, W. H. Wilson, R. A. Fleming, G. S. Williams, C. H. Kimball, Fred Torrent, S. Rosen, Chas. L. Griffin.

Worcester Spy

THE SPY SHOULD HAVE THE EYE OF ARGUS: HE IS HONORABLE IF HE DO BUT LOOK TO THE WELFARE OF THE COMMONWEALTH

WORCESTER.

TUESDAY, APRIL 26, 1892.

LUSTY APPLAUSE FOR D'ALBERT.

HE GAVE A GREAT RECITAL AND STOPPED AN ANNOYING CORNET.

It is hard to recall a musical audience more enthusiastic than that which attended the piano recital given by Eugen D'Albert in Association Hall last evening. One might say that the cozy proportions of the room were in some degree responsible for the intimate sympathy that was so early established between player and listener, but when one remembers the oppressive atmosphere, he instantly excludes the hall from all pleasant consideration, and bestows upon the pianist alone the full credit for every instant's pleasure.

Mr. D'Albert began with a powerful performance of his own version of Bach's D major prelude and fugue, which brought out surprisingly vigorous applause. There were moments in the time-honored Waldstein sonata when the young pianist seemed to forget his genius as an interpreter of Beethoven, but when he had finished the great opus 53, there remained little thought of disappointment, as the audience promptly testified. Good Beethoven playing is becoming rare, and such work as D'Albert's is therefore all the more interesting.

The pianist played Chopin's berceuse, op. 57, and waltz, op. 42, A flat major, and was about to begin a nocturne, when an ambitious musician outside began tooting a cornet. D'Albert made two feints at beginning, but the cornet kept serenely on and the pianist wouldn't. He left the piano in disgust, sped quickly down stairs ahead of his manager, found the cornet, stopped him up, came back to the piano as calmly as if nothing had happened, and went on with his music. The Chopin impromptu, op. 36, F sharp major, and the polonaise, op. 53, A flat major, awoke more hand-clapping, and D'Albert was compelled to return and play the Rubinstein etude, op. 23, C major, No. 3.

His final performances—Schubert's G major impromptu, Rubinstein's G major barcarolle, and the Strauss Tausig waltz, "Man lebt nur einmal"—were among the most enjoyable of the evening. The audience waited till after he had left the hall, and insisted on recalls till he came back and played Liszt's valse—impromptu.

If one has heard much of Paderewski, some little time seems to be required to put the listener in full sympathy with D'Albert again, however much one may have admired him. The return of that sympathy, nevertheless, is sure and the satisfaction is enduring. D'Albert has less of witchery and poetry than Paderewski, and less than the wonderful Pole's instant power to charm. On the other hand, the little polyglot German's tone is larger, his brilliancy is more dazzling, and his feeling just as strong and deep. D'Albert's style is leonine; Paderewski's is the essence of musical witchcraft. There can be no comparison between them, for they are very antipodes. Individual preference aside, the two artists must be allowed to walk side by side, at the head of living pianists, till maturer development shall determine which has the greater reserve of musical intellectuality. It may well be doubted, and it is doubted, whether Rubinstein himself, in these latter days, could vie with either in all departments of piano music.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 1892.

LAST BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The sixth and last New York concert of the Boston Orchestra this season was given under Mr. Nikisch's direction last evening in Chickering Hall, with Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Mr. Franz Kneisel as soloists. The hall was as usual crowded and the applause most hearty. The extraordinary success of these concerts speaks well for the good taste of this city, for in some respects the playing of this orchestra surpasses anything done by our local organizations. We have no such body of strings, and in incisive brilliancy this orchestra is unsurpassed.

The programme was not altogether a success last night, so far as the soloists were concerned. Mrs. Henschel's pure but small voice is not suited to dramatic music such as the familiar aria from Massenet's "Herodiade." One of the little French songs she sings so well would have been better. Neither could Mr. Henschel make much out of Wolfram's address in the second act of "Tannhauser," which is but ill suited to concert purposes.

Mr. Kneisel was happier with Paganini's D major violin concerto, which he played admirably, really doing wonders with the tremendously difficult closing cadenza and winning half a dozen recalls.

The orchestra played Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound" Dvorak's fourth symphony, which was heard at some of the Philharmonic concerts this winter. It is an unpretentious work, but full of clever quaintness, and was played with a techincal perfection and finish that cannot be too highly praised.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

—BY THE—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 1892.

CRITIC AND MANAGER.

IT is a matter for regret that the interests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city and vicinity are to be handled next season by Freddy Schwab. Schwab, in the dual capacity of critic and manager, can be of no possible value to that organization in the former function, for everything emanating from him, either written or inspired, will be known as dictated by his own interests. The conduct of the music critics of New York and Boston toward the four great pianists of the season—De Pachmann, Paderewski, Rummel and d'Albert—conclusively demonstrates that at the bottom there exists a universal unanimity on the methods of honest criticism, the only exception being Schwab, who, as the manager of De Pachmann and a financially interested party, could not, for the sake of his own investment, afford to treat with ordinary fairness the performances of the other three pianists. D'Albert, being under the management of Mr. Ellis, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this year, necessarily fared better at the hands of Schwab than Rummel or Paderewski did, for Schwab was speculating upon the tinuation of his contract for New York with the on Symphony Orchestra; hence his criticisms of lbert assumed a favorable hue.

It would be expecting more from human nature than the law allows to ask Schwab to separate his newspaper from his managerial functions. Better men than Schwab have been unable to divide or separate their interests when such a division indicated a pecuniary loss, and no one ever suspected Schwab of conjecturing the possibility of such an improbability. Schwab is in the business for all there is in it, and even those who are so fortunate as to be designated as enemies of his have never been able to point to any act on his part that could possibly discredit his instinct in that direction. It would be the height of folly to classify him as a failure, for he has made money as a manager and made it by means of combinations highly original and of a character that would make most managers hesitate before attempting to imitate them.

There is, therefore, no reason why he should not continue to remain an active operator in musical enterprises. It is unfortunate for those enterprises, particularly if they are of such an elevated species that the criticism they inspire should be looked upon as spontaneous instead of influenced by interests—particularly pecuniary ones.

For this reason it is to be regretted that the Boston Symphony Orchestra management did not find someone entirely divorced from critical newspaper work to take charge of its interests here next season. The combination of critic and manager is distasteful to everyone endowed with delicacy of feeling or a refined taste. It takes an awful amount of gall for a man to write favorable criticisms on his own enterprise and at the same time severely censure the conductor of a different organization or write nasty slurs against his personality. Schwab has enough of that kind of gall to fill a storage warehouse. Hence his association with such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be regretted and is regretted.

MR. NIKISCH'S CRITICAL ENVIRONMENT.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, does not recline on a bed of roses in Boston. His critical environment is at present singularly unpleasant, for, while the popularity of the symphony concerts and his personal popularity continue unabated, the most determined opposition on the part of a half dozen well-known music critics of the Hub to all he does must be very unpleasant for such an amiable, good hearted man as Arthur Nikisch certainly is. THE MUSICAL COURIER has always contended that there is no orchestra in America that can be compared to the famous Boston organization, a contention, by the way, that originated in Boston itself, for no epithets could be endearing enough to characterize Arthur Nikisch and his work during his first two years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All this, too, from the pens of the very men who to-day declare absolutely that no good can come forth from Nazareth.

Mr. Nikisch, they have suddenly discovered, is not an interpreter of music, and possibly later they will assert that he is neither a conductor nor a musician. THE MUSICAL COURIER gladly puts itself on record by declaring that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is unique as an orchestral organization and its conductor, Arthur Nikisch, as conductor and musician, is the most versatile in this country.

To show the extent of critical perversity in Boston it is only necessary to state that when a traveling orchestral organization appeared in that city its performances were lauded to the sky at the expense of the home orchestra, when it is notorious that the two orchestras are not on the same artistic plane at all. There must be a very large colored gentleman hidden somewhere in the critical wood pile of the Hub.

The d'Albert Orchestral Concert.—The program for the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Eugen d'Albert, the great virtuoso, at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on Monday evening, May 2, is as follows: 1. Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; 2. Concerto for piano, E minor, opus 11, Chopin; 3. Introduction to Act III., Dance of Apprentices, Procession of Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs, "Meistersinger," Wagner; 4. Pilgrims' March, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz; 5. Concerto for piano in E flat, Liszt.

BOSTON NEWS.

Boston Office of The Musical Courier,
157 Tremont Street, April 23, 1892.

THE twenty-fourth (and last) concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given this evening, with Mr. Franz Kneisel as the soloist, in the following program:

Symphony, G major, No. 13, B. & H. edition........................Haydn
Concerto (in one movement) for violin, in D major... ....Paganini
(Revised and with additions by Wilhelmj.)
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68..................................Brahms

It is a question if the orchestra has done better work this season than in the above program.

Mr. Nikisch's readings of both symphonies were most satisfactory.

In the Paganini concerto Mr. Kneisel excelled his every previous effort, and at the close of the number was recalled four or five times amid greater enthusiasm than a symphony audience has ever before displayed. And Mr. Kneisel deserved it all. As Concertmeister, artist and gentleman he has won the admiration and respect of every patron of our symphony concerts.

It must not be forgotten that to him we owe much for whatever pride we take in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * * *

On the afternoons of Monday, Wednesday and Saturday Mr. Eugen d'Albert gave three piano recitals in Music Hall. The program for the first was made up entirely of Beethoven's compositions, and while we are ever ready to pay tribute to the master we cannot refrain from observing that an entire afternoon of Beethoven sonatas is, to the majority, a tiresome feast, and calculated to turn the average musical digestive apparatus against sonatas forever.

At the second recital when a miscellaneous program was given the audience was not only larger in point of members, but much more enthusiastic. At the last recital the attendance was fully twice as large as at the first recital, and as for real enthusiasm there was no comparison. Mr. d'Albert's performance upon each occasion was simply colossal, He was intellectual ever, sentimental rarely, and then in a small degree. His execution is fully equal to that of any of his predecessors, and superior to most of them from every point of view. It is a question if any living man has ever equaled him in velocity—at the same time his precision is absolute.

His versatility seems boundless, and altogether he must take first rank in the army of virtuosi who have honored and delighted Boston the season just closed.

* * * *

GLE, Grand Rapids, Mich.

4-24

The Boston Symphony orchestra will play before one of the largest audiences ever seen in Hartman hall on Monday, May 9; 1,200 tickets have been disposed of in Grand Rapids alone. Mr. F. M. Davis spent yesterday in Muskegon, and reports that between 100 and 150 people will come over from that city to attend the great concert. Holland has sent in an order for fifty seats; Kalamazoo and Plainwell each want fifty; Grand Haven, Ionia and other surrounding towns will be represented by their music-loving people. As constant inquiries are being made about the reserved sale scheme, the following may not be amiss: On Monday, May 21, at noon, subscribers may exchange their tickets (which will be delivered to them during the coming week) for numbers, or line tickets, which entitle them to the sale of seats on Tuesday at 9 a. m. Only those who have these numbers can secure seats on Tuesday, and on Wednesday morning the sale will be opened to the general public and will continue until the night of the concert. As it has been reported in Muskegon that D'Albert, the greatest pianist in the world next to Rubenstein, will not play in the concert, this occasion is taken to deny such a statement, and to assure the public that he will play the great Liszt concerto. Among other things the orchestra will play an overture by Schumann, an overture by Weber, the prelude to "Lohengrin" by Wagner and some symphonic poems by St. Saens and Berlioz.

---

ping from Post Washington DC

4-24

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The grand series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be concluded next Wednesday with a programme worthy in every way to compare with the delightful ones that have been given by this peerless organization. Special interest will be given it by the appearance of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, whose recent recital showed what charming artists they are. The symphony is Beethoven's No. 7, in A. The opening number is that particularly melodious symphonic poem of Lizt, his "Les Preludes," and during the concert some of the choicest numbers in Wagner's "Die Merstersinger" are to be performed.

Clipping from News Muskegon Mich

Date 4-24

The Boston Symphony orchestra which is to appear in Grand Rapids, May 9, is the most proficient band of musicians ever organized in this country.

TIMES, Buffalo, N. Y.

te 4-25

The Symphony Concert.

General interest in the coming performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra was shown b[illegible] at the opening sale this morning. The concert takes place at the Star theater on Tuesday evening of next week.

MORNING
Worcester Spy

THE SPY SHOULD HAVE THE EYE OF ARGUS: HE IS HONORABLE IF HE DO BUT LOOK TO THE WELFARE OF THE COMMONWEALTH

WORCESTER.

TUESDAY, APRIL 26, 1892.

LUSTY APPLAUSE FOR D'ALBERT.

HE GAVE A GREAT RECITAL AND STOPPED AN ANNOYING CORNET.

It is hard to recall a musical audience more enthusiastic than that which attended the piano recital given by Eugen D'Albert in Association Hall last evening. One might say that the cozy proportions of the room were in some degree responsible for the intimate sympathy that was so early established between player and listener but when one remembers the oppressive atmosphere, he instantly excludes the hall from all pleasant consideration, and bestows upon the pianist alone the full credit for every instant's pleasure.

Mr. D'Albert began with a powerful performance of his own version of Bach's D major prelude and fugue, which brought out surprisingly vigorous applause. There were moments in the time-honored Waldstein sonata when the young pianist seemed to forget his genius as an interpreter of Beethoven, but when he had finished the great opus 53, there remained little thought of disappointment, as the audience promptly testified. Good Beethoven playing is becoming rare, and such work as D'Albert's is therefore all the more interesting.

The pianist played Chopin's berceuse, op. 57, and waltz, op. 42, A flat major, and was about to begin a nocturne, when an ambitious musician outside began tooting a cornet. D'Albert made two feints at beginning, but the cornet kept serenely on and the pianist wouldn't. He left the piano in disgust, sped quickly down stairs ahead of his manager, found the cornet, stopped him up, came back to the piano as calmly as if nothing had happened, and went on with his music. The Chopin impromptu, op. 36, F sharp major, and the polonaise, op. 53, A flat major, awoke more hand-clapping, and D'Albert was compelled to return and play the Rubinstein etude, op. 23, C major, No. 3.

His final performances—Schubert's G major impromptu, Rubinstein's G major barcarolle, and the Strauss-Tausig waltz, "Man lebt nur einmal"—were among the most enjoyable of the evening. The audience waited till after he had left the hall, and insisted on recalls till he came back and played Liszt's valse—impromptu.

If one has heard much of Paderewski, some little time seems to be required to put the listener in full sympathy with D'Albert again, however much one may have admired him. The return of that sympathy, nevertheless, is sure and the satisfaction is enduring. D'Albert has less of witchery and poetry than Paderewski, and less than the wonderful Pole's instant power to charm. On the other hand, the little polyglot German's tone is larger, his brilliancy is more dazzling, and his feeling just as strong and deep. D'Albert's style is leonine; Paderewski's is the essence of musical witchcraft. There can be no comparison between them, for they are very antipodes. Individual preference aside, the two artists must be allowed to walk side by side, at the head of living pianists, till maturer development shall determine which has the greater reserve of musical intellectuality. It may well be doubted, and it is doubted, whether Rubinstein himself, in these latter days, could vie with either in all departments of piano music.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 1892.

LAST BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The sixth and last New York concert of the Boston Orchestra this season was given under Mr. Nikisch's direction last evening in Chickering Hall, with Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Mr. Franz Kneisel as soloists. The hall was as usual crowded and the applause most hearty. The extraordinary success of these concerts speaks well for the good taste of this city, for in some respects the playing of this orchestra surpasses anything done by our local organizations. We have no such body of strings, and in incisive brilliancy this orchestra is unsurpassed.

The programme was not altogether a success last night, so far as the soloists were concerned. Mrs. Henschel's pure but small voice is not suited to dramatic music such as the familiar aria from Massenet's "Herodiade." One of the little French songs she sings so well would have been better. Neither could Mr. Henschel make much out of Wolfram's address in the second act of "Tannhauser," which is but ill suited to concert purposes.

Mr. Kneisel was happier with Paganini's D major violin concerto, which he played admirably, really doing wonders with the tremendously difficult closing cadenza and winning half a dozen recalls.

The orchestra played Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound" Dvorak's fourth symphony, which was heard at some of the Philharmonic concerts this winter. It is an unpretentious work, but full of clever quaintness, and was played with a techincal perfection and finish that cannot be too highly praised.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY
—BY THE—

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 1892.

CRITIC AND MANAGER.

IT is a matter for regret that the interests of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city and vicinity are to be handled next season by Freddy Schwab. Schwab, in the dual capacity of critic and manager, can be of no possible value to that organization in the former function, for everything emanating from him, either written or inspired, will be known as dictated by his own interests. The conduct of the music critics of New York and Boston toward the four great pianists of the season—De Pachmann, Paderewski, Rummel and d'Albert—conclusively demonstrates that at the bottom there exists a universal unanimity on the methods of honest criticism, the only exception being Schwab, who, as the manager of De Pachmann and a financially interested party, could not, for the sake of his own investment, afford to treat with ordinary fairness the performances of the other three pianists. D'Albert, being under the management of Mr. Ellis, of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, this year, necessarily fared better at the hands of Schwab than Rummel or Paderewski did, for Schwab was speculating upon the ntinuation of his contract for New York with the on Symphony Orchestra; hence his criticisms of lbert assumed a favorable hue.

It would be expecting more from human nature than the law allows to ask Schwab to separate his newspaper from his managerial functions. Better men than Schwab have been unable to divide or separate their interests when such a division indicated a pecuniary loss, and no one ever suspected Schwab of conjecturing the possibility of such an improbability. Schwab is in the business for all there is in it, and even those who are so fortunate as to be designated as enemies of his have never been able to point to any act on his part that could possibly discredit his instinct in that direction. It would be the height of folly to classify him as a failure, for he has made money as a manager and made it by means of combinations highly original and of a character that would make most managers hesitate before attempting to imitate them.

There is, therefore, no reason why he should not continue to remain an active operator in musical enterprises. It is unfortunate for those enterprises, particularly if they are of such an elevated species that the criticism they inspire should be looked upon as spontaneous instead of influenced by interests—particularly pecuniary ones.

For this reason it is to be regretted that the Boston Symphony Orchestra management did not find someone entirely divorced from critical newspaper work to take charge of its interests here next season. The combination of critic and manager is distasteful to everyone endowed with delicacy of feeling or a refined taste. It takes an awful amount of gall for a man to write favorable criticisms on his own enterprise and at the same time severely censure the conductor of a different organization or write nasty slurs against his personality. Schwab has enough of that kind of gall to fill a storage warehouse. Hence his association with such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be regretted and is regretted.

MR. NIKISCH'S CRITICAL ENVIRONMENT.

MR. ARTHUR NIKISCH, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, does not recline on a bed of roses in Boston. His critical environment is at present singularly unpleasant, for, while the popularity of the symphony concerts and his personal popularity continue unabated, the most determined opposition on the part of a half dozen well-known music critics of the Hub to all he does must be very unpleasant for such an amiable, good hearted man as Arthur Nikisch certainly is. THE MUSICAL COURIER has always contended that there is no orchestra in America that can be compared to the famous Boston organization, a contention, by the way, that originated in Boston itself, for no epithets could be endearing enough to characterize Arthur Nikisch and his work during his first two years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

All this, too, from the pens of the very men who to-day declare absolutely that no good can come forth from Nazareth.

Mr. Nikisch, they have suddenly discovered, is not an interpreter of music, and possibly later they will assert that he is neither a conductor nor a musician. THE MUSICAL COURIER gladly puts itself on record by declaring that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is unique as an orchestral organization and its conductor, Arthur Nikisch, as conductor and musician, is the most versatile in this country.

To show the extent of critical perversity in Boston it is only necessary to state that when a traveling orchestral organization appeared in that city its performances were lauded to the sky at the expense of the home orchestra, when it is notorious that the two orchestras are not on the same artistic plane at all. There must be a very large colored gentleman hidden somewhere in the critical wood pile of the Hub.

The d'Albert Orchestral Concert.—The program for the concert to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Mr. Eugen d'Albert, the great virtuoso, at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall on Monday evening, May 2, is as follows: 1. Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; 2. Concerto for piano, E minor, opus 11, Chopin; 3. Introduction to Act III., Dance of Apprentices, Procession of Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs, "Meistersinger," Wagner; 4. Pilgrims' March, "Harold in Italy," Berlioz; 5. Concerto for piano in E flat, Liszt.

BOSTON NEWS.

BOSTON OFFICE OF THE MUSICAL COURIER,
157 TREMONT STREET, April 23, 1892.

THE twenty-fourth (and last) concert of the present season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given this evening, with Mr. Franz Kneisel as the soloist, in the following program:

Symphony, G major, No. 13, B. & H. edition........................Haydn
Concerto (in one movement) for violin, in D major... ....Paganini
(Revised and with additions by Wilhelmj.)
Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68.................... ....Brahms

It is a question if the orchestra has done better work this season than in the above program.

Mr. Nikisch's readings of both symphonies were most satisfactory.

In the Paganini concerto Mr. Kneisel excelled his every previous effort, and at the close of the number was recalled four or five times amid greater enthusiasm than a symphony audience has ever before displayed. And Mr. Kneisel deserved it all. As Concertmeister, artist and gentleman he has won the admiration and respect of every patron of our symphony concerts.

It must not be forgotten that to him we owe much for whatever pride we take in the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * * *

On the afternoons of Monday, Wednesday and Saturday Mr. Eugen d'Albert gave three piano recitals in Music Hall. The program for the first was made up entirely of Beethoven's compositions, and while we are ever ready to pay tribute to the master we cannot refrain from observing that an entire afternoon of Beethoven sonatas is, to the majority, a tiresome feast, and calculated to turn the average musical digestive apparatus against sonatas forever.

At the second recital when a miscellaneous program was given the audience was not only larger in point of members, but much more enthusiastic. At the last recital the attendance was fully twice as large as at the first recital, and as for real enthusiasm there was no comparison. Mr. d'Albert's performance upon each occasion was simply colossal, He was intellectual ever, sentimental rarely, and then in a small degree. His execution is fully equal to that of any of his predecessors, and superior to most of them from every point of view. It is a question if any living man has ever equaled him in velocity—at the same time his precision is absolute.

His versatility seems boundless, and altogether he must take first rank in the army of virtuosi who have honored and delighted Boston the season just closed.

* * * *

.GLE, Grand Rapids, Mich.

4-24

The Boston Symphony orchestra will play before one of the largest audiences ever seen in Hartman hall on Monday, May 9; 1,200 tickets have been disposed of in Grand Rapids alone. Mr. F. M. Davis spent yesterday in Muskegon, and reports that between 100 and 150 people will come over from that city to attend the great concert. Holland has sent in an order for fifty seats; Kalamazoo and Plainwell each want fifty; Grand Haven, Ionia and other surrounding towns will be represented by their music-loving people. As constant inquiries are being made about the reserved sale scheme, the following may not be amiss: On Monday, May 21, at noon, subscribers may exchange their tickets (which will be delivered to them during the coming week) for numbers, or line tickets, which entitle them to the sale of seats on Tuesday at 9 a. m. Only those who have these numbers can secure seats on Tuesday, and on Wednesday morning the sale will be opened to the general public and will continue until the night of the concert. As it has been reported in Muskegon that D'Albert, the greatest pianist in the world next to Rubenstein, will not play in the concert, this occasion is taken to deny such a statement, and to assure the public that he will play the great Liszt concerto. Among other things the orchestra will play an overture by Schumann, an overture by Weber, the prelude to "Lohengrin" by Wagner and some symphonic poems by St. Saens and Berlioz.

---

ping from Post
Washington DC
4-24

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The grand series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be concluded next Wednesday with a programme worthy in every way to compare with the delightful ones that have been given by this peerless organization. Special interest will be given it by the appearance of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, whose recent recital showed what charming artists they are. The symphony is Beethoven's No. 7, in A. The opening number is that particularly melodious symphonic poem of Lizt, his "Les Preludes," and during the concert some of the choicest numbers in Wagner's "Die Merstersinger" are to be performed.

Clipping from News
Muskegon Mich
Date 4-24

The Boston Symphony orchestra which is to appear in Grand Rapids, May 9, is the most proficient band of musicians ever organized in this country.

TIMES, Buffalo, N. Y.

te 4-25

The Symphony Concert.

General interest in the coming performance by the Boston Symphony orchestra was shown by a lively demand for tickets at the opening sale this morning. The concert takes place at the Star theater on Tuesday evening of next week.

[illegible]

[illegible] Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

[illegible] ning's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall brought [illegible] climax the annual series of entertainments through which the representative band of the Eastern city addresses itself so eloquently to local music lovers. In the five or six years that have gone by since the Orchestra was first heard in New York, its receipts have shown a continuous increase, until now four times the amount first paid out for four concerts is harvested in six. The material success of the venture is not to be so lightly spoken of as some people imagine; it denotes a steady advance in critical and popular estimation that must gather its strongest impetus from excellent performances.

Last night's programme included Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound" overture, an air from Massenet's "Hérodiade;" Paganini's D major concerto for violin, revised and added to by Wilhelmj; Wolfram's melodious recitative from Act II. of "Tannhäuser"—conventionally described, in musical Germany, as a "fantasy;" a duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," and Dvorák's Symphony No. IV. The soloists of the occasion were Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Franz Kneisel. Of the several numbers making up this very varied house bill, the symphony and the concerto for violin are to be mentioned as having wrought the liveliest impression, the composition first cited disclosing the perfect discipline and sympathy of the band, and the concerto taking on a charm interest that its somewhat archaic and technical character might keep unrevealed, but for the assistance of an exposition of extraordinary quality. This assistance was lent it by Mr. Kneisel's execution, which, through precision, smoothness, and an easy mastery of enormous mechanical difficulties, stands unsurpassed if, indeed, it has of late years been approached by the efforts of any of the virtuoso's performance. The capabilities of the instrument have certainly never had a finer illustration than Mr. Kneisel's playing offered, and the facility, elegance, and absolute accuracy of his delivery elicited such a demonstration of astonishment and delight as the legendary violinist and composer himself, were he still in the land of living, would be proud to excite.

The symphony, which was first performed by the Orchestra in Boston two months ago, is Dvorak's latest effort, and is stamped by a vigor and brightness somewhat uncommon in latter-day music, and, as are most of the Bohemian musician's achievements, by appreciable melodiousness and consistent lucidity. The allegretto gzazioso of the third movement may be set down as having given particular prominence to the beauty of the strings, but the expressive interpretation of each of the four divisions of the work and the richness of the instrumental timbres, now differentiated in passages in which effective contrasts of tone are sought and again blended in homogeneous loveliness in the tutti, were to be admired throughout the performance. In the vocal numbers of the programme, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were listened to with much of the pleasure that the singing of these accomplished artists never fails to impart. Withal, it cannot be said that Mrs. Henschel endowed the air from "Hérodiade" with the fervor that it suggests, and in the "Tannhäuser" measures the dramatic effect of scenic surroundings was positively missed. An audience that filled every part of the hall was in attendance, and Mr. Nikisch and the soloists, after being received in most cordial fashion, were bidden au revoir with unmistakable affection.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of its series at Chickering Hall last night. A large audience was present, and there was abundant testimony as to the popularity of our periodical visitors from the East. The programme last night was largely devoted to the display of ability on the part of soloists. The expression "display of ability" is used with purpose, for the compositions chosen were not of a kind—except in one instance—to interest an audience by reason of their intrinsic beauty. The solo performers were Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Mr. Georg Henschel, baritone, and Mr. Franz Kneisel, violinist.

Mrs. Henschel sang the familiar aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," and that was the one solo whose interest might be said to be in itself. As every one knows, it is a bit of the suavely melodious dramatic sentiment of French opera, and Mrs. Henschel sang it with charming finish, though with perhaps less power than might be infused into it. It is difficult to understand why Mr. Henschel chose Wolfram's declamatory remarks from the second act of "Tannhäuser" for a concert solo. The number is not at all suitable to concert performance, because it requires the situation and the context to place its value before the hearer. Mr. Henschel sang it with intelligence and with his customary vocal skill, but he would probably have pleased the audience better with something more lyric. He and Mrs. Henschel were heard together in the last duet of Katherine and Petruccio, from Götz's "Taming of the Shrew," and this is another number which suffers by dissociation from its dramatic setting.

Mr. Kneisel chose for his solo Wilhelmj's version of the Paganini violin concerto in D major. This is a confessed show piece, abounding in all kinds of technical difficulties, but wholly deficient in musical substance. Mr. Kneisel has given sufficient proof of his profound musical feeling, and perhaps he may be pardoned for indulging in a display of mere virtuosity. As an exhibition of his complete command of the intricacies of the finger board and the subtleties of stopping, his performance was a thorough success. His intonation, even in the most involved passages, was always true, and his tone rarely lost its beautiful purity and roundness. His performance took the house by storm, and he was recalled half a dozen times with the greatest enthusiasm.

The orchestra played Goldmark's fine overture to "Prometheus Bound," one of the most satisfactory of the composer's works, and Dvorak's fourth symphony, which was recenty produced here by the Philharmonic Society. Both compositions were played with the customary vigor and splendid color of the orchestra, and with all the nuances of Mr. Nikisch's romantic style.

[illegible]

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's regular series of six concerts, at Chickering Hall, took place last night. The programme was scarcely as well planned and symmetrical a scheme as we are accustomed to from Mr. Nikisch, but the circumstance was probably due to the fact that there were three solo performers to take care of. In consequence, outside of the accompaniment to the solo numbers, the orchestra was heard only in the opening piece, Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and the closing piece, Dvorak's latest symphony, that in G major, performed here earlier in the season, at one of the concerts of the Philharmonic Society. Between these compositions Mrs. Henschel sang the familiar air from Massenet's "Herodiade," Mr. Kneisel played Paganini's concerto in D for the violin, Mr. Henschel sang Wolfram's address at the opening of the contest of minstrelsy in Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," and with Mrs. Henschel the duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," which the artist pair sang a few weeks ago at one of their delightful recitals in the same hall.

The Wagner excerpt has much to commend it on the score of its admirable declamation in the opera, but makes an utterly ineffective concert piece, and in spite of the deeply intelligent and sympathetic manner in which Mr. Henschel sang it last night, it was not counted amongst the successful things of the evening. The solo success, indeed, was that won by Mr. Kneisel, by his brilliant performance of the Paganini concerto, which, thanks to Wilhelmj's amendments and his augmentation of the accompaniment, sounded less uncompromisingly archaic than might have been expected. The concerto was one of the war horses of Herr Wilhelmj during his American tour. It is chiefly valuable as a means of displaying the technical skill of a player, though not altogether void of musical contents, and last night it served its purpose in increasing the popular admiration for the elegance and solidity of style which characterize the playing of Mr. Kneisel. He was enthusiastically recalled four or five times and richly deserved the ovation which he received. Mrs. Henschel sang with great tastefulness and nice understanding, but the air by Massenet is not a happy choice for her voice and style. In the performance of the symphony Mr. Nikisch and his men occupied a very high plane of excellence.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

Published Every Day in the Year at Nos. 63-68 Park Row.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Last Concert of the Season Is a Delightful Treat.

The sixth and last concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Chickering Hall. Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Kneisel were the soloists. The orchestral numbers were Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound," and Dvorak's new Symphony No. 4, in G major, lately given by the Philharmonic Society.

Mrs. Henschel charmingly sang an aria from Massenet's "Herodiade." Mr. Henschel was heard to advantage in a "Fantasy" from "Tannhauser," act 2, and with Mrs. Henschel in a duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew." Mr. Kneisel played Paganini's D major violin concerto, revised by Wilhelmj, with his usual taste and artistic finish, with a delightfully round, clear tone and irreproachable intonation; altogether unusually good violin playing, and perhaps better work than Mr. Kneisel has done in New York hitherto. The elaborate cadenza was added by Mr. Kneisel himself. Both Mr. Kneisel's harmonics and double-stopping were notably good.

To say that the work of the orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch, was as good as usual, is to say that it was as good as need be.

There is a repose and finish about the playing of this orchestra to which no other orchestra in this country has as yet attained. The Dvorak Symphony, recently heard under Mr. Seidl's baton, in particular, seemed to expand with and gain new and fresh meaning and delicacy from Mr. Nikisch's highly poetical reading. It is a beautiful work, which deserves to be heard frequently.

The Goetz duet went very well, but with the violin solo two vocal numbers would have been amply sufficient for a symphony programme. The beautiful Goldmark overture also went exceedingly well.

NEW YORK HERALD,

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27,

LAST BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The sixth and last New York concert of the Boston Orchestra this season was given under Mr. Nikisch's direction last evening in Chickering Hall, with Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Mr. Franz Kneisel as soloists. The hall was as usual crowded and the applause most hearty. The extraordinary success of these concerts speaks well for the good taste of this city, for in some respects the playing of this orchestra surpasses anything done by our local organizations. We have no such body of strings, and in incisive brilliancy this orchestra is unsurpassed.

The programme was not altogether a success last night, so far as the soloists were concerned. Mrs. Henschel's pure but small voice is not suited to dramatic music such as the familiar aria from Massenet's "Herodiade." One of the little French songs she sings so well would have been better. Neither could Mr. Henschel make much out of Wolfram's address in the second act of "Tannhauser," which is but ill suited to concert purposes.

Mr. Kneisel was happier with Paganini's D major violin concerto, which he played admirably, really doing wonders with the tremendously difficult closing cadenza and winning half a dozen recalls.

The orchestra played Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound" Dvorak's fourth symphony, which was heard at some of the Philharmonic concerts this winter. It is an unpretentious work, but full of clever quaintness, and was played with a techineal perfection and finish that cannot be too highly praised.

City Hall, Portland.

EUGEN D'ALBERT'S

PIANO RECITAL

Thursday Evening, April 28, 1892, at 8.

. . PROGRAMME . .

Prelude and Fugue, D major,	Bach–D'Albert
Sonata, C major, Op. 53, Allegro con brio. Introduzione e Rondo.	Beethoven
Berceuse, Op. 57,	Chopin
Valse, Op. 42,
Nocturne, Op. 9, No. 3,
Impromptu, Op. 36,
Polonaise, Op. 53,
Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 3,	Schubert
BARCAROLLE, A minor,	Rubinstein
VALSE, "Man lebt nur einmal,"	Strauss–Tausig

THE "KNABE" PIANOS USED IN ALL D'ALBERT CONCERTS.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

---

next week.

Portland Press Apr 29

THE EIGHTH STOCKBRIDGE.

The eighth entertainment in the Stockbridge Course was given to one of the largest audiences of the season at City Hall last evening. It was a piano recital by the distinguished musical artist M. Eugen D'Albert. Coming so near the recent recital of Paderewski it afforded music lovers and students a rare opportunity for comparison. Opinions seemed to be divided as to their respective merits, and in fact their methods are so distinct that an unbiased comparison would be difficult unless made by a thoroughly competent master. Certain it is that M. D'Albert is one of the great pianists of modern times, and he delighted the large and highly cultured audience. The applause bestowed upon his efforts was hearty and well earned and a number of the selections were enthusiastically encored. Of course it is a difficult matter for one performer to entertain a large general audience for an entire evening, but M. D'Albert succeeded admirably and had he been playing to a select few from a conservatory of music he could hardly have received closer attention or more appreciative recognition of his musical genius.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 29, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The latest issue of the Musical Courier declares itself in favor of Arthur Nikisch. "He does not recline on a bed of roses in Boston," it adds. "His critical environment is at present singularly unpleasant, for, while the popularity of the symphony concerts and his personal popularity continue unabated, the most determined opposition on the part of a half dozen well-known music critics of the Hub to all he does must be very unpleasant for such an amiable, good-hearted man as Arthur Nikisch certainly is. They have suddenly discovered that he is not an interpreter of music, and possibly later they will assert that he is neither a conductor nor a musician." The Musical Courier gladly puts itself on record by declaring that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is unique as an orchestral organization, and its conductor, Arthur Nikisch, as conductor and musician, is the most versatile in this country.

Georg Henschel has finished a volume of "Progressive Studies for the Voice," which is being published by Novello, Ewer & Co. He is fully competent to write such a work, if he is judged by the good work done by his wife, who was one of his pupils.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 1, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Apropos of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Brooklyn on Saturday night, a week ago, the directors of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society held a meeting on Monday and made a graceful recognition of the service that Mr. Nikisch has given to art. They resolved to decorate the stage with flowers and plants, and they made the following declaration, which voices the sentiment of the entire musical public: Resolved, That the board of directors of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn offers its congratulations to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon the brilliant series of concerts which it has given in Brooklyn during the past season. Resolved, That the thanks of the society are due to the conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, for the high standard of the music which he has presented, and for the rare excellence of the performances. Resolved, That the board fully recognizes the important results which have followed the establishment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon a permanent basis, and desires to express its appreciation of the liberal spirit of devotion to the cause of music which has made such an orchestra possible. Mr. Fred Comee, who is traveling manager for the orchestra, writes that every every seat for the coming concerts in Philadelphia, New York, Baltimore and Washington has already been sold.

—Tuesday's concert at Chickering Hall wound up most brilliantly the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York season, and Mr. Nikisch, the band and the soloists, says a writer in Town Topics, departed amid a cheering demonstration of admiration and regard. The programme was unusually varied and of less than wonted severity. The symphony was Dvorak's latest, No. IV and unlike many latter-day symphonies, it commended itself to attention, not merely by its classical form and technical elaborateness but by melodious charm and tonal splendor. It was superbly played by the orchestra—the one organization in the United States that can be held up as worthy of comparison with Lamoureux's forces in Paris and Richter's in Vienna. The clou of the evening, withal, was Herr Kneisel's performance of Paganini's concerto in D, revised and with additions by Wilhelmj. I can recall no equally finished and accurate performance; and the freedom and facility of the virtuoso's style were no unimportant factors in a rendering that made the rather obsolete music impress one as both modern and delightful. There was also some singing by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel; candidly, however, I would have preferred those excellent artists alone on the stage, with a responsive piano between them.

THE SUN, WEDNESDAY,
APRIL 27, 1892.

Final Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Chickering Hall brought to a brilliant climax the annual series of entertainments through which the representative band of the Eastern city addresses itself so eloquently to local music lovers. In the five or six years that have gone by since the Orchestra was first heard in New York, its receipts have shown a continuous increase, until now four times the amount first paid out for four concerts is harvested in six. The material success of the venture is not to be so lightly spoken of as some people imagine; it denotes a steady advance in critical and popular estimation that must gather its strongest impetus from excellent performances.

Last night's programme included Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound" overture, an air from Massenet's "Hérodiade;" Paganini's D major concerto for violin, revised and added to by Wilhelmj; Wolfram's melodious recitative from Act II. of "Tannhäuser"—conventionally described, in musical Germany, as a "fantasy;" a duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," and Dvorák's Symphony No. IV. The soloists of the occasion were Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Franz Kneisel. Of the several numbers making up this very varied house bill, the symphony and the concerto for violin are to be mentioned as having wrought the liveliest impression, the composition first cited disclosing the perfect discipline and sympathy of the band, and the concerto taking on a charm interest that its somewhat archaic and technical character might keep unrevealed, but for the assistance of an exposition of extraordinary quality. This assistance was lent it by Mr. Kneisel's execution, which, through precision, smoothness, and an easy mastery of enormous mechanical difficulties, stands unsurpassed if, indeed, it has of late years been approached by the efforts of any of the virtuoso's performance. The capabilities of the instrument have certainly never had a finer illustration than Mr. Kneisel's playing offered, and the facility, elegance, and absolute accuracy of his delivery elicited such a demonstration of astonishment and delight as the legendary violinist and composer himself, were he still in the land of living, would be proud to excite.

The symphony, which was first performed by the Orchestra in Boston two months ago, is Dvorak's latest effort, and is stamped by a vigor and brightness somewhat uncommon in later-day music, and, as are most of the Bohemian musician's achievements, by appreciable melodiousness and consistent lucidity. The allegretto gzazioso of the third movement may be set down as having given particular prominence to the beauty of the strings, but the expressive interpretation of each of the four divisions of the work and the richness of the instrumental timbres, now differentiated in passages in which effective contrasts of tone are sought and again blended in homogeneous loveliness in the tutti, were to be admired throughout the performance. In the vocal numbers of the programme, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were listened to with much of the pleasure that the singing of these accomplished artists never fails to impart. Withal, it cannot be said that Mrs. Henschel endowed the air from "Hérodiade" with the fervor that it suggests, and in the "Tannhäuser" measures the dramatic effect of scenic surroundings was positively missed. An audience that filled every part of the hall was in attendance, and Mr. Nikisch and the soloists, after being received in most cordial fashion, were bidden au revoir with unmistakable affection.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final concert of its series at Chickering Hall last night. A large audience was present, and there was abundant testimony as to the popularity of our periodical visitors from the East. The programme last night was largely devoted to the display of ability on the part of soloists. The expression "display of ability" is used with purpose, for the compositions chosen were not of a kind—except in one instance—to interest an audience by reason of their intrinsic beauty. The solo performers were Mrs. Georg Henschel, soprano; Mr. Georg Henschel, baritone, and Mr. Franz Kneisel, violinist.

Mrs. Henschel sang the familiar aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," and that was the one solo whose interest might be said to be in itself. As every one knows, it is a bit of the suavely melodious dramatic sentiment of French opera, and Mrs. Henschel sang it with charming finish, though with perhaps less power than might be infused into it. It is difficult to understand why Mr. Henschel chose Wolfram's declamatory remarks from the second act of "Tannhäuser" for a concert solo. The number is not at all suitable to concert performance, because it requires the situation and the context to place its value before the hearer. Mr. Henschel sang it with intelligence and with his customary vocal skill, but he would probably have pleased the audience better with something more lyric. He and Mrs. Henschel were heard together in the last duet of Katherine and Petruccio, from Götz's "Taming of the Shrew," and this is another number which suffers by dissociation from its dramatic setting.

Mr. Kneisel chose for his solo Wilhelmj's version of the Paganini violin concerto in D major. This is a confessed show piece, abounding in all kinds of technical difficulties, but wholly deficient in musical substance. Mr. Kneisel has given sufficient proof of his profound musical feeling, and perhaps he may be pardoned for indulging in a display of mere virtuosity. As an exhibition of his complete command of the intricacies of the finger board and the subtleties of stopping, his performance was a thorough success. His intonation, even in the most involved passages, was always true, and his tone rarely lost its beautiful purity and roundness. His performance took the house by storm, and he was recalled half a dozen times with the greatest enthusiasm.

The orchestra played Goldmark's fine overture to "Prometheus Bound," one of the most satisfactory of the composer's works, and Dvorak's fourth symphony, which was recenty produced here by the Philharmonic Society. Both compositions were played with the customary vigor and splendid color of the orchestra, and with all the nuances of Mr. Nikisch's romantic style.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The last concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's regular series of six concerts, at Chickering Hall, took place last night. The programme was scarcely as well planned and symmetrical a scheme as we are accustomed to from Mr. Nikisch, but the circumstance was probably due to the fact that there were three solo performers to take care of. In consequence, outside of the accompaniment to the solo numbers, the orchestra was heard only in the opening piece, Saint-Saens's symphonic poem, "The Youth of Hercules," and the closing piece, Dvorak's latest symphony, that in G major, performed here earlier in the season, at one of the concerts of the Philharmonic Society. Between these compositions Mrs. Henschel sang the familiar air from Massenet's "Herodiade," Mr. Kneisel played Paganini's concerto in D for the violin, Mr. Henschel sang Wolfram's address at the opening of the contest of minstrelsy in Wagner's "Tannhaeuser," and with Mrs. Henschel the duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," which the artist pair sang a few weeks ago at one of their delightful recitals in the same hall.

The Wagner excerpt has much to commend it on the score of its admirable declamation in the opera, but makes an utterly ineffective concert piece, and in spite of the deeply intelligent and sympathetic manner in which Mr. Henschel sang it last night, it was not counted amongst the successful things of the evening. The solo success, indeed, was that won by Mr. Kneisel, by his brilliant performance of the Paganini concerto, which, thanks to Wilhelmj's amendments and his augmentation of the accompaniment, sounded less uncompromisingly archaic than might have been expected. The concerto was one of the war horses of Herr Wilhelmj during his American tour. It is chiefly valuable as a means of displaying the technical skill of a player, though not altogether void of musical contents, and last night it served its purpose in increasing the popular admiration for the elegance and solidity of style which characterize the playing of Mr. Kneisel. He was enthusiastically recalled four or five times and richly deserved the ovation which he received. Mrs. Henschel sang with great tastefulness and nice understanding, but the air by Massenet is not a happy choice for her voice and style. In the performance of the symphony Mr. Nikisch and his men occupied a very high plane of excellence.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

Published Every Day in the Year at Nos. 63-69 Park Row.

WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Last Concert of the Season Is a Delightful Treat.

The sixth and last concert this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Chickering Hall. Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Kneisel were the soloists. The orchestral numbers were Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound," and Dvorak's new Symphony No. 4, in G major, lately given by the Philharmonic Society.

Mrs. Henschel charmingly sang an aria from Massenet's "Herodiade." Mr. Henschel was heard to advantage in a "Fantasy" from "Tannhauser," act 2, and with Mrs. Henschel in a duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew." Mr. Kneisel played Paganini's D major violin concerto, revised by Wilhelmj, with his usual taste and artistic finish, with a delightfully round, clear tone and irreproachable intonation; altogether unusually good violin playing, and perhaps better work than Mr. Kneisel has done in New York hitherto. The elaborate cadenza was added by Mr. Kneisel himself. Both Mr. Kneisel's harmonics and double-stopping were notably good.

To say that the work of the orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch, was as good as usual, is to say that it was as good as need be.

There is a repose and finish about the playing of this orchestra to which no other orchestra in this country has as yet attained. The Dvorak Symphony, recently heard under Mr. Seidl's baton, in particular, seemed to expand with and gain new and fresh meaning and delicacy from Mr. Nikisch's highly poetical reading. It is a beautiful work, which deserves to be heard frequently.

The Goetz duet went very well, but with the violin solo two vocal numbers would have been amply sufficient for a symphony programme. The beautiful Goldmark overture also went exceedingly well.

NEW YORK HERALD,
WEDNESDAY, APRIL 27,

LAST BOSTON ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The sixth and last New York concert of the Boston Orchestra this season was given under Mr. Nikisch's direction last evening in Chickering Hall, with Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Mr. Franz Kneisel as soloists. The hall was as usual crowded and the applause most hearty. The extraordinary success of these concerts speaks well for the good taste of this city, for in some respects the playing of this orchestra surpasses anything done by our local organizations. We have no such body of strings, and in incisive brilliancy this orchestra is unsurpassed.

The programme was not altogether a success last night, so far as the soloists were concerned. Mrs. Henschel's pure but small voice is not suited to dramatic music such as the familiar aria from Massenet's "Herodiade." One of the little French songs she sings so well would have been better. Neither could Mr. Henschel make much out of Wolfram's address in the second act of "Tannhauser," which is but ill suited to concert purposes.

Mr. Kneisel was happier with Paganini's D major violin concerto, which he played admirably, really doing wonders with the tremendously difficult closing cadenza and winning half a dozen recalls.

The orchestra played Goldmark's overture, "Prometheus Bound" Dvorak's fourth symphony, which was heard at some of the Philharmonic concerts this winter. It is an unpretentious work, but full of clever quaintness, and was played with a technical perfection and finish that cannot be too highly praised.

City Hall, Portland.

EUGEN D'ALBERT'S

PIANO RECITAL

Thursday Evening, April 28, 1892, at 8.

. . PROGRAMME . .

Prelude and Fugue, D major, ... Bach–D'Albert

Sonata, C major, Op. 53, ... Beethoven
Allegro con brio. Introduzione e Rondo.

Berceuse, Op. 57,
Valse, Op. 42,
Nocturne, Op. 9, No. 3, ... Chopin
Impromptu, Op. 36,
Polonaise, Op. 53,

Impromptu, Op. 90, No. 3, ... Schubert

BARCAROLLE, A minor, ... Rubinstein

VALSE, "Man lebt nur einmal," . . . . . Strauss–Tausig

THE "KNABE" PIANOS USED IN ALL D'ALBERT CONCERTS.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

---

next week.

Portland Press Apr 29

THE EIGHTH STOCKBRIDGE.

The eighth entertainment in the Stockbridge Course was given to one of the largest audiences of the season at City Hall last evening. It was a piano recital by the distinguished musical artist M. Eugen D'Albert. Coming so near the recent recital of Paderewski it afforded music lovers and students a rare opportunity for comparison. Opinions seemed to be divided as to their respective merits, and in fact their methods are so distinct that an unbiased comparison would be difficult unless made by a thoroughly competent master. Certain it is that M. D'Albert is one of the great pianists of modern times, and he delighted the large and highly cultured audience. The applause bestowed upon his efforts was hearty and well earned and a number of the selections were enthusiastically encored. Of course it is a difficult matter for one performer to entertain a large general audience for an entire evening, but M. D'Albert succeeded admirably and had he been playing to a select few from a conservatory of music he could hardly have received closer attention or more appreciative recognition of his musical genius.

Boston Post

FRIDAY MORNING, APRIL 29, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The latest issue of the Musical Courier declares itself in favor of Arthur Nikisch. "He does not recline on a bed of roses in Boston," it adds. "His critical environment is at present singularly unpleasant, for, while the popularity of the symphony concerts and his personal popularity continue unabated, the most determined opposition on the part of a half dozen well-known music critics of the Hub to all he does must be very unpleasant for such an amiable, good-hearted man as Arthur Nikisch certainly is. They have suddenly discovered that he is not an interpreter of music, and possibly later they will assert that he is neither a conductor nor a musician." The Musical Courier gladly puts itself on record by declaring that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is unique as an orchestral organization, and its conductor, Arthur Nikisch, as conductor and musician, is the most versatile in this country.

Georg Henschel has finished a volume of "Progressive Studies for the Voice," which is being published by Novello, Ewer & Co. He is fully competent to write such a work, if he is judged by the good work done by his wife, who was one of his pupils.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 1, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Apropos of the concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Brooklyn on Saturday night, a week ago, the directors of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society held a meeting on Monday and made a graceful recognition of the service that Mr. Nikisch has given to art. They resolved to decorate the stage with flowers and plants, and they made the following declaration, which voices the sentiment of the entire musical public: Resolved, That the board of directors of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn offers its congratulations to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon the brilliant series of concerts which it has given in Brooklyn during the past season. Resolved, That the thanks of the society are due to the conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, for the high standard of the music which he has presented, and for the rare excellence of the performances. Resolved, That the board fully recognizes the important results which have followed the establishment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon a permanent basis, and desires to express its appreciation of the liberal spirit of devotion to the cause of music which has made such an orchestra possible. Mr. Fred Comee, who is traveling manager for the orchestra, writes that every every seat for the coming concerts in Philadelphia, New York, Baltimore and Washington has already been sold.

——Tuesday's concert at Chickering Hall wound up most brilliantly the Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York season, and Mr. Nikisch, the band and the soloists, says a writer in Town Topics, departed amid a cheering demonstration of admiration and regard. The programme was unusually varied and of less than wonted severity. The symphony was Dvorak's latest, No. IV and unlike many latter-day symphonies, it commended itself to attention, not merely by its classical form and technical elaborateness but by melodious charm and tonal splendor. It was superbly played by the orchestra—the one organization in the United States that can be held up as worthy of comparison with Lamoureux's forces in Paris and Richter's in Vienna. The clou of the evening, withal, was Herr Kneisel's performance of Paganini's concerto in D, revised and with additions by Wilhelmj. I can recall no equally finished and accurate performance; and the freedom and facility of the virtuoso's style were no unimportant factors in a rendering that made the rather obsolete music impress one as both modern and delightful. There was also some singing by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel; candidly, however, I would have preferred those excellent artists alone on the stage, with a responsive piano between them.

[203]

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

D'Albert.

Portland a few weeks ago was charmed by Paderewski. Last night she was delighted with D'Albert. The appearance of two pianists of the highest rank in the same season in a small city of this size is exceptional, and it is to Mr. Stockbridge the thanks of the public are due for the opportunity. "Freshness, vitality and sincerity are the three great points in D'Albert's playing." At times his magnetic power and at others his exquisite delicacy are remarkable. Last evening his programme embraced Bach's prelude and fugue in D major; Beethoven's sonata, C major, opus 53; a group of six compositions by Chopin; Rubinstein's barcarolle in A minor; and the Strauss-Tausig waltz "Man lebt nur einmal."

It will be seen from this programme that it was in the first two numbers the opportunity was afforded to hear D'Albert at his best. The fugue is especially adapted to display the virtuosity of the pianist. It is a work of exceeding brilliancy and showed the enormous staying power of D'Albert, and his tremendous technique. But it was in the Beethoven sonata that the artist captivated and enthralled his hearers. In it he showed all the depth of thought and sympathy of feeling of which it is capable. It has been claimed for him that he is the greatest living exponent of Beethoven and we must admit his reading was instinct with vitality and permeated with the highest intelligence. Especially did he deserve the soubriquet he has obtained of "little giant" in the rendering of the introduzione e rondo. It was superb and he roused the audience to great enthusiasm.

As a performer of Chopin's beautiful dream pictures we must confess that to our taste this artist does not charm like Paderewski. His rendering of the berceuse was admirable and brought a storm of applause, and the valse was received equally well. But that magnificent tone, that liquid touch that Paderewski possesses were too recent in the remembrance to be easily forgotten. His rendering of the last impromptu, however, was magnificent in its force and power. It was like the resistless, onward sweep of a mighty army. The audience broke forth in a whirlwind of applause, and the persistent encore produced Liszt's valse impromptu. The melody of the Rubinstein barcarolle was delicious, and the interpretation of the number showed D'Albert's mastery of the key board. The concert fitly closed with the Strauss-Tausig waltz.

What D'Albert lacks is the poesy of Paderewski. To his own wonderful technique if he had joined that sensuous charm, that grace of action, that thorough absorption of himself in his piano, that marks the Polish player, we should have a combination that would be as near perfect as such things can be in thi world.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 122.

SUNDAY, MAY 1, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The week just ended has been utilized by the Boston Symphony orchestra in completing its series of concerts in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and again the press and public of these cities have recognized in the most flattering manner the value of this organization and the entire competency of its conductor.

The financial results of these six series of concerts (Brooklyn having the public rehearsal and concert usual in this city) has been more gratifying than ever before, and in New York, where the sharpest competition is met with by the orchestra, its managers have the satisfaction of being already assured by the renewal of subscriptions of the entire success of the concerts next season.

The Boston orchestra was formally adopted by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society this season, and at a meeting held last week, in anticipation of the final concert of its series last evening, it was decided to deck the stage and conductor's desk with flowers the same as when the position now held by Mr. Nikisch was filled by Theodore Thomas. It was also voted to unanimously adopt the following resolutions as an expression of the sentiments of the entire musical public of Brooklyn:

Resolved, that the board of directors of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn offers its congratulations to the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra upon the brilliant series of concerts which it has given in Brooklyn during the past season.

Resolved, that the thanks of the society are due to the conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, for the high standard of the music which he has presented, and for the rare excellence of the performances.

Resolved, that the board fully recognizes the important results which have followed the establishment of the Boston Symphony orchestra upon a permanent basis, and desires to express its appreciation of the liberal spirit of devotion to the cause of music which has made such an orchestra possible.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The last Symphony concert of this eleventh season showed Mr. Nikisch at his best. There were, to be sure, two symphonies on the programme; but as Brahms—the first, in C-minor—is miles away from Haydn—the G-major, No. 13—and as each was played properly in time, spirit and manner, there was everything to approve in the selection and the direction. Between them Mr. Kneisel played the concerto in D-major by Paganini, passing over its manifold difficulties so easily and elegantly that they did not appear to be such, filling it throughout with a sweet and sufficient tone and adding cadenzas of his own, the variety, brilliancy and elaboration of which were quite in keeping with the original, which, by the way, had been revised and rounded out by Wilhelmj from its author's imperfect manuscript. Mr. Kneisel was heartily received and was recalled again and again with an enthusiasm unparalleled during the season.

A review of the entire season shows that the number of works performed—counting each air or lied separately, although perhaps grouped by the singer—was a little less than one hundred, of which eighty were of German authorship, that is if Rubinstein, Volkman, Dvoràk and Paderewski may be classed in the German schools. The French compositions were five; the American, taking Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Floersheim as belonging here, five; the Russian, three; the Italian, three, and the Scandinavian, one. England was not represented. The works new to Boston, of which several had been heard at least in New York, were twenty; a small group had their first readings here, and Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" suite was presented for the first time in America. There can be little fault found with this proportion of new to old, although the elder concert-goers would easily have accepted a larger infusion of novelty, and with it a more catholic distribution, the division being this: Germany, eleven works; America, four, Italy, two; France, Russia and Scandanavia, one each. The scheme of programmes could have been easily improved and places made for more desirable material by omitting such works as Berlioz's "Harold"; Liszt's "Preludes"; Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale"; Schubert's "Rosamunde" music; Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture; Wagner's "Huldigung's March" and the "Walküre" selections. Mr. Floersheim's music was not necessary, even as an illustration of American composition, unless it were as a compliment to New York criticism which has been so excessively considerate of the orchestra and its conductor, and the adaptation of the Beethoven movement from a quartette for the full string orchestra could have been well spared. That the programmes have as a whole tended toward heaviness, is indicated by the fact that although each averaged about an hour and three-quarters in performance, the whole number of works was considerably less than in some previous seasons, and this, in spite of the increasing of the total footing by the insertion of six short Schubert songs. The current criticism of the city—which has been practically unanimous, in spite of the different musical training and personal point of view of the various writers—has been to the effect that the work of the orchestra has not been what it should be in accuracy, elegance, aptness or discrimination. The only notable exception has been on the part of one evening paper, the eccentricity of whose opinions about music and the drama has been expressed in language so extravagant as to excite amusement quite as often as any more serious attention. If the band has not absolutely retrograded,—as many competent judges, connoisseurs and dilettanti, as well as critics, have been disposed to say,—it certainly has not advanced, and when it has been at its best in some one work, or throughout one evening, there has been blended with the perfect satisfaction of that time the unavoidable regret that it should not be at its best always. The rapid growth in all the finest qualities of public performance made by the New York Philharmonic orchestra, of which Mr. Damrosch is the conductor, and his own marked improvement in directing, have been observed almost with surprise and commented upon favorably and significantly by the critical who heard its concerts in this town. There were a lesson and a warning in these concerts, but we cannot help doubting whether Boston will be profited by them as it should. The Boston orchestra must be by this time a source of revenue to its management. Liberal estimates do not reach the amount of money received in advance for tickets to its concerts here; gains are made of course when its men are supplied to other organizations, and its concerts in other cities are almost without exception contracted for at remunerative rates. While there is ground for pride in all this, there is also cause for distrustful anticipation. The orchestra plays during the season to many audiences which have no opportunity to compare it with others and no standard of absolute judgment. Its conductor has been confirmed in his position for another term of years, as it is understood, and therefore both he and his men have some reason to assume that their way is the right way and to persist in it. In art, as in everything else, the path which does not tend upward tends downward, and the orchestra now stands near the dividing of the ways with an inclination toward the wrong. If merely a far-seeing and bold speculation had prompted the establishment of these concerts, it would be almost impertinent and certainly foolish for the press to repeat from week to week its criticisms. But the orchestra took its rise, as has always been said, in an honest, generous and courageous desire to benefit musical art and music lovers, to show the truth and to insist upon it. If this be so, the press is right in calling upon the founder of the orchestra—even though it now costs him little or nothing—to see that it fulfils its purpose, and to forbid its conductor to give false impressions of the spirit and the form of the masterpieces of music. If he does not do this, he will be responsible for the implanting and diffusion of error, for ignorance and defiance of the truth and for the encouragement of the pernicious doctrine that a performer is greater than an author, that a messenger may misrepresent him who speaks by him and a servant set at naught the commands of his lord. That Mr. Nikisch is able and of much promise, one would stultify one's self to deny; but that he uses his ability so as to make improbable the fulfilment of that promise is also indefinable. If he be too proud, too vain or too self-sufficient to learn, he is not fit to teach, and if he be unwilling to follow authority, like a good centurion, he ought not to have soldiers under him. The pecuniary status of the orchestra may be assured for a long future, but its place in art and in educational influence is yet to be settled. Mr. Nikisch's next term may determine this, and if he be allowed to follow his fantasy and take counsel of his own pertinacity, there can be little doubt as to what the result will be. It is easier to pull down than to build up, and it behooves Mr. Higginson to consider seriously whether—if he and his intentions and desires have been rightly understood—he can afford to let the fortunes of the orchestra drift or be guided at the pleasure of one romantic and self-willed man.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

WEDNESDAY EVENING, APRIL 27, 1892.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

One cannot enjoy even Dvorak with the thermometer at 100 degrees, and that was the reason why a good many people did not stay to hear the last part of the concert that Mr. Nikisch and his matchless orchestra gave at Chickering hall last night. The heat and the foulness of the air were almost unendurable, and the playing of the band was, therefore, not so earnestly listened to as it usually is. The concert was the last of the six that Mr. Nikisch has given in New York. They have preceded by a few nights the performances in this city that are to be brought to an end, for the season, on Saturday night. The programme was fresh and the forms were free, the only deviation from the modern character of the bill consisting in a violin concerto of Paganini's that was played by Mr. Kneisel, with fine tone and almost a reckless brilliancy, but even he could not save it from sounding like Paganini music. There were too many solos, the orchestra having only two numbers on the bill—the overture by Goldmark to "Prometheus Bound," that has already been heard on this side of the East river, and a new symphony by Antonin Dvorak. The singing was by the Henschels, their numbers being taken from Massenet, Wagner and Goetz. Mrs. Henschel sang charmingly, as she always does, but Mr. Henschel does not sing as well as he used to. He is intelligent, he sings with expression, but the quality of his voice has become rasping, except when he sings softly, as he ought oftener to do. His Wagner number was unfortunate, in that it was the least interesting thing in the whole of "Tannhauser." All the soloists were received with enthusiasm, however. The orchestra was at its best in the Goldmark overture, its magnificent sweep, its delicate shading, its dramatic meaning being enlarged by the conductor. The Dvorak symphony is strong and spirited, vivid at times with that half savage spirit that flashes out in the art of the Slavs, and sometimes odd in its rhythms, but it is not restful and it is not often beautiful. Its author took recent occasion to reprehend the composer of "Cavalleria Rusticana" for his style, but he might go to school to Mascagni to learn a number of things. There is thought in his work, and passion, too, and national color, but there is not the ingenuousness that makes "Cavalleria" delightful and Mr. Dvorak does not seem to be urged by his conscience to write as much as by his custom. The concerts at the same hall will be resumed next season, and it is earnestly hoped that during the summer some effort will be made to render the place more habitable by introducing a new system of ventilation.

Apropos of the concert by the orchestra in this city on Saturday night the directors of the Brooklyn Philharmonic society held a meeting on Monday and made a graceful recognition of the service that Mr. Nikisch has given to art. They resolved to decorate the stage with flowers and plants, as they did when Mr. Thomas was director of the concerts, and they made the following declaration, which voices the sentiment of the entire musical public:

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Philharmonic society of Brooklyn offers its congratulations to the management of the Boston symphony orchestra upon the brilliant series of concerts which it has given in Brooklyn during the past season.

Resolved, That the thanks of the society are due to the conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, for the high standard of the music which he has presented, and for the rare excellence of the performances.

Resolved, That the board fully recognizes the important results which have followed the establishment of the Boston symphony orchestra upon a permanent basis and desires to express its appreciation of the liberal spirit of devotion to the cause of music which has made such an orchestra possible.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MAY 1, 1892.

—Last Tuesday's concert at Chickering Hall wound up most brilliantly the Boston Symphony orchestra's New York season, and Mr. Nikisch, the band and the soloists departed amid a cheering demonstration of admiration and regard. The orchestra, says one of the leading New York critics, "is the one organization in the United States that can be held up as worthy of comparison with Lamoureux's forces in Paris, and Richter's in Vienna.

—Mr. Adamowski intends to spend part of the summer in Europe. It is greatly hoped Mr. Ellis will prevail upon him to conduct the "Pops," however, before he goes. No local musician can ensure the popular and social success of these concerts as fully as can Mr. Adamowski.

THE BOSTON

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MAY 1, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONCERT.

The twenty-fourth concert, and the last of the season, by the Symphony orchestra, was given in Music hall Saturday evening, April 23. The programme:

Haydn.	Symphony, G major No. 13, B. & H. Adagio; Allegro—Largo.—Menuet (Allegretto).—Allegro con spirito.
Paganini.	Concerto (in one movement) for Violin, in D major. (Revised and with additions by Wilhelmj).
Brahms.	Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro—Andante sostenuto.—Un poco allegretto e grazioso.—Adagio piu andante; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

Soloist: Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The symphonies of the present season have closed, and are now among the events of the past. It is not our intention to make a review, for these concerts have been freely spoken of by many able critics according to their light and understanding of the music performed. It cannot be denied the orchestra still occupies a very high position among organizations of its kind, here and in Europe, though the Boston critics are quite unanimous in the opinion that it is not so efficient now as when Mr. Gericke left it, three years ago. While it is conceded that Mr. Nikisch is a good conductor, a good musician, a genial gentleman, it is thought he is not so good a drill master, not so correct a follower of tradition, so far as the old classical masters are concerned, as his immediate predecessor. He is credited with having more desire to produce sensational music, than the more refined, legitimate classic; and for this reason his readings have been at times rough and coarse.

The Haydn symphony, while fairly well played, was, especially in the first movement, too loud in the double bass department. If Papa Haydn had been present he would not have recognized the symphony as his. The largo and menuet were better, but I think the latter was taken at too quick a tempo to represent this old stately dance. The last movement was of course vigorously treated.

The sensation of the evening was furnished by Mr. Kneisel's phenomenal fine playing of the violin concerto. In everything relating to perfection of tone quality, nice shading, artistic expression and technique were well represented in Mr. Kneisel's performance. He succeeded admirably in revealing the beauty of the music, and also in captivating the hearts of both audience and orchestra. His cup of reward was full to overflowing, and he must have felt gratified by the more than generous applause which was awarded him. There are no doubts as to the esteemed position held by Mr. Kneisel in the musical hearts of Boston.

The Brahms symphony has been played in Boston before, and though it is a work of great pretension, of great length, of great educational skill, it fails to produce anything but ennui on the minds of the mass of hearers. The symphony starts off briskly, giving promise of something interesting, but it does not succeed in reaching anything more than commonplace. The andante is inordinately long and wearisome, and one is glad when it comes to an end. The last movement is the only redeeming feature of the piece, in that it has quite a pleasant, melodious theme which is readily worked out to a grand climax. We are told Mr. Brahms kept this symphony nine years before giving it to the world, and we can't help remarking that if he had retained it twice as long the world of music would not have suffered thereby.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, MAY 2.

THEIR WORK APPRECIATED.

Resolutions Relative to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., May 1.—The directors of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society have passed the following resolutions in relation to the Boston Symphony orchestra, which gave a concert here last night:

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn offers its congratulations to the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra upon the brilliant series of concerts which it has given in Brooklyn during the past season.

Resolved, That the thanks of the society are due to the conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, for the high standard of the music which he has presented, and for the rare excellence of the performances.

Resolved, That the board fully recognizes the important results which have followed the establishment of the Boston Symphony orchestra upon a permanent basis, and desires to express its appreciation of the liberal spirit of devotion to the cause of music which has made such an orchestra possible.

[204]

Portland Argus Ap 29

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

D'Albert.

Portland a few weeks ago was charmed by Paderewski. Last night she was delighted with D'Albert. The appearance of two pianists of the highest rank in the same season in a small city of this size is exceptional, and it is to Mr. Stockbridge the thanks of the public are due for the opportunity. "Freshness, vitality and sincerity are the three great points in D'Albert's playing." At times his magnetic power and at others his exquisite delicacy are remarkable. Last evening his programme embraced Bach's prelude and fugue in D major; Beethoven's sonata, C major, opus 53; a group of six compositions by Chopin; Rubinstein's barcarolle in A minor; and the Strauss-Tausig waltz "Man lebt nur einmal."

It will be seen from this programme that it was in the first two numbers the opportunity was afforded to hear D'Albert at his best. The fugue is especially adapted to display the virtuosity of the pianist. It is a work of exceeding brilliancy and showed the enormous staying power of D'Albert, and his tremendous technique. But it was in the Beethoven sonata that the artist captivated and enthralled his hearers. In it he showed all the depth of thought and sympathy of feeling of which it is capable. It has been claimed for him that he is the greatest living exponent of Beethoven and we must admit his reading was instinct with vitality and permeated with the highest intelligence. Especially did he deserve the soubriquet he has obtained of "little giant" in the rendering of the introduzione e rondo. It was superb and he roused the audience to great enthusiasm.

As a performer of Chopin's beautiful dream pictures we must confess that to our taste this artist does not charm like Paderewski. His rendering of the berceuse was admirable and brought a storm of applause, and the valse was received equally well. But that magnificent tone, that liquid touch that Paderewski possesses were too recent in the remembrance to be easily forgotten. His rendering of the last impromptu, however, was magnificent in its force and power. It was like the resistless, onward sweep of a mighty army. The audience broke forth in a whirlwind of applause, and the persistent encore produced Liszt's valse impromptu. The melody of the Rubinstein barcarolle was delicious, and the interpretation of the number showed D'Albert's mastery of the key board. The concert fitly closed with the Strauss-Tausig waltz.

What D'Albert lacks is the poesy of Paderewski. To his own wonderful technique if he had joined that sensuous charm, that grace of action, that thorough absorption of himself in his piano, that marks the Polish player, we should have a combination that would be as near perfect as such things can be in thi world.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 122.

SUNDAY, MAY 1, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The week just ended has been utilized by the Boston Symphony orchestra in completing its series of concerts in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, and again the press and public of these cities have recognized in the most flattering manner the value of this organization and the entire competency of its conductor.

The financial results of these six series of concerts (Brooklyn having the public rehearsal and concert usual in this city) has been more gratifying than ever before, and in New York, where the sharpest competition is met with by the orchestra, its managers have the satisfaction of being already assured by the renewal of subscriptions of the entire success of the concerts next season.

The Boston orchestra was formally adopted by the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society this season, and at a meeting held last week, in anticipation of the final concert of its series last evening, it was decided to deck the stage and conductor's desk with flowers the same as when the position now held by Mr. Nikisch was filled by Theodore Thomas. It was also voted to unanimously adopt the following resolutions as an expression of the sentiments of the entire musical public of Brooklyn:

Resolved, that the board of directors of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn offers its congratulations to the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra upon the brilliant series of concerts which it has given in Brooklyn during the past season.

Resolved, that the thanks of the society are due to the conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, for the high standard of the music which he has presented, and for the rare excellence of the performances.

Resolved, that the board fully recognizes the important results which have followed the establishment of the Boston Symphony orchestra upon a permanent basis, and desires to express its appreciation of the liberal spirit of devotion to the cause of music which has made such an orchestra possible.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The last Symphony concert of this eleventh season showed Mr. Nikisch at his best. There were, to be sure, two symphonies on the programme; but as Brahms—the first, in C-minor—is miles away from Haydn—the G-major, No. 13—and as each was played properly in time, spirit and manner, there was everything to approve in the selection and the direction. Between them Mr. Kneisel played the concerto in D-major by Paganini, passing over its manifold difficulties so easily and elegantly that they did not appear to be such, filling it throughout with a sweet and sufficient tone and adding cadenzas of his own, the variety, brilliancy and elaboration of which were quite in keeping with the original, which, by the way, had been revised and rounded out by Wilhelmj from its author's imperfect manuscript. Mr. Kneisel was heartily received and was recalled again and again with an enthusiasm unparalleled during the season.

A review of the entire season shows that the number of works performed—counting each air or lied separately, although perhaps grouped by the singer—was a little less than one hundred, of which eighty were of German authorship, that is if Rubinstein, Volkman, Dvoràk and Paderewski may be classed in the German schools. The French compositions were five; the American, taking Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Floersheim as belonging here, five; the Russian, three; the Italian, three, and the Scandinavian, one. England was not represented. The works new to Boston, of which several had been heard at least in New York, were twenty; a small group had their first readings here, and Mr. Henschel's "Hamlet" suite was presented for the first time in America. There can be little fault found with this proportion of new to old, although the elder concert-goers would easily have accepted a larger infusion of novelty, and with it a more catholic distribution, the division being this: Germany, eleven works; America, four, Italy, two; France, Russia and Scandanavia, one each. The scheme of programmes could have been easily improved and places made for more desirable material by omitting such works as Berlioz's "Harold"; Liszt's "Preludes"; Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale"; Schubert's "Rosamunde" music; Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture; Wagner's "Huldigung's March" and the "Walküre" selections. Mr. Floersheim's music was not necessary, even as an illustration of American composition, unless it were as a compliment to New York criticism which has been so excessively considerate of the orchestra and its conductor, and the adaptation of the Beethoven movement from a quartette for the full string orchestra could have been well spared. That the programmes have as a whole tended toward heaviness, is indicated by the fact that although each averaged about an hour and three-quarters in performance, the whole number of works was considerably less than in some previous seasons, and this, in spite of the increasing of the total footing by the insertion of six short Schubert songs. The current criticism of the city—which has been practically unanimous, in spite of the different musical training and personal point of view of the various writers—has been to the effect that the work of the orchestra has not been what it should be in accuracy, elegance, aptness or discrimination. The only notable exception has been on the part of one evening paper, the eccentricity of whose opinions about music and the drama has been expressed in language so extravagant as to excite amusement quite as often as any more serious attention. If the band has not absolutely retrograded,—as many competent judges, connoisseurs and dilettanti, as well as critics, have been disposed to say,—it certainly has not advanced, and when it has been at its best in some one work, or throughout one evening, there has been blended with the perfect satisfaction of that time the unavoidable regret that it should not be at its best always. The rapid growth in all the finest qualities of public performance made by the New York Philharmonic orchestra, of which Mr. Damrosch is the conductor, and his own marked improvement in directing, have been observed almost with surprise and commented upon favorably and significantly by the critical who heard its concerts in this town. There were a lesson and a warning in these concerts, but we cannot help doubting whether Boston will be profited by them as it should. The Boston orchestra must be by this time a source of revenue to its management. Liberal estimates do not reach the amount of money received in advance for tickets to its concerts here; gains are made of course when its men are supplied to other organizations, and its concerts in other cities are almost without exception contracted for at remunerative rates. While there is ground for pride in all this, there is also cause for distrustful anticipation. The orchestra plays during the season to many audiences which have no opportunity to compare it with others and no standard of absolute judgment. Its conductor has been confirmed in his position for another term of years, as it is understood, and therefore both he and his men have some reason to assume that their way is the right way and to persist in it. In art, as in everything else, the path which does not tend upward tends downward, and the orchestra now stands near the dividing of the ways with an inclination toward the wrong. If merely a far-seeing and bold speculation had prompted the establishment of these concerts, it would be almost impertinent and certainly foolish for the press to repeat from week to week its criticisms. But the orchestra took its rise, as has always been said, in an honest, generous and courageous desire to benefit musical art and music lovers, to show the truth and to insist upon it. If this be so, the press is right in calling upon the founder of the orchestra—even though it now costs him little or nothing—to see that it fulfils its purpose, and to forbid its conductor to give false impressions of the spirit and the form of the masterpieces of music. If he does not do this, he will be responsible for the implanting and diffusion of error, for ignorance and defiance of the truth and for the encouragement of the pernicious doctrine that a performer is greater than an author, that a messenger may misrepresent him who speaks by him and a servant set at naught the commands of his lord. That Mr. Nikisch is able and of much promise, one would stultify one's self to deny; but that he uses his ability so as to make improbable the fulfilment of that promise is also indefinable. If he be too proud, too vain or too self-sufficient to learn, he is not fit to teach, and if he be unwilling to follow authority, like a good centurion, he ought not to have soldiers under him. The pecuniary status of the orchestra may be assured for a long future, but its place in art and in educational influence is yet to be settled. Mr. Nikisch's next term may determine this, and if he be allowed to follow his fantasy and take counsel of his own pertinacity, there can be little doubt as to what the result will be. It is easier to pull down than to build up, and it behooves Mr. Higginson to consider seriously whether—if he and his intentions and desires have been rightly understood—he can afford to let the fortunes of the orchestra drift or be guided at the pleasure of one romantic and self-willed man.

Brooklyn Daily Eagle

WEDNESDAY EVENING, APRIL 27, 1832.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

One cannot enjoy even Dvorak with the thermometer at 100 degrees, and that was the reason why a good many people did not stay to hear the last part of the concert that Mr. Nikisch and his matchless orchestra gave at Chickering hall last night. The heat and the foulness of the air were almost unendurable, and the playing of the band was, therefore, not so earnestly listened to as it usually is. The concert was the last of the six that Mr. Nikisch has given in New York. They have preceded by a few nights the performances in this city that are to be brought to an end, for the season, on Saturday night. The programme was fresh and the forms were free, the only deviation from the modern character of the bill consisting in a violin concerto of Paganini's that was played by Mr. Kneisel, with fine tone and almost a reckless brilliancy, but even he could not save it from sounding like Paganini music. There were too many solos, the orchestra having only two numbers on the bill—the overture by Goldmark to "Prometheus Bound," that has already been heard on this side of the East river, and a new symphony by Antonin Dvorak. The singing was by the Henschels, their numbers being taken from Massenet, Wagner and Goetz. Mrs. Henschel sang charmingly, as she always does, but Mr. Henschel does not sing as well as he used to. He is intelligent, he sings with expression, but the quality of his voice has become rasping, except when he sings softly, as he ought oftener to do. His Wagner number was unfortunate, in that it was the least interesting thing in the whole of "Tannhauser." All the soloists were received with enthusiasm, however. The orchestra was at its best in the Goldmark overture, its magnificent sweep, its delicate shading, its dramatic meaning being enlarged by the conductor. The Dvorak symphony is strong and spirited, vivid at times with that half savage spirit that flashes out in the art of the Slavs, and sometimes odd in its rhythms, but it is not restful and it is not often beautiful. Its author took recent occasion to reprehend the composer of "Cavalleria Rusticana" for his style, but he might go to school to Mascagni to learn a number of things. There is thought in his work, and passion, too, and national color, but there is not the ingenuousness that makes "Cavalleria" delightful and Mr. Dvorak does not seem to be urged by his conscience to write as much as by his custom. The concerts at the same hall will be resumed next season, and it is earnestly hoped that during the summer some effort will be made to render the place more habitable by introducing a new system of ventilation.

Apropos of the concert by the orchestra in this city on Saturday night, the directors of the Brooklyn Philharmonic society held a meeting on Monday and made a graceful recognition of the service that Mr. Nikisch has given to art. They resolved to decorate the stage with flowers and plants, as they did when Mr. Thomas was director of the concerts, and they made the following declaration, which voices the sentiment of the entire musical public:

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Philharmonic society of Brooklyn offers its congratulations to the management of the Boston symphony orchestra upon the brilliant series of concerts which it has given in Brooklyn during the past season.

Resolved, That the thanks of the society are due to the conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, for the high standard of the music which he has presented, and for the rare excellence of the performances.

Resolved, That the board fully recognizes the important results which have followed the establishment of the Boston symphony orchestra upon a permanent basis and desires to express its appreciation of the liberal spirit of devotion to the cause of music which has made such an orchestra possible.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MAY 1, 1892.

—Last Tuesday's concert at Chickering Hall wound up most brilliantly the Boston Symphony orchestra's New York season, and Mr. Nikisch, the band and the soloists departed amid a cheering demonstration of admiration and regard. The orchestra, says one of the leading New York critics, "is the one organization in the United States that can be held up as worthy of comparison with Lamoureux's forces in Paris, and Richter's in Vienna.

—Mr. Adamowski intends to spend part of the summer in Europe. It is greatly hoped Mr. Ellis will prevail upon him to conduct the "Pops," however, before he goes. No local musician can ensure the popular and social success of these concerts as fully as can Mr. Adamowski.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MAY 1, 1892.

THE SYMPHONIES.

TWENTY-FOURTH CONCERT.

The twenty-fourth concert, and the last of the season, by the Symphony orchestra, was given in Music hall Saturday evening, April 23. The programme:

Haydn.	Symphony, G major No. 13, B. & H. Adagio; Allegro — Largo.—Menuet (Allegretto).— Allegro con spirito.
Paganini.	Concerto (in one movement) for Violin, in D major. (Revised and with additions by Wilhelmj).
Brahms.	Symphony No. 1, in C minor, op. 68. Un poco sostenuto; Allegro — Andante sostenuto.—Un poco allegretto e grazioso.—Adagio piu andante; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

Soloist: Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The symphonies of the present season have closed, and are now among the events of the past. It is not our intention to make a review, for these concerts have been freely spoken of by many able critics according to their light and understanding of the music performed. It cannot be denied the orchestra still occupies a very high position among organizations of its kind, here and in Europe, though the Boston critics are quite unanimous in the opinion that it is not so efficient now as when Mr. Gericke left it, three years ago. While it is conceded that Mr. Nikisch is a good conductor, a good musician, a genial gentleman, it is thought he is not so good a drill master, not so correct a follower of tradition, so far as the old classical masters are concerned, as his immediate predecessor. He is credited with having more desire to produce sensational music, than the more refined, legitimate classic; and for this reason his readings have been at times rough and coarse.

The Haydn symphony, while fairly well played, was, especially in the first movement, too loud in the double bass department. If Papa Haydn had been present he would not have recognized the symphony as his. The largo and menuet were better, but I think the latter was taken at too quick a tempo to represent this old stately dance. The last movement was of course vigorously treated.

The sensation of the evening was furnished by Mr. Kneisel's phenomenal fine playing of the violin concerto. In everything relating to perfection of tone quality, nice shading, artistic expression and technique were well represented in Mr. Kneisel's performance. He succeeded admirably in revealing the beauty of the music, and also in captivating the hearts of both audience and orchestra. His cup of reward was full to overflowing, and he must have felt gratified by the more than generous applause which was awarded him. There are no doubts as to the esteemed position held by Mr. Kneisel in the musical hearts of Boston.

The Brahms symphony has been played in Boston before, and though it is a work of great pretension, of great length, of great educational skill, it fails to produce anything but ennui on the minds of the mass of hearers. The symphony starts off briskly, giving promise of something interesting, but it does not succeed in reaching anything more than commonplace. The andante is inordinately long and wearisome, and one is glad when it comes to an end. The last movement is the only redeeming feature of the piece, in that it has quite a pleasant, melodious theme which is readily worked out to a grand climax. We are told Mr. Brahms kept this symphony nine years before giving it to the world, and we can't help remarking that if he had retained it twice as long the world of music would not have suffered thereby.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Boston Daily Globe.

MONDAY, MAY 2.

THEIR WORK APPRECIATED.

Resolutions Relative to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., May 1.—The directors of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society have passed the following resolutions in relation to the Boston Symphony orchestra, which gave a concert here last night:

Resolved, That the board of directors of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn offers its congratulations to the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra upon the brilliant series of concerts which it has given in Brooklyn during the past season.

Resolved, That the thanks of the society are due to the conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, for the high standard of the music which he has presented, and for the rare excellence of the performances.

Resolved, That the board fully recognizes the important results which have followed the establishment of the Boston Symphony orchestra upon a permanent basis, and desires to express its appreciation of the liberal spirit of devotion to the cause of music which has made such an orchestra possible.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 1.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

Anent Gratitude.

The Musical Courier, of New York, in its latest issue, has freed its mind regarding "a half dozen well-known music critics of the Hub," because of the strictures that they have made on the conducting of Mr. Nikisch. The Courier says: "His critical environment is at present singularly unpleasant, for, while the popularity of the Symphony concerts and his personal popularity continue unabated, the most determined opposition on the part of a half-dozen well-known music critics of the Hub to all he does must be very unpleasant for such an amiable, good-hearted man as Arthur Nikisch certainly is." The Courier has every reason to know how amiable and good-hearted Mr. Nikisch is, but it has, nevertheless, wasted unnecessary sympathy here, for Mr. Nikisch has placed it on record that he is too busy and his time is too valuable to read Boston criticisms of his conducting. Under the circumstances, therefore, it is not unreasonable to presume that he does not know of the "determined opposition" of which the Courier speaks, and, consequently, is undisturbed by it. Moreover a man may be both amiable and good natured and yet be an unsatisfactory conductor.

In its zeal to sympathize with Mr. Nikisch the Courier wanders slightly from fact, especially when it asserts, as far as the critics are concerned, "no epithets could be endearing enough to characterize Arthur Nikisch and his work during his first two years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." This is not so, for from the very outset of Mr. Nikisch's career here protests went forth from the critics against the liberties he took with the works of the older composers, and also against certain sensational features in his conducting. Never have endearing epithets been bestowed on him here as far as conscientious criticism is concerned. Even the one critical fugleman whom he has since grappled to himself with hooks of steel, was among the first to object to the methods of the then new conductor. The criticisms are all in print and therefore the Courier has no excuse for the misrepresentation in which it has indulged.

The Courier affirms that these critics "have suddenly discovered" that Mr. Nikisch "is not an interpreter of music, and possibly, later, they will assert that he is neither a conductor nor a musician." Here again is misrepresentation, for the critics "have suddenly discovered" nothing of the kind. They discovered at the second or third concert that Mr. Nikisch conducted in Boston, that he was prone to give new and unauthorized readings to the works of the great masters, and that these readings were vulgar and cheaply operatic. However: "The Musical Courier gladly puts itself on record by declaring that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is unique as an orchestral organization, and its conductor, Arthur Nikisch, as conductor and musician, is the most versatile in this country." This is all well enough as far as the Courier is concerned, but who shall answer for the Courier as an authority in this matter? And how is the Boston Symphony Orchestra "unique" as an orchestral organization? A question still more difficult to answer is: what has Mr. Nikisch done to entitle him to be called the most versatile musician in the country? As far as Boston is concerned, it has never heard any work that Mr. Nikisch has composed, and it is not aware that he has ever composed one, even of the simplest kind. The most versatile musician in this country is surely capable of doing more than conducting an orchestra and playing the piano accompaniments of a song. Where is the evidence of this versatile musicianship? Mr. Henschel is a versatile musician. He sings, plays the piano, and is a talented composer. During his career here as a conductor we had an overture, a piano concerto and other works by him. Mr. Gericke is a versatile musician, and during his career here we had an overture, a choral work and other compositions by him. But where is the testimony to Mr. Nikisch's versatile musicianship?

Gratitude is so rare a virtue in this busy, selfish, every-day world of ours that it is comforting to meet with it now and then; and though we object to the misrepresentations of the Courier, we cannot too warmly admire its keen sense of thankfulness for favors received. Mr. Nikisch's portrait has been printed in the Courier, and as that spirited and interesting weekly is not conducted on eleemosynary principles, it is not wholly unreasonable to presume that our conductor paid for the honor conferred on him. Then, too, Mr. Nikisch has performed here various pieces of music alleged to be composed and scored for the orchestra by one of the highly gifted and truly "versatile" editors of the Courier. It is also true that Mr Nikisch has performed here music composed by another New York musical critic; but with that we have nothing to do just now, except to bestow a passing word of admiration on the policy of our conductor. Spenser has said: "Thankfulness is the tune of angels." Thanks are called by Shakspeare "the exchequer of the poor." Dr. Johnson wrote: "Gratitude is the fruit of great cultivation; you do not find it among gross people." It is true that Seneca calls it "an obvious, a cheap and an easy virtue;—so obvious that whenever there is life for it there is place for it; so cheap that the covetous man may be grateful without expense; and so easy that the sluggard may be so likewise without labor."

It is good to be grateful, and whether gratitude be called forth by a portrait paid for as an advertisement, by music performed for the good will that its performance may insure, and in the hope of favors still to come, it is gratitude, nevertheless. The Courier suggests: "There must be a very large colored gentleman hidden somewhere in the critical wood pile of the Hub." While this suspicion still remains to be proved, there can be no doubt whatever regarding the presence of the negro in the Courier wood-pile. We trust we may be pardoned if we are amused at the Courier assuming a highly moral tone, censuring "a half-dozen well-known critics" for doing what they considered to be their duty; critics who, whatever may be their shortcomings, have never placed it in the power of any one to say of them that they have "an itching palm, and sell and mart their offices for gold"—or for portraits, or performances of editor-fathered music. Still, gratitude is a blissful possession; but one can be grateful without going to the ostentatious subserviency of plunging chin-deep into the mire of mendacity in order to show how dirtily grateful one can really be.

N. Y. FIGARO

GERMAN WEEKLY.

Sonnabend, den 30. April 1892.

Ein großer Kunſtgenuß wurde uns vorige Woche bereitet. Es war dies eine Kammermuſik-Soirée des Herrn Eugen D'Albert und des Kneiſel-Quartett-Verein. In derſelben fanden die vortragenden Künſtler ausreichende Gelegenheit, ihre Kunſt bewundern zu laſſen. Die genialen Leiſtungen übertraſen unſere Erwartungen. Den Höhepunkt bildete das Schumann'ſche Quintett. Herr D'Albert zeigte ſich in der Kreutzer-Sonate als bedeutender Beethoven-Spieler. Der künſtleriſche Erfolg der Soirée war ein durchſchlagender, doch ließ der Beſuch der Zuhörer leider zu wünſchen übrig.

FREE PRESS, Detroit, Mich.

4-30

... Ellis, the handsome and Chesterfieldian ...

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MAY 2, 1892.

The Symphony Concert Season.

Saturday before last, the last symphony concert of the season was given. It brought to a close a season which, like others, has to be commented on, and, like them, affords ample food for comment. It is some time since our Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken its place among the great orchestras of the world; and it behooves the constant listener, whom some call critic, to sum up, as well as he can, the good things, as well as the less good, that have been done. Let us look first at the menu, the bill of fare.

Leaving out the arias and songs sung at the concerts, and counting up the works for orchestra, or for a solo instrument and orchestra, we find that the prominent composers have been represented as follows:

Beethoven	10	works.
Mozart and Schumann	6	"	each.
Brahms	5	"
Schubert and Wagner	3	"	each.

This looks tolerably classical; and the classical spirit evinced in the programmes will be still more evident when we see that the composers, by whom two compositions each were given, are: Max Bruch, Dvorák, Gluck, Goldmark, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Raff, Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky, Volkmann and Weber. Those who were represented only once on the programmes were: Berlioz, Borodin, Busoni, Chadwick, Chopin, Floersheim, Handel, Henschel, Liszt, Loffler, Mascagni, Massenet, MacDowell, Paderewski, Paganini, Paine, Saint-Saëns, Spohr, Richard Strauss, and Svendsen. Of course, all these names are not classic, but striking an average, and counting Beethoven, Gluck, Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Spohr and Weber as classic, and Brahms as a neo-classic, we find on the list forty-one compositions by classic masters, against twenty-five by Berlioz, Borodin, Max Bruch, Dvorák, Goldmark, Liszt, Raff, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Richard Strauss, Svendsen, Tschaikowsky, Volkmann and Wagner. Forty against thirty-seven is pretty good odds.

No doubt we are lumping together, on the non-classical side, a lot of composers who have infinitely little in common, and who do not in the least belong in the same category. But our principal business is now with the classical ones; they are the ones who should, by rights, claim the lion's share in the programmes of any worthy season of symphony concerts; and they stand 40 to 27. This seems to us exactly as it ought to be. Let us consider a moment.

Every symphony concert season aims, or should aim, at two things: to afford a due amount of the highest and best sort of musical enjoyment to the public; and also to give the public a taste of as many and as important novelties as possible. Now, as the concert-going public is constituted, it enjoys most what it knows best; it may feel itself bored, in advance, by looking over a programme full of things which it has known for years. It may feel a certain elation at the idea of listening for the first time to works of which it has heard, which it knows by heresay, and which it has been longing to know in the flesh for a good while. The programme of well-known stuff may be called by all sorts of names—by no means complimentary—beforehand; and the programme of new things, be hailed with exuberant joy. But when it comes to the listening, the old, familiar things are, as a rule, gulped down with a relish that is as evident as it is unfeigned; whereas the new works, of which so much was expected, too often seem tedious, if not absolutely exasperating. One might even say, and with considerable truth, that the ideal of programme-making, even with nothing higher than sheer popularity in view, would be to lure the public on to believing that it was hearing a maximum of new things, while really giving it as much as possible of what it knew well already; to temper the wind of novelty to its ears by as much of the well known as could escape adverse comment.

Then, too, in concerts of this character, something more is to be considered than the mere momentary pleasure the audience is to get from them. The present writer remembers well how, at a meeting of the programme committee of the old Harvard Musical Association, one of the stanchest old classicists dumfounded his fellow committeemen by bursting out with: "We must have something more in view than our own fun; we must think of the educational influence our concerts may have upon the people that come to hear them. I, for my own part, would gladly go through a season without anything by Bach, or Handel, or Haydn, or Mozart, or Beethoven, or Weber, or Mendelssohn, or Schumann; I should like to hear nothing but Wagner and Liszt and Berlioz and Raff, and the devil knows whom not of the modern people. It is enormous fun to listen to their B—SH for the first time; but we must not think of clipping our audience to fit a Procrustes bed of that sort." There is no little solid truth hidden in this sputter from the heart; a course of symphony concerts that does not give more of what is best than of what is less good fails in achieving any object whatsoever, except that of being a "museum of curiosities." And, speaking generally, what is best in the music we have is pretty likely to be of the classic sort.

Much has been written about the average style of performance by the orchestra this season, and not always in the complimentary vein. It is not to be denied that the orchestra has fallen off in point of perfection of finish in playing during the last three years or so. There are two styles of conductors just as there are two sorts of players; each sort has its virtues and shortcomings, and we have never yet seen the good qualities of both united in a single individual. There are the large, intense and passionate players, like Rubinstein; and the fine, delicate and highly finished players like Paderewski. We have never yet heard a man of the Rubinstein sort play with the impeccable finish of a Paderewski; neither have we ever heard a man of the Paderewski sort play with the overpowering dash and impressiveness of a Rubinstein. Mr. Gericke was, so to speak, a "Paderewski conductor." Mr. Nikisch is one of the other, "Rubinstein" kind. If our orchestra have lost in Singing of love and lavishing its bliss.

curves,
...are toned in; the strong, with kissing

SITUATION WANTED to do parlor or second work by a young New Brunswick girl. 36 Kay street, Roxbury, Mass. 3t* my 2

Address V. O. M., Transcript Office. 1t* my 2 on gent's place; care cows, horses, lawn, etc.
POSITION WANTED

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA closed its season at Chickering Hall on Tuesday and is off on its annual tour with 81 people including Eugen D'Albert and Mr. and Mrs. Henschel as soloists. They will travel in a special train. The first week of the tour embraces concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn. On May 2 the orchestra will be heard in New York with Mr. D'Albert, at the Madison Square Concert Hall. The remainder of the first week in May will be taken up with concerts in Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Chicago, after which concerts will be given in Grand Rapids, Ann Arbor and Detroit, besides three concerts in Pittsburgh. Leaving Pittsburgh directly after the concert of May 14, the party returns to Boston.

THE HENSCHELS AT A SYMPHONY CONCERT.

IT WAS concert 24, the penultimate of the season. Mrs. Henschel's tones were clear and limpid. She touched the roulades in the aria from Handel's Alexander as with a butterfly's wing. Though the artistically popular Herodiade air never appeals to me with any of the Messianic suggestions which would naturally belong to it, the singer was delightful in her strong repose, to which her bonnet did not add. It would be equally sensible for men to wear their hats, because the sun happens to be shining outside. No woman looks better when singing with her hat on.

There is a rumor that when Mr. Nikisch's contract is over, Mr. Henschel may be won back to the orchestra of which he was the former director and organizer. There may be nothing in this report, but he held the baton at this concert for the first American performance of his own Hamlet Suite, an attractive but not a remarkable work. As arranged for concert use it has really six movements: first, a Hamlet motive; second, an Ophelia motive; third, an interlude which shows Hamlet's mind to be no longer irresolute as to his uncle's death. Somewhat strangely, a pastorale, suggestive of Ophelia's burial in a sunlit churchyard, precedes the description of her suicide "aslant the brook." Lastly there is a Danish march, Scandinavian in character, though not made up from Danish melodies, as one might expect.

Owing to the non-arrival from Europe of the orchestral parts for D'Albert's Symphony, which had been announced, Schumann's beautiful Spring of Love Symphony was grandly played. The concert concluded with the Oberon overture, exquisitely dealt with. Why don't we hear that opera nowadays?

APRIL SHOWERS.

Two delightful piano and violin sonatas were played as delightfully by Messrs. Faelten and Mahr for the fourth Beethoven Cyclus in Sleeper Hall; and thereafter pupils and friends assembled in the parlors to shake hands with Eugen D'Albert, who was the honored guest of the evening, affable and modest.

PETERSILEA has finished his analysis concerts for the season. He was prevented by ll health from giving his readings and con-

---

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

TUESDAY, MAY 3, 1892.

THE D'ALBERT CONCERT.

The concert which Mr. D'Albert gave in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Madison Square Hall, while in many respects an exceedingly enjoyable affair, subjected both participants to the severest test they have had to endure here this season. The concert-room is small and acoustically admirable. No better place for a pianoforte concert could be imagined, but it subjects an orchestra to a severe test. Every crudity in tone, every tardy entrance is made painfully apparent. Added to this drawback there was the difficulty of disposing of so large a band as that of Mr. Nikisch on the small stage, and the state of the atmosphere, which was extremely unfavorable to orchestral music. Not only was there a breaking of violin strings all evening, but the pitch of the wood-wind instruments was faulty, and the slow movement of the E minor concerto by Chopin, which the pianist played first, was sadly marred by the dissonant bassoons. It was easier, however, to overlook a defect of this kind for which the players were less responsible than the weather, than it was to enjoy the performance of Mr. D'Albert. There is no need, at this late day, to add to the high estimate which has been pronounced in these columns on this admirable musician and brilliant pianist. Unhappily his conception of Chopin's idyllic concerto is one which only those are likely to admire who are willing that the spirit of the composition shall be sacrificed so long as it is made a vehicle for the performer's marvellous digital skill. Of the charm which is native to the work we failed to detect a single trace last night. Mr. D'Albert's interest seemed concentrated in the passage work, which he had transmogrified with the assistance of the Tausig version, till Chopin would surely have failed to recognize it as his creation. In these portions he played with amazing brilliancy, and, of course, the ad captandum effect brought its reward. In the fervor stirred up by his stupendous close he played afterward Rubinstein's staccato etude in a manner to take one's breath away; but in the minds of the judicious it did not save the concerto. The concerto in E-flat by Liszt, which ended the concert, was a different matter. There the style which he had chosen to cultivate had its place. The orchestra played Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, selections from "Die Meistersinger" and the march movement from Berlioz's "Harold" symphony.

THE LEADER.

MAY, 1892.

GREAT PIANISTS.

VON BULOW is reported as having said:—"There are but three great pianists in the world—Rubinstein, myself, and D'Albert; but the latter is yet young, and bids fair to surpass us all." In other words, Paderewski is "not in it." How will his many devoted admirers relish such a summary dethronement of their idol?

Passing over the extreme modesty of this musician, in thus classifying himself,—though there is no question that he rightly places himself—there are several suggestions born from his oracular dictum, each one of which is vitally significant.

We cordially agree with him in placing Rubinstein at the head of the list, for, since Liszt, that is undoubtedly his proper place, as even Von Bulow himself must yield him place. Still we think there are yet other pianists who deserve, at least, honorable mention, and to exclude them thus arbitrarily will scarcely secure a public verdict.

The exclusion of Paderewski from the list of "great pianists" is to set at naught the enthusiastic acclaim of the people of both hemispheres, the echo of which has not even yet died out. However highly we may esteem the transcendent genius of Von Bulow, and however ready we may be to admit his right to speak didactically upon this subject, we still venture to assert that even the insignificant public knows something, even though it be but a little; and that same public has rights other than that of merely paying the bills. We cannot calmly consent to be thus cavalierly thrust aside, and be patient while being told that we "don't know anything about it."

And still further on this point. It is hardly good judgment on the part of any artist, however elevated, to thus arraign the class from whom his support is drawn. Only a Vanderbilt can be permitted to "anathemize the public;" and even he cannot do it with impunity. While Paderewski may not now be quite the equal of the two great artists named by Von Bulow, there can be but one opinion—that he is still a "great" artist, and gives every indication that, with their years, may come to him even a greater genius than theirs.

Concerning D'Albert we have only to say that we rejoice at his rapid advancement to the extreme front rank of the world's grandest pianists, and trust that the prediction of Von Bulow may be more than fulfilled.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

Published Every Day in the Year at Nos. 53-63 Park Row.

TUESDAY, MAY 3, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

M. D'Albert Plays at What Was Probably the Last Concert.

What was probably the last symphony concert of the present season took place last night at Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, when M. D'Albert appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch.

M. D'Albert played two concertos—Chopin's in E minor, op. 11, and Liszt's in E flat. The orchestra numbers comprised Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, selections from "Die Meistersinger," third act, and the "Pilgrim's March," from Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, a programme which, if it contained no startling novelties, was in the main enjoyable.

The audience was at once put in a receptive frame of mind by a delightfully romantic and considered performance of Goldmark's beautiful overture. M. D'Albert is too good a Beethoven player to ever excel as an interpreter of Chopin. He is too precise, too unemotional.

His reading of Chopin's brilliant ouvrage de jeunesse was finished and careful, but was distinctly lacking in poetical fancy and feeling, and sounded somewhat hard and dry. It was exceedingly brilliant, but it was not characteristically Chopinesque.

As might have been expected "Meistersinger" selections and the "Pilgrim's March," in which Mr. Kneisel played the viola solo, went in a manner which left little to be desired. Mr. Nikisch views his Wagner with most just dramatic proportion, and Mr. Kneisel makes one regret that viola solos are so infrequent and that the instrument even to-day is so disregarded.

Mr. D'Albert's remarkable force and technique were shown to the greatest advantage in the Liszt concert, a concerto by courtesy rather than in form. M. D'Albert makes nothing of technical difficulties which might well appall the most experienced, and is never guilty of playing for mere effect's sake. He was most enthusiastically received, and after the Chopin concerto played the Rubinstein C major etude as an encore in a rather perfunctory and indistinct manner, though at an astounding pace.

The orchestra sounded very well in the hall, though the two-storied appearance of the orchestra struck one as a little quaint. The programme was not on the whole as interesting or as pleasantly varied as is usual with Mr. Nikisch, who is generally an adept in the art of programme making.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 1.

HENRY G. PARKER, Editor and Publisher

Anent Gratitude.

The Musical Courier, of New York, in its latest issue, has freed its mind regarding "a half dozen well-known music critics of the Hub," because of the strictures that they have made on the conducting of Mr. Nikisch. The Courier says: "His critical environment is at present singularly unpleasant, for, while the popularity of the Symphony concerts and his personal popularity continue unabated, the most determined opposition on the part of a half-dozen well-known music critics of the Hub to all he does must be very unpleasant for such an amiable, good-hearted man as Arthur Nikisch certainly is." The Courier has every reason to know how amiable and good-hearted Mr. Nikisch is, but it has, nevertheless, wasted unnecessary sympathy here, for Mr. Nikisch has placed it on record that he is too busy and his time is too valuable to read Boston criticisms of his conducting. Under the circumstances, therefore, it is not unreasonable to presume that he does not know of the "determined opposition" of which the Courier speaks, and, consequently, is undisturbed by it. Moreover a man may be both amiable and good natured and yet be an unsatisfactory conductor.

In its zeal to sympathize with Mr. Nikisch the Courier wanders slightly from fact, especially when it asserts, as far as the critics are concerned, "no epithets could be endearing enough to characterize Arthur Nikisch and his work during his first two years as conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." This is not so, for from the very outset of Mr. Nikisch's career here protests went forth from the critics against the liberties he took with the works of the older composers, and also against certain sensational features in his conducting. Never have endearing epithets been bestowed on him here as far as conscientious criticism is concerned. Even the one critical fugleman whom he has since grappled to himself with hooks of steel, was among the first to object to the methods of the then new conductor. The criticisms are all in print and therefore the Courier has no excuse for the misrepresentation in which it has indulged.

The Courier affirms that these critics "have suddenly discovered" that Mr. Nikisch "is not an interpreter of music, and possibly, later, they will assert that he is neither a conductor nor a musician." Here again is misrepresentation, for the critics "have suddenly discovered" nothing of the kind. They discovered at the second or third concert that Mr. Nikisch conducted in Boston, that he was prone to give new and unauthorized readings to the works of the great masters, and that these readings were vulgar and cheaply operatic. However: "The Musical Courier gladly puts itself on record by declaring that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is unique as an orchestral organization, and its conductor, Arthur Nikisch, as conductor and musician, is the most versatile in this country." This is all well enough as far as the Courier is concerned, but who shall answer for the Courier as an authority in this matter? And how is the Boston Symphony Orchestra "unique" as an orchestral organization? A question still more difficult to answer is: what has Mr. Nikisch done to entitle him to be called the most versatile musician in the country? As far as Boston is concerned, it has never heard any work that Mr. Nikisch has composed, and it is not aware that he has ever composed one, even of the simplest kind. The most versatile musician in this country is surely capable of doing more than conducting an orchestra and playing the piano accompaniments of a song. Where is the evidence of this versatile musicianship? Mr. Henschel is a versatile musician. He sings, plays the piano, and is a talented composer. During his career here as a conductor we had an overture, a piano concerto and other works by him. Mr. Gericke is a versatile musician, and during his career here we had an overture, a choral work and other compositions by him. But where is the testimony to Mr. Nikisch's versatile musicianship?

Gratitude is so rare a virtue in this busy, selfish, every-day world of ours that it is comforting to meet with it now and then; and though we object to the misrepresentations of the Courier, we cannot too warmly admire its keen sense of thankfulness for favors received. Mr. Nikisch's portrait has been printed in the Courier, and as that spirited and interesting weekly is not conducted on eleemosynary principles, it is not wholly unreasonable to presume that our conductor paid for the honor conferred on him. Then, too, Mr. Nikisch has performed here various pieces of music alleged to be composed and scored for the orchestra by one of the highly gifted and truly "versatile" editors of the Courier It is also true that Mr Nikisch has performed here music composed by another New York musical critic; but with that we have nothing to do just now, except to bestow a passing word of admiration on the policy of our conductor. Spenser has said: "Thankfulness is the tune of angels." Thanks are called by Shakspeare "the exchequer of the poor." Dr. Johnson wrote: "Gratitude is the fruit of great cultivation; you do not find it among gross people." It is true that Seneca calls it "an obvious, a cheap and an easy virtue;—so obvious that whenever there is life for it there is place for it; so cheap that the covetous man may be grateful without expense; and so easy that the sluggard may be so likewise without labor."

It is good to be grateful, and whether gratitude be called forth by a portrait paid for as an advertisement, by music performed for the good will that its performance may insure, and in the hope of favors still to come, it is gratitude, nevertheless. The Courier suggests: "There must be a very large colored gentleman hidden somewhere in the critical wood pile of the Hub." While this suspicion still remains to be proved, there can be no doubt whatever regarding the presence of the negro in the Courier wood-pile. We trust we may be pardoned if we are amused at the Courier assuming a highly moral tone, censuring "a half-dozen well-known critics" for doing what they considered to be their duty; critics who, whatever may be their shortcomings, have never placed it in the power of any one to say of them that they have "an itching palm, and sell and mart their offices for gold"—or for portraits, or performances of editor-fathered music. Still, gratitude is a blissful possession; but one can be grateful without going to the ostentatious subserviency of plunging chin-deep into the mire of mendacity in order to show how dirtily grateful one can really be.

N.Y. FIGARO

GERMAN WEEKLY.

Sonnabend, den 30. April 1892.

Ein großer Kunſtgenuß wurde uns vorige Woche bereitet. Es war dies eine Kammermuſik-Soirée des Herrn Eugen D'Albert und des Kneiſel-Quartett-Verein. In derſelben fanden die vortragenden Künſtler ausreichende Gelegenheit, ihre Kunſt bewundern zu laſſen. Die genialen Leiſtungen übertrafen unſere Erwartungen. Den Höhepunkt bildete das Schumann'ſche Quintett. Herr D'Albert zeigte ſich in der Kreutzer-Sonate als bedeutender Beethoven-Spieler. Der künſtleriſche Erfolg der Soirée war ein durchſchlagender, doch ließ der Beſuch der Zuhörer leider zu wünſchen übrig.

FREE PRESS, Detroit, Mich.

4-30

C. A. Ellis, the handsome and Chesterfieldian representative of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in the city yesterday [illegible] superb organization. The sale of seats [illegible] Monday morning at Charles [illegible] music store. The concert is to

---

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MAY 2, 1892.

The Symphony Concert Season.

Saturday before last, the last symphony concert of the season was given. It brought to a close a season which, like others, has to be commented on, and, like them, affords ample food for comment. It is some time since our Boston Symphony Orchestra has taken its place among the great orchestras of the world; and it behooves the constant listener, whom some call critic, to sum up, as well as he can, the good things, as well as the less good, that have been done. Let us look first at the menu, the bill of fare.

Leaving out the arias and songs sung at the concerts, and counting up the works for orchestra, or for a solo instrument and orchestra, we find that the prominent composers have been represented as follows:

Beethoven	10 works.
Mozart and Schumann	6 "	each.
Brahms	5 "
Schubert and Wagner	3 "	each.

This looks tolerably classical; and the classical spirit evinced in the programmes will be still more evident when we see that the composers, by whom two compositions each were given, are: Max Bruch, Dvorák, Gluck, Goldmark, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Raff, Rubinstein, Tschaikowsky Volkmann and Weber. Those who were represented only once on the programmes were: Berlioz, Borodin, Busoni, Chadwick, Chopin, Floersheim, Handel, Henschel, Liszt, Loffler, Mascagni, Massenet, MacDowell, Paderewski, Paganini, Paine, Saint-Saëns, Spohr, Richard Strauss, and Svendsen. Of course, all these names are not classic, but striking an average, and counting Beethoven, Gluck, Handel, Haydn, Mendelssohn, Mozart, Schubert, Schumann, Spohr and Weber as classic, and Brahms as a neo-classic, we find on the list forty-one compositions by classic masters, against twenty-five by Berlioz, Borodin, Max Bruch, Dvorák, Goldmark, Liszt, Raff, Rubinstein, Saint-Saëns, Richard Strauss, Svendsen, Tschaikowsky, Volkmann and Wagner. Forty against thirty-seven is pretty good odds.

No doubt we are lumping together, on the non-classical side, a lot of composers who have infinitely little in common, and who do not in the least belong in the same category. But our principal business is now with the classical ones; they are the ones who should, by rights, claim the lion's share in the programmes of any worthy season of symphony concerts; and they stand 40 to 27. This seems to us exactly as it ought to be. Let us consider a moment.

Every symphony concert season aims, or should aim, at two things: to afford a due amount of the highest and best sort of musical enjoyment to the public; and also to give the public a taste of as many and as important novelties as possible. Now, as the concert-going public is constituted, it enjoys most what it knows best; it may feel itself bored, in advance, by looking over a programme full of things which it has known for years. It may feel a certain elation at the idea of listening for the first time to works of which it has heard, which it knows by heresay, and which it has been longing to know in the flesh for a good while. The programme of well-known stuff may be called by all sorts of names—by no means complimentary—beforehand; and the programme of new things, be hailed with exuberant joy. But when it comes to the listening, the old, familiar things are, as a rule, gulped down with a relish that is as evident as it is unfeigned; whereas the new works, of which so much was expected, too often seem tedious, if not absolutely exasperating. One might even say, and with considerable truth, that the ideal of programme-making, even with nothing higher than sheer popularity in view, would be to lure the public on to believing that it was hearing a maximum of new things, while really giving it as much as possible of what it knew well already; to temper the wind of novelty to its ears by as much of the well known as could escape adverse comment.

Then, too, in concerts of this character, something more is to be considered than the mere momentary pleasure the audience is to get from them. The present writer remembers well how, at a meeting of the programme committee of the old Harvard Musical Association, one of the stanchest old classicists dumfounded his fellow committeemen by bursting out with: "We must have something more in view than our own fun; we must think of the educational influence our concerts may have upon the people that come to hear them. I, for my own part, would gladly go through a season without anything by Bach, or Handel, or Haydn, or Mozart, or Beethoven, or Weber, or Mendelssohn, or Schumann; I should like to hear nothing but Wagner and Liszt and Berlioz and Raff, and the devil knows whom not of the modern people. It is enormous fun to listen to their B—SH for the first time; but we must not think of clipping our audience to fit a Procrustes bed of that sort." There is no little solid truth hidden in this sputter from the heart; a course of symphony concerts that does not give more of what is best than of what is less good fails in achieving any object whatsoever, except that of being a "museum of curiosities." And, speaking generally, what is best in the music we have is pretty likely to be of the classic sort.

Much has been written about the average style of performance by the orchestra this season, and not always in the complimentary vein. It is not to be denied that the orchestra has fallen off in point of perfection of finish in playing during the last three years or so. There are two styles of conductors just as there are two sorts of players; each sort has its virtues and shortcomings, and we have never yet seen the good qualities of both united in a single individual. There are the large, intense and passionate players, like Rubinstein; and the fine, delicate and highly finished players like Paderewski. We have never yet heard a man of the Rubinstein sort play with the impeccable finish of a Paderewski; neither have we ever heard a man of the Paderewski sort play with the overpowering dash and impressiveness of a Rubinstein. Mr. Gericke was, so to speak, a "Paderewski conductor." Mr. Nikisch is one of the other, "Rubinstein" kind. If our orchestra have lost in perfection of technical finish, it has gained in force and largeness of style and in emotional impressiveness. The frequency, however, with which the wooden wind has been out of tune with the strings of late is another matter; to our mind it might suggest the possibility that abandoning the old practice of tuning on the stage has turned out to be rather a failure. Still, with all that has been open to criticism, there has been more to enjoy than to be sorry for. We, for one, are more sorry that the season is over than for anything else.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been gathering fresh laurels on its trip so far. Last week concerts were given at Philadelphia, New York, Washington and Baltimore, and for each occasion every seat was sold in advance. After the closing concert of the season for the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society, the directors passed resolutions of warm compliments and hearty thanks to Mr. Nikisch and the orchestra.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 30, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA closed its season at Chickering Hall on Tuesday and is off on its annual tour with 81 people including Eugen D'Albert and Mr. and Mrs. Henschel as soloists. They will travel in a special train. The first week of the tour embraces concerts in Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore and Brooklyn. On May 2 the orchestra will be heard in New York with Mr. D'Albert, at the Madison Square Concert Hall. The remainder of the first week in May will be taken up with concerts in Buffalo, Cleveland, Columbus, Cincinnati and Chicago, after which concerts will be given in Grand Rapids, Ann Arbor and Detroit, besides three concerts in Pittsburgh. Leaving Pittsburgh directly after the concert of May 14, the party returns to Boston.

THE HENSCHELS AT A SYMPHONY CONCERT.

IT WAS concert 24, the penultimate of the season. Mrs. Henschel's tones were clear and limpid. She touched the roulades in the aria from Handel's Alexander as with a butterfly's wing. Though the artistically popular Herodiade air never appeals to me with any of the Messianic suggestions which would naturally belong to it, the singer was delightful in her strong repose, to which her bonnet did not add. It would be equally sensible for men to wear their hats, because the sun happens to be shining outside. No woman looks better when singing with her hat on.

There is a rumor that when Mr. Nikisch's contract is over, Mr. Henschel may be won back to the orchestra of which he was the former director and organizer. There may be nothing in this report, but he held the baton at this concert for the first American performance of his own Hamlet Suite, an attractive but not a remarkable work. As arranged for concert use it has really six movements: first, a Hamlet motive; second, an Ophelia motive; third, an interlude which shows Hamlet's mind to be no longer irresolute as to his uncle's death. Somewhat strangely, a pastorale, suggestive of Ophelia's burial in a sunlit churchyard, precedes the description of her suicide "aslant the brook." Lastly there is a Danish march, Scandinavian in character, though not made up from Danish melodies, as one might expect.

Owing to the non-arrival from Europe of the orchestral parts for D'Albert's Symphony, which had been announced, Schumann's beautiful Spring of Love Symphony was grandly played. The concert concluded with the Oberon overture, exquisitely dealt with. Why don't we hear that opera nowadays?

APRIL SHOWERS.

Two delightful piano and violin sonatas were played as delightfully by Messrs. Faelten and Mahr for the fourth Beethoven Cyclus in Sleeper Hall; and thereafter pupils and friends assembled in the parlors to shake hands with Eugen D'Albert, who was the honored guest of the evening, affable and modest.

PETERSILEA has finished his analysis concerts for the season. He was prevented by ill health from giving his readings and con-

---

New-York Daily Tribune.

FOUNDED BY HORACE GREELEY

TUESDAY, MAY 3, 1892.

THE D'ALBERT CONCERT.

The concert which Mr. D'Albert gave in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Madison Square Hall, while in many respects an exceedingly enjoyable affair, subjected both participants to the severest test they have had to endure here this season. The concert-room is small and acoustically admirable. No better place for a pianoforte concert could be imagined, but it subjects an orchestra to a severe test. Every crudity in tone, every tardy entrance is made painfully apparent. Added to this drawback there was the difficulty of disposing of so large a band as that of Mr. Nikisch on the small stage, and the state of the atmosphere, which was extremely unfavorable to orchestral music. Not only was there a breaking of violin strings all evening, but the pitch of the wood-wind instruments was faulty, and the slow movement of the E minor concerto by Chopin, which the pianist played first, was sadly marred by the dissonant bassoons. It was easier, however, to overlook a defect of this kind for which the players were less responsible than the weather, than it was to enjoy the performance of Mr. D'Albert. There is no need, at this late day, to add to the high estimate which has been pronounced in these columns on this admirable musician and brilliant pianist. Unhappily his conception of Chopin's idyllic concerto is one which only those are likely to admire who are willing that the spirit of the composition shall be sacrificed so long as it is made a vehicle for the performer's marvellous digital skill. Of the charm which is native to the work we failed to detect a single trace last night. Mr. D'Albert's interest seemed concentrated in the passage work, which he had transmogrified with the assistance of the Tausig version, till Chopin would surely have failed to recognize it as his creation. In these portions he played with amazing brilliancy, and, of course, the ad captandum effect brought its reward. In the fervor stirred up by his stupendous close he played afterward Rubinstein's staccato etude in a manner to take one's breath away; but in the minds of the judicious it did not save the concerto. The concerto in E-flat by Liszt, which ended the concert, was a different matter. There the style which he had chosen to cultivate had its place. The orchestra played Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, selections from "Die Meistersinger" and the march movement from Berlioz's "Harold" symphony.

THE LEADER.

MAY, 1892.

GREAT PIANISTS.

VON BULOW is reported as having said:—"There are but three great pianists in the world—Rubinstein, myself, and D'Albert; but the latter is yet young, and bids fair to surpass us all." In other words, Paderewski is "not in it." How will his many devoted admirers relish such a summary dethronement of their idol?

Passing over the extreme modesty of this musician, in thus classifying himself,—though there is no question that he rightly places himself—there are several suggestions born from his oracular dictum, each one of which is vitally significant.

We cordially agree with him in placing Rubinstein at the head of the list, for, since Liszt, that is undoubtedly his proper place, as even Von Bulow himself must yield him place. Still we think there are yet other pianists who deserve, at least, honorable mention, and to exclude them thus arbitrarily will scarcely secure a public verdict.

The exclusion of Paderewski from the list of "great pianists" is to set at naught the enthusiastic acclaim of the people of both hemispheres, the echo of which has not even yet died out. However highly we may esteem the transcendent genius of Von Bulow, and however ready we may be to admit his right to speak didactically upon this subject, we still venture to assert that even the insignificant public knows something, even though it be but a little; and that same public has rights other than that of merely paying the bills. We cannot calmly consent to be thus cavalierly thrust aside, and be patient while being told that we "don't know anything about it."

And still further on this point. It is hardly good judgment on the part of any artist, however elevated, to thus arraign the class from whom his support is drawn. Only a Vanderbilt can be permitted to "anathemize the public;" and even he cannot do it with impunity. While Paderewski may not now be quite the equal of the two great artists named by Von Bulow, there can be but one opinion—that he is still a "great" artist, and gives every indication that, with their years, may come to him even a greater genius than theirs.

Concerning D'Albert we have only to say that we rejoice at his rapid advancement to the extreme front rank of the world's grandest pianists, and trust that the prediction of Von Bulow may be more than fulfilled.

The World

JOSEPH PULITZER.

Published Every Day in the Year at Nos. 53-63 Park Row.

TUESDAY, MAY 3, 1892.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

M. D'Albert Plays at What Was Probably the Last Concert.

What was probably the last symphony concert of the present season took place last night at Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, when M. D'Albert appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch.

M. D'Albert played two concertos—Chopin's in E minor, op. 11, and Liszt's in E flat. The orchestra numbers comprised Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, selections from "Die Meistersinger," third act, and the "Pilgrim's March," from Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, a programme which, if it contained no startling novelties, was in the main enjoyable.

The audience was at once put in a receptive frame of mind by a delightfully romantic and considered performance of Goldmark's beautiful overture. M. D'Albert is too good a Beethoven player to ever excel as an interpreter of Chopin. He is too precise, too unemotional.

His reading of Chopin's brilliant ouvrage de jeunesse was finished and careful, but was distinctly lacking in poetical fancy and feeling, and sounded somewhat hard and dry. It was exceedingly brilliant, but it was not characteristically Chopinesque.

As might have been expected "Meistersinger" selections and the "Pilgrim's March," in which Mr. Kneisel played the viola solo, went in a manner which left little to be desired. Mr. Nikisch views his Wagner with most just dramatic proportion, and Mr. Kneisel makes one regret that viola solos are so infrequent and that the instrument even to-day is so disregarded.

Mr. D'Albert's remarkable force and technique were shown to the greatest advantage in the Liszt concert, a concerto by courtesy rather than in form. M. D'Albert makes nothing of technical difficulties which might well appall the most experienced, and is never guilty of playing for mere effect's sake. He was most enthusiastically received, and after the Chopin concerto played the Rubinstein C major etude as an encore in a rather perfunctory and indistinct manner, though at an astounding pace.

The orchestra sounded very well in the hall, though the two-storied appearance of the orchestra struck one as a little quaint. The programme was not on the whole as interesting or as pleasantly varied as is usual with Mr. Nikisch, who is generally an adept in the art of programme making.

NEW YORK HERALD

SIXTEEN PAGES.

NEW YORK, TUESDAY, MAY 3, 1892.

WITH D'ALBERT AS SOLOIST.

The concert given by Mr. Eugen D'Albert and the Boston orchestra at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall last night drew a large and enthusiastic audience. Mr. D'Albert carried off the lion's share of the honors of the evening, there being scarcely sufficient scope in the music assigned for the orchestra.

Chopin's E minor concerto and Liszt's concerto in E flat were played by Mr. D'Albert in a masterly manner. Rubinstein's study in C major, given as an encore, was played with marvellous power.

The orchestra played Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, the introduction to the third act of the "Meistersinger" and Berlioz's "Pilgrim's March," in which Mr. Franz Kneisel played the viola solo part most exquisitely.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, TUESDAY, MAY 3, 1892.

D'ALBERT AND NIKISCH.

Eugen d'Albert, the little giant of the pianoforte, appeared at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall last evening in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Arthur Nikisch. Such a combination of admirable interpreters of music was bound to attract a large audience, and as a result the house was filled and the enthusiasm was overflowing. Mr. d'Albert selected for his two numbers the Chopin concerto in E minor and Liszt's in E flat.

Mr. d'Albert's interpretation of the Chopin number is not altogether unfamiliar to local concertgoers. It will be remembered that it is not in accord with generally-accepted traditions. The languor and sensuousness of its more sentimental parts are entirely absent, while the rapid passages are all played with a vigor and fire which sometimes approach fury. It must be admitted that Mr. d'Albert's brilliancy was impaired last night, as it has been all this season, by a hardness of tone which he does not seem able to get rid of. Nevertheless, his playing quite warmed up the audience, and the brilliant octave passage (Tausig's) at the end called out cheers.

The orchestra did its work very well, in spite of the cramped space and the fact that one or two of the wind instruments were suffering from an area of low barometic pressure. Franz Kneisel, the concertmeister, was heard in the viola obligato of the third movement of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy." The orchestra also contributed a very spirited performance of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. Mr. Nikisch conducted with his usual skill.

Clipping from

Enquirer, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5/4.

BOSTON MUSICIANS' PLAYING.

It Was Greatly Enjoyed at the Star Last Night—Coming Events.

The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be long remembered by those who listened to the exquisite harmonies produced by the members of this superb organization at the concert at the Star Theater last night. It takes time and a good deal of bad or indifferent music to efface the impression made upon the memory by such a perfect rendition of great works.

The audience was composed of the most cultivated people of the city and it was larger than the Star Theater has accommodations for; in fact the house was sold out completely in advance. Marked appreciation was shown every superior effort of orchestra and soloists, which means every number on the programme.

The overture to the opera of "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz, opened the concert, and the rich descriptive music of the overture was rendered by Director Nikisch's musicians with splendid effect. Next came the playing of Eugen D'Albert. This pianist gave a recital here only a short time ago, and people thought they knew of what he was capable. But the artist surprised the most of those in his audience last night. He seemed to throw all the strength and all the expression of which he was capable into his playing. His solo was the concerto for pianoforte in E minor from opus II. by Chopin, one of the two works written by Chopin with orchestral accompaniment, and D'Albert's playing no doubt owed much of the effect it produced to the delightful manner in which this accompaniment scarcely less beautiful than the solo part itself, was rendered by the orchestra. Still the little pianist seemed to exert himself in an unusual degree and the rare beauty of the composition was evidently an inspiration to him. When he finished the allegro maestoso there was a tempest of applause, and at the close of the mournfully sweet melody of the romance larghetto which he played with wonderful delicacy and tenderness it was increased. At the conclusion of the concerto he was recalled four times and finally he sat down and played the familiar Choppin "Berceuse."

In the "Prelude" from Wagner's "Lohengrin" which followed, the strings did most did most delicate and effective work, and the Tschaikowsky number, last movement (theme with variations) from suite, opus 55, was given by the orchestra with all the spirit and expression and sentiment which the accomplished leader knows so well how to draw from his musicians. The second soloist of the evening was Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist and he too played surprisingly well. His playing was extremely sympathetic and one fancied that the artist and his instrument were on most affectionate terms. The latest symphonic composition of Dvorak, symphony No. 4 in G. Major, closed the concert and the splendid music was given a superb rendition.

[206]

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 4, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

THE sixth and last concert by that ideal organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, took place at Chickering Hall, Tuesday evening of last week. This was the program:

Overture, "Prometheus Bound" .... Goldmark
Aria from "Herodiade" .... Massenet
Mrs. Henschel.
Violin concerto in D major .... Paganini
Revised by Wilhelmj.
Mr. Kneisel.
Fantasy from Act II., "Tannhäuser," "Blich ich umher" .... Wagner
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Taming of the Shrew" .... Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Symphony No. 4, in G major .... Dvorak
Allegro con brio.
Adagio.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale, allegro ma non troppo.

Chickering Hall was, as always, crowded, and the concert, as usual, was a gem of the first water in regard to the performance. Those disgruntled critics who complain of the roughness of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must have had their ears attuned to symphonic studies of gnat wings and butterflies' sighs, else they could not have failed to do justice to the exquisite balance of the orchestra and its genuinely virtuoso qualities in music, demanding great degrees of velocity, finesse and tonal equipoise rarely if ever encountered. On the other hand the carpers at Mr. Nikisch and his band on the score of lack of breadth, virility (and there be those who do) could loudly have complained of the power and dramatic vigor of Goldmark's most characteristic overture. It was superbly played.

Mr. Kneisel, who, one is sorry to chronicle, has been quite ill since the concert with fever and a severe cold, gave a most finished interpretation of the Paganini concerto, making its enormous technical difficulties as naught, and playing with all the tenderness and brilliancy the work exacts. He won well deserved applause. Mrs. Henschel was slightly overweighted in the Massenet aria but sang delightfully with her husband, who was, as is his wont, musical and manly in his singing. The Dvorak symphony received a most fitting and finished reading at Mr. Nikisch's hands. Here are the dates for next season's series: Thursday evening, November 3, 1892; Thursday evening, December 8, 1892; Thursday evening, January 12, 1893; Thursday evening, February 9, 1893; Thursday evening, March 16, 1893; Thursday evening, April 27, 1893.

Eugen d'Albert was in Boston to-day, after completing a limited tour through the Eastern section.

In the course of conversation he stated to your correspondent that he was more than gratified with the success of his recent visit to America. He sails from New York the 17th, and will probably spend the summer in Switzerland, devoting more or less time to the completion of several compositions already well under way.

* * * *

The Music Hall "promenade concerts" begin Wednesday evening June 1. The same general plan, so successful last season, will be followed this, and although the name of the conductor has not yet been announced, the public need have no fear but that Manager Ellis will procure the services of the best available man.

The Musical Courier.

WITH the last Symphony concert the season may be said to have closed musically. A few concerts of greater or lesser importance were given during the week, and a limited number are announced for the coming fortnight or so.

THE Boston "Home Journal" in its latest issue contained these very significant remarks regarding the attitude of certain music critics of Boston toward Mr. Nikisch:

> This is the season when the Symphony Orchestra comes in for more than its share of criticism, and just now it seems to be getting it in large consignments, or, rather, Mr. Nikisch is. It is a peculiarity of Boston criticism, be it musical or dramatic, that it is more severe with the most artistic and greatest.
>
> Let a company, a star, a singer or a musical organization appear here which is merely mediocrity and it will escape with usually complimentary notices. But let a really great artist appear and he will be searched for faults which will be found. Exceptions merely prove the rule.
>
> With the Symphony Orchestra this is particularly noticeable, perhaps because it is claimed by Boston, and if we cannot find fault with what is ours, with what can we find fault? And everybody exercises that privilege. The earlier part of this week saw the leader of that incomparable organization attacked from three quarters and with such unanimity of thought and time that it certainly looked like a preconcerted movement.
>
> No one can deny the greatness of the organization, nor would they wish to, I think, but the attack is solely upon its leader. It is true that Boston boasts a large number of virtuosi who certainly ought to be numbered in this great organization and who are not, and this seems to be the basis of the criticisms, whether it appears or not.

The substance, then, of all these attacks is personal. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, say these sapient critics, is "all right," but Mr. Nikisch is "all wrong," which reminds one of the Scotch verdict, "The prisoner is not guilty, but we advise him not to do it again."

The evil of the whole affair is the naturally low es-

~~Mr. Cooper, the favorite comedian from the Varieties, sang two comic French songs. Miss du Meriel, of the Français, gave "La Fiancée du Timbalier," also by Thorné. The ladies' orchestra of scarlet clad gipsies closed the first part of the program. After supper the program consisted of an extraordinary trio, "Les Isola," giving a séance of prestidigitation and mind reading.~~

~~Miss Ramos, a pretty Spanish girl in Castilian attire, sang songs of sunny Spain, which closed the program of one of the most elaborate entertainments I have attended in Paris.~~

~~The same evening Mrs. Kirewsky gave a fashionable musicale of the compositions of that clever composer, Miss Gabrielle Ferrari, assisted by Miss Salla, Mr. White, the violinist, and other artists. Miss Ferrari obtained a great success, not only for her compositions, but for her clever performance on the piano of her "Rhapsodie Espagnole." Mr. Henri Falcke's concert at the Salle Erard on Saturday evening last was largely attended, and was one of the most enjoyed among the many concerts which have been given here this winter. Mr. Falcke is a pupil of Messrs. Mathias and Falkenberg, and his playing is characterized by great delicacy, combined with an unusual vigor and brilliancy, his sostenuto playing being especially enjoyable. His program consisted of the Grieg and Rubinstein D minor concertos, assisted by the Lamoureux orchestra. Mr. Falcke played also the toccata by Saint-Saëns, a barcarolle by Rubinstein and the tarantelle by Moszkowski, and with the orchestra the Hungarian fantaisie by Liszt. Among the audience were Mr. Guilmant, Gabriel Marie, Mr. Faure, Falkenberg, Mathias, Ch. René and others. Mr. Falcke was warmly complimented by Mr. Lamoureux, and will be heard at his concerts next season. He leaves soon for a tour through Germany.~~

~~The leading theatres are closed from Thursday until~~

SUN, Baltimore, Md.

Date 4-29

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Last Concert This Season.

The pleasure that the audience felt in the concert at Harris's Concert Hall last night was tinged with regret, for the evening was the last that Baltimoreans will spend with Arthur Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra until another musical season brings its round of concerts. No concerts given this winter in the city have proved more enjoyable or been more heartily appreciated, and the director leaves Baltimore both figuratively and literally laurel-wreathed, for a beautiful tribute was handed to him last night—a wreath of the glossy leaves, held together with ribbons of red, white and blue.

Only three purely orchestral numbers were given, but each of these was, in its intrinsic worth and manner of its performance, sufficient to mark the concert enjoyable. The overture to Wagner's glowing music-picture of that mystic romantic legend "The Flying Dutchman" was the opening number, and the second orchestral performance was of Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, that strangely beautiful work whose tragic yet tender tones communicate to the listeners the deep feeling which must have been the composer's mood when creating these two movements. This fragmentary work alone, with its exquisite blending of the instrumental and poetical expression, would readily make the composer stand out in bold outline were all his other rich gifts to music unknown. The symphonic poem "Les Preludes," by Liszt, was the third orchestral number.

Three soloists made their appearance at the concert, the vocalists being Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel, who were favorably received. Mr. Henschel lived for many years in Boston and his career since then in London has been followed with great interest by his numerous American friends. Henschel's voice is big, in fact, its bigness is the first thing that strikes one. It is not a voice easy to manage, and it speaks well for Henschel's methods as a voice-trainer that he has gotten it under as much control as it was. Mrs. Henschel, who was a pupil of Henschel's before their marriage, has a vocal organ of just the opposite caliber. It is fine, clear and in many of its tones remarkably pure, but it is not a great voice and relies for its impression mainly on grace and finish of style. Mrs. Henschel's solo was happily selected, the impressive Handel aria, noble in its simplicity, being delightfully given and arousing the audience to enthusiasm. Henschel was only moderately effective in the Wagner number, while the duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" was unsuited to them and uninteresting of itself. Mr. Franz Kneisel, owing to sudden illness, was unable to fill his part in the programme, a Paganini violin concerto, and his place was taken by Mr. Alvin Schroeder, violincellist. The disappointment that was felt at the non-appearance of the favorite concert master soon gave way to surprise and delight at the superb performance of Mr. Schroeder, whose playing was a rare combination of tone, expressive interpretation and an execution that overcame immense difficulties with perfect ease.

Clipping from Buffalo

EXPRESS, ~~Albany~~, N. Y.

Date 5-4

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Nikisch, D'Albert and the Others Played Before a Brilliant Audience.

The brilliant audience which crowded the Star Theater last evening probably would vote with Paderewski that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has no equal in the world—at least they would till the bloom of enthusiasm is worn off by a rival organization. The programme was modern, romantic and bright, and the audience was thoroughly appreciative.

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of Hector Berlioz's gorgeous overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" was evidently conamore, and in the beauty of the music one forgot all about the old goldsmith's tempestuous life which Berlioz intended to preface and outline. The daring instrumentation and beautiful color were brought out wonderfully under the conductor's wand.

The most important piece of the concert was, of course, Chopin's E minor concerto, played by Eugen d'Albert and the Orchestra. Even those who have heard the "little giant" before, this winter, must have been surprised at his power, brilliancy and intellectual force as displayed in this concerto last evening. D'Albert's fame has always rested largely on his earnestness and intelligence, but his interpretation of the delicious second movement of the concerto would alone have placed him beside the other reigning virtuosi as a poet. The orchestra played the less-interesting music with perfect taste and tact. The concerto was nearly half an hour long, and at its conclusion Herr D'Albert was greeted with applause which amounted to an ovation. Four times he was recalled, and the fifth time he sat down and played with exquisite touch the familiar Chopin cradle-song which has been given varying interpretations by every piano artist of any prominence who has visited Buffalo for many a year.

The "Lohengrin" prelude, made familiar by the Buffalo Orchestra, was taken at an almost wearyingly-slow tempo and was not as warmly received as the magnificent Tschaikowsky theme with variations which followed.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, aroused almost as much enthusiasm as D'Albert. He played with a beautiful singing tone, perfect technique and thoughtful care Chopin's e flat Nocturne, Schubert's entrancing "Musical Moment" and Klengel's old-fashioned and showy Capriccioso. It was hard to tell which to admire most, the soli or Mr. Nikisch's unostentatious and altogether perfect accompaniments. It is to be hoped that some of the Buffalo accompanists were present to profit by the example.

The concert concluded with Anton Dvorak's No. 4 Symphony, the gifted Doctor's latest symphonic composition, which was brought out in this country by Mr. Nikisch only a few months ago. It is a brilliant work, full of originalities and of strong musical ideas, and was played with splendid spirit by the orchestra.

NEW YORK HERALD

SIXTEEN PAGES.

NEW YORK, TUESDAY, MAY 3, 1892.

WITH D'ALBERT AS SOLOIST.

The concert given by Mr. Eugen D'Albert and the Boston orchestra at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall last night drew a large and enthusiastic audience. Mr. D'Albert carried off the lion's share of the honors of the evening, there being scarcely sufficient scope in the music assigned for the orchestra.

Chopin's E minor concerto and Liszt's concerto in E flat were played by Mr. D'Albert in a masterly manner. Rubinstein's study in C major, given as an encore, was played with marvellous power.

The orchestra played Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, the introduction to the third act of the "Meistersinger" and Berlioz's "Pilgrim's March," in which Mr. Franz Kneisel played the viola solo part most exquisitely.

The New-York Times.

TEN PAGES.

NEW-YORK, TUESDAY, MAY 3, 1892.

D'ALBERT AND NIKISCH.

Eugen d'Albert, the little giant of the pianoforte, appeared at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall last evening in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the baton of Arthur Nikisch. Such a combination of admirable interpreters of music was bound to attract a large audience, and as a result the house was filled and the enthusiasm was overflowing. Mr. d'Albert selected for his two numbers the Chopin concerto in E minor and Liszt's in E flat.

Mr. d'Albert's interpretation of the Chopin number is not altogether unfamiliar to local concertgoers. It will be remembered that it is not in accord with generally-accepted traditions. The languor and sensuousness of its more sentimental parts are entirely absent, while the rapid passages are all played with a vigor and fire which sometimes approach fury. It must be admitted that Mr. d'Albert's brilliancy was impaired last night, as it has been all this season, by a hardness of tone which he does not seem able to get rid of. Nevertheless, his playing quite warmed up the audience, and the brilliant octave passage (Tausig's) at the end called out cheers.

The orchestra did its work very well, in spite of the cramped space and the fact that one or two of the wind instruments were suffering from an area of low barometic pressure. Franz Kneisel, the concertmeister, was heard in the viola obligato of the third movement of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy." The orchestra also contributed a very spirited performance of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. Mr. Nikisch conducted with his usual skill.

Clipping from
Enquirer, Buffalo, N. Y.
Date 5/4.

BOSTON MUSICIANS' PLAYING.

It Was Greatly Enjoyed at the Star Last Night—Coming Events.

The visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season will be long remembered by those who listened to the exquisite harmonies produced by the members of this superb organization at the concert at the Star Theater last night. It takes time and a good deal of bad or indifferent music to efface the impression made upon the memory by such a perfect rendition of great works.

The audience was composed of the most cultivated people of the city and it was larger than the Star Theater has accommodations for; in fact the house was sold out completely in advance. Marked appreciation was shown every superior effort of orchestra and soloists, which means every number on the programme.

The overture to the opera of "Benvenuto Cellini," by Berlioz, opened the concert, and the rich descriptive music of the overture was rendered by Director Nikisch's musicians with splendid effect. Next came the playing of Eugen D'Albert. This pianist gave a recital here only a short time ago, and people thought they knew of what he was capable. But the artist surprised the most of those in his audience last night. He seemed to throw all the strength and all the expression of which he was capable into his playing. His solo was the concerto for pianoforte in E minor from opus II. by Chopin, one of the two works written by Chopin with orchestral accompaniment, and D'Albert's playing no doubt owed much of the effect it produced to the delightful manner in which this accompaniment scarcely less beautiful than the solo part itself, was rendered by the orchestra. Still the little pianist seemed to exert himself in an unusual degree and the rare beauty of the composition was evidently an inspiration to him. When he finished the allegro maestoso there was a tempest of applause, and at the close of the mournfully sweet melody of the romance larghetto which he played with wonderful delicacy and tenderness it was increased. At the conclusion of the concerto he was recalled four times and finally he sat down and played the familiar Choppin "Berceuse."

In the "Prelude" from Wagner's "Lohengrin" which followed, the strings did most did most delicate and effective work, and the Tschaikowsky number, last movement (theme with variations) from suite, opus 55, was given by the orchestra with all the spirit and expression and sentiment which the accomplished leader knows so well how to draw from his musicians.

The second soloist of the evening was Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist and he too played surprisingly well. His playing was extremely sympathetic and one fancied that the artist and his instrument were on most affectionate terms. The latest symphonic composition of Dvorak, symphony No. 4 in G. Major, closed the concert and the splendid music was given a superb rendition.

[206]

RIE
A word nrosch's
ir.
Music"
:ethoven position concerto
:ompete.
e in the 893, and
. motto.
ance for al prizes
it.
y recom-
.w piano
F. E. C.
3 minor,
ıtry and,
odern in
The first ten, and very ex-quartet of the it Beet-in last anslick, of er Sonata" and other se of many Kreutzer,
ı. Bridge-
hat honor.
son of an land about ıd as a boy
ıy. Under concerts at olinist, and the young on became ce to com-
. He kept
24, 1803, in rom manu-
of shortly subsequent l 1850.
become as eutzer, says
the famous
There he enty-seven en intimate often to the
, afterward
in the Im-ed for two e Kreutzer
the ambas-
him to the these two few years iration for wn as the s published pianoforte quasi come tzer per L.
ic.
PERA.
he Tou-
u made he next t impor-
l as conperas to nber of son, and
d. The by Vianith Jean ill be is ahre!
nificant cknowl-
lian and
ainstay, trusting
n Opera orches-season if brought

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 4, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

THE sixth and last concert by that ideal organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, took place at Chickering Hall, Tuesday evening of last week. This was the program:

Overture, "Prometheus Bound"	Goldmark
Aria from "Herodiade"	Massenet
Mrs. Henschel.
Violin concerto in D major	Paganini
Revised by Wilhelmj.
Mr. Kneisel.
Fantasy from Act II., "Tannhäuser," "Blich ich umher"	Wagner
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Taming of the Shrew"	Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Symphony No. 4, in G major	Dvorak
Allegro con brio.
Adagio.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale, allegro ma non troppo.

Chickering Hall was, as always, crowded, and the concert, as usual, was a gem of the first water in regard to the performance. Those disgruntled critics who complain of the roughness of the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra must have had their ears attuned to symphonic studies of gnat wings and butterflies' sighs, else they could not have failed to do justice to the exquisite balance of the orchestra and its genuinely virtuoso qualities in music, demanding great degrees of velocity, finesse and tonal equipoise rarely if ever encountered. On the other hand the carpers at Mr. Nikisch and his band on the score of lack of breadth, virility (and there be those who do) could loudly have complained of the power and dramatic vigor of Goldmark's most characteristic overture. It was superbly played.

Mr. Kneisel, who, one is sorry to chronicle, has been quite ill since the concert with fever and a severe cold, gave a most finished interpretation of the Paganini concerto, making its enormous technical difficulties as naught, and playing with all the tenderness and brilliancy the work exacts. He won well deserved applause. Mrs. Henschel was slightly overweighted in the Massenet aria but sang delightfully with her husband, who was, as is his wont, musical and manly in his singing. The Dvorak symphony received a most fitting and finished reading at Mr. Nikisch's hands. Here are the dates for next season's series: Thursday evening, November 3, 1892; Thursday evening, December 8, 1892; Thursday evening, January 12, 1893; Thursday evening, February 9, 1893; Thursday evening, March 16, 1893; Thursday evening, April 27, 1893.

Eugen d'Albert was in Boston to-day, after completing a limited tour through the Eastern section.

In the course of conversation he stated to your correspondent that he was more than gratified with the success of his recent visit to America. He sails from New York the 17th, and will probably spend the summer in Switzerland, devoting more or less time to the completion of several compositions already well under way.

* * * *

The Music Hall "promenade concerts" begin Wednesday evening June 1. The same general plan, so successful last season, will be followed this, and although the name of the conductor has not yet been announced, the public need have no fear but that Manager Ellis will procure the services of the best available man.

The Musical Courier.

WITH the last Symphony concert the season may be said to have closed musically. A few concerts of greater or lesser importance were given during the week, and a limited number are announced for the coming fortnight or so.

THE Boston "Home Journal" in its latest issue contained these very significant remarks regarding the attitude of certain music critics of Boston toward Mr. Nikisch:

> This is the season when the Symphony Orchestra comes in for more than its share of criticism, and just now it seems to be getting it in large consignments, or, rather, Mr. Nikisch is. It is a peculiarity of Boston criticism, be it musical or dramatic, that it is more severe with the most artistic and greatest.
>
> Let a company, a star, a singer or a musical organization appear here which is merely mediocrity and it will escape with usually complimentary notices. But let a really great artist appear and he will be searched for faults which will be found. Exceptions merely prove the rule.
>
> With the Symphony Orchestra this is particularly noticeable, perhaps because it is claimed by Boston, and if we cannot find fault with what is ours, with what can we find fault? And everybody exercises that privilege. The earlier part of this week saw the leader of that incomparable organization attacked from three quarters and with such unanimity of thought and time that it certainly looked like a preconcerted movement.
>
> No one can deny the greatness of the organization, nor would they wish to, I think, but the attack is solely upon its leader. It is true that Boston boasts a large number of virtuosi who certainly ought to be numbered in this great organization and who are not, and this seems to be the basis of the criticisms, whether it appears or not.

The substance, then, of all these attacks is personal. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, say these sapient critics, is "all right," but Mr. Nikisch is "all wrong," which reminds one of the Scotch verdict, "The prisoner is not guilty, but we advise him not to do it again."

The evil of the whole affair is the naturally low es-

Mr. Cooper, the favorite comedian from the varieties, sang two comic French songs. Miss du Meriel, of the Français, gave "La Fiancée du Timbalier," also by Thorné. The ladies' orchestra of scarlet clad gipsies closed the first part of the program. After supper the program consisted of an extraordinary trio, "Les Isola," giving a séance of prestidigitation and mind reading.

Miss Ramos, a pretty Spanish girl in Castilian attire, sang songs of sunny Spain, which closed the program of one of the most elaborate entertainments I have attended in Paris.

The same evening Mrs. Kirewsky gave a fashionable musicale of the compositions of that clever composer, Miss Gabrielle Ferrari, assisted by Miss Salla, Mr. White, the violinist, and other artists. Miss Ferrari obtained a great success, not only for her compositions, but for her clever performance on the piano of her "Rhapsodie Espagnole." Mr. Henri Falcke's concert at the Salle Erard on Saturday evening last was largely attended, and was one of the most enjoyed among the many concerts which have been given here this winter. Mr. Falcke is a pupil of Messrs. Mathias and Falkenberg, and his playing is characterized by great delicacy, combined with an unusual vigor and brilliancy, his sostenuto playing being especially enjoyable. His program consisted of the Grieg and Rubinstein D minor concertos, assisted by the Lamoureux orchestra. Mr. Falcke played also the toccata by Saint-Saëns, a barcarolle by Rubinstein and the tarantelle by Moszkowski, and with the orchestra the Hungarian fantaisie by Liszt. Among the audience were Mr. Guilmant, Gabriel Marie, Mr. Faure, Falkenberg, Mathias, Ch. René and others. Mr. Falcke was warmly complimented by Mr. Lamoureux, and will be heard at his concerts next season. He leaves soon for a tour through Germany.

The leading theatres are closed from Thursday until

SUN, Baltimore, Md.
Date 4-29

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Last Concert This Season.

The pleasure that the audience felt in the concert at Harris's Concert Hall last night was tinged with regret, for the evening was the last that Baltimoreans will spend with Arthur Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra until another musical season brings its round of concerts. No concerts given this winter in the city have proved more enjoyable or been more heartily appreciated, and the director leaves Baltimore both figuratively and literally laurel-wreathed, for a beautiful tribute was handed to him last night—a wreath of the glossy leaves, held together with ribbons of red, white and blue.

Only three purely orchestral numbers were given, but each of these was, in its intrinsic worth and manner of its performance, sufficient to mark the concert enjoyable. The overture to Wagner's glowing music-picture of that mystic romantic legend "The Flying Dutchman" was the opening number, and the second orchestral performance was of Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, that strangely beautiful work whose tragic yet tender tones communicate to the listeners the deep feeling which must have been the composer's mood when creating these two movements. This fragmentary work alone, with its exquisite blending of the instrumental and poetical expression, would readily make the composer stand out in bold outline were all his other rich gifts to music unknown. The symphonic poem "Les Preludes," by Liszt, was the third orchestral number.

Three soloists made their appearance at the concert, the vocalists being Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel, who were favorably received. Mr. Henschel lived for many years in Boston and his career since then in London has been followed with great interest by his numerous American friends. Henschel's voice is big, in fact, its bigness is the first thing that strikes one. It is not a voice easy to manage, and it speaks well for Henschel's methods as a voice-trainer that he has gotten it under as much control as it was. Mrs. Henschel, who was a pupil of Henschel's before their marriage, has a vocal organ of just the opposite caliber. It is fine, clear and in many of its tones remarkably pure, but it is not a great voice and relies for its impression mainly on grace and finish of style. Mrs. Henschel's solo was happily selected, the impressive Handel aria, noble in its simplicity, being delightfully given and arousing the audience to enthusiasm. Henschel was only moderately effective in the Wagner number, while the duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" was unsuited to them and uninteresting of itself. Mr. Franz Kneisel, owing to sudden illness, was unable to fill his part in the programme, a Paganina violin concerto, and his place was taken by Mr. Alvin Schroeder, violincellist. The disappointment that was felt at the non-appearance of the favorite concert master soon gave way to surprise and delight at the superb performance of Mr. Schroeder, whose playing was a rare combination of tone, expressive interpretation and an execution that overcame immense difficulties with perfect ease.

Clipping from
EXPRESS, ~~Albany~~ Buffalo, N. Y.
Date 5-4

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Nikisch, D'Albert and the Others Played Before a Brilliant Audience.

The brilliant audience which crowded the Star Theater last evening probably would vote with Paderewski that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has no equal in the world—at least they would till the bloom of enthusiasm is worn off by a rival organization. The programme was modern, romantic and bright, and the audience was thoroughly appreciative.

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of Hector Berlioz's gorgeous overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" was evidently conamore, and in the beauty of the music one forgot all about the old goldsmith's tempestuous life which Berlioz intended to preface and outline. The daring instrumentation and beautiful color were brought out wonderfully under the conductor's wand.

The most important piece of the concert was, of course, Chopin's E minor concerto, played by Eugen d'Albert and the Orchestra. Even those who have heard the "little giant" before, this winter, must have been surprised at his power, brilliancy and intellectual force as displayed in this concerto last evening. D'Albert's fame has always rested largely on his earnestness and intelligence, but his interpretation of the delicious second movement of the concerto would alone have placed him beside the other reigning virtuosi as a poet. The orchestra played the less-interesting music with perfect taste and tact. The concerto was nearly half an hour long, and at its conclusion Herr D'Albert was greeted with applause which amounted to an ovation. Four times he was recalled, and the fifth time he sat down and played with exquisite touch the familiar Chopin cradle-song which has been given varying interpretations by every piano artist of any prominence who has visited Buffalo for many a year.

The "Lohengrin" prelude, made familiar by the Buffalo Orchestra, was taken at an almost wearyingly-slow tempo and was not as warmly received as the magnificent Tschaikowsky theme with variations which followed.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, aroused almost as much enthusiasm as D'Albert. He played with a beautiful singing tone, perfect technique and thoughtful care Chopin's e flat Nocturne, Schubert's entrancing "Musical Moment" and Klengel's old-fashioned and showy Capriccioso. It was hard to tell which to admire most, the soli or Mr. Nikisch's unostentatious and altogether perfect accompaniments. It is to be hoped that some of the Buffalo accompanists were present to profit by the example.

The concert concluded with Anton Dvorak's No. 4 Symphony, the gifted Doctor's latest symphonic composition, which was brought out in this country by Mr. Nikisch only a few months ago. It is a brilliant work, full of originalities and of strong musical ideas, and was played with splendid spirit by the orchestra.

EEDHAM ORGAN,
World for Quality and Workmanship.

timate of Boston's critical opinion which one is forced to make after hearing Mr. Nikisch's band and reading some of the "Hub's" silly prejudiced articles. In startling contrast is the unanimity of the press throughout the country, which one learned pundit would have us believe is subsidized. Bribery on such a wholesale scale presupposes enormous wealth on the one hand and enormous corruption on the other, while some critics have been known to keep the wolf from the door in this manner, they are, nevertheless, the exception.

All Boston flocks to listen to the orchestral concerts of Mr. Nikisch, and if Music Hall were twice as large it would still be filled. A well-known manager has offered an immense bonus on this season's receipts to the management of the orchestra if he could get control of it for next season. The progress of the orchestra throughout the country is almost triumphal. In all the large cities the same story is repeated—immense audiences, immense enthusiasm, and yet a handful of men whose acute sensibilities have been jarred upon by some fancied personal slight declare through the medium of their respective literary organs that Mr. Nikisch is a poor conductor; ergo, Mr. Nikisch must go.

Therefore the logical conclusion is that Mr. Nikisch must go if these same critics have the power they lay claim to, or else they have no influence at home, and the New York "Sun" is correct when it states that Boston newspapers are not read outside of New England except by unfortunate exchange editors. The affair would be supremely ridiculous were it not for the contempt and discredit it casts upon the critical confraternity. How is the musical public of the country to believe in the value of musical criticism when they see such flagrant abuse of it as in this instance?

In the "Beacon," after a severe attack on Mr. Nikisch last Sunday, there appeared this paragraph:

> The rapid growth in all the finest qualities of public performance made by the New York Philharmonic Orchestra, of which Mr. Damrosch is the conductor, and his own marked improvement in directing, have been observed almost with surprise and commented upon favorably and significantly by the critical who heard its concerts in this town. There were a lesson and a warning in these concerts, but we cannot help doubting whether Boston will be profited by them as it should.

The above must puzzle Mr. Damrosch when he reads it and positively amuse Mr. Seidl, the conductor of the New York Philharmonic Orchestra.

The truth of the matter is that anything that partisan passion and blind prejudice dictates serves to attack Mr. Nikisch.

Here is a letter that speaks for itself:

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY OF BROOKLYN.

To the Management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra:

I have the honor to transmit the following resolutions, passed unanimously at a meeting of the board of directors of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, held April 25, 1892:

Resolved, That the board of directors of this society offer its congratulations to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon the brilliant series of concerts which it has given in Brooklyn during the past season;

Resolved, That the thanks of this society are due to the conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, for the high standard of the music which he has presented and for the rare excellence of the performances;

Resolved, That this board fully recognizes the important results which have followed the establishment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon a permanent basis and desires to express its appreciation of the liberal spirit of devotion to the cause of music which has made such an orchestra possible.

Respectfully,
B. T. FROTHINGHAM,
Secretary.

Paderewski, who certainly knows what he is talking about, only last week praised the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, all of which came to us by cable. Either the whole music loving public of the country has gone mad or else the half dozen disgruntled gentlemen of Boston are in the wrong. In this case, however, it certainly is vox populi, vox Dei.

Nikisch in Baltimore.—At the sixth concert of the Baltimore series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts Mr. Alwin Schroeder played in the place of Mr. Franz Kneisel, who was too ill to play. Here are the dates of the twelfth season, 1892–3:

November 1, 1892 ....
December 6, 1892 ....
January 10, 1893 ....
February 7, 1893 .... } Tuesday evenings
March 14, 1893 ....
May 2, 1893 ....

A Brilliant Concert.

D'ALBERT AND NIKISCH.

A BRILLIANT concert was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in conjunction with Eugen d'Albert last Monday night at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall. The hall was crowded and the audience a representative one. Here is the program:

Overture, "Sakuntala" .... Goldmark
Concerto for piano in E minor, op. 11 .... Chopin
Mr. Eugen d'Albert.
Introduction to Act III., Dance of Apprentices, Procession of Mastersingers and Homage to Hans Sachs ("Die Meistersinger") .... Wagner
"Pilgrim's March," from symphony "Harold in Italy" (by request) .... Berlioz
Viola solo, Mr. Franz Kneisel.
Concerto for piano in E flat .... Liszt

The orchestra was in capital form, and the appearance of Mr. Nikisch and Mr. Kneisel was the signal for warm applause. Mr. Nikisch's reading of Goldmark's Oriental overture is familiar to us, and it lost not a jot of its warmth and dramatic coloring on this occasion. It was played superbly.

The "Meistersinger" music also received an adequate interpretation, being finely worked out as to details.

Mr. Kneisel, who plainly showed traces of his recent illness, played his viola solo with his accustomed suavity and taste and was enthusiastically applauded. Mr. d'Albert has played both the Chopin and Liszt concertos here before, and we all know his unquenchable vigor, his fiery attack and tremendous climacteric effects. The Chopin concerto was partially Chopin and partially Tausig in the piano part, though d'Albert retained the original orchestration, with the exception of the big cut in the first tutti. While lacking tenderness, the concerto was played most brilliantly, particularly the rondo. The Liszt concerto was given con amore, especially the finale, and the house fairly rose at the conclusion. Mr. d'Albert played for encores Rubinstein's staccato etude and Chopin's A flat valse. The etude was a marvel of speed and sustained power. Mr. Nikisch conducted, as usual, with skill and fire, and his accompaniments were miracles of tact and sympathy.

SUN, Baltimore, Md.

Date 4-29

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Last Concert This Season.

The pleasure that the audience felt in the concert at Harris's Concert Hall last night was tinged with regret, for the evening was the last that Baltimoreans will spend with Arthur Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra until another musical season brings its round of concerts. No concerts given this winter in the city have proved more enjoyable or been more heartily appreciated, and the director leaves Baltimore both figuratively and literally laurel-wreathed, for a beautiful tribute was handed to him last night—a wreath of the glossy leaves, held together with ribbons of red, white and blue.

Only three purely orchestral numbers were given, but each of these was, in its intrinsic worth and manner of its performance, sufficient to mark the concert enjoyable. The overture to Wagner's glowing music-picture of that mystic romantic legend "The Flying Dutchman" was the opening number, and the second orchestral performance was of Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, that strangely beautiful work whose tragic yet tender tones communicate to the listeners the deep feeling which must have been the composer's mood when creating these two movements. This fragmentary work alone, with its exquisite blending of the instrumental and poetical expression, would readily make the composer stand out in bold outline were all his other rich gifts to music unknown. The symphonic poem "Les Preludes," by Liszt, was the third orchestral number.

Three soloists made their appearance at the concert, the vocalists being Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel, who were favorably received. Mr. Henschel lived for many years in Boston and his career since then in London has been followed with great interest by his numerous American friends. Henschel's voice is big, in fact, its bigness is the first thing that strikes one. It is not a voice easy to manage, and it speaks well for Henschel's methods as a voice-trainer that he has gotten it under as much control as it was. Mrs. Henschel, who was a pupil of Henschel's before their marriage, has a vocal organ of just the opposite caliber. It is fine, clear and in many of its tones remarkably pure, but it is not a great voice and relies for its impression mainly on grace and finish of style. Mrs. Henschel's solo was happily selected, the impressive Handel aria, noble in its simplicity, being delightfully given and arousing the audience to enthusiasm. Henschel was only moderately effective in the Wagner number, while the duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" was unsuited to them and uninteresting of itself. Mr. Franz Kneisel, owing to sudden illness, was unable to fill his part in the programme, a Paganini violin concerto, and his place was taken by Mr. Alvin Schroeder, violincellist. The disappointment that was felt at the non-appearance of the favorite concert master soon gave way to surprise and delight at the superb performance of Mr. Schroeder, whose playing was a rare combination of tone, expressive interpretation and an execution that overcame immense difficulties with perfect ease.

Clipping from Buffalo
EXPRESS, ~~Albany~~, N. Y.
Date 5-21

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Nikisch, D'Albert and the Others Played Before a Brilliant Audience.

The brilliant audience which crowded the Star Theater last evening probably would vote with Paderewski that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has no equal in the world—at least they would till the bloom of enthusiasm is worn off by a rival organization. The programme was modern, romantic and bright, and the audience was thoroughly appreciative.

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of Hector Berlioz's gorgeous overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" was evidently conamore, and in the beauty of the music one forgot all about the old goldsmith's tempestuous life which Berlioz intended to preface and outline. The daring instrumentation and beautiful color were brought out wonderfully under the conductor's wand.

The most important piece of the concert was, of course, Chopin's E minor concerto, played by Eugen d'Albert and the Orchestra. Even those who have heard the "little giant" before, this winter, must have been surprised at his power, brilliancy and intellectual force as displayed in this concerto last evening. D'Albert's fame has always rested largely on his earnestness and intelligence, but his interpretation of the delicious second movement of the concerto would alone have placed him beside the other reigning virtuosi as a poet. The orchestra played the less-interesting music with perfect taste and tact. The concerto was nearly half an hour long, and at its conclusion Herr D'Albert was greeted with applause which amounted to an ovation. Four times he was recalled, and the fifth time he sat down and played with exquisite touch the familiar Chopin cradle-song which has been given varying interpretations by every piano artist of any prominence who has visited Buffalo for many a year.

The "Lohengrin" prelude, made familiar by the Buffalo Orchestra, was taken at an almost wearyingly-slow tempo and was not as warmly received as the magnificent Tschaikowsky theme with variations which followed.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, aroused almost as much enthusiasm as D'Albert. He played with a beautiful singing tone, perfect technique and thoughtful care Chopin's e flat Nocturne, Schubert's entrancing "Musical Moment" and Klengel's old-fashioned and showy Capriccioso. It was hard to tell which to admire most, the soli or Mr. Nikisch's unostentatious and altogether perfect accompaniments. It is to be hoped that some of the Buffalo accompanists were present to profit by the example.

The concert concluded with Anton Dvorak's No. 4 Symphony, the gifted Doctor's latest symphonic composition, which was brought out in this country by Mr. Nikisch only a few months ago. It is a brilliant work, full of originalities and of strong musical ideas, and was played with splendid spirit by the orchestra.

[207]

The Henschels in Boston.

THE HENSCHELS.

Two of the four recitals allotted to Boston in the present brief tour of Mr. and Mrs. Henschel are past, and, as heretofore, large audiences of the best music-lovers are finding great delight in the opportunity of hearing these artists again. Listening to one of their concerts, where song after song succeeds so easily and in such apparently natural order, the auditor rarely stops to think how much research, wide sympathy, liberal taste, and careful consideration those programmes represent. These songs are not mere extracts from some printed collection accessible to any purchaser, but they come from the heart of old operas and oratorios or from the depths of pages forgotten and practically unknown on the one hand, while on the other they present the composers of the time in airs which are sure to be characteristic. It is not possible in our limits to analyze the two programmes already heard,—the great ballads which Mr. Henschel sings as no one else can; the dainty modern airs and quaint old melodies for which Mrs. Henschel has such purity, grace, and silvery lightness; while the gravity of ecclesiastical music and the gayety of humor are not forgotten.—Beacon, April 2.

MUSICAL BOSTON WELCOMES THE RETURN OF TWO OLD FAVORITES.

The first of a series of vocal recitals by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel was given in the Meionaon last evening, and a fashionable and cultured audience was present to welcome the return to Boston of these two sterling artists and long-time favorites here.

It is scarcely necessary to tell Bostonians what thorough artists they are, or to dwell upon the delight which was offered yesterday's audience and the pleasure that is in store for those who attend the subsequent concerts of this uniquely interesting series. Mr. Henschel's labors with the Symphony Orchestra in the days of its formation are still gratefully remembered, and their much too seldom appearance here since they left us for Europe are notable events in the season's musical annals. Their last appearance here was three years ago.

An admirably arranged programme was offered last night, and both the artists seemed to be in especially good voice. It is in itself a delight to listen to Mr. Henschel's piano accompaniments, whether to his own or to his wife's songs.

Their first offering was Padre Martini's "Quel onda che rovina," which was charmingly interpreted, and called forth enthusiastic demonstrations of approval. Indeed, the applause was unreservedly enthusiastic throughout the evening.

The solos assigned to Mr. Henschel were sung with wonderful spirit and inspiration.

Mrs. Henschel never sang more sweetly, more purely, or with greater grace than she did last night.—Globe, March 30.

THE HENSCHEL RECITAL.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel may travel about as much as they please, they may win foreign laurels to their hearts' content, but we shall still regard them as Bostonians, and their home-coming will still have in its great success a degree of personal greeting. But, apart from all possible municipal pride, the concerts of such a gifted pair must have an intrinsic value of their own, and the programmes they present during their present season in Boston are worthy of any musical metropolis in the world. The execution of these programmes is likely to be almost beyond criticism, if the performance of last night be taken as criterion. The voices remain very much the same as when the artists last appeared in our city. The lady sings with a tenderness and purity that charms by its simplicity; while the husband has the same timbre, the same dramatic fervor, as heretofore. Hers is a voice that stands almost alone in its genre, and it possesses a charm peculiarly its own. Mr. Henschel's own singing was the best he has ever given here; and those who know what his work has been can imagine the high standard attained.—Advertiser, March 30.

THE RETURN OF THE HENSCHELS.— THEIR FIRST RECITAL.

The pleasantly anticipated return of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel to the scene of so many earlier triumphs at the Meionaon yesterday, as was expected, took on the character of a reunion of the patrons of their vocal recitals in the past, and made it as pleasant a social occasion as it was an artistic success.

The audience assembled last evening was one that any artist would gladly appeal to, and the quick appreciation of all the good work done by the singers added not a small element to the enjoyment of the occasion.

As in former years, the programme made showed the skill and good judgment of Mr. Henschel in this art, and the varied list of numbers contained much that was unfamiliar, and more that was enjoyable.

Mrs. Henschel's voice that has so often charmed her home admirers was again heard in all its purity and sweetness. Of her singing little that is new can be said. She is a most delightful artist at all times, and last evening she again caused the most complete satisfaction in all her contributions to the programme.

Mr. Henschel has always done wonders with his voice, but his triumphs over nature's limitations on his vocal equipment were never so pronounced as on this occasion. The jolly aria by Cimarosa was splendidly sung, and the famous song from Lortzing's opera was an artistic treat rarely enjoyed, even in the work of this great artist. The Gounod couplets were also given in the most admirable fashion, and quite captivated the audience.

In the duets of the evening the two singers were heard with unstinted pleasure, their voices blending most enjoyably, and their singing being marked by a joint intelligence that commanded and gained the heartiest applause.

Needless to say that Mr. Henschel's accompaniments were a most important factor in the successes of the evening.—Herald, March 30.

Mrs. Henschel's voice is no longer the merely limpid, light soprano it used to be: it has acquired a rich, sensuous quality, an emotional expressiveness, which was once foreign to it. It now approaches, in timbre, if not in volume, the great dramatic soprani. A similar change is to be noted in her singing. With no loss of that exquisite finish of style for which she has been conspicuous ever since her first return from Europe, she has regained all the emotional, passionate force, the native largeness of style and magnetism, which we remember in her when a half-taught young girl of fifteen. She now sings once more with all the fire she did in the days when she used to sing Schubert's "Gretchen am Spinnrade" to her own accompaniment. Mr. Henschel's voice sounds smoother and mellower than of yore, while his singing shows all its whilom artistic insight and dramatic power.

Mr. Henschel displays his wonderful versatility as brilliantly as ever. From Schubert's "Doppelgänger" and "Gruppe aus dem Tartarus" to the rollicking patter of the air from Cimarosa's "Don Calandrino," what a distance! Yet Mr. Henschel sings the one as admirably, as brilliantly and characteristically, to the manner born, as the other.—Transcript, March 30.

The large audience present at the first Henschel recital at the Meionaon, last night, was agreeably surprised at the degree of excellence which prevailed throughout the entire performance. Rumors of the manner in which Mr. and Mrs. Henschel had been received in other cities had, in a measure, prepared people for an enjoyable evening; and those familiar with their methods knew that the concert could not be other than artistic, and yet they were surprised.

The Henschels lay no claims to greatness, but rather base their popularity upon good musical taste, a thorough knowledge of correct phrasing, a clear idea of shading, and well-trained, sympathetic voices; and, with such gifts, how could they do otherwise than stand at the head of the musical profession?

Mr. Henschel played all the accompaniments in his own finished manner, and evinced rare taste in the arrangement of the programme which introduced both Mrs. Henschel and himself in solo work, with a limited number of duets in which the two voices were perfectly blended. Post, March 30.

The Henschels in Philadelphia.

THE HENSCHELS' RECITAL.

An Interesting Concert at the Chestnut Street Opera House.

The Henschels sang excellently yesterday. The programme heretofore published was given in a thoroughly artistic manner. No two persons sing more perfectly together. The audience was delighted with both, and every number had its own particular charm. It is to be hoped the house will be crowded Friday afternoon.—Inquirer, March 23.

For perfection of taste and exquisiteness of finish the song recitals of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel stand as models. Their programmes are selected to please not only lovers of high class music, but also men and women who do not understand complex harmonies and irregular melodies. All lovers of songs must feel the beauty of Mrs. Henschel's singing of "Solveig's Song," by Grieg, or Brahms's "Junge Liebe," or Sir Walter Scott's, "Oh, hush thee, my Baby," set to music by Mr. Henschel. The movement of these recitals is perfectly smooth and graceful. There are no hitches. Everything has been thought of,—every song studied in detail, the inflections of each passage made the subject of consideration; and yet withal there is not a suspicion of anything mechanical in the concerts.—Press, March 27.

"THE HENSCHELS."

A Delightful Song Recital at the Chestnut Street Opera House.

The audience at the Chestnut Street Opera House yesterday afternoon was not a crush, but was composed of the best people; and certainly those who were present were fortunate, for it was one of the most agreeable musical occasions of the season. Mr. Henschel, as most of our readers no doubt know, is a musician of wide accomplishments. He is a baritone singer of fine powers, an excellent pianist, and a first-class vocal teacher and conductor of choral societies. Beyond all this, however, he is one of the principal orchestral leaders of Europe. Mr. Henschel's recitals have the further advantage of bringing forward his wife, an admirable soprano. In concert—in the lieder especially—she is delightfully efficient. Yesterday's programme was mainly given up to songs, though there were a few excursions into dramatic music. The selections took a wide range of time and nationality, stretching from Cimarosa and Pergolesi to Massenet of the present, including original compositions by Mr. Henschel, and some folk-songs. Some duets were particularly well received, the voices blending exquisitely; and the skilful pianoforte accompaniments of Mr. Henschel, supporting, yielding, and sympathetic, but never violent, made a third element as important as either of the other two. In the work of both artists, whether in English, German, French, or Italian, the perfect enunciation was a great element of pleasure.—Philadelphia Telegram, March 23.

ENTERTAINMENTS.

Chestnut Street Opera House.—The Henschels' Recital.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, who some years ago won secure reputation on both sides of the Atlantic, gave a song recital in the Chestnut Street Opera House yesterday afternoon. The programme comprised a score of numbers, chronological to some extent, and took an hour and a half in its execution. The period was made a delightful one. Mrs. Henschel has a soprano voice of what may be classed as a light order, pure, fresh, true, and elastic, and of a carrying power that makes her sturdiest bravura work thoroughly effective. Mr. Henschel's voice is a fine, sonorous, musical baritone, with the bass quality below (he sings a resonant lower F) and the smoothness of a tenor in the upper division. In a single expressive and much mis-applied term, each is an artist. Both singers were admirable in point of phrasing, expression, and general execution. Each used the language in which the song was originally composed; and whether in English, German, French, or Italian, each seemed to the manner born. Mr. Henschel, who would evidently have shone as a pianist, had he chosen that branch of the art, played all the accompaniments, which were of marked value in the charming success of the recital. The perfect way in which he blends the instrument with and makes it participate in the humor and sentiment expressed by the singers is the result of little short of genius. By the two examples he had on the programme, Mr. Henschel also figured with decided credit as a composer.—Philadelphia Ledger, March 23.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

Rarely has there been a more charming musical treat than that of the song recital of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel at the Chestnut Street Opera House yesterday afternoon. The programme included songs in German, English, French and Italian, of remote and of recent dates, thus illustrating the history of such composition for a century or two. Mr. Henschel's endowments of voice and culture have long been known. He is most ably seconded by Mrs. Henschel, whose voice is pure and sympathetic, while her manner expresses real dramatic feeling without ever descending to theatrical. There were twelve or fifteen songs — solos or duos — and, of course, there can be little more than a general notice. The two artists are so nicely trained to singing together that there is never an imperfection. Mr. Henschel's manly baritone blends with his wife's mezzo-soprano voice with the finest accord, and his elegant accompaniments perfect the unity.— Bulletin, March 23.

MUSICAL NOTES.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel at the Chestnut Street Opera House.

There was a large and cultured audience at the Chestnut Street Opera House yesterday afternoon, when Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel gave one of those song recitals for which they have won artistic distinction on both sides of the Atlantic. These concerts of theirs, of which that of yesterday was the first ever given in Philadelphia, are unique. There is nothing else quite like them in the whole range of musical entertainment, and this because no other two artists of equal standing so closely and admirably supplement and complete and harmonize with each other. Their voices blend perfectly, they understand each other completely, and are in absolute sympathy artistically and emotionally with each other. Given these conditions, together with vocal ability of a high order in each instance, and the charm of the ensemble work can readily be imagined. The concert was one of consummate excellence. Merely to hear Mr. Henschel play accompaniments is a liberal education in that difficult and neglected art.— Philadelphia North American, March 23.

A VERY DELIGHTFUL SONG RECITAL AT THE CHESTNUT ST. OPERA HOUSE.

The art of what may be called chamber singing, as distinguished from that of the stage, has not been brought to finer perfection than by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, who gave their first song recital at the Chestnut Street Opera House yesterday afternoon. Each of these accomplished musicians has a distinct artistic personality, but they sing together with a unity of style and sentiment, and Mr. Henschel plays the accompaniments for either or for both with such consummate skill and understanding, that they make a united impression that is quite unique. Informal and unpretentious as the concert was, it proved an occasion of rare artistic enjoyment. Mrs. Henschel's voice seems as pure and sweet as when she was first heard here as Miss Bailey, and she sings with a purity of delivery and a refinement of sentiment that no one has excelled. In the grace and freedom of "Nymphs and Shepherds," the poetic feeling of Liszt's "Loreley" or in the exquisite finesse of Massenet's "Sérénade du Passant," she was equally satisfying, singing all with the ease of well-mastered power and understanding and the charm of an attractive personality. Mr. Henschel's own work is equally masterly, displaying an extraordinary dramatic adaptability and a fluency of expression very unusual. He sang a number of unusual songs, and some that were familiar, including "The Two Grenadiers," and sang each with its fitting style, and with a remarkable command of vocal nuances, while the beauty and sentiment of his accompaniments were an essential feature of a most delightful entertainment.— Philadelphia Times, March 23.

The Henschels in New York.

MR. AND MRS. HENSCHEL SING.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel have returned to America, and yesterday afternoon gave the first of two song recitals at Chickering Hall. These artists are so well known and so warmly admired that a large audience was a foregone conclusion. The welcome which the assembly gave the talented couple must have assured them of an abundance of affectionate remembrance, and it was their happy privilege not to disappoint those in whose minds that affectionate remembrance had developed lively expectation.

The programme was altogether delightful. As to the execution of their duets by the two artists, only praise can be uttered. We know of no other musical entertainments where the sweetness of a delicately refined art makes a clearer musical atmosphere.

Mrs. Henschel's phrasing and breath management are backed by so high a training and by so exquisite a taste that her singing seems to be the spontaneous creation of nature rather than the ultimate product of a studied art. Nothing lovelier has been heard on the local concert stage in many moons than her delivery of the aria "Lusinghe più care," from Handel's "Alessandro," which, by reason of her fearlessness in the matter of tempo and Mr. Henschel's beautifully colored accompaniment, exerted the full influence of its vigorous and ever fresh spirit.

Mr. Henschel's mastery of his own voice and the remarkable effects of color which he produces with it are food for constant study and delight, while the eloquence of the details of his shading reveals a musical intelligence of the highest order. Mr. Henschel is a dramatist in song, and under his treatment Schubert's "Die Krähe" and "Der Leiermann" become little dramas in tone, just as they were in the immortal composer's imagination. And the artist's accompaniments are picturesque in the excellence of their expressiveness Altogether, these two singers offer to the public song recitals which are conceived and performed in the finest spirit of a very subtle art.— Times, March 20.

MR. AND MRS. HENSCHEL'S RECITAL.

After an absence of three years Mr. and Mrs. Henschel appeared in Chickering Hall yesterday afternoon and delighted a large audience with a number of songs and duos beautifully sung and exquisitely accompanied by Mr. Henschel.

It is almost superfluous to say that Mr. and Mrs. Henschel are the best lieder singers we have an opportunity of hearing. Both are gifted with rare taste, exceptional musical skill, and pleasant voices.—New York Herald, March 20.

YESTERDAY'S MUSIC.

There were three affairs of first-class importance to enlist the attention of music-lovers yesterday. The Henschel matinée was so thoroughly delightful that it gives the keenest pleasure to announce that the public interest manifested has been sufficient to persuade the management to give a supplementary recital next Saturday. The entertainment provided by the remarkably gifted artist couple is of so lofty and refined a character that to see it so thoroughly appreciated, as was the case yesterday, is to keep one's faith in the ultimate triumph of good art alive. There is nothing factitious about these recitals, which are conducted with perfect dignity, and in their way provide pleasure of the highest kind. Each recital is a highly suggestive lesson in musical history, as well as an entertainment; and we could wish that the number was extended to a dozen, if that were practicable. Yesterday's concert aroused enthusiasm at the very outset.—Tribune, March 26.

THE HENSCHELS' RECITAL.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel have paid us a spring visit; and a very welcome one it is, for the singing of this artistic couple improves with age, like wine. Mrs. Henschel did some beautiful singing, her voice sounding as pure and clear as the proverbial lark's. Mr. Henschel's dramatic style and amazing variety of moods were shown to the best advantage in the Schubert group. He is one of those singers whose brain is superior to his vocal environment.—New York Recorder, March 20.

THE HENSCHEL RECITALS.

The most enjoyable vocal concert of the season was given on Saturday afternoon at Chickering Hall by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel. That this was by no means their first appearance in New York, and that their concerts of former years were pleasantly remembered, was shown by the large audience. Some of the pieces were sung by Mrs. Henschel alone, some by Mr. Henschel, and some by both, so there was plenty of variety, and the two hours of the concert seemed but a quarter of an hour. It is a consummation devoutly to be wished that all vocal teachers in New York and their pupils could be compelled to attend these Henschel recitals. They would discover then that it is possible for a singer to pronounce the words of the text so that one can hear every syllable distinctly, without sacrificing beauty of tone for a moment, no matter whether the language used is French, Italian, or German. When Mr. and Mrs. Henschel sing, the audience gets not only beautiful music beautifully sung, but hears the poems which inspired the composers. These two artists need fear no technical analysis of their manner of execution, but such analysis is superfluous where the spirit is so much more emphasized than the technique. Next Saturday another of these recitals will be given.—Evening Post, March 20.

MAIL AND EXPRESS, New York, N. Y.

Date........ 3-3

Eugen D'Albert and the Boston Symphony Orchestra Play Together—A Brilliant Performance.

A large and appreciative audience was present at the concert in which Eugen D'Albert and the Boston Symphony Orchestra were the attractions at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall last evening. The orchestral numbers of the programme were Goldmarck's "Sakuntala" overture, some selections from the third act of "Die Meistersinger," and the "Pilgrim's March," from Berlioz's "Harold in Italy."

The excellencies of the organization were shown in its playing of these numbers, under Mr. Nikisch's direction, but its rendering of the Wagner excerpts was the least satisfactory. The overture was beautifully given, as also was the Berlioz number, in which Mr. Kneisel played the viola obligato delightfully.

Mr. D'Albert played two concertos—Chopin's in E minor, op. II., and Liszt's in E flat—and for an encore Rubinstein's C major etude. Brilliant and facile as was the pianist's performance, his robust interpretation was lacking in the sentiment and poetic charm which belong to the Polish composer.

In the Liszt concerto he had ample opportunity fitly to display his remarkable virtuosity—the precision and finish of his technique, the elegance as well as dignity of his style, the tremendous tone he has at his command, and his command of the resources of the pianoforte. His performance of the difficult work was in every way a superb one and fully justified the enthusiasm it created.

Clipping from .... Y.

Date 5-1

The [illegible] a Fact and a Type

1/3

The opening and the closing of a Philharmonic season form a complimentary event of passing interest and of typical significance, with which the sympathy of all who are concerned in art growth and in worthy, organized entertainment is associated. The immediate purpose of the society is musical, but its success implies much more than this. Since it was founded, more than a generation ago, it has stood in the first rank within its own peculiar field. Those who have directed its management and those who have helped to maintain it by constant support have secured, in addition to their own private, personal gratification, the large reward of doing rare public service. This society, beginning with Eisfeldt and going on under Bergmann, Thomas and Nikisch, has steadfastly promoted the best execution of music of the highest kind. It is not necessary to enter upon comparisons of these conductors, each of whom was at the front in his time, and all of whom have contributed to the sum of accomplished work. The Philharmonic at its first concert presented the best available orchestra and leader. It did the like at its latest concert. Indeed, there is very good authority for saying that it assembled on the stage of the Academy of Music last night the best band anywhere in the world. Each of these conductors, while helping along the remarkable growth of the half century, has in turn profited by the labors of his predecessors. Nikisch has the enormous advantage of a permanent orchestra. Eisfeldt nor Bergmann had it, nor would Nikisch have had it. To get together then even a scratch company of anything like eighty-seven fairly capable players would have been dismissed as a wild proposal. Time and taste on a broad scale had to be waited for before such a permanent ground work could be dreamed of. It was only lately that one man could be found—and that first one not in New York, the city of monumental and other failures—to pledge his wealth to such an undertaking. This honored citizen not only provided in the present this essential condition, a strong force of skillful executants, devoting themselves solely to the study and production of compositions of this highest music, provided so liberally that they could go on with their work without a dollar of public support if necessary, but is reported to have set apart by his will the equivalent of a very handsome fortune, to guarantee by endowment the undisturbed future of this permanent orchestra. This effort is in the same direction and toward the same end to which the Philharmonic society of Brooklyn has labored. Nowhere has been illustrated more strikingly in individual and organized capacity, in public taste and education, the steps by which that art standard, the orchestral concert, has attained the place which its early masters would scarcely have hoped for in its behalf. For nearly two score of years the best of music of the best kind has been brought within easy and effective hearing in this city. It has opened the way for a competitive movement of the first class. The founders were building so much better than they knew that when they resolved upon an organization of their own they were unconsciously foretelling Seidl and his painstaking association. The impulses set in motion by the Philharmonic enables us to hear Mendelssohn's greatest work at home, and it may be hoped that the forthcoming performance of "Elijah" will indicate that with the Brooklyn choral society a distinct musical demand of the city is supplied.

But somebody shall say: "That is well enough for you if you like it, but what is it to me? I do not care for it. Your orchestral performances, with their symphonies and concertos and overtures and suites and such, are a bore to me. Give me a good brass band or an old English ballad, or those sweet melodies of the negro minstrels or a rattling comic opera. I have tried to attend those Philharmonic affairs, but found them so stupid that I went to sleep." There is no more use in quarreling with schools than in disputing about tastes. There is good music of all kinds, but those who are represented by the supposed objector are, after all, more indebted to the Philharmonic than they perhaps suppose. Its work has been productive for those who are impatient with itself. Improvement of art in its highest regions effects improvement along its lower levels. If it is true that there are better first class orchestras now than there were a quarter of a century ago, so are there better brass bands. The old ballads and the later melodies should be sung more satisfactorily because of the general advance in cultivation. Certainly the comic operas of the last generation would be scarcely tolerated now. There is a marked gain even in the street bands which the aldermen are trying to drive out of town, and it is not extravagant to say that they are less objectionable than they used to be, more submissive to the radical conditions of time and tune, because of the advance all along the musical line from top to bottom.

The Philharmonic is not only notable for what it has thus directly or indirectly achieved. It is a type of much beside that has been done in the city. There are more theaters and better. That best of critical faculties, the intelligent judgment of the public, has been discovered and encouraged. The best players, the best obtainable plays, the best stage settings, are demanded, and it is found worth while to furnish them. All this and much more implies an education in things which belong to a large city, refinement, broadened sensibilities and cosmopolitan influences. They describe generally among the latest acquisitions of a great community. It may be said that some of them came very tardily to Brooklyn. In recent years lost time has been rapidly making up. Now all this development has been going on contemporaneously with the processes of the Philharmonic, and are more closely related to them than some persons suspect. The Philharmonic society may be said to have originated the Academy of Music. The Academy may be called the father of our Brooklyn theaters, although not a regular one itself. How it has stimulated wholesome forces of the community in many and various ways would make a long story in the telling. But this material fact in the history of the Philharmonic is of trifling importance in comparison with its share in the higher and finer education, not merely for its own chosen specialty, but also in behalf of other things apparently remote from it in sympathy, of men and women who look askance upon a symphonic poem, to whom the "Faust" overture suggests worse torments than are usually associated with the subject's companion, and who regard a liking for pure music as an affectation or a delusion. If the society should disband to-morrow it would have made for itself a memorable record.

Eve. Post, New York, N. Y.

Date 9-9

D'Albert with the Boston Orchestra.

Mr. Eugene D'Albert did not add anything to his reputation as a pianist by his performance last evening of Chopin's first concerto. It was a brilliant exhibition of virtuosity, but it was not the real Chopin, who has been much better interpreted in New York, not only by Joseffy, Rummel, and Paderewski, but by little Josef Hofmann and Otto Hegner. Mr. D'Albert's interpretation lacks not only the Slavic spirit, the exotic fragrance, which is the soul of Chopin, but it has not even a trace of that sensuous tonal beauty which is the color on Chopin's rose petals. His tone, especially in the slow movement, was thin, dry, short-cut, and his playing consequently deficient in the legatissimo which is essential in Chopin's music. His management of the pedal betrays his lack of a sense for the finer varieties of tone color, and his passage work is often blurred, while there are none of those delicate effects in orchestral coloring with which other modern pianists charm their audiences. He has, however, fortunately given up his former habit of pounding. But he still aims at impressing an audience by impetuosity rather than by legitimate artistic effects. Thus, he utterly marred Rubinstein's splendid staccato étude by taking it faster than he could carry it through. Consequently, scores of wrong notes got mixed up with the right ones, the rhythmic execution was faulty, and the only redeeming feature was the bold execution of the noble cantabile bars that intervene. In the Liszt E flat concerto Mr. D'Albert was much more satisfactory, although this also has been better played in New York. He was enthusiastically applauded after every movement of both the concertos.

Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra contributed the accompaniments in their usual masterly manner. The atmosphere was, however, extremely unfavorable to orchestral playing, and the violin strings broke right and left, as if they thought they were at a "snap convention." Selections from the third act of "Die Meistersinger" did not evoke the enthusiasm which our local orchestras usually secure. Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture was beautifully played, and in the Pilgrim's March from Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" Mr. Kneisel was once more heard with his exquisite viola tone.

TIMES, Chicago, Ill.

Date 3/7

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, with Eugene d'Albert, the famous pianist, and Franz Kneisel, violinist, as soloists, will appear for the only time in this city next Saturday evening at Central Music hall. Such a combination is not often to be heard in a single concert, and the occasion promises to be a notable event of the musical season. The Boston orchestra is now in its eleventh year, and it is recognized as one of the finest musical organizations in the world. It was the first permanent orchestra to be organized in this country, and was founded and has been supported by a single individual, Henry L. Higginson of Boston. Seventy-five players will appear in the ranks at the coming concert. The favor which Mr. Nikisch and his musicians have found with the musical public, the great form of the soloists, and the excellence of the program will undoubtedly attract a great audience. The program in full is as follows: Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala," Chopin's concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11, Mr. d'Albert; Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Paganini's concerto for violin in D major (revised and with addition by Wilhelmj), Mr. Kneisel; Berlioz' Pilgrim's march from symphony "Harold in Italy," viola solo, Mr. Kneisel; Schumann's symphony No. 1, in B flat, op. 38. The sale of seats opens tomorrow (Monday) morning.

CITIZEN, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 5-1

THEIR LAST REHEARSAL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Receives an Ovation.

It was both natural and proper that the last rehearsal of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra should be well attended. But the most sanguine admirer of Mr. Nikisch scarcely expected such a demonstration as was seen and heard at the Academy Friday afternoon, when every seat was occupied, though the rain and the cold made it dangerous for any but the robust to venture outside their own doors. Mr. Nikisch has earned the thanks of the Brooklyn public for the able manner in which he has conducted the music of the season of '91 and '92. His list was made up so as to include a wide range of the greatest known works from Bach to our own day. A recapitulation of such composers as Beethoven, Berlioz, Brahm, Chopin, Delibes, Goldmark, Goetz, Handel, Liszt, Massanet, Paderewski, Rubinstein, Saint-Saens, Schubert, Schumann, Strauss, Tansig, Tschaikowsky, Wagner and Weber may be said (with a few exceptions) to include almost everything that is worthy to be known. Add to these Gluck, Mozart, Haydn and a few of the most prominent modern English composers, and but little remains to hear. The fullness, breadth, and completeness of the season's work, added to the self-evident superiority of its interpretation, combined with the additional attraction of Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel, who appeared at yesterday's rehearsal, combined to attract one of the largest audiences of the season.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, for it seems almost impossible to speak of them apart, occupy a distinguished and proud position in the world of musical art. Born with an innate love for song, though not blessed with any superior attractions of voice, they have by unremitting labor overcome the natural barriers which seemed to impose an impassable gulf between them and success, until they are recognized to-day as two of the most finished artists of the age. Gifted with a versatility as boundless as it is delightful, to them all styles and forms appear easy. From the severely classic to the broadly farcical, from the comic to the tragic, they have tried everything and in everything succeeded. The air from "Alessandro" was encored three times, so splendidly was it sung by Mrs. Henschel, and in the duet from Goetz' "Taming of the Shrew" it seemed as though the enthusiasm of the house would never subside. Seven times were they compelled to appear in acknowledgment of the vociferous applause which ascended from parquet to roof with the noise of a whirlwind. Not even Patti, with all her prestige, was awarded a more hearty welcome, and when it is known that the audience was essentially a musical one, who attended for what they could hear, without any of the blandishments of scenery and stage situation, the triumph was peculiarly significant.

The orchestra gave a picturesque reading of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," a tone poem rather than an overture, conceived in the busy brain of the composer during a storm at sea, full of the glare of lightnings, the whistle of winds, the straining of cords and cables, the flapping and ripping of sails, the upheaving and tossing of billows, and all the other horrors incident to that saddest and most significant sight in the world—a piece of man's mechanism battling with the forces of angry nature. Such a sight did Wagner behold, such experience did he undergo, and so vivid was the impression left upon his mind that no resource was left to him but to reduce it to form, to reproduce in the concert room something which should serve as a perpetual reminder of a short period which by the agony endured seemed like an age or a lifetime. It is a tone painting approached by none with the single exception of Saint-Saens' marvelous "Deluge; but it is more than this. As elaborated by Wagner it is a story with a significant moral, the history of an event, a reproduction of an old superstition, a legend; for Wagner, however musical, never ceased to be historical.

The unfinished symphony in B minor, the allegro-moderato, and andante, con moto, by Schubert, was interpreted with rare and refined delicacy. There are some critics who affect to regret that Schubert never finished this, his greatest work. It may be that the composer had written himself out, that continuation would have meant unconscious repetition, that the two movements were regarded by him as constituting in themselves a monument worthy of a life's endeavor. It is conceivable, too, that such a man, who literally wrote everything as if it were with his heart's blood, could not bear the strain of continued effort, for the unfinished symphony was a history of his unfinished life, which was a life of suffering and unrest, of tragedy and sorrow, of disappointment and despair, of baffled ambition and blasted hope, for Schubert had real genius, a nervous sensitive nature, a tender, trusting heart, a child-like simplicity, an impetuosity of movement and passion. Such composers live no more; our dull, prosaic utilitarian age is not favorable to their growth or development. The most we can expect, and the best, is a clever utilization of others' thoughts, a more severe application of the appliances of art and science, and this, be it said, we are getting and must rest content with until other scenes and another age shall produce another genius. As with music, so with poetry. We are fed on rhymes. Since Pope put philosophy into verse we have been declining. So low did we sink that in our stupid idolatry we erected an altar for Martin Tupper, and not until we make history, as well as write it, need we expect either change or amendment. The concert concluded with Schumann's Symphony No. 4, in D minor, opus 120, with five movements, adagio non troppo, allegro, romance, adagio non troppo, scherzo and finale allegro. It was Schumann who made the candid confession that he hated theory. This was while he was studying law at Heidelberg. Most of the prominent composers and singers have been designed by their parents for other professions. Imagine Schumann a lawyer, or Handel a butcher, schoolmaster, or draper, and it is almost as cruel as confining Robert Burns to the tail of a plow, or making him much worse, a rum gauger in the employ of the Government. Happily genius is obstinate and refuses blindly to submit to the exactions of time and circumstance. It possesses a commendable and irrepressible power of rebellion, which bursts all bonds until it gravitates to its own level, finds its own proper field of labor. However strong Schumann's distate for theory might have been in his youth, the No. 4 symphony contains internal evidence that he must have employed himself assiduously to its study later in life. It was by no accident, by no spontaneous and uninstructed effort of human genius pure and simple, that either of these five movements were written. Technical blunders were, no doubt, found in the score, but the power of construction was there, strongly and strangely original, allied to poetry of conception, and harmonious and picturesque blending of parts. It is by no accident that a musician becomes familiar with the resources of an orchestra such as are displayed in this symphony. There has been haste and impatience, but there was, notwithstanding, amazing power of invention, a broad field of observation, a delightful treatment of details, a loving lingering over favorite themes, a boundless wealth of melody and a novelty as inexhaustible as it is charming. Such a work can only be adequately played by a first-class orchestra, and only then when directed by a leader of strong poetical tendencies. These Mr. Nikisch supplied in an eminent manner, with the result that the performance yesterday was one of the most perfect

---

EAGLE, Grand Rapids, Mi

Date 8/

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

The Boston Symphony orchestra concert Monday evening, May 9, will go on record as the greatest musical event ever heard in Grand Rapids. Those who have been instrumental in bringing them here have spared no effort to make it so, and their work has borne good fruit in the enormous advance sale of tickets. It is estimated that between 1,400 and 1,500 tickets have been disposed of in Grand Rapids and surrounding towns, and this before the box office has been opened. Society will be out en masse, and Hartman hall will be a scene of splendor. Not only do our home people consider it an event of the greatest importance, musically and socially, but the visitors from Muskegon, Kalamazoo and other cities will be robed in their finest. In fact, each delegation will be a full-fledged theater party.

A further explanation of the methods to be observed tomorrow and Tuesday will be of interest. No one will receive more than one line ticket, which will entitle its holder to secure not more than ten seats the following day (Tuesday), when tickets will be exchanged for reserve seats without extra charge.

At this concert acquaintance will be made with Eugene d'Albert, undoubtedly the greatest pianist, next to Rubenstein, in the world. He is a pianistic giant. Although a very small man his work is colossal. He is intellectual ever, sentimental rarely, and then in a small degree. His execution is fully equal to that of any of his predecessors, and superior to most of them from every point of view. It is a question if any living man has equaled him in velocity; at the same time his precision is absolute. His versatility seems boundless, and he will be heard to the most superb advantage in Liszt's magnificent concerto in Eb. The symphony orchestra has been talked about so much of late that any favorable words are unnecessary; suffice it to give the opinions of two such great men as Paderewski and as the American pianist and composer, E. A. MacDowell. The former says there is only one orchestra in Europe that can approach the Boston organization, and that is the famous Paris conservatory orchestra, and this lacks a conductor who is anything like the equal of Arthur Nikisch. Mr. MacDowell goes a step farther and says they give the best programme of any orchestra in the world. Among the numbers to be given here are the Symphony in A No. 1, by Schumann, the prelude to "Lohengrin" by Wagner, and the overture to "Oberon" by Weber. Mr. Nikisch is noted as an interpreter of Schumann, and the great work will undoubtedly receive full justice at the hands of the conductor and orchestra. A better selection than the "Lohengrin" prelude, bringing out, as it does, the famous violins of the organization. The "Oberon" overture is always a favorite.

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 5/12

THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

Saturday night's Philharmonic was a concert long to be remembered. The season when it began in November under a new management, was decidedly experimental in character. That the experiment turned out happily is apparently indicated by the publication in last Saturday's programme of the dates for next season's concerts and rehearsals, which will be again conducted by Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The last concert of the season was outwardly distinguished from its predecessors by pretty floral decorations and a different setting of the stage. Easter lilies, azaleas and palms filled the space within the orchestra rail, and a scene in light tones replaced the ugly green one so long associated with Philharmonic concerts. The Academy was well filled, and the audience were unusually enthusiastic.

Mr. Nikisch, in giving very little Wagner music this season, has tacitly refused to place himself in competition with Seidl or other Wagnerian leaders. The only orchestral selections given were the "Faust Overture," the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," the prelude to the "Meistersinger" and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman," which opened the concert last Saturday. If hitherto any of Mr. Nikisch's hearers have doubted his ability to render the works of Wagner as intelligently and artistically as he interprets other composers, Saturday night's performance of the "Flying Dutchman" overture must have reassured them on this point. The selection was evidently carefully studied, and it was brilliantly played.

Mrs. Henschel repeated her charming performance of Haendel's "Alessandro" aria, and was warmly applauded. The Schubert B minor symphony, was attentively heard, and Mr. Nikisch's exquisite and original rendering of it was apparently appreciated, for the applause was heartier than that usually given to an orchestral number.

Mr. Henschel's only solo selection, the "Blick ich umher," from "Tannhaeuser," was, perhaps, not the best thing he might have chosen for his voice, but his singing of it was manly and skillful. Again, the duo from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," sung by both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, won for the singers five recalls from a delighted audience.

The Schumann symphony in D minor, No. 4, is one of the things which gains by repetition. It is a pity that we do not hear it oftener. The playing of it was beyond criticism. The comparatively unlearned people in the audience found much pleasure and enlightenment in following it, with the aid of Prout's delightful analysis, which was printed in the well-edited but not handsome programme. It is to be hoped that the custom of presenting descriptive notes of the orchestral numbers will not be discontinued next year. Their excellent character has called forth many expressions of satisfaction.

At the close of the concert, the audience stayed long enough to recall Mr. Nikisch three times, as an expression of appreciation of his winter's work.

DEMOCRAT, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date.....5-1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Arthur Nikisch, the director of the great orchestra to be here on the evening of the ninth of this mouth, is in many respects a phenomenal individual. He is most liberal and versatile in his musical instincts, which fact shows itself in the diversified styles and nationalities of music which he gives. When Richard Wagner's great theatre at Bayreuth was dedicated there was an orchestra chosen from the leading artists of the world, and Arthur Nikisch was one of a few who went from Vienna. After the experience of playing under Wagner's baton at that most wonderful music festival, it is not surprising that he should be considered the most famous exponent of the great master's music. The Wagner numbers on the program have met with the most wonderful success, and instead of being severe or classical they have, in every instance, drawn out the most popular applause. Nikisch knows how to give the best music in existence, and yet music that does not tire the average listener. The playing of this great orchestra is going to be a revelation to the audience on Monday evening, the 9th. Eighteen first and nearly as many second violins, led by some of the finest violinists in the world, eight basses and other instruments to balance; eighty-one members in the company, including the managers. Concerning the little man, Eugen d'Albert, a great deal might be said. Liszt's latest and greatest pupil, similar in temperament to Carl Tausig: pronounced by Rubinstein and Bulow to be absolutely the leading pianist today; a Hercules in technique and musical force; such is this quaint little artist. He carries his audiences by storm, and does this not so much by persuasion as by absolute command in pianistic ability.

Hartman hall is, from all appearances, going to present a grand appearance when Nikisch raises his baton for the opening number, for there will be a splendid representation from every neighboring town, and the auditorium will undoubtedly be quite filled, and the orchestra and the program!—the best music that has ever been here or in America.

HENRY C. POST.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

On the evening of Monday, May 9, Grand Rapids music lovers will have the pleasure of listening to one of the grandest musical organizations on earth. The work done by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is of the very highest grade and appeals to the most cultured musical taste. Tickets can be subscribed for in the Grand Rapids National bank.

---

ing from Enquirer, Buffalo, N. Y.

4-30

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

In the words of the platform orator the Boston Symphony Orchestra "needs no introduction" to the Buffalo music-loving public. Its renown is such that it would be rather a reflection upon the intelligence of our concert goers to try to tell them anything about it. The orchestra and its talented conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will come to Buffalo for a concert on Tuesday evening next at the Star Theater. Two solo artists will appear with the orchestra, Alvin Schrœder, the eminent violoncellist, and Eugen D'Albert, the pianist who played here so finely but a short time ago that nothing need be said about him now. Among the features of the programme of orchestral music will be the last movement (theme with variations) from Tschaikowsky's suite, opus 55. It is said to be an interesting example of Tschaikowsky's vigorous scoring, mastership of musical means and deep sentiment. Particularly interesting will be the Dvorak's Symphony No. 4 in G major. This work was played for the first time in this country at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 26 and 27 of this year in Boston. It is the latest symphonic composition by Dvorak and was completed last year and performed under Hans Richter's direction in both Vienna and London with much success, it is said.

The orchestra numbers 70 performers and every one of them is an artist. This is the programme:

Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini'..........Berlioz
Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, Op. 11,
Chopin
Allegro maestoso.
Romance—larghetto.
Rondo vivace.
Mr. D'Albert.
Prelude, "Lohengrin"..................Wagner
Last Movement (Theme with Variations)
from Suite, Op. 55..........Tschaikowsky
Soli for Violoncello.
a. Nocturne..........................Chopin
b. Moment Musical...............Schubert
c. Capriccioso.........................Klengel
Mr. Schroeder.
Symphony No. 4, in G major............Dvorak
Allegro con brio.
Adagio.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale: Allegro ma non troppo.

THE LLOYD CONCERT.

Clipping from News
Muskegon Mich

Date.....5-1

The fame of the Boston Symphony orchestra is world-wide, and seldon does it visit cities of the size of Grand Rapids. Muskegon is to be congratulated in having this opportunity of hearing so magnificent an orchestra. Arrangements have been made with the G. R. & I. railway company to run a special train back to this city after the concert. The concert occurs May 9 and all who wish to attend and avail themselves of the opportunity must nd in their names to T. C. Clark at

---

EXPRESS, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date.....5-1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, with Eugen D'Albert, the great piano virtuoso, and Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, will give its only concert in this city next Tuesday evening. The Boston Orchestra was first heard in Buffalo six years ago. Since that time its annual visits here have been welcomed by an ever-widening circle of admirers until no event of the year now has greater attractiveness for the musical public. The Orchestra is said to be better than ever this year, and has also been extraordinarily successful from the box-office point of view. Seventy-five performers will appear in the ranks at Tuesday's concert. The romantic programme to be played has many features of interest and is especially suited to Mr. Nikisch, who is noted for his insight and appreciation of this rich class of music. It will be no little addition to the pleasure of the evening to hear Eugen d'Albert, whose magnificent performance at his recent recital is well remembered, and there will be a curiosity to hear the 'cellist who has been so highly praised in Boston and New-York. The programme in full follows:

Berlioz.................Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."
Chopin....Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, Op. 11.
Allegro maestoso.
Romance—larghetto.
Rondo vivace.
Mr. D'Albert.
Wagner............................Prelude, "Lohengrin."
Tschaikowsky..Last Movement (Theme with Variations) from Suite, Op. 55.
Soli for Violoncello.
a Chopin...................................Nocturne.
b Schubert...........................Moment Musical.
c Klengel...................................Capriccio.
Mr. Schroeder.
Dvorak.....................Symphony No. 4, in G major.
Allegro con brio.
Adagio.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale; Allegro ma non troppo;

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not surpassed in Europe or America, and many, including Paderewski, think it the best in the world.

~~TELEGRAM~~-HERALD, Grand Rapids, Mich

Date.....5-2

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The event of the musical season in this city will be the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, May 9, with the great pianist, D' Albert, than whom there is none greater, with the exception, perhaps, of Rubinstein. He was Liszt's most wonderful pupil, and he is that rare thing in a pianist, the combination of a profound musical nature, behind which are a great musical brain, and a warm, artistic temperament, with an unlimited technique. This is the sixth annual tour of the Symphony orchestra, which plays only in the larger cities. But for the fact that Hartman's hall is so finely adapted to concerts of this character, Western Michigan would not have the pleasure of hearing this truly grand organization. Line tickets will be issued at box office, No. 94 Ottawa street, this noon. Subscribers can obtain only as many reserved seats as they held tickets, ten being the limit. Seats will be reserved Tuesday morning, beginning at 9 o'clock.

COMMERCIAL, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date.....5-3

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Star Theatre this evening will present a variety of distinctive attractions. The orchestra itself, the largest and most lavishly supported musical organization in existence; Mr. Nikisch, its conductor, famons over two continents for his skill as a leader, his intellectual appreciation of the great musical works and his powers to bring out their latent beauties; Eugene D'Albert, the phenomenal pianist; Alvin Schroeder, the eminent 'cello player, and a program of some of the most interesting works of the modern romantic composers; Berlioz, Wagner, Tachaikowsky, Klengel and Drorak are all represented, besides the older composers, Chopin and Schubert. Something of the power to please which this orchestraa possesses may be inferred from the fact that it has given over 100 performances this season in Boston, New York and other eastern cities and every one has drawn great audiences.

EXPRESS, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date.....5-3

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

That model musical organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, Eugen d' Albert, the great pianist, and Alwin Schroeder, the violoncello virtuoso, form an ideal company of artists the equal of which can seldom be heard in any city. They will appear at the Star Theater this evening in a brilliant programme in which the masters of the modern school of orchestration are well represented. A large audience is assured.

The programme is as follows:

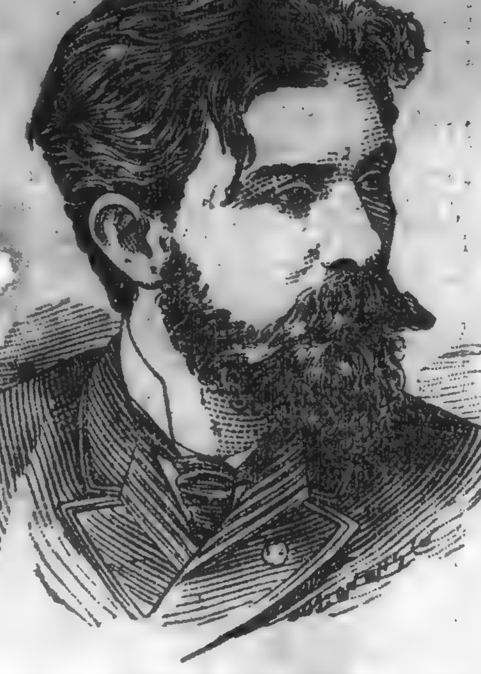
Overture, "Benvennto Cellini." ....Berlioz
Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor............Chopin
Mr. D'Albert.
Prelude, "Lohengrin." ....Wagner
Theme with Variations from Suite, Op. 55.
...............................Tschaikowsky
Soli for Violoncello:
a Nocturne......................................Chopin
b Moment Musical..........................Schubert
c Capriccio......................................Klengel
Mr. Schroeder.
Symphony in G major No. 4......................Dvorak

NEWS, Buffalo, N. Y. 5

Date

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, accompanied by Eugen D'Albert, the famous pianist, and Alwin Schroeder, the 'celloist, will give a concert at the Star Theater next Tuesday evening. The opportunity to hear in the same concert the finest orchestra this country has ever known, an artist commonly recognized as the first of living pianists and a distinguished 'cello virtuoso, constitutes an attraction not to be resisted by the musical public, and, as was expected, the demand for seats has been very great and there is every indication that the supply will be exhausted before Tuesday.



ARTHUR NIKISCH.

The Boston Orchestra is a permanent organization numbering 75 picked players. The present is its sixth visit to Buffalo. For Tuesday's concert Mr. Nikisch has arranged a programme of great interest, made up largely of representative numbers by modern composers and calculated to show to the best advantage the remarkable ability of the great orchestra and the soloists. The programme in full is as follows:

Overture—"Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz
Concerts for pianoforte in E minor..Chopin
Mr. D'Albert.
Prelude—"Lohengrin"............Wagner
Theme with variations from the Suite op. 55...........Tschaikowsky
Solo for Violencello..............................
(a) Nocturne...................Chopin
(b) Moment Musical..........Schubert
(c) Capriccio.....................Klengel
Mr. Schroeder.
Symphony in G major No. 4........Dvorak

---

lipping from Com. Advertiser,
~~STAR~~, New York, N. Y.

ate.....5-2

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BROOKLYN.

The sixth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn was given on Saturday evening at the Academy of Music. The programme was delightfully rendered. This concert was the close of an unusually successful season, and formed a very brilliant and fitting termination to this series. We cannot imagine a more finished performance. The beautiful Schubert Unfinished Symphony was perhaps played with more sympathy than anything else on the programme.

In this number the orchestra seemed to enter, con amore, into the very spirit of the great work. We have often heard this orchestra give this symphony before, but never with greater emotion or with greater perfection of execution—an absolutely faultless performance.

The introduction of two symphonies into the programme gave an opportunity of comparing this well known work of Schubert's with Schumann's symphony No. 4 in D minor. A striking contrast of style and of expression, but both immensely interesting. In the Schubert a concentration of sorrow; in the Schumann buoyant gladness and the light of love; in both a warm, human vitality. The scherzo of the Schumann symphony was played with "vim and vigor." To us it seems the best part of the work. In the romance movement the slight solo for violin fell to Mr. Loeffler, in Mr. Kneisel's absence, and was most gracefully played.

In Mr. and Mrs. Henschel the orchestra had the assistance of consummate artists. Mrs. Henschel was heard in a charming aria, "Alessandro," by Handel, and Mr. Henschel in the Tannhauser Fantasy, "Blick ich Umher," both given with perfect intonation and expression. Their duet from "Taming of the Shrew" was encored tumultuously, the singers being three times recalled, but not repeating the number. There are no artists whose method is more worthy of study than these two thoroughly trained vocalists. Their method is such perfect art that it ceases to be felt as art, and seems nature itself, as if there were no other way to sing. At the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch was obliged to appear three times and bow his acknowledgement of the well earned applause which testified to the appreciation of him and his work.

For the season of 1892-93 the following dates have been arranged, on Saturday evenings, at the same place as this season's concerts: Nov. 5, Dec. 10, 1892; Jan. 14, Feb. 11, March 18 and April 29, 1893.

---

lipping from Enquirer
Buffalo N Y

ate.....4-30

The Great Republic

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

In the words of the platform orator the Boston Symphony Orchestra "needs no introduction" to the Buffalo music-loving public. Its renown is such that it would be rather a reflection upon the intelligence of our concert goers to try to tell them anything about it. The orchestra and its talented conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will come to Buffalo for a concert on Tuesday evening next at the Star Theater. Two solo artists will appear with the orchestra, Alvin Schrœder, the eminent violoncellist, and Eugen D'Albert, the pianist who played here so finely but a short time ago that nothing need be said about him now. Among the features of the programme of orchestral music will be the last movement (theme with variations) from Tschaikowsky's suite, opus 55. It is said to be an interesting example of Tschaikowsky's vigorous scoring, mastership of musical means and deep sentiment. Particularly interesting will be the Dvorak's Symphony No. 4 in G. major. This work was played for the first time in this country at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 26 and 27 of this year in Boston. It is the latest symphonic composition by Dvorak and was completed last year and performed under Hans Richter's direction in both Vienna and London with much success, it is said.

The erchestra numbers 70 performers and every one of them is an artist. This is the programme:

Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini'..........Berlioz
Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, Op. 11,
Chopin
Allegro maestoso.
Romance—larghetto.
Rondo vivace.
Mr. D'Albert.
Prelude, "Lohengrin"..................Wagner
Last Movement (Theme with Variations)
from Suite, Op. 55..........Tschaikowsky
Soli for Violoecello.
a. Nocturne..........................Chopin
b. Moment Musical...............Schubert
c. Capriccioso.........................Klengel
Mr. Schroeder.
Symphony No. 4, in G major............Dvorak
Allegro con brio.
Adagio.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale: Allegro ma non troppo.

---

lipping from News
Balto Md

ate.....4-29

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

he Last of a Most Delightful Series of Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its season of six concerts at the Academy Concert Hall last evening, with a strong but varied programme consisting of three works for the orchestra, three short 'cello solos and three vocal numbers.

The soloists were Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, first violincellist of the orchestra, and a member of the Kneisel Quartette. Mr. Franz Kneisel had been advertised to play a Paganini concerto, but was prevented by serious illness from fulfilling his engagement.

Mrs. Henschel was heard to great advantage in the Handel aria, which is thoroughly suited to her style of singing, and her clear, sweet, flexible soprano voice. She was quite enthusiastically recalled several times, but did not set the bad example of singing an encore.

Mr. Henschel sang Wolfram's love song, which opens the [illegible] of song scene in the second act of Wagner's Tannhauser. Although seldom heard in concerts, it is one of the most noble and melodious numbers in the opera. It is composed in the recitative style of the old Minnesingers, who recited their songs in the courts of their kings, and accompanied their voices with the small harps which they carried from place to place. Mr. Henschel's voice is not a great one, and he does not always sustain his tones at the end of the phrase, but he is an artist of unusual intelligence in music generally, and whatever he does is finished and artistic. He is one of the finest lieder singers living.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder's three short 'cello solos aroused great enthusiasm. The first was the well-known Chopin nocturne, opus 9, No. 2; the second, the Schubert moment musicale, and the third the Popper dance of the elves and gnomes. His appearance in Baltimore hereafter will always be anticipated with pleasure.

The orchestral work was exceedingly well done, as usual, the principal number being "The Preludes," by Liszt, with which the concert closed. The Schubert symphony can be played by almost any orchestra, and has been heard here so often that concert patrons naturally prefer something more modern from the full Boston orchestra. Nevertheless, the laurel wreath presented to Mr. Nikisch by one of Baltimore's finest artists, expressed the feeling of the entire audience.

Six more concerts are announced for next season, and it is to be hoped that the lovers of music and enterprise generally will hurry up the new Music Hall in time to afford them a fitting place for the entire orchestra of eighty-five musicians, which, on account of limited stage room, Baltimore has

DEMOCRAT, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date 5-1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Arthur Nikisch, the director of the great orchestra to be here on the evening of the ninth of this mouth, is in many respects a phenomenal individual. He is most liberal and versatile in his musical instincts, which fact shows itself in the diversified styles and nationalities of music which he gives. When Richard Wagner's great theatre at Bayreuth was dedicated there was an orchestra chosen from the leading artists of the world, and Arthur Nikisch was one of a few who went from Vienna. After the experience of playing under Wagner's baton at that most wonderful music festival, it is not surprising that he should be considered the most famous exponent of the great master's music. The Wagner numbers on the program have met with the most wonderful success, and instead of being severe or classical they have, in every instance, drawn out the most popular applause. Nikisch knows how to give the best music in existence, and yet music that does not tire the average listener. The playing of this great orchestra is going to be a revelation to the audience on Monday evening, the 9th. Eighteen first and nearly as many [illegible]ond violins, led by some of the finest violinists in the world, eight basses and other instruments to balance; eighty-one members in the company, including the managers. Concerning the little man, Eugen d'Albert, a great deal might be said. Liszt's latest and greatest pupil, similar in temperament to Carl Tausig: pronounced by Rubinstein and Bulow to be absolutely the leading pianist today; a Hercules in technique and musical force; such is this quaint little artist. He carries his audiences by storm, and does this not so much by persuasion as by absolute command in pianistic ability.

Hartman hall is, from all appearances, going to present a grand appearance when Nikisch raises his baton for the opening number, for here will be a splendid representati[illegible] from every neighboring town, and the auditorium will undoubtedly be quite filled, and the orchestra and the program!—the best music that has ever been here or in America.

HENRY C. POST.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

On the evening of Monday, May 9, Grand Rapids music lovers will have the pleasure of listening to one of the grandest musical organizations on earth. The work done by the Boston Symphony Orchestra is of the very highest grade and appeals to the most cultured musical taste. Tickets can be subscribed for in the Grand Rapids National bank.

---

ping from Enquirer, Buffalo, N. Y.

4-30

OSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

In the words of the platform orator the Boston Symphony Orchestra "needs no introduction" to the Buffalo music-loving public. Its renown is such that it would be rather a reflection upon the intelligence of our concert goers to try to tell them anything about it. The orchestra and its talented conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will come to Buffalo for a concert on Tuesday evening next at the Star Theater. Two solo artists will appear with the orchestra, Alvin Schrœder, the eminent violoncellist, and Eugen D'Albert, the pianist who played here so finely but a short time ago that nothing need be said about him now. Among the features of the programme of orchestral music will be the last movement (theme with variations) from Tschaikowsky's suite, opus 55. It is said to be an interesting example of Tschaikowsky's vigorous scoring, mastership of musical means and deep sentiment. Particularly interesting will be the Dvorak's Symphony No. 4 in G major. This work was played for the first time in this country at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 26 and 27 of this year in Boston. It is the latest symphonic composition by Dvorak and was completed last year and performed under Hans Richter's direction in both Vienna and London with much success, it is said.

The orchestra numbers 70 performers and every one of them is an artist. This is the programme:

Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini'..........Berlioz
Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, Op. 11, Chopin
Allegro maestoso.
Romance—larghetto.
Rondo vivace.
Mr. D'Albert.
Prelude, "Lohengrin"..................Wagner
Last Movement (Theme with Variations) from Suite, Op. 55...........Tschaikowsky
Soli for Violoncello.
a. Nocturne..........................Chopin
b. Moment Musical...............Schubert
c. Capriccioso.........................Klengel
Mr. Schroeder.
Symphony No. 4, in G major............Dvorak
Allegro con brio.
Adagio.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale: Allegro ma non troppo.

THE LLOYD CONCERT.

Clipping from News Muskegon Mich

Date 5-1

The fame of the Boston Symphony orchestra is world-wide, and seldon does it visit cities of the size of Grand Rapids. Muskegon is to be congratulated in having this opportunity of hearing so magnificent an orchestra. Arrangements have been made with the G. R. & I. railway company to run a special train back to this city after the concert. The concert occurs May 9 and all who wish to attend and avail themselves of the opportunity must send in their names to T. C. Clark at

---

EXPRESS, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5-1

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, with Eugen D'Albert, the great piano virtuoso, and Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, will give its only concert in this city next Tuesday evening. The Boston Orchestra was first heard in Buffalo six years ago. Since that time its annual visits here have been welcomed by an ever-widening circle of admirers until no event of the year now has greater attractiveness for the musical public. The Orchestra is said to be better than ever this year, and has also been extraordinarily successful from the box-office point of view. Seventy-five performers will appear in the ranks at Tuesday's concert. The romantic programme to be played has many features of interest and is especially suited to Mr. Nikisch, who is noted for his insight and appreciation of this rich class of music. It will be no little addition to the pleasure of the evening to hear Eugen d'Albert, whose magnificent performance at his recent recital is well remembered, and there will be a curiosity to hear the 'cellist who has been so highly praised in Boston and New-York. The programme in full follows:

Berlioz.................Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."
Chopin....Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, Op. 11.
Allegro maestoso.
Romance—larghetto.
Rondo vivace.
Mr. D'Albert.
Wagner.........................Prelude, "Lohengrin."
Tschaikowsky..Last Movement (Theme with Variations) from Suite, Op. 55.
Soli for Violoncello.
a Chopin..................................Nocturne.
b Schubert ....Moment Musical.
c Klengel..................................Capriccio.
Mr. Schroeder.
Dvorak..................Symphony No. 4, in G major.
Allegro con brio.
Adagio.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale; Allegro ma non troppo;

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not surpassed in Europe or America, and many, including Paderewski, think it the best in the world.

~~TELEGRAM~~ HERALD, Grand Rapids, Mich

Date 5-2

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The event of the musical season in this city will be the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, May 9, with the great pianist, D' Albert, than whom there is none greater, with the exception, perhaps, of Rubinstein. He was Liszt's most wonderful pupil, and he is that rare thing in a pianist, the combination of a profound musical nature, behind which are a great musical brain, and a warm, artistic temperament, with an unlimited technique. This is the sixth annual tour of the Symphony orchestra, which plays only in the larger cities. But for the fact that Hartman's hall is so finely adapted to concerts of this character, Western Michigan would not have the pleasure of hearing this truly grand organization. Line tickets will be issued at box office, No. 94 Ottawa street, this noon. Subscribers can obtain only as many reserved seats as they hold tickets, ten being the limit. Seats will be reserved Tuesday morning, beginning at 9 o'clock.

COMMERCIAL, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5-3

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Concert at the Star Theatre this evening will present a variety of distinctive attractions. The orchestra itself, the largest and most lavishly supported musical organization in existence; Mr. Nikisch, its conductor, famous over two continents for his skill as a leader, his intellectual appreciation of the great musical works and his powers to bring out their latent beauties; Eugene D'Albert, the phenomenal pianist; Alvin Schroeder, the eminent 'cello player, and a program of some of the most interesting works of the modern romantic composers; Berlioz, Wagner, Tachaikowsky, Klengel and Drorak are all represented, besides the older composers, Chopin and Schubert. Something of the power to please which this orchestraa possesses may be inferred from the fact that it has given over 100 performances this season in Boston, New York and other eastern cities and every one has drawn great audiences.

EXPRESS, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5-3

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

That model musical organization, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, Eugen d' Albert, the great pianist, and Alwin Schroeder, the violoncello virtuoso, form an ideal company of artists the equal of which can seldom be heard in any city. They will appear at the Star Theater this evening in a brilliant programme in which the masters of the modern school of orchestration are well represented. A large audience is assured.

The programme is as follows:

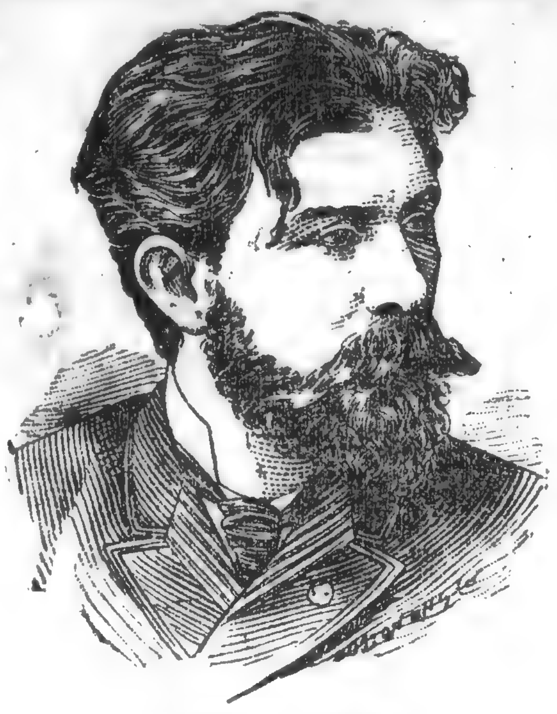
Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini." ....Berlioz
Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor..............Chopin
Mr. D'Albert.
Prelude, "Lohengrin." ....Wagner
Theme with Variations from Suite, Op. 55. ....Tschaikowsky
Soli for Violoncello:
a Nocturne....................................Chopin
b Moment Musical...........................Schubert
c Capriccio....................................Klengel
Mr. Schroeder.
Symphony in G major No. 4........................Dvorak

NEWS, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, accompanied by Eugen D'Albert, the famous pianist, and Alwin Schroeder, the 'celloist, will give a concert at the Star Theater next Tuesday evening. The opportunity to hear in the same concert the finest orchestra this country has ever known, an artist commonly recognized as the first of living pianists and a distinguished 'cello virtuoso, constitutes an attraction not to be resisted by the musical public, and, as was expected, the demand for seats has been very great and there is every indication that the supply will be exhausted before Tuesday.



ARTHUR NIKISCH.

The Boston Orchestra is a permanent organization numbering 75 picked players. The present is its sixth visit to Buffalo. For Tuesday's concert Mr. Nikisch has arranged a programme of great interest, made up largely of representative numbers by modern composers and calculated to show to the best advantage the remarkable ability of the great orchestra and the soloists. The programme in full is as follows:

Overture—"Benvenuto Cellini".....Berlioz
Concerts for pianoforte in E minor..Chopin
Mr. D'Albert.
Prelude—"Lohengrin"............Wagner
Theme with variations from the Suite op. 55............Tschaikowsky
Solo for Violencello.........................
(a) Nocturne....................Chopin
(b) Moment Musical...........Schubert
(c) Capriccio......................Klengel
Mr. Schroeder.
Symphony in G major No. 4........Dvorak

Clipping from Com. Advertiser
~~STAR~~, New York, N. Y.

Date 5-2

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY IN BROOKLYN.

The sixth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn was given on Saturday evening at the Academy of Music. The programme was delightfully rendered. This concert was the close of an unusually successful season, and formed a very brilliant and fitting termination to this series. We cannot imagine a more finished performance. The beautiful Schubert Unfinished Symphony was perhaps played with more sympathy than anything else on the programme.

In this number the orchestra seemed to enter, con amore, into the very spirit of the great work. We have often heard this orchestra give this symphony before, but never with greater emotion or with greator perfection of execution—an absolutely faultless performance.

The introduction of two symphonies into the programme gave an opportunity of comparing this well known work of Schubert's with Schumann's symphony No. 4 in D minor. A striking contrast of style and of expression, but both immensely interesting. In the Schubert a concentration of sorrow; in the Schumann buoyant gladness and the light of love; in both a warm, human vitality. The scherzo of the Schumann symphony was played with "vim and vigor." To us it seems the best part of the work. In the romance movement the slight solo for violin fell to Mr. Loeffler, in Mr. Kneisel's absence, and was most gracefully played.

In Mr. and Mrs. Henschel the orchestra had the assistance of consummate artists. Mrs. Henschel was heard in a charming aria, "Alessandro," by Handel, and Mr. Henschel in the Tannhauser Fantasy, "Blick ich Umher," both given with perfect intonation and expression. Their duet from "Taming of the Shrew" was encored tumultuously, the singers being three times recalled, but not repeating the number. There are no artists whose method is more worthy of study than these two thoroughly trained vocalists. Their method is such perfect art that it ceases to be felt as art, and seems nature itself, as if there were no other way to sing. At the close of the concert Mr. Nikisch was obliged to appear three times and bow his acknowledgment of the well earned applause which testified to the appreciation of him and his work.

For the season of 1892-93 the following dates have been arranged, on Saturday evenings, at the same place as this season's concerts: Nov. 5, Dec. 10, 1892; Jan. 14, Feb. 11, March 18 and April 29, 1893.

---

lipping from Enquirer Buffalo N Y

Date 4-30

The Great Republic

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

In the words of the platform orator the Boston Symphony Orchestra "needs no introduction" to the Buffalo music-loving public. Its renown is such that it would be rather a reflection upon the intelligence of our concert goers to try to tell them anything about it. The orchestra and its talented conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, will come to Buffalo for a concert on Tuesday evening next at the Star Theater. Two solo artists will appear with the orchestra, Alvin Schrœder, the eminent violoncellist, and Eugen D'Albert, the pianist who played here so finely but a short time ago that nothing need be said about him now. Among the features of the programme of orchestral music will be the last movement (theme with variations) from Tschaikowsky's suite, opus 55. It is said to be an interesting example of Tschaikowsky's vigorous scoring, mastership of musical means and deep sentiment. Particularly interesting will be the Dvorak's Symphony No. 4 in G. major. This work was played for the first time in this country at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Feb. 26 and 27 of this year in Boston. It is the latest symphonic composition by Dvorak and was completed last year and performed under Hans Richter's direction in both Vienna and London with much success, it is said.

The erchestra numbers 70 performers and every one of them is an artist. This is the programme:

Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini'..........Berlioz
Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, Op. 11, Chopin
Allegro maestoso.
Romance—larghetto.
Rondo vivace.
Mr. D'Albert.
Prelude, "Lohengrin"..................Wagner
Last Movement (Theme with Variations) from Suite, Op. 55..........Tschaikowsky
Soli for Violoecello.
a. Nocturne..........................Chopin
b. Moment Musical...............Schubert
c. Capriccioso.........................Klengel
Mr. Schroeder.
Symphony No. 4, in G major............Dvorak
Allegro con brio.
Adagio.
Allegretto grazioso.
Finale: Allegro ma non troppo.

---

lipping from News, Balto Md

Date 4-29

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

he Last of a Most Delightful Series of Concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its season of six concerts at the Academy Concert Hall last evening, with a strong but varied programme consisting of three works for the orchestra, three short 'cello solos and three vocal numbers.

The soloists were Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, first violincellist of the orchestra, and a member of the Kneisel Quartette. Mr. Franz Kneisel had been advertised to play a Paganini concerto, but was prevented by serious illness from fulfilling his engagement.

Mrs. Henschel was heard to great advantage in the Handel aria, which is thoroughly suited to her style of singing, and her clear, sweet, flexible soprano voice. She was quite enthusiastically recalled several times, but did not set the bad example of singing an encore.

Mr. Henschel sang Wolfram's love song, which opens the [illegible]rnament of song scene in the second act of Wagner's Tannhauser. Although seldom heard in concerts, it is one of the most noble and melodious numbers in the opera. It is composed in the recitative style of the old Minnesingers, who recited their songs in the courts of their kings, and accompanied their voices with the small harps which they carried from place to place. Mr. Henschel's voice is not a great one, and he does not always sustain his tones at the end of the phrase, but he is an artist of unusual intelligence in music generally, and whatever he does is finished and artistic. He is one of the finest lieder singers living.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder's three short 'cello solos aroused great enthusiasm. The first was the well-known Chopin nocturne, opus 9, No. 2; the second, the Schubert moment musicale, and the third the Popper dance of the elves and gnomes. His appearance in Baltimore hereafter will always be anticipated with pleasure.

The orchestral work was exceedingly well done, as usual, the principal number being "The Preludes," by Liszt, with which the concert closed. The Schubert symphony can be played by almost any orchestra, and has been heard here so often that concert patrons naturally prefer something more modern from the full Boston orchestra. Nevertheless, the laurel wreath presented to Mr. Nikisch by one of Baltimore's finest artists, expressed the feeling of the entire audience.

Six more concerts are announced for next season, and it is to be hoped that the lovers of music and enterprise generally will hurry up the new Music Hall in time to afford them a fitting place for the entire orchestra of eighty-five musicians, which, on account of limited stage room, Baltimore has ne

Clipping from American Balto Md

Date 4-29

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Close of the Boston Orchestra's Performances—The Program and Soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed the season here last night in the Concert Hall of the Academy of Music in fine style. Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel were the vocal soloists. They are known on both sides of the ocean as artists of the first rank. Mr. Henschel, who is a native of Silesia, has had the best musical training under distinguished masters. He founded the Boston Orchestra, led it for three years, and then went to London to conduct a similar organization. He sang last night, in a thoroughly-finished style, the air, "Blick ich Umher," from "Tannhauser." His voice is a resonant, melodious baritone, highly cultivated and of great dramatic power and breadth. His rendition of the air was all that could be desired. His wife's maiden name was Lillian Bailey. She was born in Columbus, O. She first appeared in public as a pupil of Madame Rudersdorf in 1876. Afterwards she studied abroad with Madame Viadot-Gorcia and other excellent trainers, and has sung at many great festivals in England, Scotland, Germany and America. She married Mr. Henschel in 1881. The career of the two has been a long and brilliant one. Mrs. Henschel's voice is a clear, sweet, true, flexible soprano, which she manages with consummate skill and taste. Her treatment of Haendel's air, "Alessandro," was in the highest style, and aroused the audience to a great pitch of enthusiasm. Goetz's beautiful duet from "Taming of the Shrew"—"Come, Kate, My Dearest"—served to further exhibit the admirable quality of their voices and their splendid method. It was a genuine treat to hear them sing it. Mr. Franz Kneisel was down for Paganini's concerto in D major for violin, but he was too ill to appear. In his place Mr. Alwin Schroeder, a member of the Kneisel Quartet, showed in three short selections what a fine master of the 'cello he is. The orchestra played in its usual splendid style the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Mr. Nikisch received from an admirer a wreath of ivy with fancy streamers attached. The concerts this season have been better attended than ever before. At some of them people were turned away—a proof that classical music, when played as it ought to be, is thoroughly appreciated by our people. Six concerts have been announced for next season.

COMMERCIAL, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 4-30

On Tuesday the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Nikisch will give a concert at the Star Theatre, when Buffalo will again have an opportunity of hearing the great pianist D'Albert. He will play Chopin's concerto in E minor, one of the most beautiful of this composer's works, and one very seldom heard here. Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the first violincello in the Orchestra, will be the other soloist. He has won good opinions from the eastern press, and his position alone warrants interesting work. Of the Orchestra itself nothing more can be said, it being conceded as one of the best, if not the best, in the world. A symphony of Dvorak's, the Lohengrin prelude, and Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," forms this part of the program. The Dvorak Symphony was given in Vienna and London last year with marked success, and was produced for the first time in this country by Mr. Nikisch last February. With such a program, rendered by such artists, the Star Theatre should be filled to its utmost capacity.

PROGRAM.

Berlioz........Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"
Chopin...Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, Op. 11.
    Allegro maestoso.
    Romance—larghetto.
    Rondo vivace.
Mr. D'Albert.
Wagner..................Prelude, "Lohengrin"
Tschaikowsky.....Last Movement (Theme with Variations from Suite, Op. 55.
Soli for Violoncello.
    a. Chopin, Nocturne.
    b. Schubert. Moment Musical.
    c. Klengel. Capriccioso.
Mr. Schroeder.
Dvorak.............Symphony No. 4, in G major
    Allegro con brio.
    Adagio.
    Allegretto grazioso.
    Finale; Allegro ma non troppo.

Chicago Herald
May 5/1

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The one musical event of importance during the coming week will be the visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which under its distinguished conductor, Arthur Nikisch, will give a single concert at Central Music hall on Saturday evening. The orchestra numbers seventy five performers and is recognized as one of the best in the world. Indeed, no less an authority than Paderewski recently said of it: "I consider the Boston Symphony orchestra the best in the world, not excepting the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris. There are a few better instruments in the Conservatoire, but, as a whole, the Boston Symphony orchestra stands above it. After the performance of my concerts in Brooklyn, in which Mr. Nikisch directed the accompaniment, I declared I would never play the piece again; and I will not, as its perfection may not be reached again.

An important feature of the concert on Saturday will be the appearance with the orchestra of Eugene D'Albert, the great piano virtuoso. Franz Kneisel, the concertmeister of the orchestra, will also be heard in solo numbers. The programme is as follows:

Overture—"Sakuntala"........................Goldmark
Concerto for Pianoforte in E Minor, op. 11..Chopin
Eugene D'Albert.
Symphonic Poem, "The Rouet D'Omphale"..........................Saint-Saens
Concerto for Violin in D Major..............Paganini
Franz Kneisel.
Pilgrim's March, from Symphony "Harold in Italy"..............................Berlioz
Viola Solo, Mr. Kneisel.
Symphony No. 1 in B Flat, op. 38.......Schumann

The sale of seats opens to-morrow morning.

Clipping from Star Union Brooklyn N.Y.

Date 5-2

THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

Saturday night's Philharmonic was a concert long to be remembered. The season, when it began in November under a new management, was decidedly experimental in character. That the experiment turned out happily is apparently indicated by the publication in last Saturday's programme of the dates for next season's concerts and rehearsals, which will be again conducted by Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The last concert of the season was outwardly distinguished from its predecessors by pretty floral decorations and a different setting of the stage. Easter lilies, azaleas and palms filled the space within the orchestra rail, and a scene in light tones replaced the ugly green one so long associated with Philharmonic concerts. The Academy was well filled, and the audience were unusually enthusiastic.

Mr. Nikisch, in giving very little Wagner music this season, has tacitly refused to place himself in competition with Seidl or other Wagnerian leaders. The only orchestral selections given were the "Faust Overture," the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," the prelude to the "Meistersinger" and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman," which opened the concert last Saturday. If hitherto any of Mr. Nikisch's hearers have doubted his ability to render the works of Wagner as intelligently and artistically as he interprets other composers, Saturday night's performance of the "Flying Dutchman" overture must have reassured them on this point. The selection was evidently carefully studied, and it was brilliantly played.

Mrs. Henschel repeated her charming performance of Haendel's "Alessandro" aria, and was warmly applauded. The Schubert B minor symphony was attentively heard, and Mr. Nikisch's exquisite and original rendering of it was apparently appreciated, for the applause was heartier than that usually given to an orchestral number.

Mr. Henschel's only solo selection, the "Blick ich umher," from "Tannhaeuser," was, perhaps, not the best thing he might have chosen for his voice, but his singing of it was manly and skillful. Again, the duo from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," sung by both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, won for the singers five recalls from a delighted audience.

The Schumann symphony in D minor, No. 4, is one of the things which gains by repetition. It is a pity that we do not hear it oftener. The playing of it was beyond criticism. The comparatively unlearned people in the audience found much pleasure and enlightenment in following it, with the aid of Prout's delightful analysis, which was printed in the well-edited but not handsome programme. It is to be hoped that the custom of presenting descriptive notes of the orchestral numbers will not be discontinued next year. Their excellent character has called forth many expressions of satisfaction.

At the close of the concert, the audience stayed long enough to recall Mr. Nikisch three times, as an expression of appreciation of his winter's work.

~~TELEGRAM~~-HERALD, Grand Rapids, Mich

Date 5-1

A week from tomorrow night the famous Boston Symphony orchestra will play in Hartman hall. This is the largest orchestra in the United States and in point of proficiency it is second to none in the world. It is composed of the most accomplished instrumentalists that can be secured. The appearance of this superb organization in Grand Rapids is a treat; a privilege that the lovers of music never dreamed of. Too much expression of appreciation cannot be given to F. M. Davis and A. H. Morehead, who, it is understood, had the courage to pledge the orchestra a large certainty in order to induce them to come here. In addition to the fine program of solid and substantial music, Eugene D'Albert, the renowned pianist, who is compared with Rubenstein, will render several solos. The subscription list for tickets indicates that the spacious auditorium will be crowded to its capacity. The following notice is intended for subscribers: Line tickets will be issued at the box office at No. 94 Ottawa street tomorrow morning. Subscribers can obtain only as many reserved seats as they hold tickets. To facilitate the subscription sale, those who have subscribed are requested to call upon F. M. Davis, cashier Grand Rapids National bank, and retain their tickets. The sale will open to the public on Wednesday morning, continuing until the night of the concert.

INTER-OCEAN, Chicago, Ill.

Date 5-1

CENTRAL MUSIC HALL.

The musical community will undoubtedly welcome the opportunity of again hearing the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under its distinguished conductor, Arthur Nikisch. This organization will give its only concert in this city next Saturday evening at Central Music Hall, when it will be accompanied by Eugen d'Albert, the piano virtuoso, and Franz Kneisel, violinist, who are the soloists of the present tour. The Boston Orchestra has been enjoying a season of remarkable prosperity, and its concerts in New York, Philadelphia, and other large Eastern cities, have attracted great patronage and have won for it the heartiest praise from the leading critics. At the coming concert it will number seventy-five players. The programme in full is as follows: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11, Chopin, Mr. d'Albert; symphonic poem, "Le Rouet D'Omphale," Saint-Saens; concerto for violin in D major, Paganini (revised and with addition by Wilhelmj), Mr. Kneisel; viola solo, "Pilgrim's March," from symphony "Harold in Italy," Berlioz, Mr. Kneisel; symphony No. 1 in B flat, op. 38, Schumann.

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 4-30

THE PHILHARMONIC REHEARSAL.

At the sixth and last rehearsal yesterday Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel were the special attractions. These artists are deservedly popular in Brooklyn, and always draw good houses. The orchestral part of the programme was especially calculated to bring out the strong points of Nikisch's fine orchestra. The overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" was broadly rendered, but it may safely be said that Brooklyn has never heard the Schubert B minor or "Unfinished" symphony better given. Mr. Nikisch's interpretation differs considerably from that of Seidl or of Thomas. The opening is taken at a slower tempo, and the changes of time throughout are more carefully observed. The Schumann D minor symphony was also given very effectively.

Mrs. Henschel sang with her sweet but not powerful voice Haendel's air from "Alessandro," a selection admirably suited to her. She is an exceedingly accomplished singer, and it is unusual to hear a voice so perfectly managed. She is, however, a somewhat cold singer. Mr. Henschel's rendering of Wolfram's competition song, from the second act of "Tannhaeuser," was distinguished by perfect technique and great heartiness and earnestness. These qualities, in fact, make up a large part of Henschel's attraction. He has not a remarkable voice, but he is a capable musician, thoroughly devoted to his art.

The audience rose to great enthusiasm after the singing of the duo from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," and Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were recalled five times. This evening's concert will practically close the Brooklyn musical season, as far as the "regular" attractions are concerned.

Clipping from World. Balto Md

Date 4-29

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston symphony concert Thursday night as usual attracted an audience which filled every seat in the Academy hall. Many came in evening dress to enjoy the concert first and the Maryland club reception later, and this made the assemblage a brilliant one. The soloists, Herr Hentschel and wife, were not as satisfactory as those heard in former concerts, although Mrs. Hentschel was heartily recalled several times. But the audience had in mind D'Albert and other famous musicians who have appeared as soloists and naturally comparisons were made. The cello solos of Herr Schroeder, who appeared in place of Franz Kneisel, who is ill, were artistic triumphs. He played a suite of three, which displayed his wonderful fingering, sympathetic shading, and stamped him as a cello soloist of the first rank. The orchestra rendered the overture to "Flying Dutchman" in grand style, and an unfinished symphony by Schubert, closing with a masterly performance of Liszt's symphonic poem reminds one so strongly of Wagner in several of its movements.

Date 4-28

BROOKLYN'S PHILHARMONIC.

The public rehearsal for the last concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society to-night was given by the Boston Orchestra under Herr Nikisch's direction yesterday afternoon in the Academy of Music across the river. The programme included the overture to the "Flying Dutchman" and Schumann's D minor symphony. The orchestra played, as usual, with superb finish and spirit.

The soloists were Mr. and Mrs. Henschel. Mrs. Henschel sang the florid aria from Handel's "Alessandro" admirably, and together these consummate artists were heard in the duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew."

The audience was one of the largest of the year and the applause was very hearty.

COMMERCIAL, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 4-30

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Star Theatre next Tuesday evening, May 3, will undoubtedly be a "red letter" event of the musical season. Mr. Nikisch and his men have won a high place in the esteem of this public by their splendid performances in past seasons notably at the festival of the Buffalo Musical Association last year. Since that occasion the organization has steadily gained in prestige and most judges now agree with Paderewski who said of it "I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra the best in the world." The Orchestra will be accompanied on its coming visit by Eugen d'Albert, the great pianist. The combination is one not often to be enjoyed and will no doubt call out an attendance worthy of the occasion.

TIMES, New York, N. Y.

Date 5-1

—Eugen d'Albert and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in concert together at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall to-morrow evening. Mr. d'Albert will play Chopin's E minor concerto and Liszt's in E flat. The orchestra will play Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, selections from "Die Meistersinger," and the third movement of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," with Franz Kneisel as viola soloist.

Eve. Post, New York, N. Y.

Date 4-27

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Although there were three soloists at last evening's final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the interest nevertheless centred in the orchestral numbers; not that the soloists were poor, but because the orchestra fairly beat its own record in the matter of technical finish and artistic expression. Mrs. Henschel sung an aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," Mr. Henschel sang "Blick ich umher" from "Tannhäuser," and together these two accomplished artists sang a duet from the "Taming of the Shrew." Mr. Kneisel, the concert-master of the orchestra, again showed his marvellous skill as an executant on the violin, but it was to be regretted that he had not chosen a piece that would have given more opportunity than the Paganini D-major concerto, for showing the higher, intellectual, and emotional qualities of violin-playing which Mr. Kneisel also possesses to a degree equalled by but very few living violinists.

Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound" overture was substituted for a Saint-Saëns symphonic poem that had been announced, and as that overture is one of Goldmark's best works, somewhat in Liszt's vein but with a rich Oriental coloring peculiar to the composer of the "Queen of Sheba," the audience did not feel inclined to disapprove of the change. But the greatest treat was reserved for the end—Dvorák's fourth symphony, which, fine as it seemed at a first hearing, struck us last evening as being one of the greatest of modern symphonic works, brimful of new ideas, orchestral devices, and national color. Who has not, on reading the sad story of Schubert's life, and his early death at the age of thirty-one, ardently wished that that most spontaneous of all composers might come to live again in the person of some Doppelgänger? Well, Anton Dvorák is such a Schubert redivivus, and New York is happy in the prospect of soon possessing him as a member of her musical colony. Nor will he be allowed to starve here as the other Schubert was in Vienna. He will have $15,000 a year at the National Conservatory, which is a great deal more than Schubert earned all his life.

The truly delightful manner in which Mr. Nikisch and his musicians interpreted this symphony—it was the very perfection of orchestral playing—by way of concluding the season, must have decided any hearers who may have been uncertain as to renewing their subscriptions for next year.

The dates of next year's six concerts are (on Thursday evenings) November 3, December 8, January 12, February 9, March 16, April 27. They will again be given in Chickering Hall, but it is to be hoped that before next autumn some means will be found for ventilating the hall without letting in the deafening street noises. It would be well if Eighteenth Street could be paved with asphalt.

Date 5-1

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

The Boston symphony orchestra must have felt at home last evening, for it faced an audience in the Brooklyn Academy of Music that resembled in size and quality the houses it is accustomed to play to in Boston, and the likeness was strengthened by the cordiality, at times reaching to enthusiasm, that marked the attitude of the public toward the band and its leader, Mr. Nikisch being twice recalled and cheered at the end of the programme. A set of resolutions, giving encouragement and indorsement, was privately delivered to the conductor by the Philharmonic society, but the friendliness of that body was gratefully manifested in the floral decoration of the stage that had been undertaken by its order. The dramatic "Flying Dutchman" overture, the lovely unfinished symphony by Schubert, the brief and beautiful Fourth symphony of Schumann were the orchestral pieces. Mrs. Henschel sang sweetly the air from Handel's "Alexander," Mr. Henschel was vigorous, but in better voice than at the rehearsal, in his delivery of the "Blick Ich Umher" from "Tannhauser," and the two sang tastefully and expressively the duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew." The next appearance of the Boston symphony orchestra hereabout will be in conjunction with D'Albert at Madison square garden concert hall to-morrow night, and the first performance of the second season in Brooklyn will be on November 4.

WORLD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 4-29

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston symphony concert Thursday night as usual attracted an audience which filled every seat in the Academy hall. Many came in evening dress to enjoy the concert first and the Maryland club reception later, and this made the assemblage a brilliant one. The soloists, Herr Hentschel and wife, were not as satisfactory as those heard in former concerts, although Mrs. Hentschel was heartily recalled several times. But the audience had in mind D'Albert and other famous musicians who have appeared as soloists and naturally comparisons were made. The cello solos of Herr Schroeder, who appeared in place of Franz Kneisel, who is ill, were artistic triumphs. He played a suite of three, which displayed his wonderful fingering, sympathetic shading, and stamped him as a cello soloist of the first rank. The orchestra rendered the overture to "Flying Dutchman" in grand style, and an unfinished symphony by Schubert, closing with a masterly performance of Liszt's symphonic poem reminds one so strongly of Wagner in several of its movements.

Clipping from American
Balto Md

Date 4-29.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Close of the Boston Orchestra's Performances—The Program and Soloists.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed the season here last night in the Concert Hall of the Academy of Music in fine style. Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel were the vocal soloists. They are known on both sides of the ocean as artists of the first rank. Mr. Henschel, who is a native of Silesia, has had the best musical training under distinguished masters. He founded the Boston Orchestra, led it for three years, and then went to London to conduct a similar organization. He sang last night, in a thoroughly-finished style, the air, "Blick ich Umher," from "Tannhauser." His voice is a resonant, melodious baritone, highly cultivated and of great dramatic power and breadth. His rendition of the air was all that could be desired. His wife's maiden name was Lillian Bailey. She was born in Columbus, O. She first appeared in public as a pupil of Madame Rudersdorf in 1876. Afterwards she studied abroad with Madame Viadot-Gorcia and other excellent trainers, and has sung at many great festivals in England, Scotland, Germany and America. She married Mr. Henschel in 1881. The career of the two has been a long and brilliant one. Mrs. Henschel's voice is a clear, sweet, true, flexible soprano, which she manages with consummate skill and taste. Her treatment of Haendel's air, "Alessandro," was in the highest style, and aroused the audience to a great pitch of enthusiasm. Goetz's beautiful duet from "Taming of the Shrew"—"Come, Kate, My Dearest"—served to further exhibit the admirable quality of their voices and their splendid method. It was a genuine treat to hear them sing it. Mr. Franz Kneisel was down for Paganini's concerto in D major for violin, but he was too ill to appear. In his place Mr. Alwin Schroeder, a member of the Kneisel Quartet, showed in three short selections what a fine master of the 'cello he is. The orchestra played in its usual splendid style the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Mr. Nikisch received from an admirer a wreath of ivy with fancy streamers attached. The concerts this season have been better attended than ever before. At some of them people were turned away—a proof that classical music, when played as it ought to be, is thoroughly appreciated by our people. Six concerts have been announced for next season.

COMMERCIAL, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 4-30

On Tuesday the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Nikisch will give a concert at the Star Theatre, when Buffalo will again have an opportunity of hearing the great pianist D'Albert. He will play Chopin's concerto in E minor, one of the most beautiful of this composer's works, and one very seldom heard here. Mr. Alvin Schroeder, the first violincello in the Orchestra, will be the other soloist. He has won good opinions from the eastern press, and his position alone warrants interesting work. Of the Orchestra itself nothing more can be said, it being conceded as one of the best, if not the best, in the world. A symphony of Dvorak's, the Lohengrin prelude, and Berlioz's overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," forms this part of the program. The Dvorak Symphony was given in Vienna and London last year with marked success, and was produced for the first time in this country by Mr. Nikisch last February. With such a program, rendered by such artists, the Star Theatre should be filled to its utmost capacity.

PROGRAM.

Berlioz..........Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini"
Chopin...Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, Op. 11.
  Allegro maestoso.
  Romance—larghetto.
  Rondo vivace.
    Mr. D'Albert.
Wagner..................Prelude, "Lohengrin"
Tschaikowsky.....Last Movement (Theme with Variations from Suite, Op. 55.
Soli for Violoncello.
  a. Chopin, Nocturne.
  b. Schubert. Moment Musical.
  c. Kleugel., Capriccioso.
    Mr. Schroeder.
Dvorak..............Symphony No. 4, in G major
  Allegro con brio.
  Adagio.
  Allegretto grazioso.
  Finale; Allegro ma non troppo.

Chicago [illegible]
May 5

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The one musical event of importance during the coming week will be the visit of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which, under its distinguished conductor, Arthur Nikisch, will give a single concert at Central Music hall on Saturday evening. The orchestra numbers seventy five performers and is recognized as one of the best in the world. Indeed, no less an authority than Paderewski recently said of it: "I consider the Boston Symphony orchestra the best in the world, not excepting the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris. There are a few better instruments in the Conservatoire, but, as a whole, the Boston Symphony orchestra stands above it. After the performance of my concerts in Brooklyn, in which Mr. Nikisch directed the accompaniment, I declared I would never play the piece again; and I will not, as its perfection may not be reached again.

An important feature of the concert on Saturday will be the appearance with the orchestra of Eugene D'Albert, the great piano virtuoso. Franz Kneisel, the concertmeister of the orchestra, will also be heard in solo numbers. The programme is as follows:

Overture—"Sakuntala".......................Goldmark
Concerto for Pianoforte in E Minor, op. 11..Chopin
  Eugene D'Albert.
Symphonic Poem, "The Rouet D'Omphali"...........Saint-Saens
Concerto for Violin in D Major............Paganini
  Franz Kneisel.
Pilgrim's March, from symphony "Harold in Italy"..................Berlioz
  Viola Solo, Mr. Kneisel.
Symphony No 1, in B Flat, op. 38.........Schumann

The sale of seats opens to-morrow morning.

Clipping from Star Union
Brooklyn N Y

Date 5-2

THE PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

Saturday night's Philharmonic was a concert long to be remembered. The season, when it began in November under a new management, was decidedly experimental in character. That the experiment turned out happily is apparently indicated by the publication in last Saturday's programme of the dates for next season's concerts and rehearsals, which will be again conducted by Mr. Arthur Nikisch. The last concert of the season was outwardly distinguished from its predecessors by pretty floral decorations and a different setting of the stage. Easter lilies, azaleas and palms filled the space within the orchestra rail, and a scene in light tones replaced the ugly green one so long associated with Philharmonic concerts. The Academy was well filled, and the audience were unusually enthusiastic.

Mr. Nikisch, in giving very little Wagner music this season, has tacitly refused to place himself in competition with Seidl or other Wagnerian leaders. The only orchestral selections given were the "Faust Overture," the "Waldweben" from "Siegfried," the prelude to the "Meistersinger" and the overture to the "Flying Dutchman," which opened the concert last Saturday. If hitherto any of Mr. Nikisch's hearers have doubted his ability to render the works of Wagner as intelligently and artistically as he interprets other composers, Saturday night's performance of the "Flying Dutchman" overture must have reassured them on this point. The selection was evidently carefully studied, and it was brilliantly played.

Mrs. Henschel repeated her charming performance of Haendel's "Alessandro" aria, and was warmly applauded. The Schubert B minor symphony was attentively heard, and Mr. Nikisch's exquisite and original rendering of it was apparently appreciated, for the applause was heartier than that usually given to an orchestral number.

Mr. Henschel's only solo selection, the "Blick ich umher," from "Tannhaeuser," was, perhaps, not the best thing he might have chosen for his voice, but his singing of it was manly and skillful. Again, the duo from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," sung by both Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, won for the singers five recalls from a delighted audience.

The Schumann symphony in D minor, No. 4, is one of the things which gains by repetition. It is a pity that we do not hear it oftener. The playing of it was beyond criticism. The comparatively unlearned people in the audience found much pleasure and enlightenment in following it, with the aid of Prout's delightful analysis, which was printed in the well-edited but not handsome programme. It is to be hoped that the custom of presenting descriptive notes of the orchestral numbers will not be discontinued next year. Their excellent character has called forth many expressions of satisfaction.

At the close of the concert, the audience stayed long enough to recall Mr. Nikisch three times, as an expression of appreciation of his winter's work.

~~TELEGRAM~~-HERALD, Grand Rapids, Mich

Date 5-1

A week from tomorrow night the famous Boston Symphony orchestra will play in Hartman hall. This is the largest orchestra in the United States and in point of proficiency it is second to none in the world. It is composed of the most accomplished instrumentalists that can be secured. The appearance of this superb organization in Grand Rapids is a treat; a privilege that the lovers of music never dreamed of. Too much expression of appreciation cannot be given to F. M. Davis and A. H. Morehead, who, it is understood, had the courage to pledge the orchestra a large certainty in order to induce them to come here. In addition to the fine program of solid and substantial music, Eugene D'Albert, the renowned pianist, who is compared with Rubenstein, will render several solos. The subscription list for tickets indicates that the spacious auditorium will be crowded to its capacity. The following notice is intended for subscribers: Line tickets will be issued at the box office at No. 94 Ottawa street tomorrow morning. Subscribers can obtain only as many reserved seats as they hold tickets. To facilitate the subscription sale, those who have subscribed are requested to call upon F. M. Davis, cashier Grand Rapids National bank, and retain their tickets. The sale will open to the public on Wednesday morning, continuing until the night of the concert.

INTER-OCEAN, Chicago, Ill.

Date 5-1

CENTRAL MUSIC HALL.

The musical community will undoubtedly welcome the opportunity of again hearing the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra under its distinguished conductor, Arthur Nikisch. This organization will give its only concert in this city next Saturday evening at Central Music Hall, when it will be accompanied by Eugen d'Albert, the piano virtuoso, and Franz Kneisel, violinist, who are the soloists of the present tour. The Boston Orchestra has been enjoying a season of remarkable prosperity, and its concerts in New York, Philadelphia, and other large Eastern cities, have attracted great patronage and have won for it the heartiest praise from the leading critics. At the coming concert it will number seventy-five players. The programme in full is as follows: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11, Chopin, Mr. d'Albert; symphonic poem, "Le Rouet D'Omphale," Saint-Saens; concerto for violin in D major, Paganini (revised and with addition by Wilhelmj), Mr. Kneisel; viola solo, "Pilgrim's March," from symphony "Harold in Italy," Berlioz, Mr. Kneisel; symphony No. 1 in B flat, op. 38, Schumann.

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 4-30

THE PHILHARMONIC REHEARSAL.

At the sixth and last rehearsal yesterday, Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel were the special attractions. These artists are deservedly popular in Brooklyn, and always draw good houses. The orchestral part of the programme was especially calculated to bring out the strong points of Nikisch's fine orchestra. The overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" was broadly rendered, but it may safely be said that Brooklyn has never heard the Schubert B minor or 'Unfinished" symphony better given. Mr. Nikisch's interpretation differs considerably from that of Seidl or of Thomas. The opening is taken at a slower tempo, and the changes of time throughout are more carefully observed. The Schumann D minor symphony was also given very effectively.

Mrs. Henschel sang with her sweet but not powerful voice Haendel's air from "Alessandro," a selection admirably suited to her. She is an exceedingly accomplished singer, and it is unusual to hear a voice so perfectly managed. She is, however, a somewhat cold singer. Mr. Henschel's rendering of Wolfram's competition song, from the second act of "Tannhaeuser," was distinguished by perfect technique and great heartiness and earnestness. These qualities, in fact, make up a large part of Henschel's attraction. He has not a remarkable voice, but he is a capable musician, thoroughly devoted to his art.

The audience rose to great enthusiasm after the singing of the duo from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew," and Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were recalled five times. This evening's concert will practically close the Brooklyn musical season, as far as the "regular" attractions are concerned.

Clipping from World.
Balto Md

Date 4-29

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston symphony concert Thursday night as usual attracted an audience which filled every seat in the Academy hall. Many came in evening dress to enjoy the concert first and the Maryland club reception later, and this made the assemblage a brilliant one. The soloists, Herr Hentschel and wife, were not as satisfactory as those heard in former concerts, although Mrs. Hentschel was heartily recalled several times. But the audience had in mind D'Albert and other famous musicians who have appeared as soloists and naturally comparisons were made. The cello solos of Herr Schroeder, who appeared in place of Franz Kneisel, who is ill, were artistic triumphs. He played a suite of three, which displayed his wonderful fingering, sympathetic shading, and stamped him as a cello soloist of the first rank. The orchestra rendered the overture to "Flying Dutchman" in grand style, and an unfinished symphony by Schubert, closing with a masterly performance of Liszt's symphonic poem reminds one so strongly of Wagner in several of its movements.

Date 4-29

BROOKLYN'S PHILHARMONIC.

The public rehearsal for the last concert of the Brooklyn Philharmonic Society to-night was given by the Boston Orchestra under Herr Nikisch's direction yesterday afternoon in the Academy of Music across the river. The programme included the overture to the "Flying Dutchman" and Schumann's D minor symphony. The orchestra played, as usual, with superb finish and spirit.

The soloists were Mr. and Mrs. Henschel. Mrs. Henschel sang the florid aria from Handel's "Alessandro" admirably, and together these consummate artists were heard in the duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew."

The audience was one of the largest of the year and the applause was very hearty.

COMMERCIAL, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 4-30

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Star Theatre next Tuesday evening, May 3, will undoubtedly be a "red letter" event of the musical season. Mr. Nikisch and his men have won a high place in the esteem of this public by their splendid performances in past seasons notably at the festival of the Buffalo Musical Association last year. Since that occasion the organization has steadily gained in prestige and most judges now agree with Paderewski who said of it "I consider the Boston Symphony Orchestra the best in the world." The Orchestra will be accompanied on its coming visit by Eugen d'Albert, the great pianist. The combination is one not often to be enjoyed and will no doubt call out an attendance worthy of the occasion.

TIMES, New York, N. Y.

Date 5-

—Eugen d'Albert and the Boston Symphony Orchestra will appear in concert together at the Madison Square Garden Concert Hall to-morrow evening. Mr. d'Albert will play Chopin's E minor concerto and Liszt's in E flat. The orchestra will play Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, selections from "Die Meistersinger," and the third movement of Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," with Franz Kneisel as viola soloist.

Eve. Post, New York, N. Y.

te 4-27

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Although there were three soloists at last evening's final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the interest nevertheless centred in the orchestral numbers; not that the soloists were poor, but because the orchestra fairly beat its own record in the matter of technical finish and artistic expression. Mrs. Henschel sung an aria from Massenet's "Herodiade," Mr. Henschel sang "Blick ich umher" from "Tannhäuser," and together these two accomplished artists sang a duet from the "Taming of the Shrew." Mr. Kneisel, the concert-master of the orchestra, again showed his marvellous skill as an executant on the violin, but it was to be regretted that he had not chosen a piece that would have given more opportunity than the Paganini D-major concerto, for showing the higher, intellectual, and emotional qualities of violin-playing which Mr. Kneisel also possesses to a degree equalled by but very few living violinists.

Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound" overture was substituted for a Saint-Saëns symphonic poem that had been announced, and as that overture is one of Goldmark's best works, somewhat in Liszt's vein but with a rich Oriental coloring peculiar to the composer of the "Queen of Sheba," the audience did not feel inclined to disapprove of the change. But the greatest treat was reserved for the end—Dvorák's fourth symphony, which, fine as it seemed at a first hearing, struck us last evening as being one of the greatest of modern symphonic works, brimful of new ideas, orchestral devices, and national color. Who has not, on reading the sad story of Schubert's life, and his early death at the age of thirty-one, ardently wished that that most spontaneous of all composers might come to live again in the person of some Doppelgänger? Well, Anton Dvorák is such a Schubert redivivus, and New York is happy in the prospect of soon possessing him as a member of her musical colony. Nor will he be allowed to starve here as the other Schubert was in Vienna. He will have $15,000 a year at the National Conservatory, which is a great deal more than Schubert earned all his life.

The truly delightful manner in which Mr. Nikisch and his musicians interpreted this symphony—it was the very perfection of orchestral playing—by way of concluding the season, must have decided any hearers who may have been uncertain as to renewing their subscriptions for next year.

The dates of next year's six concerts are (on Thursday evenings) November 3, December 8, January 12, February 9, March 16, April 27. They will again be given in Chickering Hall, but it is to be hoped that before next autumn some means will be found for ventilating the hall without letting in the deafening street noises. It would be well if Eighteenth Street could be paved with asphalt.

Date 5-

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

The Boston symphony orchestra must have felt at home last evening, for it faced an audience in the Brooklyn Academy of Music that resembled in size and quality the houses it is accustomed to play to in Boston, and the likeness was strengthened by the cordiality, at times reaching to enthusiasm, that marked the attitude of the public toward the band and its leader, Mr. Nikisch being twice recalled and cheered at the end of the programme. A set of resolutions, giving encouragement and indorsement, was privately delivered to the conductor by the Philharmonic society, but the friendliness of that body was gratefully manifested in the floral decoration of the stage that had been undertaken by its order. The dramatic "Flying Dutchman" overture, the lovely unfinished symphony by Schubert, the brief and beautiful Fourth symphony of Schumann were the orchestral pieces. Mrs. Henschel sang sweetly the air from Handel's "Alexander," Mr. Henschel was vigorous, but in better voice than at the rehearsal, in his delivery of the "Blick Ich Umher" from "Tannhauser," and the two sang tastefully and expressively the duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew." The next appearance of the Boston symphony orchestra hereabout will be in conjunction with D'Albert at Madison square garden concert hall to-morrow night, and the first performance of the second series in Brooklyn will be on November 4.

WORLD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 4-29

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston symphony concert Thursday night as usual attracted an audience which filled every seat in the Academy hall. Many came in evening dress to enjoy the concert first and the Maryland club reception later, and this made the assemblage a brilliant one. The soloists, Herr Hentschel and wife, were not as satisfactory as those heard in former concerts, although Mrs. Hentschel was heartily recalled several times. But the audience had in mind D'Albert and other famous musicians who have appeared as soloists and naturally comparisons were made. The cello solos of Herr Schroeder, who appeared in place of Franz Kneisel, who is ill, were artistic triumphs. He played a suite of three, which displayed his wonderful fingering, sympathetic shading, and stamped him as a cello soloist of the first rank. The orchestra rendered the overture to "Flying Dutchman" in grand style, and an unfinished symphony by Schubert, closing with a masterly performance of Liszt's symphonic poem reminds one so strongly of Wagner in several of its movements.

[210]

Clipping from Sun
Balto Md
Date 4-29

MUSIC OF ALL GRADES.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Last Concert This Season.

ORGANIZING A BALTIMORE PROJECT.

Prof. Ross Jungnickel's Proposition—Summer Opera—The Marine Band—A Cantata Sung by the Choir of St. Paul's Southern Methodist Church.

The pleasure that the audience felt in the concert at Harris's Concert Hall last night was tinged with regret, for the evening was the last that Baltimoreans will spend with Arthur Nikisch and the Boston Symphony Orchestra until another musical season brings its round of concerts. No concerts given this winter in the city have proved more enjoyable or been more heartily appreciated, and the director leaves Baltimore both figuratively and literally laurel-wreathed, for a beautiful tribute was handed to him last night—a wreath of the glossy leaves, held together with ribbons of red, white and blue.

Only three purely orchestral numbers were given, but each of these was, in its intrinsic worth and manner of its performance, sufficient to mark the concert enjoyable. The overture to Wagner's glowing music-picture of that mystic romantic legend "The Flying Dutchman" was the opening number, and the second orchestral performance was of Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, that strangely beautiful work whose tragic yet tender tones communicate to the listeners the deep feeling which must have been the composer's mood when creating these two movements. This fragmentary work alone, with its exquisite blending of the instrumental and poetical expression, would readily make the composer stand out in bold outline were all his other rich gifts to music unknown. The symphonic poem "Les Preludes," by Liszt, was the third orchestral number.

Three soloists made their appearance at the concert, the vocalists being Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel, who were favorably received. Mr. Henschel lived for many years in Boston and his career since then in London has been followed with great interest by his numerous American friends. Henschel's voice is big, in fact, its bigness is the first thing that strikes one. It is not a voice easy to manage, and it speaks well for Henschel's methods as a voice-trainer that he has gotten it under as much control as it was. Mrs. Henschel, who was a pupil of Henschel's before their marriage, has a vocal organ of just the opposite caliber. It is fine, clear and in many of its tones remarkably pure, but it is not a great voice and relies for its impression mainly on grace and finish of style. Mrs. Henschel's solo was happily selected, the impressive Handel aria, noble in its simplicity, being delightfully given and arousing the audience to enthusiasm. Henschel was only moderately effective in the Wagner number, while the duet from Goetz's "Taming of the Shrew" was unsuited to them and uninteresting of itself. Mr. Franz Kneisel, owing to sudden illness, was unable to fill his part in the programme, a Paganina violin concerto, and his place was taken by Mr. Alvin Schroeder, violincellist. The disappointment that was felt at the non-appearance of the favorite concert master soon gave way to surprise and delight at the superb performance of Mr. Schroeder, whose playing was a rare combination of tone, expressive interpretation and an execution that overcame immense difficulties with perfect ease.

CITIZEN, Brooklyn, N.Y.

Date 5-

On Saturday evening, April 30, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch, gave its last concert of the present season at the Academy of Music, assisted by Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel, when the following magnificent programme was heard:

Overture, "Flying Dutchman"....................Wagner
Air, "Alessandro"....................Haendel
Mrs. Henschel.
Unfinished symphony in B minor....................Schubert
Allegro moderato.
Andante con moto.
Fantasie from Act II., "Tannhauser," "Blick ich umher"....................Wagner
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Taming of the Shrew"....................Goetz
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Symphony No. 4, in D minor, op. 120....................Schumann
Introduction (adagio non troppo.)
Allegro.
Romance (adagio non troppo.)

News D. F. P.
Ap 11

One of the greatest musical treats yet to come in Detroit is the program offered by the Boston Symphony orchestra, May 11, for which occasion Charles Bobzin has secured D'Albert. There will be Goldmark's overture "Saknutula," Liszt's concerto in E flat, the first and third movements from A. Tschaikowsky's theme with variations, op. 55, and the entire Beethoven symphony No. 3, "Heroic." This will be a notable event in musical annals here as no orchestra has ever given an entire symphony in this city, and the 70 performers will give it a grand interpretation.

* * * *

Clipping from Independent
Plainwell Mich
4/28

The Boston Symphony orchestra, one of the first organizations, if not the finest of its kind, will appear at Hartman's Hall, Grand Rapids, Monday evening, May 9. There will probably be a train from Kalamazoo which will pass through Plainwell and take passengers from here. This is said to be the last time they will appear in the

---

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 4-28

NIKISCH-HENSCHEL CONCERTS.

LAST OF THE CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

To-morrow afternoon and Saturday evening two last concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given in the Academy of Music, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society. Director Arthur Nikisch will have for assistants at these two performances Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel. These two concerts will be the only occasions in which these two talented artists will appear in Brooklyn. Besides, it is the last opportunity of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra this season.

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel have achieved enviable reputations in the different cities in which they have sung during their present successful tour. They sing separately and together, and both have voices of rare sweetness. In a duet the voices blend perfectly. Mr. Henschel has great versatility in the use of his voice, and, as a Wagnerian exponent, he has few, if any, superiors.

Mr. Nikisch, it is understood, has determined to make these concerts, if possible, the best of the series he has given in Brooklyn. His orchestra numbers eighty-seven pieces, and he has in preparation some very fine selections.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn, held April 25, 1892, the following resolutions were unanimously passed:

"Resolved, That the Board of Directors of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn offers its congratulations to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon the brilliant series of concerts which it has given in Brooklyn, during the past season.

"Resolved, That the thanks of the society are due to the conductor, Arthur Nikisch, for the high standard of the music which he has presented, and for the rare excellence of the performances.

"Resolved, That the Board fully recognizes the important results which have followed the establishment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon a permanent basis, and desires to express its appreciation of the liberal spirit of devotion to the cause of music, which has made such an orchsetra possible."

HERALD, Baltimore, Md.

4-27

Two Fine Concerts.

Although the present brilliant musical season is about closing, two of the finest concerts yet remain—that by the Kneisel Quartet to be given at 4 o'clock this afternoon at Lehmann's Hall, and the last of the six by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which will take place to-morrow evening at the Academy Concert Hall. The programme of the Kneisel Quartet concert consists of the Beethoven string quartet in E minor, Opus 59, and the Schubert Trout quintet in C major, Opus 163.

The Boston Symphony programme is strong and varied, including works by Wagner, Handel, Paganini, Goetz and Liszt, the soloists being Mr. Franz Kneisel, the well-known violinist, and Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, the celebrated baritone and soprano, who appear for the first time in Baltimore.

Clipping from [illegible]
[illegible]
Date -30

PADEREWSKI says that he considers the Boston Symphony orchestra the best in the world, not excepting the orchestra of the Conservatoire in Paris. We have always thought that Pad intended to play a series of return engagements in America.

TIMES, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 4-29

The board adjourned for one week.

Mr. Nikisch and the Philharmonic.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the board offers its congratulations to the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon the brilliant series of concerts which it has given in Brooklyn during the past season.

Resolved, That the thanks of the Philharmonic Society are due to the conductor, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, for the high standard of the music which he has presented and for the rare excellence of the performances.

Resolved, That the board fully recognizes the important results which have followed the establishment of the Boston Symphony Orchestra upon a permanent basis and desires to express its appreciation of the liberal spirit of devotion to the cause of music which has made such an orchestra possible.

EVENING JOURNAL, Chicago, Ill.

Date 4-

* * *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, with Eugen D'Albert, the famous pianist, and Franz Kneisel, violinist, as soloists, will give its only concert in this city at Central Music Hall on Saturday evening of next week. The annual visit of this organization has become an important feature of each season and is welcome to the musical public. The fine performance always to be expected of the Boston orchestra and the fame of the soloists make the event one of extraordinary attractiveness. The sale of seats will open next Monday at Central Music Hall.

Date 5-1

The programme for the concert by the Boston symphony orchestra and Eugen D'Albert at Madison square garden concert hall to-morrow night is as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala"....................Goldmark
Concerto for pianoforte in E minor....................Chopin
Introduction to Act III, dance of apprentices, procession of mastersingers and homage to Hans Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger"....................Wagner
"Pilgrims' March" (third movement), from the symphony "Harold in Italy." Viola solo, Franz Kneisel (by request)....................Berlioz
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat....................Liszt

NEWS, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 4-26

SOME PROFESSIONAL PEOPLE.

The famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give a single concert at the Star Theater on Tuesday evening of next week. The organization numbers 70 performers and will be assisted by Eugen D'Albert, the renowned piano virtuoso, and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, 'cellist.

STANDARD-UNION, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 4-25

THE SIXTH NIKISCH CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Arthur Nikisch, conductor, will give their sixth rehearsal and concert, under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society, next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening. On these occasions the overture from Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" will be the opening piece. Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel will be the soloists, and they will also sing a duet from the "Taming of the Shrew."

BUFFALO COURIER: WEDNESDAY, MAY 4.

NIKISCH'S ORCHESTRA.

Classical Music Delightfully Played by America's Greatest Band.

The perfection of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was never more thoroughly demonstrated than last evening at the Star Theater. Since this organization was in Buffalo a year ago, it has had the benefit of additional drill and experience, and it is to-day the most perfectly equipped group of musicians in this country, if not in the world. There is no spasmodic playing, there is no independent thought, but one mind controls. Herr Nikisch thinks and his orchestra expresses his thoughts, receiving as if by intuition the inspiration that has such control of the quiet man. His calmness is that of intensity, and spirit permeates every movement of his men. While listening to such interpretation which seems so simple, it is mysterious that it cannot be repeated, and that other orchestras in the country fail where Nikisch succeeds. The man, however, understands that the strongest part of his orchestra is the strings, because he is himself a violinist, and realizes that the expressive part of an orchestra must be embodied in them. It is said that Von Bulow's orchestra fails in this particular, because he does not understand the instrument. This is always the case, and a man, perfectly to fill the position of conductor, should know the various instruments and their resources, but play the violin.

The programme last evening represented the French, German, Russian, and Bohemian schools of music, and they were distinct and separate. Berlioz and Dvorak formed the extremes and between them came Chopin, Wagner, and Tschaikowsky. The overture, "Benvenuto Cellini," is really an introductory symphony, and contains beautiful writing throughout. It is as variable as was the eccentric Italian whose name it bears, and the French conception and delineation is exceedingly clever. Berlioz writes for effects, and these effects are strong, besides being impregnated with most graceful expression. The Orchestra played the overture possibly as well as anything upon the programme, and it was as thoroughly enjoyed. Wagner's "Prelude" to "Lohengrin" gives the strings of the Symphony Orchestra every possible opportunity to show their efficiency, and the audience received the selection with the greatest enthusiasm. The variations from Tschaikowsky's "Suite" afford an opportunity to the composer of which he makes excellent use, and the skill with which he arrays the original thought in new attire enthralls the interest of the listener throughout. How beautifully the movements were played every patron of the concert knows and can never forget. Herr Nikisch fairly drew sparks of fire from the instruments by the nervous, quick up-drawing of his hand toward him. Surely an orchestra never responded with such life to the movement of a conductor. The Dvorak "Symphony," No. 4 in D minor, closed the programme, and like the preceeding numbers was played superbly.

Eugen D'Albert recently appeared in Buffalo and gave a piano recital, but he was not received with any particular enthusiasm. Last evening, largely on account of his surroundings which infused vigor into his playing, he received an ovation. After the playing of the Chopin "Concerto" in E minor he was recalled four times, and finally was obliged to seat himself at the piano, when he played the Chopin "Berceuse." His interpretation of the "Concerto" was most artistic, in which he was supported by the Orchestra in a manner never before heard in this city. The accompaniment is difficult, but there were no uneven places to mar the effect. Herr Nikisch complimented the pianist, and the Orchestra likewise applauded his effort.

The solos of Mr. Schroeder, the well-known 'cello player, were accompanied delightfully by Mr. Nikisch upon the pianoforte, and proved one of the most attractive numbers presented.

There is no fault to be found with the concert, but as was generally expressed, the audience would have enjoyed a greater number of selections by the Orchestra. Whenever it pleases the organization to visit Buffalo, the popular managers, Messrs. Ellis and Cornee, may be assured there will be no vacant seats whatever the dimensions of the hall in which the orchestra plays.

BUFFALO EXPRESS

Wednesday Morning, May 4, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Nikisch, D'Albert and the Others Played Before a Brilliant Audience.

The brilliant audience which crowded the Star Theater last evening probably would vote with Paderewski that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has no equal in the world—at least they would till the bloom of enthusiasm is worn off by a rival organization. The programme was modern, romantic and bright, and the audience was thoroughly appreciative.

Mr. Nikisch's interpretation of Hector Berlioz's gorgeous overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" was evidently conamore, and in the beauty of the music one forgot all about the old goldsmith's tempestuous life which Berlioz intended to preface and outline. The daring instrumentation and beautiful color were brought out wonderfully under the conductor's wand.

The most important piece of the concert was, of course, Chopin's E minor concerto, played by Eugen d'Albert and the Orchestra. Even those who have heard the "little giant" before, this winter, must have been surprised at his power, brilliancy and intellectual force as displayed in this concerto last evening. D'Albert's fame has always rested largely on his earnestness and intelligence, but his interpretation of the delicious second movement of the concerto would alone have placed him beside the other reigning virtuosi as a poet. The orchestra played the less-interesting music with perfect taste and tact. The concerto was nearly half an hour long, and at its conclusion Herr D'Albert was greeted with applause which amounted to an ovation. Four times he was recalled, and the fifth time he sat down and played with exquisite touch the familiar Chopin cradle-song which has been given varying interpretations by every piano artist of any prominence who has visited Buffalo for many a year.

The "Lohengrin" prelude, made familiar by the Buffalo Orchestra, was taken at an almost wearyingly-slow tempo and was not as warmly received as the magnificent Tschaikowsky theme with variations which followed.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the 'cellist, aroused almost as much enthusiasm as D'Albert. He played with a beautiful singing tone, perfect technique and thoughtful care Chopin's e flat Nocturne, Schubert's entrancing "Musical Moment" and Klengel's old-fashioned and showy Capriccioso. It was hard to tell which to admire most, the soli or Mr. Nikisch's unostentatious and altogether perfect accompaniments. It is to be hoped that some of the Buffalo accompanists were present to profit by the example.

The concert concluded with Anton Dvorak's No. 4 Symphony, the gifted Doctor's latest symphonic composition, which was brought out in this country by Mr. Nikisch only a few months ago. It is a brilliant work, full of originalities and of strong musical ideas, and was played with splendid spirit by the orchestra.

State Journal

FRIDAY - - - - - May 6, 1892.

ORPHEUS CONCERT.

Their Closing Event of the Season a Rare Musical Treat.

The fourth and last concert of the Orpheus club for the season of 1891-92 at the Grand last night drew the largest and finest audience the club has had and was a musical event long to be remembered. The superb Boston Symphony orchestra of eighty pieces completely filled the opera house stage. A more finished musical performance was never given in Columbus than that of this superb aggregation of talent. Mr. Arthur Nickisch, the conductor, has the large body of skilled performers perfectly under the control of his baton, and elicited from the many-voiced instruments sounds sweet enough to "Create a soul under the ribs of death."

More delicate and delicious shading we never listened to, and that the musical people present enjoyed to the extreme limit the work of the finest orchestra in America goes without saying. The first orchestral number was an exquisite rendition of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Their second was "Le Rouet d'Omphale," by Saint-Saens, and "Last Movement from Suite, Op. 55," Tschaisowsky, and the last Weber's beautiful overture, "Oberon." D'Albert, the pianist, took the house by storm. He was called out four times before he responded with a second piece. His first piece was Liszt's Concerto in E flat. D'Albert is a marvel of skill. Mr. T. Adamowski, a violinist, possessed of an instrument of marvelous sweetness and a delicate touch, played a rondo capriccio solo by Saint Saens, and was called out several times, but declined to play a second time. The Orpheus club only sang one piece, but to the mind of the writer it was one of their prettiest selections of the season, and showed to excellent advantage the many fine voices of which the club is the possessor.

Clipping from
PRESS, Columbus, O.
Date 5-4

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To-morrow night the musical people will have the pleasure of hearing the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the auspices of the Orpheus Club. This excellent organization has been greatly increased since their last appearance here, and now numbers sixty-five men, and the programme arranged is of such a nature as to please all. Tickets admitting to gallery only now on sale at City Hall Drug Store.

The Cleveland Leader.

THURSDAY, MAY 5, 1892.

CHARMED THE AUDIENCE.

Five Thousand People Listen to the Music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Eugen D'Albert and Otto Roth Given Ovations—The Philharmonic Concert To-night.

Five thousand people listened enchanted to the music of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Music Hall last night. The orchestra commanded a full house at each performance and the entertainment of last evening was fully up to the standard set by previous visits to this city. In its trip this season the orchestra is accompanied by two soloists of renown and the entertainment given furnishes an agreeable variety, which greatly enhances its merit. The first number on the programme was Wagner's overture to "Tannhauser." It was given in a thoroughly artistic manner, in which the beauty and grandeur of the production were fully brought out. Herr Eugen D'Albert, the pianist, next gave an exquisite rendering of the concerto in E flat, by Liszt. He was accompanied by the stringed instruments of the orchestra and was accorded a perfect ovation at the close. Tumultuous applause rang through the house, lasting fully ten minutes, and the performer came to the front of the platform repeatedly before the audience calmed down. Mr. Otto Roth played Sarasate's "Faust's Fantasy" for the violin in an accomplished manner and won an enthusiastic encore. Saint-Saen's symphonic poem, "Le Rouet d'Omphale," was given by the orchestra, and Herr Eugen D'Albert rendered Rubinstein's barcarolle in A minor, and the valse "Mann Lebt Nur Einmal," by Strauss-Tausig. The evening closed with Brahms' symphony, No. 2, in D major, by the orchestra.

The May Festival will close this evening with a concert by the Cleveland Philharmonic Orchestra. It will be the last concert of the orchestra this season and a fine programme has been prepared. Madame Amalie Joachim, Miss Villa White, Mr. Charles Heydler, and Mr. Berneike will be the soloists. The mixed chorus of the Cleveland Gesangverein will also participate.

TRIBUNE, New York, N. Y.

Date 5-3

THE D'ALBERT CONCERT.

The concert which Mr. D'Albert gave in conjunction with the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Madison Square Hall, while in many respects an exceedingly enjoyable affair, subjected both participants to the severest test they have had to endure here this season. The concert-room is small and acoustically admirable. No better place for a pianoforte concert could be imagined, but it subjects an orchestra to a severe test. Every crudity in tone, every tardy entrance is made painfully apparent. Added to this drawback there was the difficulty of disposing of so large a band as that of Mr. Nikisch on the small stage, and the state of the atmosphere, which was extremely unfavorable to orchestral music. Not only was there a breaking of violin strings all evening, but the pitch of the wood-wind instruments was faulty, and the slow movement of the E minor concerto by Chopin, which the pianist played first, was sadly marred by the dissonant bassoons. It was easier, however, to overlook a defect of this kind for which the players were less responsible than the weather, than it was to enjoy the performance of Mr. D'Albert. There is no need, at this late day, to add to the high estimate which has been pronounced in these columns on this admirable musician and brilliant pianist. Unhappily his conception of Chopin's idyllic concerto is one which only those are likely to admire who are willing that the spirit of the composition shall be sacrificed so long as it is made a vehicle for the performer's marvellous digital skill. Of the charm which is native to the work we failed to detect a single trace last night. Mr. D'Albert's interest seemed concentrated in the passage work, which he had transmogrified with the assistance of the Tausig version, till Chopin would surely have failed to recognize it as his creation. In these portions he played with amazing brilliancy, and, of course, the ad captandum effect brought its reward. In the fervor stirred up by his stupendous close he played afterward Rubinstein's staccato etude in a manner to take one's breath away; but in the minds of the judicious it did not save the concerto. The concerto in E-flat by Liszt, which ended the concert, was a different matter. There the style which he had chosen to cultivate had its place. The orchestra played Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, selections from "Die Meistersinger" and the march movement from Berlioz's "Harold" symphony.

Clipping from Press Cleveland O.

Date 5-5

Symphony Concert.

Nikisch and his Boston symphony orchestra played ~~entrancingly~~ in Music hall, Wednesday evening, to an audience of 4000 people. The overture to "Tannhauser" probably never had a better interpretation than ~~that~~ given by the symphony. Eugen D'Albert played Liszt's great concerto in E flat and won rapturous applause, in which even the musicians joined. The program was made up from the works of Wagner, Liszt, Saint-Saens, Sarasate, Strauss-Faussig, Rabenstein and a grand symphony by Brahms.

Com. Advertiser,

Clipping from

~~STAR,~~ New York, N. Y.

Date 5-7

It was not Thomas Wentworth Higginson, but Henry Lee Higginson, who presented to Harvard College a tract of twenty acres to be called the "Soldiers' Field," and to be used for athletic sports. This is the same Mr. Higginson who has maintained the Boston Symphony Orchestra for years, and is the most generous man at the Hub.

Leader, Pittsburg

[illegible]

The May music festival will be the leading attraction in the city next week. The concerts will be given under the auspices of the Mozart club, Prof. J. P. McCollum director, at the Old City hall on the evening of May 12, 13 and 14. The club will be assisted by the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the able directorship of Prof. Arthur Nikisch. This orchestra is composed of eighty pieces, and in connection with the Mozart chorus of 200 voices, will make some good music. However, the Boston Symphony club will be given full sway on the first evening of the series, and an elaborate program consisting of vocal and instrumental solos and duets has been prepared for the occasion.

A New York critic, commenting on a concert given recently in that city, says:

No more beautiful concert ever was or ever could be given than that furnished yesterday evening to its subscribers by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Arthur Nikisch. Both in regard to selections and the manner of their performance the entertainment was perfect. Only three names of great composers appeared upon the bill—Haendel, Berlioz and Wagner. They were set down in this order, the older man heading the list with a "concerto for string orchestra and two wind choirs in F major," a work so full of symmetrical beauty, and so refreshing in its clear, square cut forms and honest, straightforward progressions, that, while listening, wrinkles were smoothed from knitted brows and cares and doubts fell away from anxious hearts. Strength and health and common sense and justice seem to be the inherent qualities of Haendel's delightful concerto. It radiates peace and comfort from every phrase throughout its entire length. There are five short movements, cleverly contrasted, each as fine as the other. It was interesting to note how the exact, Haendelian spirit was given to this number, the stiff, formal style of the old master showing in vivid comparison with the rest of the program, which was made up of the ultra-romantic school, Berlioz's symphony "Harold in Italy," and Wagner's "Lohengrin" prelude, with extracts from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung," being the remaining selections.

WORLD, New York, N. Y.

Date 5-3

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

M. D'Albert Plays at What Was Probably the Last Concert.

What was probably the last symphony concert of the present season took place last night at Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, when M. D'Albert appeared with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch.

M. D'Albert played two concertos—Chopin's in E minor, op. 11, and Liszt's in E flat. The orchestra numbers comprised Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, selections from "Die Meistersinger," third act, and the "Pilgrim's March," from Berlioz's "Harold in Italy" symphony, a programme which, if it contained no startling novelties, was in the main enjoyable.

The audience was at once put in a receptive frame of mind by a delightfully romantic and considered performance of Goldmark's beautiful overture. M. D'Albert is too good a Beethoven player to ever excel as an interpreter of Chopin. He is too precise, too unemotional.

His reading of Chopin's brilliant ouvrage de jeunesse was finished and careful, but was distinctly lacking in poetical fancy and feeling, and sounded somewhat hard and dry. It was exceedingly brilliant, but it was not characteristically Chopinesque.

As might have been expected "Meistersinger" selections and the "Pilgrim's March," in which Mr. Kneisel played the viola solo, went in a manner which left little to be desired. Mr. Nikisch views his Wagner with most just dramatic proportion, and Mr. Kneisel makes one regret that viola solos are so infrequent and that the instrument even to-day is so disregarded.

Mr. D'Albert's remarkable force and technique were shown to the greatest advantage in the Liszt concert, a concerto by courtesy rather than in form. M. D'Albert makes nothing of technical difficulties which might well appall the most experienced, and is never guilty of playing for mere effect's sake. He was most enthusiastically received, and after the Chopin concerto played the Rubinstein C major etude as an encore in a rather perfunctory and indistinct manner, though at an astounding pace.

The orchestra sounded very well in the hall, though the two-storied appearance of the orchestra struck one as a little quaint. The programme was not on the whole as interesting or as pleasantly varied as is usual with Mr. Nikisch, who is generally an adept in the art of programme making.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 129.

SUNDAY, MAY 8, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The reports received from the concerts of the week just ended by the Boston Symphony orchestra are well calculated to sustain the faith in this organization on the part of its home admirers, and it is pleasant to know that the favor shown the Boston musicians in the concert rooms of the West is supplemented by marked social courtesies to Director Nikisch and the leaders of the orchestra wherever they appear.

The concert on Monday evening in New York, with D'Albert as soloist made a pronounced success, and this was followed on Tuesday evening by the greatest artistic triumph the orchestra has ever gained in Buffalo, the demand for tickets far exceeding the limits of the auditorium used.

On Wednesday evening at Cleveland, O., the audience numbered over 4000, and both Conductor Nikisch and D'Albert were recalled repeatedly to receive the ovation of the delighted audience. On Thursday evening at Columbus, O., the orchestra played under the auspices of the Orpheus Club, to the capacity of the opera house in that city, and at the close of the concert the Columbus Club gave a dinner to Conductor Nikisch, D'Albert, Messrs. Kneisel, Schroeder and the Adamowskis of the orchestra and Managers Charles A. Ellis and Fred R. Comee.

The concert at Cincinnati on Friday evening, under the auspices of the College of Music, was the most successful financially of any ever given there by the Boston orchestra, the hall being packed and four recalls given Mr. Nikisch after the first number. At Chicago, last evening, the attendance also exceeded the record of any preceding year, and altogether it is evident that the Boston orchestra is getting to be a very popular organization "out West."

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1892.

Boston Notes.

THE eleventh season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra ended with two symphonies and a violin concerto. The latter was Paganini's, in D, as revised by Wilhelm, played by Kneisel, who was recalled four times. Haydn's Symphony in G, 13, one of his earlier works, with its solemn Largo, bright Minuet, and jovial Finale, has enough melody and brevity for perpetual delight. Brahms' First, in C minor, has a tedious beginning and a long postscript; but if you patiently await for the third movement and are not too weary for the first half of the last, you are partly repaid. It is a work for musical scientists, not for ordinary concert-goers. Nikisch is announced as next season's director, though some critics, who happen to disagree with his musical romancing now and then, have hotly clamored for a change. Music is not an exact science, like mathematics.

D'ALBERT'S BOSTON TRIPLET.

NOT many men can bring a large audience into Music Hall for a piano recital, but this is what D'Albert did for his series of Easter week. In the first he hypnotized us to such an extent that a hundred minutes had passed before we knew it. It was a Beethoven Matinee, and we had, besides, the 32 Variations in C-minor, op. 101, four solid sonatas; the popular Waldstein, the first movement played with unwonted brilliancy; the E-minor and E-major, op. 90 and 109, not so often heard, and the op. 110. His performance reached a high degree of poetry as well as technique, and he gratified his applausive hearers with a classic encore. No fuss and flummery about D'Albert, but direct unimpeachable work.

HE is not an artist to be shut up in Beethoven, however, and his second recital was wider in range and simply magnificent. Said one lady, herself a good pianist, who has heard everybody: "This is the greatest recital I ever attended in my life!" Such a succession of wonderful executions, all without paper and without apparent fatigue, for he ended with an encore, a Chopin waltz. What did he play? His own pyrotechnic version of Bach's D Major Prelude and Fugue; Beethoven's rarely heard sonata, op. 78,—and D'Albert can play more Sonata in five minutes than anybody else; Mendelssohn's 15 Variations Serieuses; Raff's long Suite in D-minor, op. 91; Schubert's lovely Impromptu, op. 90, No. 3; Tausig's difficult arrangement of Strauss's waltz, "Man lives but once;" Liszt's Liebesbraum, No. 3, and Spanish Rhapsody, with the Arragonese Jota. Pianists were thick as blackberries, marvelling at such a union of technique and sentiment in one artist.

The third recital did not equal the second in brilliant power, but it grew better and better from the Bach Suite Anglaise, No. 6, which opened it, to the Liszt Tarantella at the close, and included a Brahms Rhapsody, op. 79, No. 2; Chopin's Sonata in B-minor, op. 58; Rubenstein's Barcarolle in A-minor; Mozart's Rondo in the same key. He added three encores, Chopin's great Polonaise, a nocturne, and an Impromptu Waltz; and yet he rose from his labors as fresh as when he sat down two hours earlier. J. H. W.

D'Albert and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert, the famous pianist, was "applauded to the echo" at the Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert at the Madison Square Concert Hall on Monday evening. It will be remembered that when Mr. D'Albert was here a few seasons ago his successes were all won with the co-operation of an orchestra rather than in pianoforte recitals, and it must be conceded that until this occasion Mr. D'Albert has been somewhat under a cloud this season. The same methods that characterized his playing before are patent enough to win him the delighted applause of almost any audience at present. His playing of the Liszt E flat Concerto is one of the most sensational feats that modern virtuosity is capable of. Mr. D'Albert has an immense command of technique and the way he uses it, especially in the last movement, is only one degree removed from absolute frenzy. If he don't quite come to that point himself his hearers do. It is a performance that heats the blood, sets every nerve to a quiver, sharpens every sense to an acute point and brings one up to a pitch of excitement. This is a tribute to technique, extreme display of digital skill and sensational pianism. Liszt responds admirably to this kind of treatment, especially in the rhapsodical closing movement of the concerto, but when you come to display the same spirit in the playing of a Chopin concerto as Mr. D'Albert did when he performed the E minor concerto upon the same occasion it becomes quite a different matter.

D'Albert's style is diametrically opposite to any accepted manner of rendering Chopin. In the first place his touch is not an artistic and singing touch, such as will vibrate and prolong the tone sufficiently to do justice to Chopin's exquisite melodies. When he touches the keys it is with a blunt and rather unsympathetic touch, and as we said upon the occasion of his début in New York some years ago, his playing lacks the softer graces of poetry and romance. Mr. D'Albert gave the Chopin Concerto with quite as much vigor and impetuosity as the Liszt Concerto, which we hold to be quite different from the true spirit of the work.

In the one style this pianist awakens genuine admiration, but let him avoid Chopin if he cannot help "pounding" the life out of that tone poet's music. The orchestra played admirably, but manifestly under difficulties, for it was a damp evening, and every moment there would be heard the sharp twang of a broken string, until it seemed as though all the stringed instruments would be disabled. The Goldmark "Sakuntala" overture was the "piece de resistance" of the evening from the orchestra.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 8.

More Gratitude.

The Musical Courier continues to indulge in virtuous and grateful indignation against the Boston music critics who have found fault with Mr. Nikisch for certain inexcusable innovations in his readings of the works of Beethoven, Mozart and other great composers, and for their strictures on the degeneration of the Symphony Orchestra since it has been under his control. The funniest feature in this second attack of the Courier on the Boston critics, is the piteous moan aroused by the fear that the course of these same critics may cast "contempt and discredit upon the critical confraternity." Now, one need not make a very arduous search among the New York papers devoted to music, to find one that has achieved both distinction and notoriety in bringing just this contempt and discredit on the critical confraternity of the metropolis. By way of overwhelming the Boston critics with a sense of their ignorance and wickedness, the Courier says: "Paderewski, who certainly knows what he is talking about, only last week praised the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." It is on record here that Mr. Paderewski was delighted with the manner in which his pianoforte concerto was conducted by Mr. Nikisch; and as far as that is concerned, the pianist does know exactly what he is talking about. But what Paderewski's praise has to do with the unwarrantable liberties Mr. Nikisch takes with the music of Beethoven, Mozart, Mendelssohn and Schumann, and what relevancy it has in connection with the degeneration in the playing of an orchestra that he never heard when it was at its highest point of efficiency, do not appear. As far as Paderewski himself is concerned, admirable pianist as he is in his peculiar vein, he made sorry work with Beethoven whenever he played that composer's music here; and we have a very vivid recollection that New York criticism, that of the Courier included, was far from complimentary to the pianist in this connection. That one who misinterprets Beethoven should approve of a conductor who does the same thing is by no means remarkable. Moreover, it would be interesting to know what page in the last court calendar made Paderewski a final and indisputable authority on conducting and orchestral playing. The leading Boston critics, for the most part are trained musicians, and are quite as capable of passing judgment on orchestral performances as are Mr. Paderewski and the New York critics. It is true that some of the critics of our sister city are also musicians, though, Mr. H. W. Nicholl and and Mr. Ernest Catenhusen both solid musicians, are said to have excellent reasons for questioning the musicianship to which at least one of these critics lays claim.

The Courier asks, anent this almost unanimous stand that the Boston critics have taken against the new readings that Mr. Nikisch foists on great masterpieces, "Is it a Conspiracy?" It is scarcely worth while to suggest conspiracy until it be proved that the Boston critics have charged Mr. Nikisch with faults of which he is innocent. Even the most lenient and most admiring of Mr. Nikisch's critics remonstrated with "utterly superb" vigor against our conductor's highly-spiced misreading of Mendelssohn's Scotch symphony, and in his summing up of the season, fell into line with the other critics by saying: "It is not to be denied that the orchestra has fallen off in point of perfection of finish in playing during the past three years or so;" and conceded "the frequency with which the wooden wind have been out of tune with the strings of late." The subject however is not worth pursuing further, All that has been proved thus far is, that the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of late, has not pleased the Boston critics, while it has delighted those of New York. The moral of it all is that New York criticism is more easily satisfied than is that of Boston. Only this and nothing more. At the same time, we must again express our admiration for the affluence of gratitude for favors received and to come, that is the characteristic, perhaps the only virtue of the Courier.

THE ENQUIRER

The Boston Symphony Concert.

A large and appreciative audience attended the concert given by Eugen D'Albert and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Odeon, last evening. Several additional numbers were given by request of members of the audience, who were delighted by the combination's work.

After the symphony concert on Friday evening Eugen D'Albert, the great pianist, and Nikisch, the famous orchestra leader, were tendered an elegant banquet at the St. Nicholas. D'Albert and Nikisch sat at the opposite ends of the table. To the right and left of D'Albert sat Profs. Doerner and Guckenberger, of the college, and to the right and left of Nikisch were Dr. Elsenheimer and Louis Ehrgott. The others ranged around the festal board were Theodore Bohlman, Werthner, Brockhoven, Gorno, Sterling, Mattioli, Graninger, Singer and Romeo Gorno. Mr. George Schneider was also invited, but being unable to attend, at the last moment Franz Kneisel, the concertmeister, filled his place. The table was handsomely decorated, the menu of the finest, and the artists and their friends held a veritable feast of reason and flow of soul.

29TH YEAR. GRAND RAPIDS, MICH.

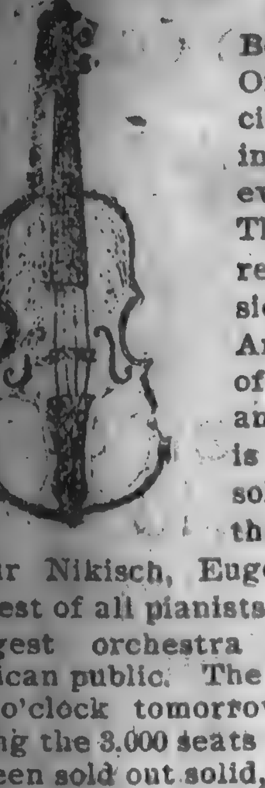
Democrat Grand Rapids Mich

FEAST OF SYMPHONY.

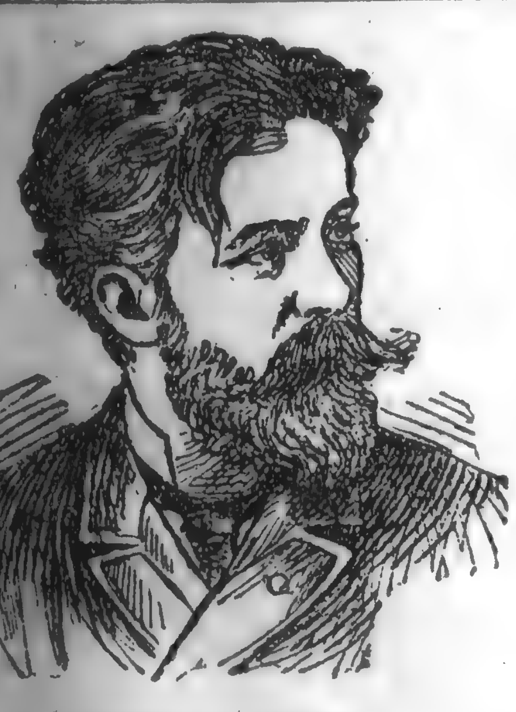
5-7

NIKISCH'S WONDERFUL ORCHESTRA.

Program for the Concert to Be Given Tomorrow Evening by the Great Boston Symphony Orchestra—Brief Analysis of the Selections.



THE visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to this city tomorrow evening is the musical event of the year. The orchestra is the representative musical organization of America. Every one of the three score and ten performers is an accomplished soloist, and under the conductorship of Arthur Nikisch, Eugen D'Albert, the greatest of all pianists, they make the strongest orchestra ever before the American public. The concert will begin at 8 o'clock tomorrow evening. Last evening the 3.000 seats in Hartman's hall had been sold out solid, and probabilities are that a building as spacious as the Muskegon wigwam will hardly be able to house the overflow of disappointed music lovers who will be unable to get into the hall tomorrow evening. That so high-class an entertainment should meet with such generous patronage at the necessarily steep prices asked for admission, is an exceedingly favorable commentary on the taste and cultivation of the Valley City.



CONDUCTOR NIKISCH.

Program for the Concert.

Arthur Nikisch, the conductor of the orchestra has announced the following program for the concert. Assistant Manager Comee has written F. M. Davis, the prime mover in getting the orchestra here, that the program is as fine as any which will be given by them on their present trip. It starts out with Schumann's symphony No. 1 in B flat, one of the grandest compositions known to music, and, after a varied menu by Liszt and Wagner, concludes with Weber's overture, "Oberon," a sparkling number, which will refresh the spirits and restore the nerves of the listeners and send them home delighted:

Symphony No. 1, in B flat..........Schumann
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro multo vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.
Concerto for Pianoforte, in E flat.......Liszt
Prelude—"Lohengrin"..............Wagner
"Siegfried's Passage to Bruennhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung"....Wagner (Arranged by Hans Richter).
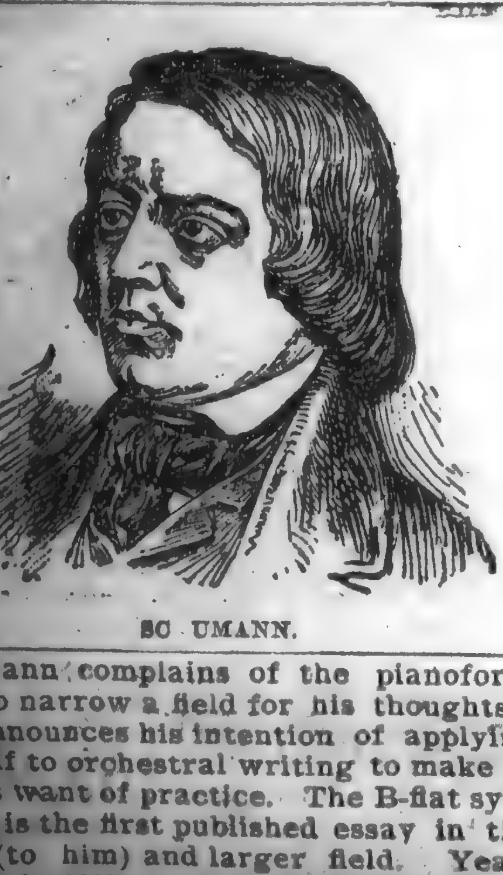
Overture—"Oberon"..................Weber

Schumann's Symphony No. 1.

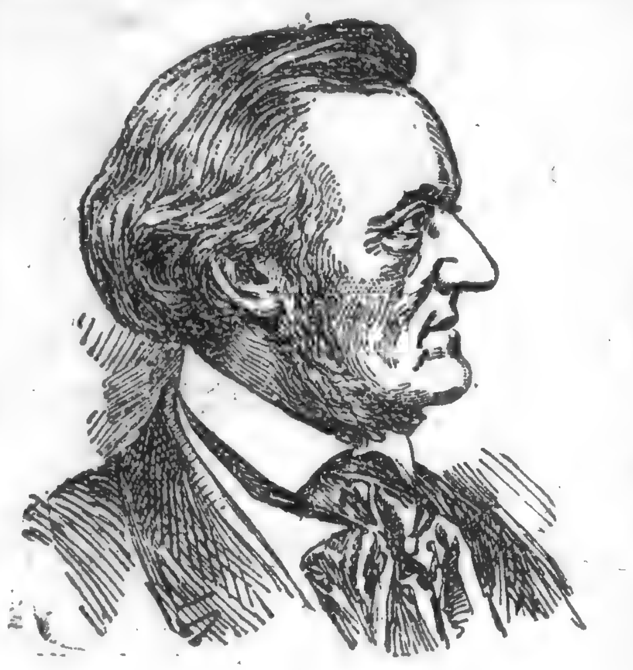
The programs contain an extended analysis of the several selections to be rendered, together with personal sketches of the composers whose works are produced. Of the first it says; This is Schumann's "Spring" symphony. It emanates from the happiest period of his life. The obstacles to his marriage had been overcome, and he had won a high position as a composer and an authority in music. In a letter to Dorn in 1839, Schumann complains of the pianoforte as "too narrow a field for his thoughts," and announces his intention of applying himself to orchestral writing to make up for his want of practice. The B-flat symphony is the first published essay in the new (to him) and larger field. Years before, in 1829, when a Heidelberg student, undecided between the professions of law and music, he wrote to Wieck, his old pianoforte teacher and future father-in-law: "I detest theory pure and simple, as you know; and I have been living very quietly, improvising a good deal, but not playing much from notes. I have begun many a symphony, but finished nothing, and every now and then have managed to edge in a Schubert waltz between Roman law and the pandects, etc." Of these juvenile student attempts in the symphonic form, one at least, in G minor, was played in public (in Schneeberg in 1833). The title "Spring Symphony," which, however, is not adopted upon the printed title-page, is Schumann's own. It is conceded that the buoyant B-flat symphony witnesses, in a truly astonishing manner, Schumann's forward stride in the technique of composition. Purists point out its "lovely imperfections"; but few of these are unwilling to say, with Ehlert: "It possesses all the charm of a first creation; it is imbued with the fragrant breath of a young pine grove, in which the sun plays at hide-and-seek; it embodies as much of a bridal air as if Schumann were celebrating his symphonic honeymoon."



SC UMANN.

Pen Picture of Richard Wagner.

The most striking thing about Richard Wagner at first sight was the extraordinary life and energy which animated his insignificant body, surmounted by a very large head, with an enormous frontal development. His bright eyes and pleasant glance softened the strongly marked face, and his mouth, notwithstanding the undue prominence of nose and chin, had a singular expression of sweetness and affability. With his short stature, his extreme rapidity of movement, gait and gesture, he gave from the first an expression of unusual and powerful originality. He fascinated by his conversation, so animated was he on all subjects which interested him, and he always acted out his discourse. He was violent, even explosive, in temper. With him, gayety, like wrath, was tempestuous and overflowing. Was he seized with a fit of mirth or raillery, he lost all control; he no longer knew what he was saying or to whom he was talking; and his wife, whose diplomacy was ever on the watch to prevent or repair his blunders, was often unable to hold him back or to keep up with him on this slippery ground. He was unmistakably incorrigible.

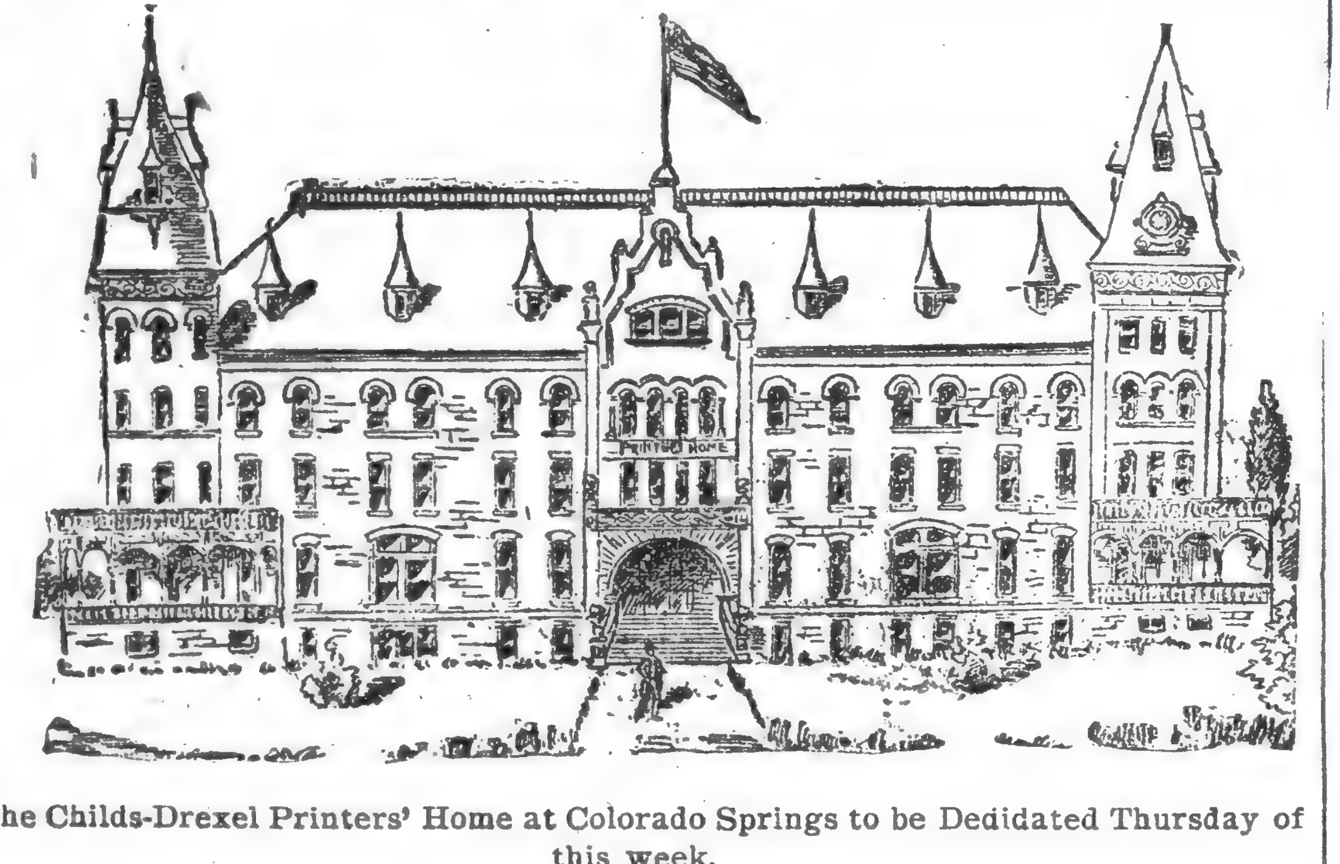


RICHARD WAGNER.

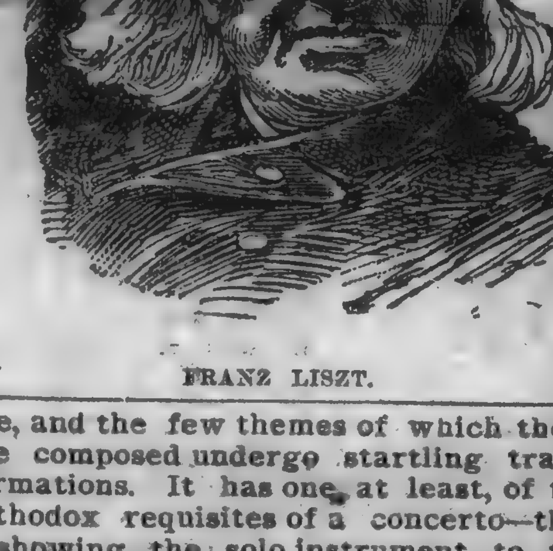
He made but a sign, and nearly two hundred of the best artists of Germany and foreign lands hastened to the rehearsals and performances of the Trilogy, which lasted through two summers. Proud to be associated with his work, they cheerfully signed the agreement to spend at Bayreuth three whole months of these two years, without making anything more than their board and their traveling expenses. All who approached Richard Wagner were charmed, carried away, dominated by his personality, those who knew him intimately as well as those who had only a passing acquaintance; but all testify likewise as to the uncertainty of his temper and the necessity of bending before him. This marvellous organization of so exquisite a sensibility experiences some terrible vibrations; one even questions how he is able to stand them. One day of sorrow makes him ten years older; but let joy return, and he is younger than ever the next day. He spends his energies with an extraordinary prodigality.

Liszt's Concerto for Piano Forte.

Franz Liszt, in his two concertos, in his remarkable sonata in B minor, and in many of his Poemes Symphoniques, has followed closely in the wake of Weber as regards the fusion of the various movements into one continuous whole; and, to do this more effectively, he has systematically made use of what may be called a metamorphosis of themes—a manner of procedure which dates from Beethoven, who makes use of it with astounding ingenuity in his thirty-three variations, in the final movements of the "Eroica" and the ninth symphonies, in some of the later quartets, and elsewhere. By means of this metamorphosis, the poetic unity of the whole musical tissue is made apparent, spite of very great diversity of details; and Coleridge's attempt at a definition of poetic beauty—unity in multeity is carried out to the letter. The present concerto does not afford specimens of all the innovations for which Liszt in some of his later works is responsible, yet it affords numerous and significant glimpses of them. The four sections which constitute it—opening allegro, adagio, scherzando and finale—are fused into one, and the few themes of which these are composed undergo startling transformations. It has one, at least, of the orthodox requisites of a concerto—that of showing the solo instrument to the fullest advantage, being without doubt the most difficult, as it is most brilliant, of display pieces. Perhaps "a rhapsody" would be the most appropriate title for it.



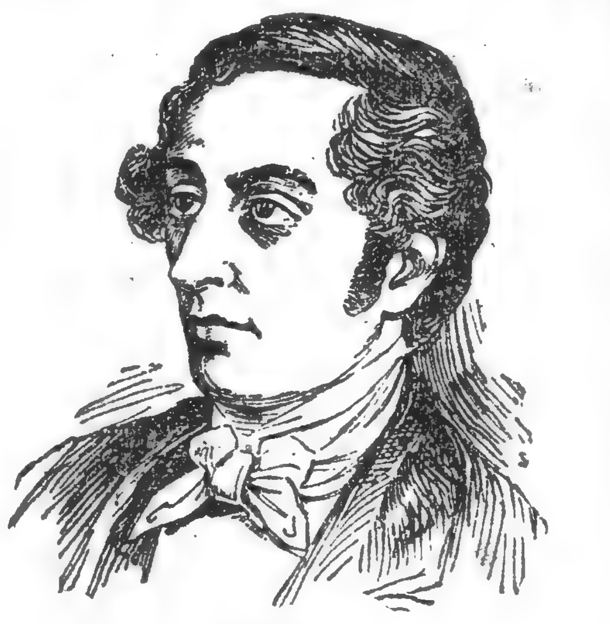
The Childs-Drexel Printers' Home at Colorado Springs to be Dedidated Thursday of this week.



FRANZ LISZT.

Siegfried's Passage to Bruennhilde Rock.

The arrangement from the final dramas of the Nibelungen to be played is one of the several Wagner contemplated for concert purposes, which were not completed till after his death. It was, however, fully discussed by him and Dr. Hans Richter, and was ultimately finished under the supervision of the latter. Though drawn from the last two dramas of the trilogy,—"Siegfried" and "Gotterdaemmerung,"—the scene of action remains the same; namely, the summit of the rocky mountain upon which the walkure Brunnhilde sleeps. It begins at the moment when Siegfried, having thrust Wotan from his path, turns to seek the fire-encircled rock and Bruennhilde—that moment in the progress of the drama where, with the breaking of Wotan's spear, all the gloom of the orchestra is changed in a twinkling to glorious expectancy. The arrangement includes none of the sublime music of Bruennhilde's atmosphere, nor does it touch upon the great love duet with which the drama of "Siegfried" ends. The orchestra now enters upon the "Morning Dawn" motive (from the second scene in the first act of "Die Gotterdaemmerung") heard in the 'cellos. As day broadens, the horns give out the motive of "Siegfried, the Son of the Forest," followed by a new motive (first clarinet), indicating Bruennhilde's love for Siegfried. The strings take it to a splendid climax. The sun rises high. Siegfried and Bruennhilde come forward (he in full armor, she leading her horse), which scene the orchestra superbly illustrates by a superb handling of the "Siegfried, the Son of the Forest," motive. The section "Siegfried's Rhine Journey" (he leaves Bruennhilde, in search of adventure and in fulfillment of the tragic fate that holds him) begins with Siegfried's horn-calls from the depths below Bruennhilde; a secondtime he passes through the fire (note the development of the horn motive and its conjunction with Loge's fire motive, first violins). On reaching the Rhine, the primeval element motive, beginning with the modulation, sways the whole orchestra. This superb picture extends through fifty-six bars. Then is heard the song of the Rhine daughters, with its brilliant accompaniment, interrupted by the "Rhinegold" motive, the symbol of desire (bass trombone), the motive of the ring (wood-wind and soft brasses). The arrangement closes with an effective handling of the "Walhalla" theme.



WEBER.

Weber's Overture to "Oberon."

The overture to "Oberon" is too well known to need extended description. The themes are from the opera. The opening movement, adagio sostenuto, almost wholly consists of fairy music, in the composition of which Weber scarcely had a superior. The magic horn begins, and the faries answer by their presence. Next appears an echo of Sir Huon's march, played as he returns home from his successful mission. After this the charming fanciful music continues till a fortissimo chord from the full orchestra ushers in the allegro con fuoco section, which begins with a subject taken from the quartet, "Over the dark blue waters." Subsequently the horn-call is again heard, and the clarinet gives out a second subject—the theme of Huon's song, "From boyhood trained"—which is supplemented by a passage from the great scene of soprano. "Ocean, thou mighty monster." There is also a reference to the chorus of spirits who are directed by Puck to raise the storm which makes shipwreck of the lover's bark.

DO NOT RENT.

Boston Musical Herald.
BOSTON, MAY, 1892.
GEORGE H. WILSON, Editor and Publisher.

On Saturday, April 2, came the twenty-first Symphony Concert. It began with Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, into which Mr. Nikisch read some of his own individuality—a heinous crime, if certain critics are to be believed. It pleased the large audience as did also the selections from "die Walkfire," though never were more divergent criticisms brought out than came from leading critics the next Monday. It was really comical. It was both the worst and the best performance of the Symphony; never before had the Feuerzauber been given so superbly and so wretchedly. A little less of the "personal equation," gentlemen! Why should we not have individuality, though it upsets our preconceived notions? Mr. Molé and Mr. Schuecker performed the andante and allegro from Mozart's flute and harp concerto:—a rather uninspired and summer-excursion-steamboaty kind of work; yet it gave both the flutist and harpist a chance to display brilliant virtuosity. The atmosphere played the mischief with the strings of the harp—if they were the spirits of just men, they were certainly not made perfect. The other number was Volkmann's charming but not great serenade for strings, exquisitely given. Mr. Heinrich Meyn was the vocalist and struggled manfully to make Wotan's Farewell effective against the tremendous background of the orchestration.

On Monday, April 4, the Kneisel Quartet gave their postponed concert, the last of the series. It began with Brahms's Sextet in G major for two violins, two violas and two 'cellos—a most noble, inspired and glorious work. This was followed by Beethoven's third sonata (in A major) for piano and 'cello, played by Mr. Perabo and Mr. Schroeder. It is wearisome to use superlatives, but what else can be employed regarding such a work interpreted by such artists? Let us follow the example of one of our esteemed contemporaries, and apologize because we have no fault to find. The concert ended with the E minor quartet, the second of the series dedicated to Prince Rasoumoffsky and here again we save space by the use of latent hyperboles.

D'Albert's symphony was announced for the twenty-third symphony concert (Saturday, April 16), but owing to the non-arrival of the partitur Schumann's first or Spring symphony was substituted. Mrs. Henschel was the soloist and selected the aria Lusinghe più care from Handel's "Alessandro" and an aria from Massenet's "Herodiade." Both of them were admirably suited to her, even if Music Hall is rather large for her voice. Mr. Henschel conducted the suite from his own music to Shakespere's "Hamlet," consisting of three preludes, interlude, and pastorale and the Danish March. It was the first performance in America and brought the talented composer an ovation. Musically, in this the characters of Hamlet and Ophelia are contrasted—the Wagneresque leit motiv being effectively and appropriately employed. The concert ended with a splendid performance of Weber's "Oberon" overture. Here it may be appropriate to add that Mr. and Mrs. Henschel's song-recitals in the Meionaon were unusually brilliant and successful—the singers appearing in a wide range of historic and modern lyrics.

Last and not least it remains to speak of D'Albert's three piano recitals at Music Hall. The first, on Monday afternoon, April 18, consisted wholly of Beethoven—the thirty-two variations in C minor and four sonatas. Such a program is instructive and valuable, is entirely worthy and artistic, but it may be questioned whether it is wise. It may show a pianist at his greatest but not in his most attractive light. Mr. D'Albert played these great works with fine intellectual feeling and vigorous, clear, perfect interpretation. At the second, his program ranged from his own arrangement of Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D major to Liszt's "Liebestraum" and Spanish Rhapsody, and included a Beethoven sonata, Mendelssohn's fifteen variations, a Schubert impromptu and Raff's Suite in D minor—a truly colossal bill of fare wonderfully executed. The last took place Saturday afternoon, April 23, with a no less delectable and brilliant program. He was greeted by a large audience whom he roused to enthusiasm by his wonderful interpretations. His playing of Bach's English Suite was something to remember, and if exception could be taken to the power displayed in the Chopin Polonaise which he gave as an encore, its technique was unimpeachable. In short he showed himself possessed of every great quality demanded by an artist:—poetry, memory, power, depth, breadth, height. And to this marvellous equipment is added a perfect simplicity which is delightful.

The same evening the final Symphony Concert was given at Music Hall; the series closing with a quaint, fresh and sparklingly vivacious Symphony of Haydn (in G major No. 13) and Brahms's First Symphony; a work worthy to take its place in the front van of all great Symphonies. Mr. Kneisel was the Soloist, and played with his smooth, faultless technique and delicate tone Paganini's D major Concerto. It made a favorable impression, in spite of its un-greatness. Mr. Kneisel was recalled again and again and the audience, with its electrical polarity of enthusiasm, gave a generous share of applause to the conductor whose great wint r's work was so happily concluded.

Mar 7

—Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel's vocal recital on the twenty-fifth is looked forward to with pleasure. These artists are so well known to Buffalo that it is needless to urge any one to hear them. No less than eighteen songs are on the program, two only by Mr. Henschel, appearing a "Spinning Song," and duet "Gondoliera." The other numbers, of which many are new, promise to be very interesting.

EVENING JOURNAL, Chicago, Ill.
Date.......... 5-7

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Eugen D'Albert, under the direction of Arthur Nikisich, will take place at Central Music Hall this evening. It will of course be an event in the musical world.

[213]

Press. Pittsburg
May 8

The one hundred and seventy-eighth reception will occur at the Pittsburg club theater, on Monday evening, May 16, at 8 o'clock. Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel will be the society's guests on this occasion. Although Mr. Henschel enjoys world-wide fame as a composer, orchestral conductor and oratorio singer, and Mrs. Henschel has won like repute as a leading artist in musical events of the first magnitude, it is, nevertheless, undoubted that they appear at their very best in their song-recitals, where they sing in turn and together to Mr. Henschel's own pianoforte accompaniment. With the pleasant privilege of personally meeting Mr. and Mrs. Henschel added to a musical program of such peculiar charm, this reception promises to be in every way one of the most brilliant yet given by the society. In view of the limited capacity of the hall and the extraordinary demand for cards already being made known, the board of directors have adopted the following rules for this occasion: "Admission shall be had by no one, whether a member or not, except upon presentation at the door of one of the cards specially printed for this reception; the ordinary cards will not be received. Two of these special cards, each admitting only one person, will be furnished to each member applying to the secretary on or before Tuesday, May 10. After that date the remaining cards, if any, to the capacity of the hall will be distributed first to those members who have applied for one extra card, and then to those members who have applied for two extra cards, in the order in which such applications have been received by the secretary. No cards will be issued before May 10, by which time each member should notify the secretary just how many cards he wants—and can certainly use. If two extra cards are wanted, when failing both, one would answer, it will be well to say so distinctly. Every member applying on time can rely on two cards; there may be one extra card for each member wanting it, but it is not likely that there will be two extra cards for all wanting them." Charles W. Scovel is the secretary.

The leading musical event of the week will be the Mozart club concerts under the direction of Prof. J. P. McCollum, and the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, at old city hall, on Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings. The club has been rehearsing for these concerts ever since the "Messiah" concert in December, and the chorus never was in better form. Another rehearsal will be held to-morrow evening, and Prof. McCollum will then announce the time and date of the last rehearsal.

That the concerts will prove a success is already apparent. The sale of tickets has only been going on three days and already nearly 2,800 seats have been disposed of. Through some fault of the printers, the tickets did not arrive for the opening of the sale. They are now here, however, and associate members and others holding cards should call at once and have the cards exchanged for tickets. The box office is at Mellor & Hoene's music store, 77 Fifth avenue.

Times: Sunday,
May 8, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, gave its only concert in Chicago this season at Central Music hall last night. Last year it gave three concerts in the same place, the first of them May 7 also, and all of them were well attended, and it is not quite clear why Chicago is passed this year with but one concert. That one, however, drew a very large audience, probably the largest the orchestra has ever had in Chicago, and served again to emphasize the wonderfully poetic and superbly rounded finish of the orchestral interpretations. And in this word "finish" is meant to be included all the elements that go to make up the best possible orchestral interpretation, not only the technical but what may be called the inspirational. Mr. Nikisch exhibits often unexpected treatment of tempo and of shading, but in every case, as has heretofore been remarked, his peculiar treatment is in entire harmony with the spirit of the composition in hand, and goes to make clearer a symmatrical interpretation of a warmly appreciative conception of the composer's purpose. It may be said in passing that the precision, the delicacy, the bold, picturesque shading, and above all the wonderfully fine unity of feeling obvious in all the band's work were the more appreciated last night, because since the last visit of this band a year ago nothing so spiritually, as well as intellectually and technically fine in orchestral work has been offered to Chicago music-lovers.

The orchestral numbers last night were Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," the "Pilgrim's March" from Berlioz' symphony "Harold in Italy," and Schumann's symphony, No. 1, in B flat.

It only remains to speak of the playing of d'Albert in the Chopin concerto. From the virtuoso point of view it left nothing to be desired, and the closing passage in the rondo was a wonderful piece of pianism, but we cannot speak so warmly on the point of interpretation. The warmth of coloring of the orchestra found no fitting response in the piano forte, but aside from this it was full of enthusiasm if not high flights of imagination. He received a warm encore, and responded by playing Rubinstein's staccato etude.

Mr. Kneisel was unfortunately too ill to play the Paganini work, and Mr. Schroeder filled his place by playing some 'cello solos by Chopin and Schubert, accompanied by Mr. Nikisch.

[214]

CHICAGO TRIBUNE.
SUNDAY, MAY 8, 1892.

WINS CHICAGO PRAISE

A BIG AUDIENCE HEARS THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Central Music Hall Filled with Persons Who Applauded Mr. Nikisch and His Musicians in an Enthusiastic Way—Their Right to Be Called the First Orchestra of America Clearly Proved—Violinist Remenyi Warmly Received by the Union League Club.

If the young Boston women who hang on Mr. Arthur Nikisch's baton, metaphorically speaking, from the beginning of the "symphony" season in that city to its lamented end, could have been present at Central Music Hall last evening they would have been gratified at the reception Chicago accorded their petted orchestra. They might have felt, possibly, that the applause accorded Mr. Nikisch was far scanter than his deserts, but they would certainly have found comfort in the fact that the night was fair beyond what is ordinarily expected of Chicago nights in early spring, and that the audience was all that it should be.

Every seat in the hall was filled from the front row in the pit to the very farthest in the second balcony, and enthusiasts stood in the aisles and foyer during the entire program.

It was a representative audience, too, made up from all classes of Chicago society, including all the types with which the inveterate concert-goer is familiar—the inconsiderate man who promenades the foyer in squeaky patent-leather shoes, the inconsiderate woman who chatters without regard for orchestral shading, the elegant young person who carries an American Beauty rose, that other who clutches a paper-bag of bonbons, and, not least, the serious-minded folk who propose to listen to the music and who persevere in their determination grimly.

Each visit of Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra brings increase of admiration for them both and for their thoroughly artistic work. As a conductor Mr. Nikisch satisfies by the high musicianship and the scholarly qualities displayed in his readings, and delights the artistic as well as the esthetic senses of his hearers by the poetic and emotional power of his interpretations. The orchestra stands today the product of over a decade of severe discipline, rigid technical drill, and constant practice under gifted and thorough directors, and it is to his long and careful training that it in a large measure owes its position today as the first orchestra of America, and one whose equals in Europe are but few. The playing last evening proved conclusively the right of the organization to this position, and the results were in every respect such as the most exacting spirit could require from an orchestra of such worth. Technically flawless, the work of the men may be considered as beyond aught save the highest praise.

The interpretation accorded Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saëns "Rouet d'Omphale," the "Pilgrim's March" from Berlioz, "Harold in Italy," and Schumann's Symphony No. 1 was in each instance masterly. Belonging as they did to the romantic or the modern school of composition, these selections lent themselves with unusual grace to the impassioned, highly emotional style of Mr. Nikisch's interpreting, and their poetic and dramatic beauties stood revealed with superb power and seemed to gain increased splendor of coloring and tonal effects by his affectionate treatment. The Goldmark overture was given with rare appreciation of its marked oriental character, and the Saint-Saëns Symphonic Poem was almost ideal in the technical finish with which it was played and in the delicacy and the keen appreciation of its dramatic import which characterized its interpretation. Schumann's joyous Symphony received a performance, which, for perfection of execution and loveliness of reading, has rarely been equaled in this city. The box-holders at the concert were:

Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Clark, Mrs. J. J. Glessner, Mrs. A. N. Eddy, Mr. Beal, Mr. G. Hickes, Miss Getty, Mrs. W. B. Howard, and Mr. Crane.

TIMES, Chicago, Ill.

Date 5-8

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, gave its only concert in Chicago this season at Central Music hall last night. Last year it gave three concerts in the same place, the first of them May 7 also, and all of them were well attended, and it is not quite clear why Chicago is passed this year with but one concert. That one, however, drew a very large audience, probably the largest the orchestra has ever had in Chicago, and served again to emphasize the wonderfully poetic and superbly rounded finish of the orchestral interpretations. And in this word "finish" is meant to be included all the elements that go to make up the best possible orchestral interpretation, not only the technical but what may be called the inspirational. Mr. Nikisch exhibits often unexpected treatment of tempo and of shading, but in every case, as has heretofore been remarked, his peculiar treatment is in entire harmony with the spirit of the composition in hand, and goes to make clearer a symmatrical interpretation of a warmly appreciative conception of the composer's purpose. It may be said in passing that the precision, the delicacy, the bold, picturesque shading, and above all the wonderfully fine unity of feeling obvious in all the band's work were the more appreciated last night, because since the last visit of this band a year ago nothing so spiritually, as well as intellectually and technically fine in orchestral work has been offered to Chicago music-lovers.

The orchestral numbers last night were Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," the "Pilgrim's March" from Berlioz' symphony "Harold in Italy," and Schumann's symphony, No. 1, in B flat.

It only remains to speak of the playing of d'Albert in the Chopin concerto. From the virtuoso point of view it left nothing to be desired, and the closing passage in the rondo was a wonderful piece of pianism, but we cannot speak so warmly on the point of interpretation. The warmth of coloring of the orchestra found no fitting response in the piano forte, but aside from this it was full of enthusiasm if not high flights of imagination. He received a warm encore, and responded by playing Rubinstein's staccato etude.

Mr. Kneisel was unfortunately too ill to play the Paganini work, and Mr. Schroeder filled his place by playing some 'cello solos by Chopin and Schubert, accompanied by Mr. Nikisch.

HERALD.
CHICAGO, MAY 8,

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Arthur Nikisch, gave a concert in Central music hall last evening, with Eugene d'Albert, Alwin Schroeder and Franz Kneisel as soloists. The hall was filled to overflowing with a brilliant audience, in which society and musical circles were equally well represented. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala"......Goldmark
Concerto in E Minor, op. 11......Chopin
Eugene D'Albert.
Symphonic Poem, "The Rouet D'Omphale"......Saint-Saens
Violoncello Solos......
Alwin Schroeder.
Pilgrim's March from the "Harold in Italy," Symphony......Berlioz
Viola Solo by Franz Kneisel.
Symphony No. 1, in B Flat......Schumann

To those who have listened to the symphony concerts in the Auditorium during the past season, the tone of the visiting orchestra may at times have seemed harsh and coarse. But they must not forget that the difference in size between the two halls is largely responsible for this, and, taken altogether, the smaller hall in many respects offers advantages which the larger one does not possess, by giving due prominence to many of the finer effects that are of necessity lost in the larger space and by permitting climacteric effects to exercise their full power, which they were never able to do in the Auditorium. The concert in many respects invites comparison between the eastern organization and our home orchestra, and it is pleasant to record that in several instances such comparison indubitably redounds to the benefit of the Chicago orchestra. Our reeds are vastly superior to those of the Boston orchestra, and our brass choir is certainly equally good. In the strings, however, Mr. Nikisch's organization is much better equipped; even in the smaller hall, which acts upon the tone like a microphone and in which their work is subjected to much closer auricular scrutiny, they proved their undeniable superiority, never exhibiting that lack of agreement in intonation or in precision that so frequently proved a disturbing element in the Chicago orchestra.

As a conductor Mr. Nikisch lacks the repose and self-poise that is such a noteworthy characteristic of Mr. Thomas. He is more demonstrative. His beat is very elastic, very suggestive and very indicative, yet it is firm, intelligent and intelligible, and he exercises complete control over his men. He secures pronounced effects and an intensity that at times almost border on exaggeration—chiefly by sudden transitions in dynamics and tempi where such suddenness seems uncalled for, and many, no doubt, took exception to such extravagances, especially in the Schumann symphony. With the exception of this symphony the programme offered nothing that had not been heard here during the winter, and so calls for little comment. The work of the orchestra throughout the evening was admirable, although it is doubtful whether it appeared to such excellent advantage in any other number as it did in the symphonic poem.

Mr. Kneisel had been announced to play Paganini's concert in D major, but was unable to do so on account of lack of strength resulting from recent illness, so that Mr. Schroeder, the principal 'cello of the orchestra, was substituted for him. He played transcriptions of Chopin's nocturne in E flat, Schubert's "Momens Musicale" and a piece by Kleugel, all of which served to display a beautiful tone, excellent technique and admirable taste. In the slight opportunities afforded by the viola obligato in Berlioz's symphony Mr. Kneisel developed an uncommonly rich and warm tone.

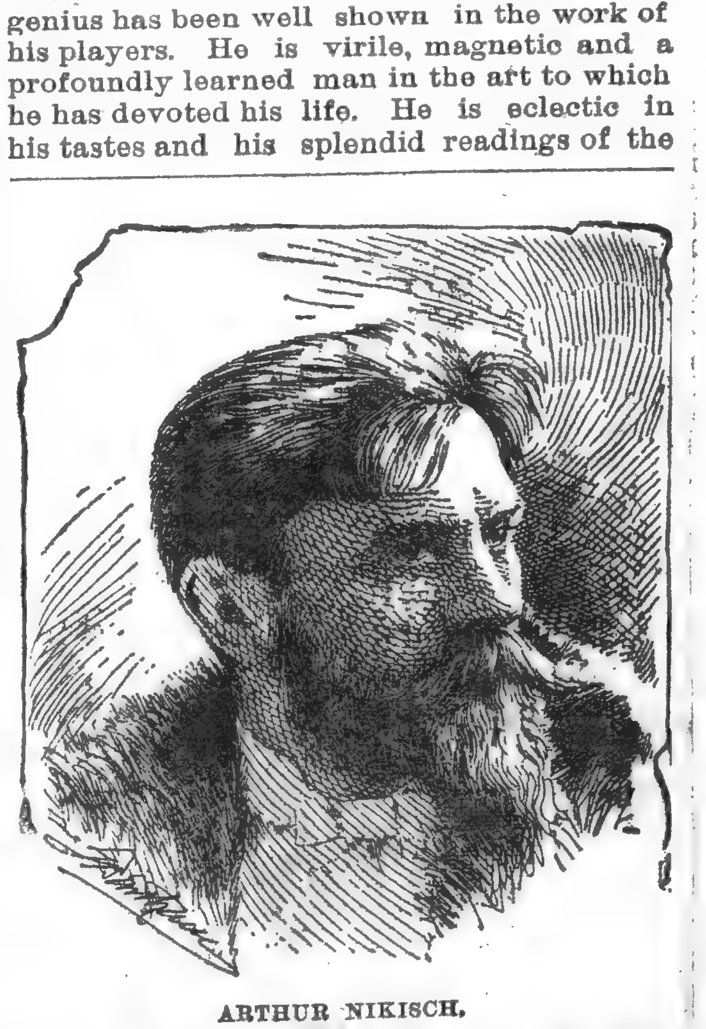
D'Albert gave a brilliant interpretation of the concerto, which he has played here before, and for an encore he played Rubinstein's staccato etude in the same almost incredible and heroic style as at his recent recitals.

The expressions of approval throughout the evening were of the heartiest and most demonstrative, and Conductor Nikisch was obliged to bow his acknowledgements time and again at the conclusion of each number.

EVENING POST, Chicago, Ill.

Date 5-5

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its concert next Saturday evening at Central Music Hall, is generally regarded as the most perfect orchestra of its kind in the world. Its director is Arthur Nikisch, whose genius has been well shown in the work of his players. He is virile, magnetic and a profoundly learned man in the art to which he has devoted his life. He is eclectic in his tastes and his splendid readings of the great masterpieces place him in the foremost rank of living conductors. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give only one concert here at this time. Eugene D'Albert will play the Chopin pianoforte concerto in E minor, Franz Kneibel will play the Paganini concerto for violin in D major. The orchestral numbers are Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala," Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Beltoz's "Pilgrim March" from the "Harold" symphony and Schumann's symphony in B flat.



ARTHUR NIKISCH.

INTER OCEAN. MAY 8

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Art is long, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears to have a position closer to its goal than any similar organization in this country. Eleven years of association have given its members the individual impulse, the unity of action, and the close sympathy only begotten by actual companionship in music. One of the finest audiences of the season welcomed this fine organization last evening at Central Music Hall, and applauded its performances to the echo. If the financial results were singularly gratifying to the management, the artistic appreciation that cheered the performers in this practical issue of reciprocity was even more so. Mr. Arthur Nikisch is the same graceful and spirited conductor as of yore, and has that singular power of sympathetic touch with his players that gains most gratifying results in harmony. His orchestra at present enlists seventy-five players, each having individual work, all joining to guard finesse in ensemble. It is not within the limitations of a brief and hurried review to describe the fine work of this organization. Owing to the unfortunate illness of Mr. Franz Kneisel, the violinist, there was one change in the regular programme. The Paganini concerto, in D minor, op. 6, was substituted by three numbers, Chopin's "Nocturne," Schubert's "Leament Musicale," and Klengel's "Capriccio," delightfully played by Alvin Schroeder, cellist; Director Nikisch furnishing the piano accompaniment.

The concert was charmingly opened with Gudmark's passionate and pompous overture "Sakuntala," a very dainty and delighful feature was Saint-Saens' weird and romantic symphonic poem, "Le Ronet d'Omphale," with the restless whirr of its spinning wheel, and the sighs of love-lorn Hercules. The third movement of Berlioz' "Pilgrims' March," from Harold in Italy, had a viola solo by Mr. Kneisel, who played in spite of the indisposition that disbarred him from the more trying ordeal of the Paganini selection. The concluding orchestral feature was Schumann's first symphony, in B flat, his best work from a technical standpoint. The orchestral work throughout the evening was as delightful as it was graceful and finished. Eugene D'Albert was the piano soloist, and appeared as the interpreter of Chopin's concerto in E minor. It is a composition that pianists regard as one of the noblest and most poetic of the repertoire. Its dazzling runs, beautiful melodies, sparkling passages of brauvara make it a magnetic masterpiece for testing the powers of the pianist. The solo part has the advantage of peculiar beauties, but the orchestral part has some exquisite effects, notably the employment of the French horns, the flutes and clarinets; while the effect of the muted string accompaniment in the romanza is one of the loveliest effects of Chopin. D'Albert was the master of the situation, in both the philosophy of the interpretation and the art of its technical requirements. The first movement was absolutely fearless, while the brilliancy of his octave work in the finale called forth the most enthusiastic expressions of approval. In response to encore he gave Rubinstein's staccato etudo in superb style.

It was a great night for music, and a distinct triumph for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and all associated with it.

THE COMMERCIAL GAZETTE.

Office—Fourth and Race Streets.

SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Its Concert in the Odeon—D'Albert and Nikisch.

A brilliant, discriminative and glowingly enthusiastic audience was that gathered in the Odeon last evening to do honor to the noble achievements of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the very climax of virtuosity and art overtopped by that modern giant of the pianistic world, Eugen D'Albert. All sorts and conditions of criticism have been indulged by the Eastern press anent the conductor of the Boston band; but after such a concert as last evening, and with the memories of a wide sweeping range of selections thronging in upon the mind, there is but one conclusion to be reached by the candid listener, be he musician, layman or critic. Great is the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Nikisch is its prophet, a very oracle of wisdom and of might.

It is not worth while to dwell upon studied analyses of the methods by which he reaches the goal of his ideal in the conduct of the band, and yet it would be interesting to follow these to their conclusion for the sake of the good that might accrue to the disciples of rule and line use of the baton. Never has there appeared here a man whose entire nature seemed so instinct with the very fire and passion of his theme, whose muscles leap from phrase to phrase, now tense, now lax with the music's ebb and flow. Not a throbbing chord but bears its impress in his mind, and the weight of its passing beauty dwells within his heart. The programme last night had to offer by way of prelude Liszt's third symphonic poem, Les Preludes, which formed an impressive beginning, so grand was its delivery, and this was followed by the last and greatest of the concerto series of Beethoven, that one that fitly bears the title "The Emperor," played by D'Albert, who was in a positively royal mood. His interpretation throughout was fraught with intensity and fire, and it was a positive triumph of clearness and intellectuality. He was recalled again and again, and returning playing the "Scherzo," from —was it Op. 31, No. 32?

Following this was heard the fragment from the jeweled crown of the immortal Schubert, then the "Pilgrim's March," from Berlioz's Symphony "Harold in Italy," with solo, by Mr. Kneisel, and next an innovation in the way of a "request" number, interpolated. Gracious it was, too, being the allegro and Gavotte by Bach, arranged with consummate art by Bachrich. What verve and rhythmic swing to the old dance movement! It left one positively weak from the listening; and lastly, the wonderfully diverse excerpt Hans Richter has drawn from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung." It is a question if Mr. Nikisch be not more thoroughly in sympathy with the music of Wagner than with the writing of any other one man. Its marvelous wealth of effect, its shifting, waving tide of contrast, its constant play of emotions, or, if you please, upon the emotions, the spreading harmonies that embrace all the resources of the modern orchestra, and ask for yet more, act upon him with a subtle and compelling force, and the result, as developed in the band before him, is inspiring, one might almost say sublime. Nothing could exceed the enthusiasm of the auditory, and the applause was certainly well bestowed.

Press. Pittsburg
May 5

The one hundred and seventy-eighth reception will occur at the Pittsburg club theater, on Monday evening, May 16, at 8 o'clock. Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel will be the society's guests on this occasion. Although Mr. Henschel enjoys world-wide fame as a composer, orchestral conductor and oratorio singer, and Mrs. Henschel has won like repute as a leading artist in musical events of the first magnitude, it is, nevertheless, undoubted that they appear at their very best in their song-recitals, where they sing in turn and together to Mr. Henschel's own pianoforte accompaniment. With the pleasant privilege of personally meeting Mr. and Mrs. Henschel added to a musical program of such peculiar charm, this reception promises to be in every way one of the most brilliant yet given by the society. In view of the limited capacity of the hall and the extraordinary demand for cards already being made known, the board of directors have adopted the following rules for this occasion: "Admission shall be had by no one, whether a member or not, except upon presentation at the door of one of the cards specially printed for this reception; the ordinary cards will not be received. Two of these special cards, each admitting only one person, will be furnished to each member applying to the secretary on or before Tuesday, May 10. After that date the remaining cards, if any, to the capacity of the hall will be distributed first to those members who have applied for one extra card, and then to those members who have applied for two extra cards, in the order in which such applications have been received by the secretary. No cards will be issued before May 10, by which time each member should notify the secretary just how many cards he wants—and can certainly use. If two extra cards are wanted, when failing both, one would answer, it will be well to say so distinctly. Every member applying on time can rely on two cards; there may be one extra card for each member wanting it, but it is not likely that there will be two extra cards for all wanting them." Charles W. Scovel is the secretary.

The leading musical event of the week will be the Mozart club concerts under the direction of Prof. J. P. McCollum, and the Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, at old city hall, on Thursday, Friday and Saturday evenings. The club has been rehearsing for these concerts ever since the "Messiah" concert in December, and the chorus never was in better form. Another rehearsal will be held to-morrow evening, and Prof. McCollum will then announce the time and date of the last rehearsal.

That the concerts will prove a success is already apparent. The sale of tickets has only been going on three days and already nearly 2,800 seats have been disposed of. Through some fault of the printers, the tickets did not arrive for the opening of the sale. They are now here, however, and associate members and others holding cards should call at once and have the cards exchanged for tickets. The box office is at Mellor & Hoene's music store, 77 Fifth avenue.

Times: Sunday,
May 8, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, gave its only concert in Chicago this season at Central Music hall last night. Last year it gave three concerts in the same place, the first of them May 7 also, and all of them were well attended, and it is not quite clear why Chicago is passed this year with but one concert. That one, however, drew a very large audience, probably the largest the orchestra has ever had in Chicago, and served again to emphasize the wonderfully poetic and superbly rounded finish of the orchestral interpretations. And in this word "finish" is meant to be included all the elements that go to make up the best possible orchestral interpretation, not only the technical but what may be called the inspirational. Mr. Nikisch exhibits often unexpected treatment of tempo and of shading, but in every case, as has heretofore been remarked, his peculiar treatment is in entire harmony with the spirit of the composition in hand, and goes to make clearer a symmatrical interpretation of a warmly appreciative conception of the composer's purpose. It may be said in passing that the precision, the delicacy, the bold, picturesque shading, and above all the wonderfully fine unity of feeling obvious in all the band's work were the more appreciated last night, because since the last visit of this band a year ago nothing so spiritually, as well as intellectually and technically fine in orchestral work has been offered to Chicago music-lovers.

The orchestral numbers last night were Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," the "Pilgrim's March" from Berlioz' symphony "Harold in Italy," and Schumann's symphony, No. 1, in B flat.

It only remains to speak of the playing of d'Albert in the Chopin concerto. From the virtuoso point of view it left nothing to be desired, and the closing passage in the rondo was a wonderful piece of pianism, but we cannot speak so warmly on the point of interpretation. The warmth of coloring of the orchestra found no fitting response in the piano forte, but aside from this it was full of enthusiasm if not high flights of imagination. He received a warm encore, and responded by playing Rubinstein's staccato etude.

Mr. Kneisel was unfortunately too ill to play the Paganini work, and Mr. Schroeder filled his place by playing some 'cello solos by Chopin and Schubert, accompanied by Mr. Nikisch.

[214]

CHICAGO TRIBUNE:
SUNDAY, MAY 8, 1892-

WINS CHICAGO PRAISE

A BIG AUDIENCE HEARS THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Central Music Hall Filled with Persons Who Applauded Mr. Nikisch and His Musicians in an Enthusiastic Way—Their Right to Be Called the First Orchestra of America Clearly Proved—Violinist Remenyi Warmly Received by the Union League Club.

If the young Boston women who hang on Mr. Arthur Nikisch's baton, metaphorically speaking, from the beginning of the "symphony" season in that city to its lamented end, could have been present at Central Music Hall last evening they would have been gratified at the reception Chicago accorded their petted orchestra. They might have felt, possibly, that the applause accorded Mr. Nikisch was far scanter than his deserts, but they would certainly have found comfort in the fact that the night was fair beyond what is ordinarily expected of Chicago nights in early spring, and that the audience was all that it should be.

Every seat in the hall was filled from the front row in the pit to the very farthest in the second balcony, and enthusiasts stood in the aisles and foyer during the entire program.

It was a representative audience, too, made up from all classes of Chicago society, including all the types with which the inveterate concert-goer is familiar—the inconsiderate man who promenades the foyer in squeaky patent-leather shoes, the inconsiderate woman who chatters without regard for orchestral shading, the elegant young person who carries an American Beauty rose, that other who clutches a paper-bag of bonbons, and, not least, the serious-minded folk who propose to listen to the music and who persevere in their determination grimly.

Each visit of Mr. Nikisch and his orchestra brings increase of admiration for them both and for their thoroughly artistic work. As a conductor Mr. Nikisch satisfies by the high musicianship and the scholarly qualities displayed in his readings, and delights the artistic as well as the esthetic senses of his hearers by the poetic and emotional power of his interpretations. The orchestra stands today the product of over a decade of severe discipline, rigid technical drill, and constant practice under gifted and thorough directors, and it is to his long and careful training that it in a large measure owes its position today as the first orchestra of America, and one whose equals in Europe are but few. The playing last evening proved conclusively the right of the organization to this position, and the results were in every respect such as the most exacting spirit could require from an orchestra of such worth. Technically flawless, the work of the men may be considered as beyond aught save the highest praise.

The interpretation accorded Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saëns "Rouet d'Omphale," the "Pilgrim's March" from Berlioz, "Harold in Italy," and Schumann's Symphony No. 1 was in each instance masterly. Belonging as they did to the romantic or the modern school of composition, these selections lent themselves with unusual grace to the impassioned, highly emotional style of Mr. Nikisch's interpreting, and their poetic and dramatic beauties stood revealed with superb power and seemed to gain increased splendor of coloring and tonal effects by his affectionate treatment. The Goldmark overture was given with rare appreciation of its marked oriental character, and the Saint-Saëns Symphonic Poem was almost ideal in the technical finish with which it was played and in the delicacy and the keen appreciation of its dramatic import which characterized its interpretation. Schumann's joyous Symphony received a performance, which, for perfection of execution and loveliness of reading, has rarely been equaled in this city. The box-holders at the concert were:

Mr. and Mrs. J. M. Clark, Mrs. J. J. Glessner, Mrs. A. N. Eddy, Mr. Beal, Mr. G. Hickes, Miss Getty, Mrs. W. B. Howard, and Mr. Crane.

TIMES, Chicago, Ill.

Date 5-8

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Nikisch conductor, gave its only concert in Chicago this season at Central Music hall last night. Last year it gave three concerts in the same place, the first of them May 7 also, and all of them were well attended, and it is not quite clear why Chicago is passed this year with but one concert. That one, however, drew a very large audience, probably the largest the orchestra has ever had in Chicago, and served again to emphasize the wonderfully poetic and superbly rounded finish of the orchestral interpretations. And in this word "finish" is meant to be included all the elements that go to make up the best possible orchestral interpretation, not only the technical but what may be called the inspirational. Mr. Nikisch exhibits often unexpected treatment of tempo and of shading, but in every case, as has heretofore been remarked, his peculiar treatment is in entire harmony with the spirit of the composition in hand, and goes to make clearer a symmatrical interpretation of a warmly appreciative conception of the composer's purpose. It may be said in passing that the precision, the delicacy, the bold, picturesque shading, and above all the wonderfully fine unity of feeling obvious in all the band's work were the more appreciated last night, because since the last visit of this band a year ago nothing so spiritually, as well as intellectually and technically fine in orchestral work has been offered to Chicago music-lovers.

The orchestral numbers last night were Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," the "Pilgrim's March" from Berlioz' symphony "Harold in Italy," and Schumann's symphony, No. 1, in B flat.

It only remains to speak of the playing of d'Albert in the Chopin concerto. From the virtuoso point of view it left nothing to be desired, and the closing passage in the rondo was a wonderful piece of pianism, but we cannot speak so warmly on the point of interpretation. The warmth of coloring of the orchestra found no fitting response in the piano forte, but aside from this it was full of enthusiasm if not high flights of imagination. He received a warm encore, and responded by playing Rubinstein's staccato etude.

Mr. Kneisel was unfortunately too ill to play the Paganini work, and Mr. Schroeder filled his place by playing some 'cello solos by Chopin and Schubert, accompanied by Mr. Nikisch.

HERALD,
CHICAGO, MAY 8,

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the leadership of Arthur Nikisch, gave a concert in Central music hall last evening, with Eugene d'Albert, Alwin Schroeder and Franz Kneisel as soloists. The hall was filled to overflowing with a brilliant audience, in which society and musical circles were equally well represented. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Concerto in E Minor, op. 11 Eugene D'Albert.	Chopin
Symphonic Poem, "The Rouet D'Omphale"	Saint-Saens
Violoncello Solos Alwin Schroeder.
Pilgrim's March from the "Harold in Italy," Symphony Viola Solo by Franz Kneisel.	Berlioz
Symphony No. 1, in B Flat	Schumann

To those who have listened to the symphony concerts in the Auditorium during the past season, the tone of the visiting orchestra may at times have seemed harsh and coarse. But they must not forget that the difference in size between the two halls is largely responsible for this, and, taken altogether, the smaller hall in many respects offers advantages which the larger one does not possess, by giving due prominence to many of the finer effects that are of necessity lost in the larger space and by permitting climacteric effects to exercise their full power, which they were never able to do in the Auditorium. The concert in many respects invites comparison between the eastern organization and our home orchestra, and it is pleasant to record that in several instances such comparison indubitably redounds to the benefit of the Chicago orchestra. Our reeds are vastly superior to those of the Boston orchestra, and our brass choir is certainly equally good. In the strings, however, Mr. Nikisch's organization is much better equipped; even in the smaller hall, which acts upon the tone like a microphone and in which their work is subjected to much closer auricular scrutiny, they proved their undeniable superiority, never exhibiting that lack of agreement in intonation or in precision that so frequently proved a disturbing element in the Chicago orchestra.

As a conductor Mr. Nikisch lacks the repose and self-poise that is such a noteworthy characteristic of Mr. Thomas. He is more demonstrative. His beat is very elastic, very suggestive and very indicative, yet it is firm, intelligent and intelligible, and he exercises complete control over his men. He secures pronounced effects and an intensity that at times almost border on exaggeration—chiefly by sudden transitions in dynamics and tempi where such suddenness seems uncalled for, and many, no doubt, took exception to such extravagances, especially in the Schumann symphony. With the exception of this symphony the programme offered nothing that had not been heard here during the winter, and so calls for little comment. The work of the orchestra throughout the evening was admirable, although it is doubtful whether it appeared to such excellent advantage in any other number as it did in the symphonic poem.

Mr. Kneisel had been announced to play Paganini's concert in D major, but was unable to do so on account of lack of strength resulting from recent illness, so that Mr. Schroeder, the principal 'cello of the orchestra, was substituted for him. He played transcriptions of Chopin's nocturne in E flat, Schubert's "Momens Musicale" and a piece by Kleugel, all of which served to display a beautiful tone, excellent technique and admirable taste. In the slight opportunities afforded by the viola obligato in Berlioz's symphony Mr. Kneisel developed an uncommonly rich and warm tone.

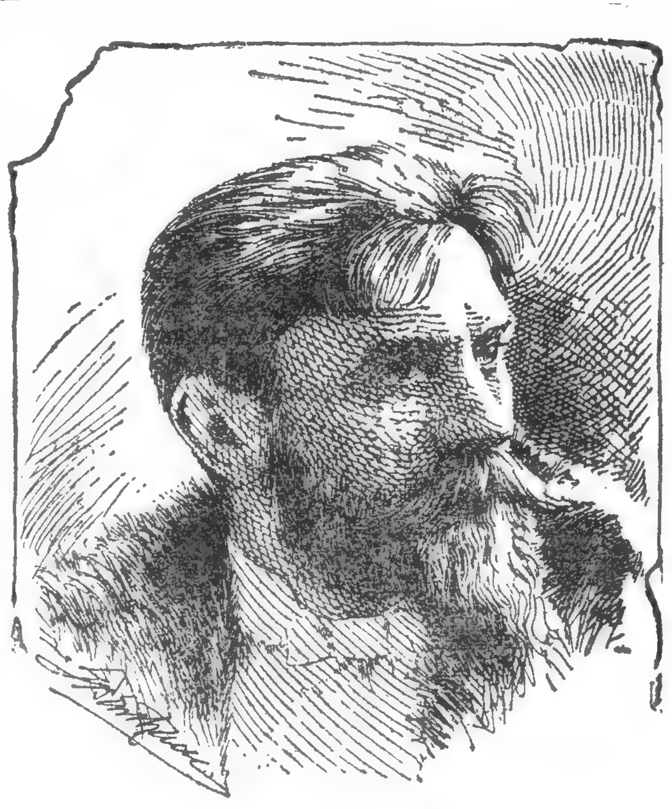
D'Albert gave a brilliant interpretation of the concerto, which he has played here before, and for an encore he played Rubinstein's staccato etude in the same almost incredible and heroic style as at his recent recitals.

The expressions of approval throughout the evening were of the heartiest and most demonstrative, and Conductor Nikisch was obliged to bow his acknowledgements time and again at the conclusion of each number.

EVENING POST, Chicago, Ill.

Date 5-5

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, which gives its concert next Saturday evening at Central Music Hall, is generally regarded as the most perfect orchestra of its kind in the world. Its director is Arthur Nikisch, whose genius has been well shown in the work of his players. He is virile, magnetic and a profoundly learned man in the art to which he has devoted his life. He is eclectic in his tastes and his splendid readings of the great masterpieces place him in the foremost rank of living conductors. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give only one concert here at this time. Eugene D'Albert will play the Chopin pianoforte concerto in E minor, Franz Kneibel will play the Paganini concerto for violin in D major. The orchestral numbers are Goldmark's overture "Sakuntala," Saint-Saens' symphonic poem "Le Rouet d'Omphale," Belioz's "Pilgrim March" from the "Harold" symphony and Schumann's symphony in B flat.



ARTHUR NIKISCH.

INTER OCEAN. MAY 8

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Art is long, but the Boston Symphony Orchestra appears to have a position closer to its goal than any similar organization in this country. Eleven years of association have given its members the individual impulse, the unity of action, and the close sympathy only begotten by actual companionship in music. One of the finest audiences of the season welcomed this fine organization last evening at Central Music Hall, and applauded its performances to the echo. If the financial results were singularly gratifying to the management, the artistic appreciation that cheered the performers in this practical issue of reciprocity was even more so. Mr. Arthur Nikisch is the same graceful and spirited conductor as of yore, and has that singular power of sympathetic touch with his players that gains most gratifying results in harmony. His orchestra at present enlists seventy-five players, each having individual work, all joining to guard finesse in ensemble. It is not within the limitations of a brief and hurried review to describe the fine work of this organization. Owing to the unfortunate illness of Mr. Franz Kneisel, the violinist, there was one change in the regular programme. The Paganini concerto, in D minor, op. 6, was substituted by three numbers, Chopin's "Nocturne," Schubert's "Leament Musicale," and Klengel's "Capriccio," delightfully played by Alvin Schroeder, cellist; Director Nikisch furnishing the piano accompaniment.

The concert was charmingly opened with Gudmark's passionate and pompous overture "Sakuntala," a very dainty and delighful feature was Saint-Saens' weird and romantic symphonic poem, "Le Ronet d'Omphale," with the restless whirr of its spinning wheel, and the sighs of love-lorn Hercules. The third movement of Berlioz' "Pilgrims' March," from Harold in Italy, had a viola solo by Mr. Kneisel, who played in spite of the indisposition that disbarred him from the more trying ordeal of the Paganini selection. The concluding orchestral feature was Schumann's first symphony, in B flat, his best work from a technical standpoint. The orchestral work throughout the evening was as delightful as it was graceful and finished. Eugene D'Albert was the piano soloist, and appeared as the interpreter of Chopin's concerto in E minor. It is a composition that pianists regard as one of the noblest and most poetic of the repertoire. Its dazzling runs, beautiful melodies, sparkling passages of brauvara make it a magnetic masterpiece for testing the powers of the pianist. The solo part has the advantage of peculiar beauties, but the orchestral part has some exquisite effects, notably the employment of the French horns, the flutes and clarinets; while the effect of the muted string accompaniment in the romanza is one of the loveliest effects of Chopin. D'Albert was the master of the situation, in both the philosophy of the interpretation and the art of its technical requirements. The first movement was absolutely fearless, while the brilliancy of his octave work in the finale called forth the most enthusiastic expressions of approval. In response to encore he gave Rubinstein's staccato etudo in superb style.

It was a great night for music, and a distinct triumph for the Boston Symphony Orchestra and all associated with it.

THE COMMERCIAL GAZETTE.

Office—Fourth and Race Streets.

SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Its Concert in the Odeon—D'Albert and Nikisch.

A brilliant, discriminative and glowingly enthusiastic audience was that gathered in the Odeon last evening to do honor to the noble achievements of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the very climax of virtuosity and art overtopped by that modern giant of the pianistic world, Eugen D'Albert. All sorts and conditions of criticism have been indulged by the Eastern press anent the conductor of the Boston band; but after such a concert as last evening, and with the memories of a wide sweeping range of selections thronging in upon the mind, there is but one conclusion to be reached by the candid listener, be he musician, layman or critic. Great is the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Nikisch is its prophet, a very oracle of wisdom and of might.

It is not worth while to dwell upon studied analyses of the methods by which he reaches the goal of his ideal in the conduct of the band, and yet it would be interesting to follow these to their conclusion for the sake of the good that might accrue to the disciples of rule and line use of the baton. Never has there appeared here a man whose entire nature seemed so instinct with the very fire and passion of his theme, whose muscles leap from phrase to phrase, now tense, now lax with the music's ebb and flow. Not a throbbing chord but bears its impress in his mind, and the weight of its passing beauty dwells within his heart. The programme last night had to offer by way of prelude Liszt's third symphonic poem, Les Preludes, which formed an impressive beginning, so grand was its delivery, and this was followed by the last and greatest of the concerto series of Beethoven, that one that fitly bears the title "The Emperor," played by D'Albert, who was in a positively royal mood. His interpretation throughout was fraught with intensity and fire, and it was a positive triumph of clearness and intellectuality. He was recalled again and again, and returning playing the "Scherzo," from—was it Op. 31, No. 3?

Following this was heard the fragment from the jeweled crown of the immortal Schubert, then the "Pilgrim's March," from Berlioz's Symphony "Harold in Italy," with solo, by Mr. Kneisel, and next an innovation in the way of a "request" number, interpolated. Gracious it was, too, being the allegro and Gavotte by Bach, arranged with consummate art by Bachrich. What verve and rhythmic swing to the old dance movement! It left one positively weak from the listening; and lastly, the wonderfully diverse excerpt Hans Richter has drawn from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung." It is a question if Mr. Nikisch be not more thoroughly in sympathy with the music of Wagner than with the writing of any other one man. Its marvelous wealth of effect, its shifting, waving tide of contrast, its constant play of emotions, or, if you please, upon the emotions, the spreading harmonies that embrace all the resources of the modern orchestra, and ask for yet more, act upon him with a subtle and compelling force, and the result, as developed in the band before him, is inspiring, one might almost say sublime. Nothing could exceed the enthusiasm of the auditory, and the applause was certainly well bestowed.

Tägliches Cincinnatier Volksblatt

Briefe an das „Volksblatt" ſind zu adreſſiren:
„CINCINNATI VOLKSBLATT", Box 226, Cincinnati, Ohio.

HAUPT-OFFICE:
No. 269 Vine Strasse, Cincinnati, Ohio.
GESCHAEFTS-DEPARTEMENT......Telephon No. 960
REDAKTION.......................Telephon No. 1018

ZWEIG-OFFICES:
COVINGTON, KY., 406 Scott St., Telephon No. 4072
NEWPORT, KY., 4. & York St., Telephon No. 4173

Samſtag, den 7. Mai 1892.

Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter und Kneiſel-Quartett im Odeon.

Mit dem geſtrigen Tage wurde die Saiſon der Odeonkonzerte unter den Auſpizien des College of Muſic in der erfolgreichſten Weiſe zum Abſchluß gebracht. Es war ein weiſer Gedanke der Unternehmer, das Beſte bis zuletzt aufzuſparen, denn je größer der Genuß war, der in dem letzten Konzert geboten wurde, deſto ſchöner und nachhaltiger iſt die Erinnerung daran, deſto reger das Bedürfniß nach ebenſo Gutem in der nächſten Saiſon. Man muß der Leitung des College of Muſic die vollſte Anerkennung für ihr Beſtreben zollen, dem hieſigen Publikum das Beſte in muſikaliſcher Hinſicht zu bieten, das überhaupt in dieſem Lande aufzutreiben iſt. Die Serie der diesjährigen Subſkriptionskonzerte brachte mit wenigen Ausnahmen nur Gutes, in vielen Fällen ſogar Ausgezeichnetes und die Muſikfreunde Cincinnati's haben dem College of Muſic und deſſen Leitern viel, ſehr viel zu danken. Einen glänzenderen Abſchluß hätte die Konzertſerie in der That nicht finden können. — Nachmittags das Kneiſel-Quartett, am Abend das Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter.

Das Kneiſel-Quartett, unſtreitig das vortrefflichſte ſeiner Art in den Ver. Staaten, beſteht aus den Herren Franz Kneiſel (1. Violine), Otto Roth (2. Violine), L. Svecenski (Viola) und Alwin Schröder (Cello). Jeder Einzelne der Genannten iſt ein tüchtiger Künſtler auf ſeinem Inſtrumente und im Enſembleſpiel gründlich geſchult. Dieſes Quartett bildet einen Theil des Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſters, giebt aber auch für ſich Kammermuſik-Konzerte, welche bereits hohe Berühmtheit erlangt haben. Die Leiſtungen des Quartetts ſind geradezu wunderbar in ihrer künſtleriſchen Vollendung und erheben ſich gewaltig über das Niveau gewöhnlicher, handwerksmäßiger Quartettmuſik. Wie ſchon bemerkt, iſt jeder der Spieler ein Künſtler im vollen Sinne des Wortes. Keiner von ihnen würde es über das Herz bringen, ſich auch nur die geringſte Freiheit in der Durchführung ſeines Parts zu erlauben, um ſeine eigene Virtuoſität in den Vordergrund zu drängen. Durchaus zeigt ſich die beſcheidenſte Unterordnung der Einzelnen unter das Ganze, das liebevollſte Eingehen auf die Intentionen des Komponiſten und eine Sorgfalt und Gewiſſenhaftigkeit in der Ausarbeitung, welche eine meiſterhafte Beherrſchung des Inſtrumentes als Vorbedingung vorausſetzt. Die Sicherheit der Einſätze, die mathematiſche Genauigkeit in der Beobachtung der Tempi, mit einem Wort die Exaktheit des Enſembleſpiels grenzt an's Wunderbare, doch trotzdem macht das Zuſammenſpiel keineswegs den Eindruck des Maſchinenhaften. Wo dies die Kompoſition erfordert, geht die Individualität der Einzelnen in dem Enſemble vollſtändig auf, doch tritt dieſelbe klar und plaſtiſch hervor, wo die Gelegenheit dies zuläſſig macht. Es wäre zwecklos, eine eingehende Kritik der verſchiedenen Nummern, welche zum Vortrag kamen, verſuchen zu wollen; vor ſolchen Leiſtungen verſtummt die Kritik. Wir wüßten in der That nicht, woher wir den Maßſtab für eine Kritik des Haydn'ſchen D-Dur Quartetts, wie es geſtern Nachmittag geſpielt wurde, nehmen ſollen. Die liebliche Kompoſition wurde in ſo formvollendeter Weiſe wiedergegeben, daß man nur ſtaunen und bewundern konnte. Das herrliche Adagio, das zierliche, neckiſche Menuett und das ſtürmiſche Allegro Vivace, in welchem beſonders die erſte Violine ſo Wunderbares leiſtete—welche Anmuth und Leichtigkeit im Vortrag, welche feine Nuancirung in den Ton- und Tempoſchattirungen!

Ungemein wirkungsvoll erwies ſich das all' sordino geſpielte Andante aus dem D Dur Quartett von Tſchaikowski, einer Kompoſition von ganz eigenartiger, wir möchten faſt ſagen myſteriöſen, düſteren Schönheit. Die dritte Nummer auf dem Programm bildete das A-Dur Quartett, Op. 91, No. 3, von Schumann, eine Perle unter den Werken dieſes großen Komponiſten. Dieſes Quartett iſt mathematiſch ungemein ſchwierig und ſtellt an die Exaktheit der Spielenden die höchſten Anforderungen. Für Künſtler wie Kneiſel, Roth, Svecenski und Schröder gibt es aber keine techniſchen und mathematiſchen Schwierigkeiten und es bleibt ihnen daher Zeit genug, ihr Hauptaugenmerk auf die künſtleriſche Auffaſſung des Werkes zu richten. Wie lange wird es wohl dauern, bis auch Cincinnati ein ſolches Quartett wird aufweiſen können, oder wird es überhaupt je dazu kommen?

Ehe wir weitergehen, wollen wir noch ganz energiſch einen Uebelſtand rügen, deſſen Vermeidung in der Zukunft ſich die Geſchäftsleitung des College of Muſic zur Pflicht machen ſollte. Es iſt entſchieden unrecht, Ruheſtörungen durch feſtes Auftreten auf die Steinfließen des Korridors, welche ſonderbarer Weiſe nicht mit einem ſchalldämpfenden Teppich bedeckt ſind, lautes Sprechen, Zuſchlagen von Thüren etc. zu dulden, während im Odeon Hunderte von Menſchen mit Spannung und Intereſſe der herrlichſten Muſik lauſchen. Der Genuß des geſtrigen Nachmittags-Konzertes wurde den Zuhörern durch zahlreiche ſolcher Störungen bedeutend beeinträchtigt. Auch wäre es dringend erwünſcht, wenn Niemandem der Zutritt in den Konzertſaal geſtattet würde, ſo lange geſpielt oder geſungen wird, denn dies iſt für die Zuhörer immer mit unangenehmen Störungen verbunden. Wenn dieſe Regel ſtrenge gehandhabt würde, würden die Leute in Zukunft nach Kräften das Zuſpätkommen zu vermeiden ſuchen.

Das Abendkonzert.

Das Odeon war geſtern Abend anläßlich des Konzertes des Boſton Symphonieorcheſters bis auf den letzten Platz gefüllt und einige Dutzend Zuhörer mußten ſich ſogar mit Stehplätzen begnügen. Wer dachte übrigens trotz Stehens und der gewaltigen Hitze im Saal an Bequemlichkeit, wo es ſolche Muſik zu hören gab!

Die ſuperklugen Herrn Kritiker in Boſton, welche aus Gründen perſönlicher Art während dieſer Saiſon Herrn Nikiſch ſo viel am Zeuge zu flicken ſuchten, mögen ſagen, was ſie wollen — es gibt doch nur ein Boſton Symphonie Orcheſter in dieſem Lande, nur ein Orcheſter, welches die höchſte Stufe der künſtleriſchen Vollendung repräſentirt. Herr Arthur Nikiſch mag als Menſch ſeine Eigenheiten haben, reizbar und ſchwer umgänglich ſein und vielleicht die Eitelkeit mancher jener Herren Kritiker dadurch verletzt haben, als Dirigent ſteht er jedoch, wenigſtens in dieſem Lande unübertroffen da.

Was wir von dem Kneiſel-Quartett geſagt, gilt in gleicher Weiſe von dem Symphonieorcheſter; auch deſſen Leiſtungen gegenüber ſchweigt die Kritik. Wer hat wohl Liszt's ſymphoniſches Gedicht „Les Preludes" ſchon beſſer ſpielen gehört, als es geſtern Abend vom Boſton Symphonieorcheſter geſpielt wurde? Die Violinen leiſteten in der großartigen Sturmſcene geradezu Wunderbares. Wie Sturmesbrauſen ſtieg das Creſcendo der Violinen an und dumpfer Paukenſchlag tönte wie ferner Donner in das Toſen hinein. Die Kompoſition iſt in Bezug auf Tonmalerei von ſeltener Schönheit, doch nur bei ſo meiſterhaftem Vortrag kömmt dieſelbe zur vollen Geltung. Von großartiger Wirkung war Beethoven's Konzert No. 5 (das ſogenannte Kaiſer-Konzert) für Piano mit Orcheſterbegleitung. Dieſes Konzert, das bedeutendſte ſeiner Art, welches Beethoven oder irgend ein anderer Komponiſt geſchrieben, iſt ungemein ſchwierig und wird aus dieſem Grunde ziemlich ſelten zur Aufführung gebracht. Es erfordert einen Meiſter auf dem Klavier, ein vorzügliches Orcheſter und—last but not least—einen ebenſo guten Dirigenten. Hier waren alle Bedingungen erfüllt; Herr Eugen D'Albert ſpielte die Pianopartie, wie ſie außer ihm wohl Wenige zu ſpielen im Stande ſein würden. Spielend überwand er die gewaltigen techniſchen Schwierigkeiten der Kompoſition und die Kraft, welche er entwickelte, war wirklich erſtaunlich. Bewundernswerth waren ſeine Creſcendi und Decreſcendi, ſeine rapiden Läufe und Oktavengriffe, welche ſeine Meiſterſchaft in der Technik im glänzendſten Lichte zeigten. Das Orcheſter ſpielte die ſchwierigen Einſätze mit unfehlbarer Sicherheit und hielt ſich mit großer Diskretion zurück, um das Piano nicht zu übertäuben.

Eine herrliche Leiſtung waren die beiden Sätze der unvollendeten H-Moll Symphonie von Schubert, welche allein ſchon genügt hätte, um ihren Komponiſten unſterblich zu machen. Hierauf folgte der „Pilgermarſch" aus der Symphonie „Harold in Italien" von Berlioz, eine ungemein zarte Schöpfung von bedeutender Originalität. Herr Franz Kneiſel ſpielte das Viola Solo in dieſer Nummer und erntete damit ſtürmiſchen Beifall.

Zunächſt wurde auf vielſeitigen Wunſch eine Extranummer eingelegt, das Adagio und die Gavotte aus einer Suite von Bach, für Orcheſter arrangirt. Die Durchführung war eine muſtergiltige und das Publikum war beſonders von der Gavotte vollſtändig enthuſiasmirt.

Den Schluß bildeten „Siegfried's Gang zu Brunhilden's Felſen", „Morgengrauen" und „Rheinfahrt" aus Wagner's „Siegfried" und „Götterdämmerung", nach dem Arrangement von Hans Richter.

Dieſe Nummer war eine der köſtlichſten Leiſtungen des Abends und würde wohl mehr Beifall gefunden haben, wenn ſie nicht unglücklicher Weiſe den Schluß des Programms gebildet hätte. Doch, dies läßt ſich einmal nicht ändern — eine Nummer muß die letzte ſein.

Wir wollen hoffen, daß es nicht das letzte Mal in dieſem Jahre war, daß den Muſikfreunden von Cincinnati Gelegenheit geboten wurde, das Boſton Symphonie-Orcheſter, incluſive Kneiſel-Quartett, zu hören.

THE COMMERCIAL GAZETTE.
PUI CINCINNATI. ORNING
SATURDAY, MAY 7, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Its Concert in the Odeon—D'Albert and Nikisch.

A brilliant, discriminative and glowingly enthusiastic audience was that gathered in the Odeon last evening to do honor to the noble achievements of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the very climax of virtuosity and art overtopped by that modern giant of the pianistic world, Eugen D'Albert. All sorts and conditions of criticism have been indulged by the Eastern press anent the conductor of the Boston band; but after such a concert as last evening, and with the memories of a wide sweeping range of selections thronging in upon the mind, there is but one conclusion to be reached by the candid listener, be he musician, layman or critic. Great is the Boston Symphony Orchestra and Nikisch is its prophet, a very oracle of wisdom and of might.

It is not worth while to dwell upon studied analyses of the methods by which he reaches the goal of his ideal in the conduct of the band, and yet it would be interesting to follow these to their conclusion for the sake of the good that might accrue to the disciples of rule and line use of the baton. Never has there appeared here a man whose entire nature seemed so instinct with the very fire and passion of his theme, whose muscles leap from phrase to phrase, now tense, now lax with the music's ebb and flow. Not a throbbing chord but bears its impress in his mind, and the weight of its passing beauty dwells within his heart. The programme last night had to offer by way of prelude Liszt's third symphonic poem, Les Preludes, which formed an impressive beginning, so grand was its delivery, and this was followed by the last and greatest of the concerto series of Beethoven, that one that fitly bears the title "The Emperor," played by D'Albert, who was in a positively royal mood. His interpretation throughout was fraught with intensity and fire, and it was a positive triumph of clearness and intellectuality. He was recalled again and again, and returning playing the "Scherzo," from—was it Op. 31, No. 3?

Following this was heard the fragment from the jeweled crown of the immortal Schubert, then the "Pilgrim's March," from Berlioz's Symphony "Harold in Italy," with solo, by Mr. Kneisel, and next an innovation in the way of a "request" number, interpolated. Gracious it was, too, being the allegro and Gavotte by Bach, arranged with consummate art by Bachrich. What verve and rhythmic swing to the old dance movement! It left one positively weak from the listening; and lastly, the wonderfully diverse excerpt Hans Richter has drawn from "Siegfried" and "Die Gotterdammerung." It is a question if Mr. Nikisch be not more thoroughly in sympathy with the music of Wagner than with the writing of any other one man. Its marvelous wealth of effect, its shifting, waving tide of contrast, its constant play of emotions, or, if you please, upon the emotions, the spreading harmonies that embrace all the resources of the modern orchestra, and ask for yet more, act upon him with a subtle and compelling force, and the result, as developed in the band before him, is inspiring, one might almost say sublime. Nothing could exceed the enthusiasm of the auditory, and the applause was certainly well bestowed.

THE COMMERCIAL
GAZETTE. CINCINNATI
SATURDAY, MAY 7,

THE KNEISEL QUARTET.

A Model Chamber Concert—Excursions to the May Festival.

It was an exceptional bit of enterprise that was manifested by the College of Music in engaging the famous Kneisel String Quartet for an afternoon concert yesterday, by way of prelude to the larger effort of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night. Inasmuch as by the visit of the last the appearance of the former was made possible, the debt of obligation to the Boston aggregation and the management is proportionately increased.

As the writer attended upon the work of the superb organization of which Mr. Kneisel is the artistic head and front, the thought would intrude that an ensemble of equal excellence should be located here under the protecting shadow of the institution that Mr. Springer so handsomely endowed; but the fruition seems far to seek. The audience in attendance upon the efforts of the Eastern combination was musical in the extreme, and of handsome dimensions. The quartette comprises Messrs. Franz Kneisel, Otto Roth, L. Svecenski and Alwin Schroeder, and they had to offer Haydn's Quartet in D major; the Andante from Tschaikowsky's Quartet in D major, and Schumann's most interesting and comprehensive quartet in A major, Op. 91, No. 3. The playing of the four men was one constant source of pleasure, gratifying to the musical sense, and so reverently indulged that it was at once a model and an example of the possibilities underlying conscientious study and continued effort. The leader, who is the concertmeister of the orchestra, is an artist of rare proportions; but in this special line of work, so skillful was the merging of individualities, the quartet must be taken as one. Rarely, indeed, is the quaint positiveness of Haydn protrayed with such nicety and captivating naivete, nor can less be said of the finely poised writing of the Russian, as expressed in the slow movement from his quartet. A broader field was opened up in the Schumann number, which was amply filled, throughout, being reflected the same masterly grasp of intentions, the same nicety of tonal balance, an equal delicacy and refinement in phrasing and harmonic color. The concert was delightful and memorable.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Academy Concert Hall, - Baltimore,

Thursday Evening, April 28, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

6

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets now on sale at Albert's ticket office, 13 North Charles Street.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Madison Square Garden Concert Hall, - New York,

Monday Evening, May 2, at 8.15.

EUGEN D'ALBERT

AND THE

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Star Theatre, - - Buffalo,

Tuesday Evening, May 3, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets now ready at the Box Office, Star Theatre.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall, - - Cleveland.

STAR COURSE.

Wednesday Evening, May 4, 1892.

UNDER THE MANAGEMENT OF Mr. N. COE STEWART.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Grand Opera House, - Columbus.

UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE ORPHEUS CLUB,

Thursday Evening, May 5, 1892, at Eight o'clock.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

The Odeon, - - Cincinnati,

Friday Evening, May 6, 1892, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Central Music Hall, - Chicago,

Saturday Evening, May 7, at 8.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

[217]

Tickets now ready at the Box Office, Central Music Hall.

Hartman Hall, - Grand Rapids,

Monday Evening, May 9, at 8.

FIRST APPEARANCE OF THE

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

University Hall, Ann Arbor, Mich.

Tuesday Evening, May 10, 1892.

UNIVERSITY MUSICAL SOCIETY.

FRANCIS W. KELSEY, Ph.D., President. ALBERT A. STANLEY, A.M., Director.

1891.—CHORAL UNION SERIES.—1892.

THIRD SEASON. FIFTH CONCERT. FULL SERIES, XVII.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

The next Concert in this Series will be given May 27.

"THE DAMNATION OF FAUST."—BERLIOZ.

Choral Union, 266 Voices. Full Orchestra. Mrs. Genevra Johnstone-Bishop, Mr. Chas. A. Knorr, and Mr. Heinrich Meyn, Soloists.

Lyceum Theatre, - - Detroit,

Wednesday Evening, May 11.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SEASON 1891-92
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

Tickets, with Analytical Programmes, on sale at Chas. Bobzin & Co.'s Music Store on and after Monday, May 2.

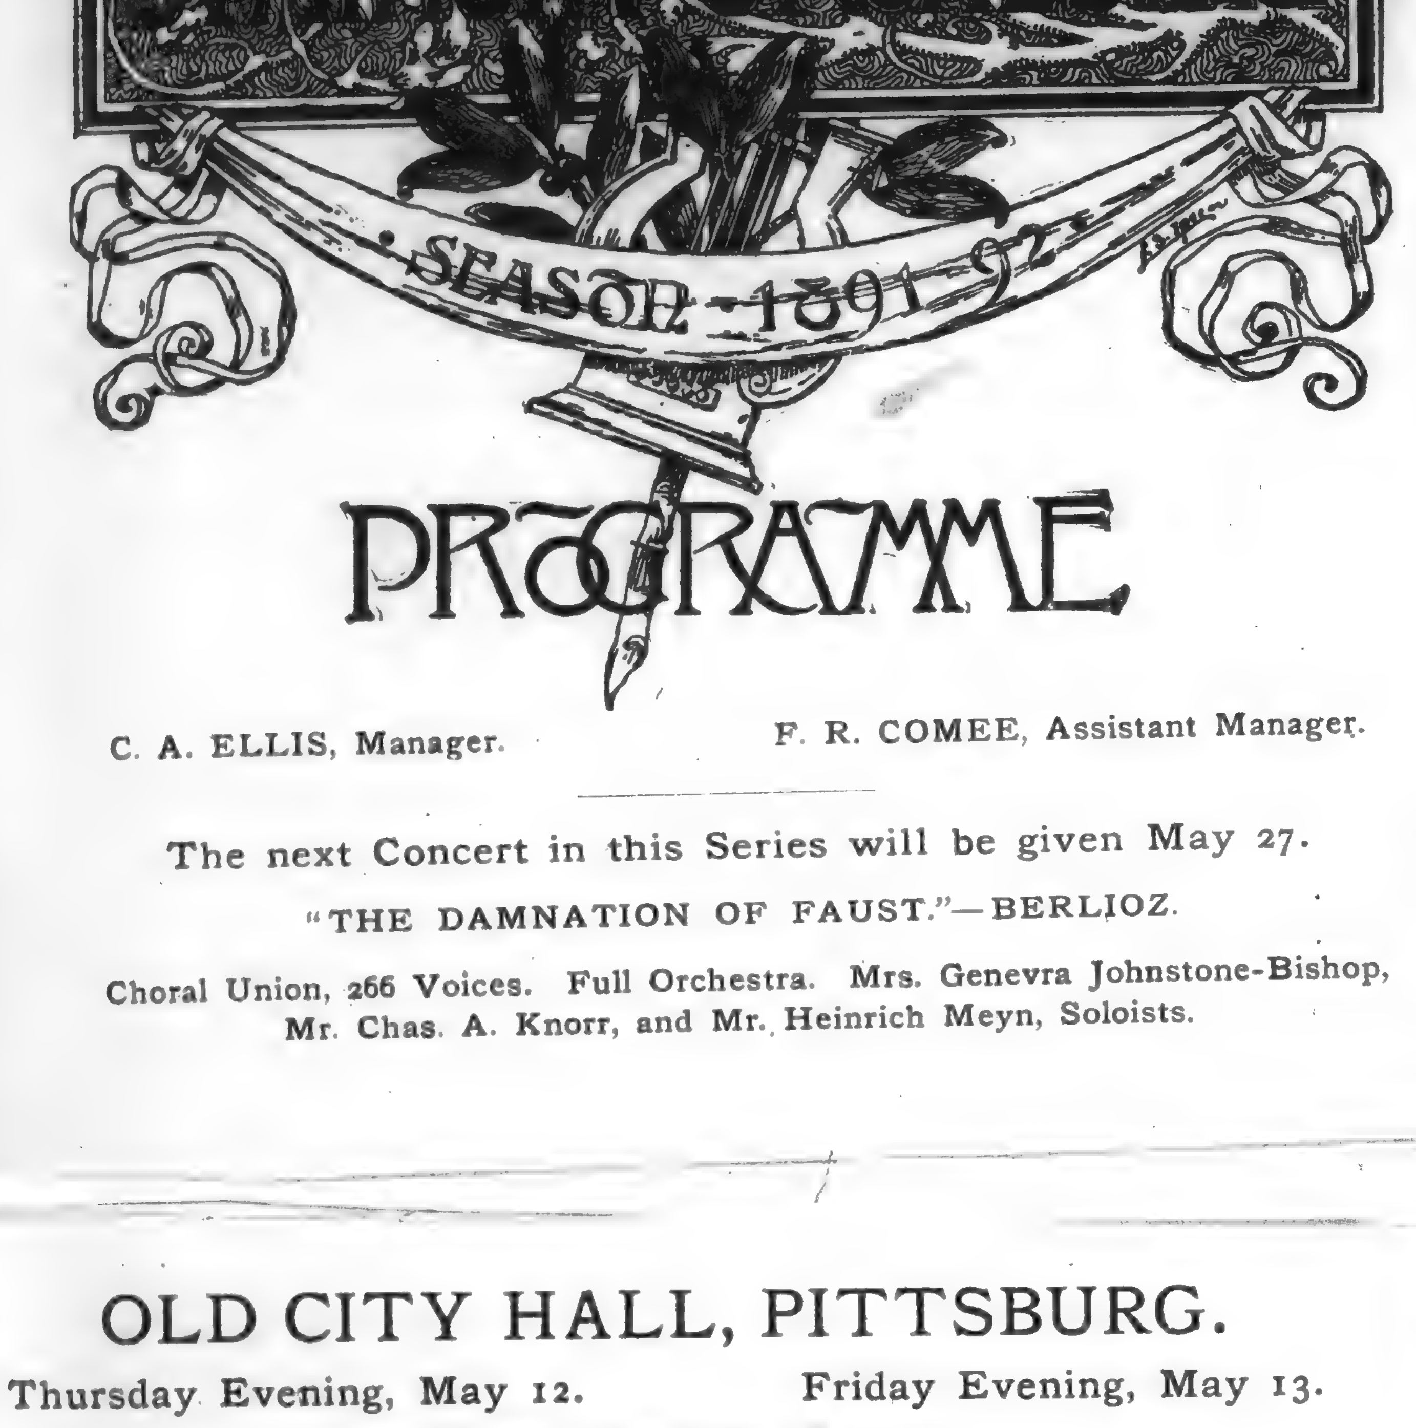
OLD CITY HALL, PITTSBURG.

Thursday Evening, May 12. Friday Evening, May 13.
Saturday Evening, May 14.

SIXTH TOUR.

THREE GRAND CONCERTS BY THE MOZART CLUB.

Mr. JAMES P. McCOLLUM, Director.
AND THE



Mr. ARTHUR NIKISCH, Conductor.

SOLOISTS:

Mrs. GEORG HENSCHEL. Mr. EUGEN D'ALBERT.
Miss ADELAIDE FORESMAN. Mr. GEORG HENSCHEL.
Mr. PAUL ZIMMERMAN. Mr. GARDNER LAMSON.
Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER. Mr E. H. DERMITT.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

EAGLE, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date 9-8-

Tomorrow night the greatest musical event that Grand Rapids ever enjoyed will take place in Hartman hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra never appeared in this city, but their reputation has preceded, and everybody now knows what the organization is and what its status. Organized eleven years ago, it has through the high endeavors of its conductors, the ability of its members, and the liberality of its patron, Col. Higginson of Boston, attained such a degree of excellence that it has certainly no rival in America and no superiors in the world. Since Arthur Nikisch assumed directorship it has risen to the zenith of its powers, and now holds undisputed sway as the leading exponent of orchestra music on this continent. After what was written by Mr. Post in Wednesday's EAGLE nothing need be said of D'Albert biographically. Enough to mention that his tour this year has been a succession of triumphs. Much comment has been made during the past week upon the method of securing seats, etc. It is but justice to those who engaged the orchestra, Messrs. Hartman, Campbell, Davis and Morehead, to say that they did everything they could to accommodate the subscribers and the public at large. If any fault is found with them it should rather be for their too great zeal to please everybody, than for any intention to do wrong to the people of Grand Rapids. A very large advance sale of seats has been made during the week, but there are still some very desirable seats. For the accommodation of ladies, the lecture room of the hall will be transformed into a cloak room on Monday night. It is the intention of society people to make this a social event as well as a musical feast, and their thoughtfulness will be appreciated. The concert will last two hours, so that carriages may be ordered for 10 o'clock. The following is the programme:

Schumann.............Symphony No. 1 in B-flat
Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace.
Larghetto.
Scherzo.
Allegro animato e grazioso.
Liszt..........Concerto for Pianoforte in E flat
Wagner.................Prelude, "Lohengrin,"
Wagner. "Siegfried's Passage to Bruennhilde's Rock, Morning Dawn, and Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried" and Die Goetterdaemmerung." (Arranged by Hans Richter.),
Weber.....................Overture, "Oberon"
Soloist, Mr. Eugen D'Albert.

On account of the Boston Symphony orchestra concert on Monday night the Oratorio society will have their weekly rehearsal on Wednesday night in Chapel hall.

POST, Columbus, O.

Date 5-6

ORPHEUS' ADIEU.

The Season Course Closed Last Evening With a Concert of Rare Merit.

The fourth and last concert of the Orpheus club for the season of 1891-92 at the Grand last night drew as fine an audience as has assembled in this city in many a day, and was a musical event of great merit.

The Boston Symphony orchestra of eighty pieces completely filled the opera house stage, and that the musical people present enjoyed to the extreme limit the work of the finest orchestra in America goes without saying. The first orchestral number was an exquisite rendition of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." Their second was "Le Rouet d'Omphale" by Saint Saens, and "Last Movement from Suite. Op. 55," Tschaisowsky, and tee last Weber's beautiful overture, "Oberon." D'Albert the pianist took the house by storm.

His first piece was Liszt's concerto in E flat. D'Albert is a morvel of skill.

Mr. T. Adamowski, a violinist played a rondo capriccio solo by Saint Saens. The Orpheus club only sang one piece, but one of their prettiest selections of the season.

STATE JOURNAL, Columbus, O.

Date 5/8

The Boston Symphony orchestra is the finest orchestra in the world. D'Albert is considered the greatest living pianist. This is the best Metronome can do. Words of praise are pigmies when used in speaking of the two, especially when the supply has been exhausted in praising amateurs in this city.

THE MORNING PRESS.

2d TUESDAY, MAY 10, 1892 Kal.

MICH.,

The Boston Symphony orchestra entertainment at Hartman's hall last night drew out an enormous crowd, many of those present coming from neighboring towns, Holland alone sending a delegation of 50. The performers were nearly all Germans—they numbered 70—and as interpreters of classical music are no doubt unexcelled. The lovers of classical music in the hall last night were, however, in the minority, as shown by the fact that some of the grandest numbers were received rather indifferently. To the uneducated, the grandest strains frequently resembled the wild shriek of a March wind sweeping over a barren plain, and the peformers appeared to be engaged in a go-as-you-please fiddling match, the one scoring the greatest number of notes to be entitled to a new string. Arthur Nikisch the conductor, is not a bad looking fellow and certainly understands his business although the musicians are so perfectly trained that they need to pay no attention whatever to the waving of his baton. The feature of the evening was the pianoforte solos by Eugene D'Albert. He is without doubt a master at the business. His movements are as rapid as the wings of a humming bird and his touch, as light as a falling leaf, and he can put in force with effect where required. He is clearly the star of the organization and before a Grand Rapids audience is more than half of it. He was encored several times but was slow to respond, except by walking to the footlights and making a bow that resembled something between a Turkish salaam and an Irish courtesy.

He supplemented the regular programme by playing two solos—a Chopin and a Strauss—and while at least three-fourths of the audience were unable to appreciate—would rather have heard a popular melody—they admired his skill and gave him enthusiastic applause, with which he seemed greatly pleased. That the audience was unable to fully appreciate and enjoy a programme composed of Schumann, Liszt, Wagner and Weber is not reflecting on the musical taste of the city. There are few cities of one hundred thousand inhabitants that can produce an audience of four thousand people able to understand the proper rendition of such a programme. In fact, owing to the work, influence and example of the Oratorio society and the St. Cecilias, it is probable that the work of the Symphony orchestra is more fully appreciated in Grand Rapids than in any city west of New York.

---

lipping from Journal
llegan Mich

ate 5-6

The coming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to Grand Rapids, next Monday night, has created the wildest enthusiasm in that city, and no wonder, for seldom is there offered such a chance of hearing so large a company of world-renowned musicians, under the leadership of that prince of the baton, Nikisch. Who is not acquainted with the name of D'Albert, one of the most celebrated pianists in the world. To hear him alone is worth traveling a great many miles. Tickets are sold at $1.50, which secures a reserved seat; $2 is charged in most cities. Arrangements have been made with the railroad company so that parties of ten can get reduced rates.

---

pping from News
uskegon Mich

te 5-8

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concert to be given by the Boston Symphony orchestra at Grand Rapids Monday night, will be attended by a large party from this city. Most of those going will leave here on the 3:35 train in the afternoon, and all will return on a special train after the concert. Railroad and concert tickets can be procured of T. C. Clark today or tomorrow; Mr. Clark will meet those who desire to go on the early train, Monday morning, at the depot and furnish them with tickets. After that tickets can be procured at his office. The concert will be given in Hartman's hall and word comes that every seat in the house will be sold. The orchestra is the best in America.

GRAND RAPIDS DEMOCRAT

TUESDAY, MAY 10, 1892.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Grand Rapids Had a Great Musical Event and Appreciated It.

When such finished work is presented as that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there remains nothing to criticise within the ability of local talent. Arthur Nikisch but again called attention to his wonderful ability as a conductor, when he, with a wave of his baton, caused Hartman's hall to be filled with waves of harmony the most exquisite ever produced within those walls which have witnessed so many musical events. The seventy performers seemed to be a grand single instrument, which under the wizard hands of the master produced harmonies as he willed. The program, though of a high class, was so wonderfully rendered that even the least trained ear in the audience fell under the spell of its witchery, and the much boasting Philistine became a devout believer in the doctrine of the classical school of music. There was wonderful strength in the work of the orchestra, the technique was perfect, while the true coloring brought out the ideas of the composer in a manner which, could they have heard, would have delighted the creators of the divine harmonies. Each of the four movements of the opening number, Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B-flat, was warmly received, though the second movement was most relished. The Liszt concerto in E-flat introduced to the audience Eugen D'Albert, whose work on the piano in that difficult number won many plaudits for the masterly manner in which he carried the theme and brought out the strong points of the composition. At the close of the number he was recalled three times, and finally seated himself at the piano and rendered a second selection. The pianist was, of course, contrasted by those who had heard Scharwenka with that great artist, yet was voted a great artist, though without the personal magnetism of Scharwenka.

Wagner was honored with two numbers on the program and at the imperative demand of the audience the first one, the prelude to "Lohengrin", was repeated. The second number was Richter's arrangement of passages from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung." With many the ability to play Wagner's music is the test of ability of an orchestra. Judged by this test the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the peer of any similar organization. The weird music of the great master of the German school, with its mythological meanings, wailed and triumphed at will, and grandeur aud harmony struggled for mastery. Eugen D'Albert executed two numbers on the piano, not on the program, one a dreamy morceau by Chopin and the other a lively composition by Strauss. The closing number of the program was the overture to Weber's "Oberon." The composition is full of beauties and the harmonies, being simpler, were refreshing, following, as they did, the heavy work of the preceding numbers. It was just such a composition as was calculated to send the audience home in excellent tune.

The audience present was one of the most cultured ever gathered in Grand Rapids. It listened with rapt attention to the music, and the discriminating applause showed that musical culture is prevalent in the city. The hall was filled with the exeption of a few undesirable seats in the very front of the main floor, and, owing to the knowledge that late arrivals would not be allowed to disturb those who came on time, nearly everyone was seated before the concert began. There were several large parties from out of town present, the largest, sixty-six in number, coming from Muskegon, and returning on a special train after the concert. The visitors expressed themselves entirely satisfied with their treatment in this city, and especially with the seats provided for them, which, contrary to their expectation, proved to be among the very best in the hall. The orchestra appears in Ann Arbor tonight and in Detroit the next evening.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 5/11

Boston public and critics are having a big fuss over the capacity of Mr. Nikisch to conduct the symphony orchestra. New York critics assert that there is a conspiracy to turn out Mr. Nikisch whom they assert to be the finest conductor in America to-day. The Sun pleasantly says in this relation that there isn't a newspaper in Boston that is read outside of New England. In the language of the base ball field, What's the matter with New England!

FREE PRESS, Detroit, Mich.

Date 5-11

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Music lovers will be glad to be reminded of the concert at the Lyceum Theater this evening by the famous Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Arthur Nikisch, conductor. Eugen D'Albert will be the soloist. The programme in full is as follows: Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark; concerto for pianoforte and E flat, Liszt, Mr. D'Albert; two movements from the suite op. 55, Tschaikowsky; symphony No. 3, "Eroica," Beethoven. The sale of seats has been very large.

---

ping from Independent lainwell Mich

e 5-5

Boston Symphony Orchestra, Hartman's hall, Grand Rapids, May 9. One of the grandest musical organizations in the world.

GRAND RAPIDS HERALD 5/10

IT WAS VERY FINE

The Matchless Melody of Many Instruments

IN WAGNERIAN SYMPHONIES

Stir a Vast Audience with Pleased Emotions — D'Albert, the Mannerish Frenchman, Given an Ovation.

The Symphony concert of last night was an event of marked significance to Grand Rapids in that it very accurately fixed the standard of intellectual and æsthetic culture in this city as nothing else could. Ten years ago no such performance could have been given here, or if it had it would have been to empty benches. As it was Mr. Nikisch and his players were greeted by a sympathetic and responsive audience, though it may not have been an ideally appreciative one from the artist's point of view.

Mr. Nikish never adapts his programs, and there is but little in them which will thrill the heart of the listner whose ears are more familiar with the swish of buzz saws than the majestic strains of a Wagner opera.

It Caught the Young Folks.

It was among the younger element that the real appreciation was found, and manifested itself in glistening eyes and the significent hush, which is the most eloquent tribute that any artist can ask.

Naturally the brilliant overture to "Oberon" appealed with greatest power. The splendid effects, the sudden contrasts and the lively and sustained vigor of Weber's glowing descriptions received full justice at the hands of the orchestra and left the most desirable effect possible on the minds of the audience. Schumann's "Spring" symphony in B flat, with its happy suggestions, expressive soothing melodies and noble finale, was received with storms of applause.

Full Strength Brought Out.

The prelude to "Lohengrin," the narrative passages from "Siegfried" and "Gotterdammerung" brought out the full strength of the orchestra. The reception accorded the interpretation of these efforts was spontaneous and heartfelt and showed that in such hands the music of Wagner will appeal to the most untutored mind. Eugen d'Albert's work did not touch the heart of the audience as a whole. His eccentric mannerisms caused him to receive a tremendous ovation, but it was plain to see that it was d'Albert the quaint and amusing Frenchman rather than d'Albert the artist, that was the object of the demonstration. D'Albert was very gracious and after rendering in his conscientious way the concerto for pianoforte in E flat, by Liszt, he responded with an encore, and later gave two numbers not on the program, Chopin's exquisite "Berceuse" and Straus' "Man Lives but Once," adapted for the pianoforte by Tausig. Straus wrote this waltz for the full orchestra, and only a great artist could do full justice to Tausig's arrangement. D'Albert accomplished this and put a degree of life, sympathy and daintiness of touch into the interpretation that were little short of marvelous. No praise of Mr. Nikisch is necessary. Suffice to say, he has the same subtle control over his musicians, the same magnetic and masterful power in carrying them successfully through the most difficult and longest sustained passages.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, MAY 13, 1892.

The concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the West have drawn large audiences. In Cleveland four thousand listened to the concert, and in Buffalo, Chicago, Columbus and Grand Rapids many were turned away. Mr. Kneisel was ill in Chicago, and was unable to play the Paganini concerto.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 136.

SUNDAY, MAY 15, 1892.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S TOUR.

The sixth annual tour of the Boston Symphony orchestra will end with the arrival of its members in this city tomorrow morning, the last week having been given to single concerts in Grand Rapids and Ann Arbor, Mich., and Detroit, and a series of three festival concerts in Pittsburg. Pa.

During the tour of 3200 miles so ended, the orchestra has travelled with 81 persons, given 18 concerts in 14 different cities, to over 30,000 people—the full capacity of every concert hall used having been tested to accommodate its audiences.

The soloists have been D'Albert, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel and Messrs. Kneisel, Adamowski, Schroeder and Rath. The tour has been throughout the most successful known in the history of the organization.

TELEGRAM-HERALD, Grand Rapids, Mich

ate 5/8

MUSIC IN THE CITY

The Boston Symphony Concert Monday Night

MUSICIANS' PROTECTIVE UNION

Will Celebrate an Anniversary—Recital at the Akely Institute—Notes and Suggestions to Players.

Pre-eminent among musical events for the coming week is the appearance of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Hartman's hall tomorrow night. This is the sixth annual tour of the orchestra with Mr. Arthur Nikish, conductor, and it follows immediately upon the conclusion of its Boston series of twenty-four public rehearsals and concerts, the organization having opened in Philadelphia early in April. The regular season of the orchestra, just now ended, has exceeded in its financial success that of any known since its establishment eleven years ago, and this fact, viewed in the light of the unprecedented competition it has been forced to meet, is uncontrovertible evidence of the high artistic standing maintained in all its appearances, and also of the great popularity of its accomplished conductor. The association travels with eighty-one people mainly by special trains with such a soloist as Eugene d' Albert. With the exception of three concerts a handsome surplus over the expense is guaranteed for every appearance of the orchestra throughout the tour, a fact that removes any doubt as to the value of the organization in the estimation of the musical publics in the leading cities. In the arrangements of the tours of this orchestra care has always been taken to make the travel as easy as possible for the men independent of any question of expense, and they will stop at one of the best hotels while in this city.

Successor to Rubinstein.

The pianist, d'Albert, is called the successor of Rubinstein by Von Bulow. In his advent in this country two years ago his marvelous playing carried everything before it as did Rubinstein's twenty years ago. D'Albert was born in Glasgow, Scotland, twenty-eight years ago. Thus it will be seen that he has attained a great name early in life and bids fair to surpass all great pianists. His father, Charles Napoleon d'Albert, was a French composer of eminence, and young Eugene was so carefully trained that at the age of 12 years he was elected Newcastle scholar in the National Training school, London, where he studied the piano, harmony and composition, under Ernest Pauer, Dr. Stainer, Mr. Prout and Arthur Sullivan. Afterward he was received by Liszt.

The personal appearance of d'Albert bears a striking resemblance to Tausig. He is short in stature, with a round face, small black eyes and a heavy shock of dark brown hair. There is a rumor current that he is married to Theresa Carreno, and, indeed, it is said that Tagliapietra, the singer, and d'Albert, the pianist, both claim her for a wife. Probably the lady will decide herself sooner or later, and in the meantime the musical world will discuss the present status of the case, which bears a certain resemblance to a situation in "Mr. Wilkinson's Widows." The concert tomorrow night will be a very novel event, both gentlemen and ladies appearing in full dress. The ladies will lay aside their bonnets. A cloak room will be arranged down stairs in the lecture room and those who who have garments checked may enter the concert room by the inner stairway. Those who enter late will be obliged to wait at the door until the close of the number. This is done to prevent the noise and confusion which invariably attends the seating of belated auditors. The sale of seats has been phenomenal, but there are still some left in an excellent location. It is expected that 300 extra seats will be added.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MAY 15, 1892.

—The Symphony orchestra won golden encomiums in Chicago last week. "The orchestra stands today," says the leading critic of that city, "as the first in America, and one whose equals in Europe are very few. The precision, the delicacy, the bold, picturesque shading, and above all the wonderfully fine unity of feeling obvious in all the band's work were the more appreciated last night, because since the visit of this band a year ago nothing so spiritually, as well as intellectually and technically fine in orchestral work, has been offered to Chicago music lovers."

[219]

DEMOCRAT, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date 5/10

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Grand Rapids Had a Great Musical Event and Appreciated It.

When such finished work is presented as that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra there remains nothing to criticise within the ability of local talent. Arthur Nikisch but again called attention to his wonderful ability as a conductor, when he, with a wave of his baton, caused Hartman's hall to be filled with waves of harmony the most exquisite ever produced within those walls which have witnessed so many musical events. The seventy performers seemed to be a grand single instrument, which under the wizard hands of the master produced harmonies as he willed. The program, though of a high class, was so wonderfully rendered that even the least trained ear in the audience fell under the spell of its witchery, and the much boasting Philistine became a devout believer in the doctrine of the classical school of music. There was wonderful strength in the work of the orchestra, the technique was perfect, while the true coloring brought out the ideas of the composer in a manner which, could they have heard, would have delighted the creators of the divine harmonies. Each of the four movements of the opening number, Schumann's Symphony No. 1 in B-flat, was warmly received, though the second movement was most relished. The Liszt concerto in E-flat introduced to the audience Eugen D'Albert, whose work on the piano in that difficult number won many plaudits for the masterly manner in which he carried the theme and brought out the strong points of the composition. At the close of the number he was recalled three times, and finally seated himself at the piano and rendered a second selection. The pianist was, of course, contrasted by those who had heard Scharwenka with that great artist, yet was voted a great artist, though without the personal magnetism of Scharwenka.

Wagner was honored with two numbers on the program and at the imperative demand of the audience the first one, the prelude to "Lohengrin", was repeated. The second number was Richter's arrangement of passages from "Siegfried" and "Die Goetterdaemmerung." With many the ability to play Wagner's music is the test of ability of an orchestra. Judged by this test the Boston Symphony Orchestra is the peer of any similar organization. The weird music of the great master of the German school, with its mythological meanings, wailed and triumphed at will, and grandeur and harmony struggled for mastery. Eugen D'Albert executed two numbers on the piano, not on the program, one a dreamy morceau by Chopin and the other a lively composition by Strauss. The closing number of the program was the overture to Weber's "Oberon." The composition is full of beauties and the harmonies, being simpler, were refreshing, following, as they did, the heavy work of the preceding numbers. It was just such a composition as was calculated to send the audience home in excellent tune.

The audience present was one of the most cultured ever gathered in Grand Rapids. It listened with rapt attention to the music, and the discriminating applause showed that musical culture is prevalent in the city. The hall was filled with the exeption of a few undesirable seats in the very front of the main floor, and, owing to the knowledge that late arrivals would not be allowed to disturb those who came on time, nearly everyone was seated before the concert began. There were several large parties from out of town present, the largest, sixty-six in number, coming from Muskegon, and returning on a special train after the concert. The visitors expressed themselves entirely satisfied with their treatment in this city, and especially with the seats provided for them, which, contrary to their expectation, proved to be among the very best in the hall. The orchestra appears in Ann Arbor tonight and in Detroit the next evening.

The Evening News.

DETROIT, THURSDAY, MAY 12, 1892.

CRIES OF "BRAVO!"

The Boston Symphony Concert Greatly Enjoyed.

It was an enthusiastic and so an inspiring audience which filled the Lyceum theater last night, when Conductor Nikisch stepped forth and took his place before the Boston symphony orchestra, from whom so much is expected and realized. Not only was Mr. Nikisch received with hearty applause, but applause repeated and long continued followed every number and movement. When d'Albert had finished cries of "Bravo! bravo!"—so seldom heard in a Detroit audience—were so insistent that the little bundle of nerves and expression was forced to reappear several times, and at last gave a second number, the only encore which was allowed during the performance.

Detroit recognizes and appreciates finish, skill and a delicate yet forceful interpretation of the masters of composition by masterly musicians. It was a pleasure to see many in the audience following the analysis of the numbers as given by the compilers of the symphony programs, and it was noticed that several had cut out the sketch given in last Sunday's NEWS. The program was a brilliant and varied one, and the grand Beethoven symphony, as rendered entire in its four movements, was such a musical treat as Detroit has not before enjoyed.

The contrasts were marked and effective between the delicate shadings of the passages that died away in softest, sweetest harmony on the hushed air, and the swelling bars in which clashing cymbals and sounding horns marked "heroic" or "victorious" motives. The playing of d'Albert is unique and totally uncomparable to that of any other pianist heard here this winter. He is an artist of expression and a master of all the difficulties of technique.

Clipping from

~~PRESS~~, Columbus, O.

Date 3-9

THOMAS THEODORE.

THE BRILLIANT CLOSING CONCERT OF THE ORPHEUS CLUB.

Attractive Musical Events This Week, to Close With the Final Season Concert By the Arion Club.

Truly, the season of the Orpheus Club for 1891-92, closed last Thursday evening, amid a blaze of glory. It was no wonder that the faces of President Patton, Director Schneider, and in fact the entire membership of the Club, were wreathed in placid, contented smiles, for their efforts had been successful in consummating the most brilliant closing of the most successful of any season within the history of the Club. Successful from a musical standpoint, the mere financial success may be questioned. It was a heroic venture to bring here the magnificent Boston Symphony Orchestra, the entire aggregation numbering eighty-one people, together with the world's greatest pianist, Eugene D'Albert, and the celebrated violinist, Adamowki, It was the result of a determination to give Columbus people an opportunity to hear music and musicians seldom heard, under such favorable auspices, outside the great music centers of the globe, the only full reward being in the unbounded good-will and approbation which was sure to follow such enterprise, zeal and sacrifice.

The club sang but one number, an arrangement by Rubinstein, "A Calm Sea and Happy Voyage," which was a happy break in a most telling programme for orchestra, piano and violin. The audience received them warmly and heartily applauded their work, many regrets being expressed that they were so modest in not appearing again.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, with D'Albert and Adamowski, is making its sixth annual tour, and but few cities are favored by a visit from them. They left Boston April 24, filling engagements in New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington, Baltimore, Buffalo and Cleveland, prior to coming here. After going to Cincinnati, Chicago, Grand Rapids, Ann Arbor, Detroit and Pittsburgh, they return to Boston on the 16th of the present month. Under the careful direction of Mr. Arthur Nikisch, this orchestra has attained a position surpassing any organization of its nature in America, and the equal of any like body of musicians in any land. Arthur Nikisch must be a great man, for he has stirred up the musical centers of Boston lately and engendered the most determined opposition on the part of a half dozen prominent and well-known music critics of the Hub to all he does. He is said to be an amicable, good hearted gentleman, and seems to be going on his way amid continuous successes and others are doing the grumbling.

The programme given here embraced works new to Columbus and their grandeur carried everybody by storm. I have never seen a more complete captivation of an audience tnan on this occasion. The great orchestral numbers were what was styled a symphonic poem, by Liszt, and a symphonic poem by Saint Saens, who is no doubt justly proclaimed the greatest of living French composers. While all may not have followed or read the touching poems as portrayed through music by these great masters, all were thrilled and held spellbound by the wonderful instrumentation of this orchestra. I admit my inability to approach doing the subject justice, therefore will not try. It must be heard to be appreciated.

The height of the great musical feast was attained when D'Albert played Liszt's concerto for piano in E-flat, being accompanied by the orchestra. The audience seemed breathless during the playing, which made the wild excitement following his close so much more noticeable. Never before have I witnessed such a perfect furore in a Columbus audience. Again and again was the little giant called back, and the stormy commotion was only stilled by his coming to the piano and responding to their demands for more. D'Albert is a short, stumpy little fellow, with small hands, and at first sight, would not strike one as being a great artist, but he soon removes all doubts. He is still young, it being but ten years ago that he made his debut in Berlin. He was then called a boy of nineteen. We are told that after his second season, he was no longer called a "child wonder" but had earned his right to be classed with the greatest virtuosos and musicians of the day. He was one of Franz Liszt's favorite and most renowned pupils. The master saw the great promise in the boy and bestowed the most earnest care in his education. He lived to see his fondest expectations realized, and the future has still in store a grand career for this wonderful artist.

The violinist, Adamowski, was so eclipsed by the great work of the orchestra and D'Albert that his efforts did not seem to enthuse the audience greatly. He played a rondo capriccioso by Saint Saens, with string accompaniment, and under most any other circumstances would have commanded deserved recognition; as it was, the special lovers of the violin were among the only ones to give him the plaudits he won.

The Orpheus Club has certainly met the highest expectations of their most exacting patrons and friends. Of all the good things given the past season, one thing we are sure, they kept the best until the last.

Pittsburger [illegible]

Freitag Morgen, den 13. Mai 1

Das Reich der Töne.

Das geſtrige Konzert des Boſton Symphonie Orcheſters ein wahrer Kunſtgenuß.

Das geniale Spiel des großen Pianiſten d'Albert.

Die Boſtoner und Eugen d'Albert auf einem Programm—was Wunder, daß die Alte Stadthalle geſtern Abend bis beinahe auf den letzten Platz gefüllt war und daß ſich das Konzert zu einem muſikaliſchen Hochgenuſſe, in der vollen Bedeutung des Ausdrucks, geſtaltete.

Das Konzert wurde eröffnet mit der Ouverture zu der Oper „Benvenuto Cellini" von Hector Berlioz, die vom Orcheſter meiſterhaft gegeben wurde. Als höchſt origineller Komponiſt, mit einer an das Wunderbare grenzenden Phantaſie, nimmt Berlioz einen ſo hohen Rang ein, daß er als einer der bedeutendſten Vermittler zwiſchen Beethoven und Wagner gelten kann. In der genannten Oper tritt uns, obſchon ſie eines der früheren ſeiner Werke iſt, ein großer Reichthum der mannigfaltigſten Stimmungen entgegen; in der Inſtrumentation herrſcht ein außerordentlich großes individuelles Leben und die Ouverture zeigt eine wunderbare Gewalt der ſchöpferiſchen Kraft.

Als zweite Nummer figurirte

Chopin's Klavier-Konzert in E-Moll, mit d'Albert als Soliſten. Wir haben über das geniale Spiel des klein-großen Pianiſten dem früher Geſagten nichts Neues hinzuzufügen. Chopins Kompoſitionen, hervorgegangen aus einer eigenthümlichen Vereinigung polniſcher und deutſcher Elemente, durcheilen die ganze Skala der verſchiedenartigſten Empfindungen, bald neckiſch ſcherzend, bald ſchwermüthig klagend, jetzt elegant und glänzend, dann wieder alle Tiefen der Leidenſchaft aufwühlend; ſie verlangen von Seiten des Ausführenden, neben einer auf das Höchſte ausgebildeten Technik, das feinſte poetiſche Empfinden, und d'Albert wird dieſen Anforderungen in jeder Hinſicht gerecht.—Der Applaus, welcher dem vollendeten Vortrag folgte, ſchien kein Ende nehmen zu wollen, und der Künſtler mußte ſich zu einer Zugabe bequemen, zu welcher er einen bekannten Chopin'ſchen Konzertwalzer (Opus 64, wenn wir nicht irren) wählte.

Beſondere Erwähnung verdient die verſtändnißvolle Orcheſterbegleitung, wie auch die Wiedergabe der folgenden Orcheſternummer, Goldmark's prächtiges Tongemälde einer „Ländlichen Hochzeit"; der leidenſchaftlich gehaltene Andante-Theil, „Im Garten", hat uns beſonders gut gefallen und die treffliche Leiſtung des Orcheſters wurde mit einer rauſchenden Beifallsſpende belohnt.

Herr Alwin Schröder, ein Bruder des Hofkapellmeiſters Karl Schröder in Sondershauſen, führte ſich mit drei Soli als vorzüglicher Violincell-Virtuoſe bei dem hieſigen Publikum ein. Statt der angekündigten „Sarabande" von Bach, ſpielte er eine „Nocturne" von Chopin mit echt muſikaliſchem Verſtändniſſe und erwies ſich in dem „Capriccio" von Klengel als Beſitzer einer ausgezeichneten techniſchen Fertigkeit. Herr Schröder erntete für ſeine gediegene Leiſtung lebhaften Applaus und wurde zu einem Da Capo gezwungen. Dirigent Nikiſch begleitete die Cello-Soli auf dem Klavier, und wie in der Leitung des Orcheſters, ſo entwickelte er auch hier ein echt künſtleriſches Verſtändniß.

Zwei Kompoſitionen des großen Meiſters Wagner, das prachtvolle „Lohengrin" Präludium und der effektreiche Huldigungsmarſch, verliehen dem Konzerte einen würdigen Abſchluß.

Bei dem Konzerte heute Abend wirkt, außer dem Orcheſter und dem großen Pianiſten d'Albert, der berühmte Sänger Georg Henſchel mit. Den zweiten Theil des Konzertes bildet Gade's „Zion", welches Oratorium vom Mozart Klub und dem Symphonie Orcheſter, mit Herrn E. H. Dermitt als Soliſten, aufgeführt wird.

Morgen Abend, zum Schluß der Konzertſerie, gelangt Mendelsſohns Oratorium „Elias" zur Aufführung.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 15, 1892.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the business management of Mr. Fred R. Comee, is having a triumphal tour through the West. The papers of the Windy City fairly outdid themselves in praising a concert given there by the orchestra a few nights ago. Had the choir invisible itself appeared in concert the dictionary could have fared no worse nor could the critics in their efforts to prove themselves equal to the occasion have perspired more freely. Mr. Nikisch and his skilled musicians simply took the town by storm, as they have taken every other town in the West in which they have appeared. Never was a foreign country conquered more completely.

The Free Press.

PUBLISHED DAILY, SEMI-WEEKLY AND WEEKLY.

THURSDAY MORNING MAY 12, 1892.

The Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The appearance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Lyceum last night happily demonstrated two gratifying points—that we have in this country an orchestra worthy of the highest appreciation, and that we have in Detroit enough people willing to appreciate it to the financial extent demanded of them for the opportunity of so doing. A finer theater audience never assembled in Detroit; the orchestra fulfilled all the promises of its sponsors, but whether all of those who gathered to hear it were fully satisfied with their venture only an individual expression could tell—for, taken as a whole, their manifestations were not of that vigorous, hearty, spontaneous type that a musically cultured audience usually gives to such a magnificent performance as that of Mr. Nikisch and his splendid body of instrumentalists. An exception to this criticism—if it be taken as such—must be made as to the pianist, D'Albert, for no audience would rise to a higher degree of enthusiasm than was shown upon the completion of his number. Here the applause was tremendous, even vociferous, and the performer was obliged to respond with another example of his wonderful ability, although it was quite apparent that "no encores" was to be the order of the evening.

The first orchestral number was Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," a noble compostion, and a grand prelude to the more serious work to follow. Its more delicate passages, breathing forth an air of oriental mysticism, were rendered with most charming effect, while the more vigorous lines, performed without a blur, showed the strength of the composition and its interpreters.

Then came the wonderful artist, D'Albert. His number was Liszt's concerto in E flat, a composition which gives the performer full scope for the demonstration of his remarkable powers. The delicacy of his touch in the lighter passages is little short of marvelous, yet it is in the strong passages that he is most effective. Here his remarkable facility of execution shows to best advantage, so far as the average auditor is concerned, and this, joined with an expression that shows the mind and feeling of the master, gave him what he grandly won last night—an artistic triumph.

Next came the orchestra's second number, by Tschaikowsky—the first and fourth movements from suite, op. 55. This composition, with passages almost dainty combined with the most energetic instrumentation, was artistically rendered, and then came the orchestral triumph of the evening and the last number on the programme—Beethoven's "Heroic" Symphony. It is in works of this character that Conductor Nikisch and his instrumentalists grandly sustain their proud reputation. There are four movements—allegro con brio, adagio assai (marcia funebre), scherzo (allegro vivace) and the finale. In the performance of these differing movements the orchestra shows its remarkable capabilities. The first movement is a picture of varying colors, most artistically blended, bright in the main, but with here and there a touch of shadow. The second movement is somber, now low and sweetly sad, then awe-inspiring, almost, in its magnificent solemnity. Here the pure quality of the reed instruments and the well-controlled power of the brasses are shown to great advantage. The third movement dispels the clouds, becoming almost hilarious in its joy and gladness, and the finale shows a blending of all the emotions that have preceded it, giving the orchestra, perhaps more than any other movement, an opportunity of displaying its rare skill in execution, its purity of tone, its faultless tune and the masterful direction of its conductor.

The Detroit Tribune

THURSDAY, MAY 12, 1892.

IT CONQUERED.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays to a Big Audience.

It is to be regretted that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could not have given another performance in Detroit, so great was the demand for seats and so many were disappointed in not being able to obtain admittance at all to the Lyceum Theater last night. Seldom has a larger or more enthusiastic audience assembled in this city. The organization has created for itself a reputation that insures a crowd at every appearance. Conspicuous among the audience last night was a large number of the hotel men who are now in the city.

The symphony orchestra programs generally contain but few numbers, but it must never be judged on this account that the concerts are short. The program last night contained but four numbers, but the concert, nevertheless, was longer than the average, and demonstrated fully that Mr. Nikisch is a prince among conductors. The program opened with Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," a setting of the story of this name one of the most beautiful in the Hindoo mythology. The playing in this as in all of the other numbers was superb and the marvelous precision of the rendering and the universally harmonious effects drew out long-continued applause. Eugene D'Albert was in Detroit only a short time ago, and consequently seemed like an old friend to many in the audience as he came forward and made his precise little bow before taking his seat at the piano. The little giant, as he has been called, was quite as favorably received as during his last appearance here. The selection was Liszt's concerto in E flat.

The next number was the first and fourth movements theme with variations from Tschaikowsky's suite op. 55. The twelve variations give opportunity for wonderful range of combination and formed what was, perhaps, the feature of the evening. The last number was Beethoven's symphony No. 3, "Heroic," a piece which grows upon the listener with every hearing and which never fails to bring forth some new richness of delight.

[220]

The PRESTO

CHICAGO, MAY 12, 1892.

BOSTON'S GREAT ORCHESTRA.

That paragon of excellence the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Central Music Hall last Saturday evening. In regard to this organization criticism gives place to praise. To say what was best on the program is impossible, what was enjoyed the most by the auditors equally as vain a task.

Therefore with mentioning that the orchestra plaped superbly, nothing being individually noticeable for its single excellence but the whole body of tone being of rare beauty and that the director, Arthur Nikisch, conducted with his old time fire and grace, we pass on to a consideration of the soloists.

First that earnest young man, Eugen D'Albert was received with a perfect ovation as he appeared to play the piano solo in Chopin's concerto in F minor. Worthily he acquitted himself of his task. Not in Chicago, in the dozens of times this famous concerto has been played, was it ever given with such extremes of feeling, gigantic force and extreme daintiness as last Saturday evening. The "Romance" and "Larghetto" were particularly noticeable for their tender handling. His playing brought out hitherto unheard beauties in the score and was a treat to the majority of this city's pianists who were present.

D'Albert was obliged to respond to an encore and played Rubinstein's famous Barcarole with such faultless execution and grace that it strengthened the impression that he was the most satisfactory pianist that has ever visited Chicago.

Mr. Kneisel was unable to play so his place was taken by Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, who was in every way a perfect substitute, and was loudly rewarded for some most artistic work. Mr. Nikisch played the accompaniments on the piano and his accompaniments were alone worth the price of admission.

Arthur Nikisch is a great conductor whose work is always conscientiously and artistically done. Finish means with him perfection. For that he works and that he gets for finish a synonymous term with perfection aptly describes the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE HENSCHEL RECITAL.

A rare treat, for the lover of the artistic, was given last Tuesday matinee in Central Music Hall, and one for which the general public have to thank the Amateur Musical Club. For the club's fifty-second Artist's recital they secured Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel.

These artists were in fine voice and gave an hour and a half of intense pleasure to their auditors. A performance where everything is harmonious and artistic in the extreme is rare, yet these great artists day by day give them.

Mrs. Henschel has a charming stage presence and sings with a naive grace irresistible.

Mr. Henschel has a grand voice which he uses with a thorough knowledge of his wonderful gift.

Together these gifted singers sing duets in a manner unsurpassed.

Now add to all this the accompaniment playing of Mr. Henschel, who presides at the piano throughout the recital, which is a revelation to concert goers and you have a harmonious whole that is never seen on any stage in the world, except when these two gifted artists occupy it. The Henschels would be famous as vocalists alone, but add to that the accompaniments of Mr. Henschel and you have the secret of their phenomenal success. The performance can not be dissected, but is extremely artistic in its entirety.

There is a well founded rumor that says this is the last season that Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will give recitals. If this is so, too much credit cannot be given those singers for refraining to tour under the well worn farewell performances dodge. At the same time if these artists appear no more in recitals the world will be the poorer for there is none to take their place, absolutely none.

The principal topic of the week in Chicago musical circles has been the notice in the Sunday Tribune of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Saturday night last. It is almost impossible to believe that Mr. Hubbard wrote the article in question. It looked as if the horse editor had heard of the Symphony Orchestra and was trying his apprentice hand at musical criticism. The notice contained many complimentary words for the orchestra, indeed the critic could do nothing else but express admiration, but not a word of the marvelous playing of Eugen D'Albert. It will be remembered that when D'Albert was here a few weeks ago this same critic "damned with faint praise," but his present attitude toward one of the most distinguished artists of the present day is hard to make out. The musicians of Chicago, those who are concert goers and newspaper readers, understand well the gush that the critic of the Tribune lavished upon Paderewski. Paderewski was and is this interviewer's idol, but it is hard to understand how he dare make use of the columns of an influential journal like the Tribune to exhibit his feelings toward another artist. It may be that the performance of D'Albert on this occasion so opened his eyes to the possibilities of piano forte playing that he was struck dumb. I am honestly sorry that the Tribune critic has put himself in such a position. He has laid himself open to the suspicion that his criticisms are influenced by outside (you may supply the other word), considerations. I have before this' called attention to the irresponsible productions in the way of musical criticisms in some of our daily papers, and now I wish to add a most vigorous protest against such things being allowed. Papers like the Herald and Tribune, that especially in the Sunday editions, reach thousands of readers exert a great, a not-to-be-calculated influence. In the foreign and home news department they are careful that no mistakes occur, to make them ridiculous. Why then should they make laughing stocks of themselves in an important and special department like the musical column? The Tribune critic is young yet, and has much to learn, among other things, that he must keep his prejudices better concealed if he wishes his words to have weight with the public. I can tell him that the people are not all fools, and he will soon be seen in the same light by them, as he now is by the musical world of this city.

Boston, city of classic culture and baked beans, has enjoyed each summer a series of high-class promenade concerts. They have been one of the attractions of the summer season at the Hub and this season it is proposed to make them even more enjoyable than ever before. I learn on the best of authority that the orchestra this summer will be under the direction of Romualdo Sapio. Sapio is one of the cleverest musicians in this country. He has been conductor for Patti tours, is principal of singing at the National Conservatory of Music, New York, a clever composer and an unexcelled pianist and accompanist. Last but not least he has most extraordinary good taste as evidenced by his recent marriage to that most charming singer and equally charming woman, Clementine de Vere. May all good fortune be theirs.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give one of their famous recitals next Saturday evening at the South Congregational Church, Drexel Boulevard and Fortieth Street.

MUSIC MENTION.

Times-Star - Cincinnati May 12

Congratulations are in order for the Ladies' Musical club. It has been many a day since a Cincinnati audience, and composed of her best people, have been afforded such unique enjoyment under the sweet ministration of song as that of the Henschels, man and wife, last evening at the Pike. It would be quite impossible to anticipate such entertaining variety with but two persons filling the entire evening. Mrs. Henschel's voice is a soprano of extraordinary culture and her method is perfection itself. Her portion of the entertainment comprehended every sentiment pictured in musical expression, and it all was done with that delicacy and finish and refinement that only characterize the true artist in feeling as well as in education.

Mr. Henschel is a kind of composite character in music. He plays all accompaniments for himself and wife, and in a most delighting manner, too, and yet gives full individuality to his singing. His voice is a full, rich and powerful baritone, and his interpretations are all clothed with the fullest of expression. Then he is a composer, and a conductor. He was the organizer and first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and spoke of this to the writer.

"And I am happy to say that after seven years' effort I have at last succeeded in establishing a symphonic orchestra on a successful basis in London. As in Boston I had to have a good guarantee and so in London." Mrs. Henschel is an especially charming little woman with brown hair and dark eyes.

"To-morrow night we will sing in Columbus, which is my old home, you know. Of course I love to go back there. What a lovely audience this was to-night and quite a society affair, too. It was highly gratifying to sing before such an appreciating audience. Yes, we have sung before the queen on several occasions. Our tour will end in June and then we will go back to England. I am very tired. We sang yesterday afternoon in Chicago, now to-night in Cincinnati, to-morrow night in Columbus, next night in Pittsburg, and so on."

"Do you think it necessary now for American girls to go to Europe to study?" she was asked.

"Well, I don't think I should try to answer that question, for the very reason that I would be hardly competent to judge. I have lived in England for many years, and I am not posted as to the conditions for musical education here. Perhaps it would not be necessary in the more ordinary sense. Do you understand what I mean? I think that a musical training is possible here in all the essentials, but for the finish and polish it were better to have training abroad, too. And yet among your very best teachers there is perhaps as good training as anywhere, but in Europe one is in the very atmosphere of it. Now, that is my impression, and at the same time you have asked me a question I really should not attempt to answer. I can say this, however, the amateur voice here is much better than that of Europe."

The little dressing-room of this gifted pair was thronged with congratulating people after the concert, and the happiest people alive, and because deserving, were the ladies of the Musical club. They will have quite $200 balance after paying all expenses of their high class entertainment.

Clevelander Anzeiger
— und —
Deutſche Preſſe.
Tägliche Ausgabe.
Herausgegeben von der
German-American Publ. Co.
Office: No. 221 St. Clair-Straße.
Donnerſtag, den 5. Mai

Das Maimuſikfeſt.

Zweiter Tag: Boſtoner Symphonieorcheſter und Eugen d'Albert.

Wohl ſelten hat ſich das herkömmliche Muſikfeſt, wie es nach altem Gebrauch um die Zeit, wenn die Knoſpen ſpringen, in Cleveland gefeiert wird, ſo harmoniſch und durchweg befriedigend geſtaltet, wie diesmal. Mit dem geſtrigen Abend war der Höhepunkt des gebotenen Muſikgenuſſes erreicht. Das beſte Orcheſter, das die Ver. Staaten kennen, der größte gegenwärtig in Nordamerika weilende Pianiſt, ein geſchätzter Violinvirtuoſe trugen mit vereinten Kräften zu dieſem Erfolge bei. Kapellmeiſter Arthur Nikiſch verdient auch an der Spitze eines ſolchen Orcheſters zu ſtehen, indem er die trefflichen Einzelleiſtungen zu einem abgerundeten und fein ausgearbeiteten Ganzen geſtaltet. Seine Kunſt im Dirigiren iſt bewunderswerth; ſeine Geſten, ſein geiſtiger Rapport mit dem Orcheſter ſind häufig genug dem Zuhörer kaum erkennbar. Und doch fühlt man aus der Art der Wiedergabe heraus, daß der Dirigent ſein Orcheſter ſo völlig beherrſcht, wie ein geſchickter Spieler ſein Inſtrument. Mit einem Wort, der Triumph des geiſtigen Princips über die widerſtrebende Materie, der Kunſt über die ſpröde Technik iſt es, welcher die Leiſtungen des Boſtoner Orcheſters dem Ideal am nächſten bringt. Da findet aber auch keine Probe ſtatt, damit die einzelnen Muſiker ihre Stimmen erſt mühſelig durchüben; wenn geprobt wird, iſt techniſch alles fix und fertig und es gilt nur, die künſtleriſche Auffaſſung und das harmoniſche Zuſammenſpiel zu geſtalten.

Schon der Streicherchor — beſtehend aus 14 erſten Violinen und 9 zweiten, nebſt der nöthigen Ergänzung durch Bratſchen, Celli und Contrabäſſe — imponirt durch ſein trefflich abgetöntes Zuſammenſpiel. Gehören doch die meiſten Mitglieder dem Orcheſter ſchon ſeit deſſen Beſtehen ſtändig an. Beſonders glänzend bewies ſich das Streichquartett in der das Concert eröffnenden Tannhäuſer-Ouvertüre, an deren Wiedergabe wohl Meiſter Richard ſelbſt nichts auszuſetzen gehabt hätte. Tadellos rein klangen die Geigenfiguren aus dem Venusreigen, und der Abſchluß mit der Repriſe des Lobgeſangs auf die heidniſche Frau Minne machte mit ſeinem ſchmetternden Jubel einen großartigen Eindruck.

Eine eigenartige und geiſtreiche ſymphoniſche Dichtung des Franzoſen St. Saens, betitelt „Das Spinnrad der Omphale", war eine neue Gabe, die wir mit Dank entgegennahmen: Der alte phrygiſch-helleniſche Naturmythos vom Frühlingsgott Herakles-Athys, der von der eigentlich als Todes- oder Wintergöttin gedachten Königin Omphale in ihren Bann gezwungen und in entwürdigender Weiberkleidung an den Spinnrocken geſetzt wird, während ſie ſelbſt ſich mit dem Fell des nemäiſchen Löwen und der Keule des Zeusſohnes ſchmückt. Simſon und Delila, Baldur und Loki, Herakles und Omphale (auch Dejanira), Achilleus und Thetis — alles nur wechſelnde Geſtalten desſelben Mythos. Der ſinnreiche Componiſt hat ein Tongemälde geſchaffen, deſſen Grundton das ſchwirrende Spinnrädchen zu ſein ſcheint, unterbrochen von dem ſpottenden Gelächter der beim Klange der phrygiſchen Flöten im Heldenſchmucke ſich brüſtenden Omphale, während das Stöhnen des gedehmüthigten Helden ab und zu aus der gequälten Bruſt emporſteigt, wie ferner Donner oder das Gebrüll des Löwen.

Mit der Brahms'ſchen zweiten Sinfonie in Ddur (opus 78), welche vollſtändig wiedergegeben wurde, ſchloß der orcheſtrale Theil des Programms. Die erſten beiden Theile, in denen vielleicht das muſikaliſche Formenwerk den geiſtigen Gehalt zu ſehr überwuchert, ließen die Hörer ziemlich kühl; erſt in den letzten beiden Theilen, wo der Quell der muſikaliſchen Erfindung friſcher ſprudelt und anmuthig dahinplätſchert, fingen die Gemüther ſich an zu erwärmen und ein lebhaftes muſikaliſchen In- [illegible] ſchweren Programms iſt übrigens auch nicht am Platz. Die Auffaſſungsfriſche iſt da ſchon der Ermüdung gewichen, namentlich wenn Eugen d'Albert vorher geſpielt hat.

Ja, Eugen d'Albert hat geſpielt, und bei Wiedergabe des Emoll-Concerts von Liſzt vielleicht einige der glücklichſten Momente künſtleriſcher Inſpiration gehabt. Er war gegen das vorige Mal, als er krank und mißmuthig vor uns auftrat, wie verwandelt. Sein Auftreten war ſelbſtbewußter, ſeine Auffaſſung poetiſch verklärt und durchgeiſtigt. Die Compoſition iſt im verzwickt-geheimnißvoll Liſzt'ſchen Stil geſchrieben und kann wenig Anſpruch auf begeiſterten Beifall erheben. Der rauſchende Applaus galt daher dem Künſtler ſelbſt, der es verſtand, den widerſtrebenden Stoff zu einem Kunſtgebilde erſten Ranges zu geſtalten. D'Alberts Technik war phänomenal. Ermüdung ſcheint für ihn nicht zu exiſtiren, denn nachdem er bald darauf das ſchwierige Adur-Gondellied von Rubinſtein und die Tauſig'ſche Paraphraſe von Strauß' Walzer „Man lebt nur einmal" brillant geſpielt, gab er als Encore noch die ungeheuer ſchwere Staccato-Etüde von Rubinſtein dazu.

In Herrn Otto Roth, der Saraſates Fauſtphantaſie mit ſchönem reinem, wenn auch nicht großem Ton und feinem Verſtändniß vortrug, lernten wir einen Geiger kennen, der ſeiner Stellung als Concertmeiſter des Herrn Nikiſch volle Ehre macht.

Pittsburgh Dispatch
Sun May 15th '92

A great deal of interest is felt in the advent into Pittsburg society of those magnificent artists, Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel. To-morrow evening the one hundred and seventy-eighth reception of the Art Society will be held at the Pittsburg Club Theater, when the distinguished artists will be the guests of honor. They will give a programme of songs and duets, Mr. Henschel taking the pianoforte. They have a very large repertoire, and they will give some of the best selections from it for the pleasure of those at the reception. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel have been lionized in all the large cities of Europe as well as in America, and it only remains for Pittsburg to meet them and add its laurels to the wreaths they wear so gracefully.

The social features following the musical programme are in charge of a special committee composed of the following officers and members of the society: Mr. and Mrs. George A. Macbeth, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Albree, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Scoyel, Mr. Ross W. Drum, Mr. William B. Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph R. Woodwell, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred S. Wall, Mr. and Mrs. William N. Frew, Mr. and Mrs. John W. Beatty, Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Mellor, Mrs. Henry Holdship, Mrs. Josiah Cohen, Mrs. Christopher L. Magee, Mrs. Christian I. McKee, Miss Kate C. McKnight, and Miss Julia M. Harding.

The reception promises to be both musically and socially one of the most brilliant ever given by the time-honored and now rejuvenated Art Society.

TRIBUNE, Detroit, Mich. 5-12

ate ....

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays to a Big Audience.

It is to be regretted that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could not have given another performance in Detroit, so great was the demand for seats and so many were disappointed in not being able to obtain admittance at all to the Lyceum Theater last night. Seldom has a larger or more enthusiastic audience assembled in this city. The organization has created for itself a reputation that insures a crowd at every appearance. Conspicuous among the audience last night was a large number of the hotel men who are now in the city.

The symphony orchestra programs generally contain but few numbers, but it must never be judged on this account that the concerts are short. The program last night contained but four numbers, but the concert, nevertheless, was longer than the average, and demonstrated fully that Mr. Nikisch is a prince among conductors. The program opened with Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," a setting of the story of this name one of the most beautiful in the Hindoo mythology. The playing in this as in all of the other numbers was superb and the marvelous precision of the rendering and the universally harmonious effects drew out long-continued applause. Eugene D'Albert was in Detroit only a short time ago, and consequently seemed like an old friend to many in the audience as he came forward and made his precise little bow before taking his seat at the piano. The little giant, as he has been called, was quite as favorably received as during his last appearance here. The selection was Liszt's concerto in E flat, The next number was the first and fourth movements theme with variations from Tschaikowsky's suite op. 55. The twelve variations give opportunity for wonderful range of combination and formed what was, perhaps, the feature of the evening. The last number was Beethoven's symphony No. 3, "Heroic," a piece which grows upon the listener with every hearing and which never fails to bring forth some new richness of delight.

The PRESTO

CHICAGO, MAY 12, 1892.

BOSTON'S GREAT ORCHESTRA.

That paragon of excellence the Boston Symphony Orchestra played in Central Music Hall last Saturday evening. In regard to this organization criticism gives place to praise. To say what was best on the program is impossible, what was enjoyed the most by the auditors equally as vain a task.

Therefore with mentioning that the orchestra plaped superbly, nothing being individually noticeable for its single excellence but the whole body of tone being of rare beauty and that the director, Arthur Nikisch, conducted with his old time fire and grace, we pass on to a consideration of the soloists.

First that earnest young man, Eugen D'Albert was received with a perfect ovation as he appeared to play the piano solo in Chopin's concerto in F minor. Worthily he acquitted himself of his task. Not in Chicago, in the dozens of times this famous concerto has been played, was it ever given with such extremes of feeling, gigantic force and extreme daintiness as last Saturday evening. The "Romance" and "Larghetto" were particularly noticeable for their tender handling. His playing brought out hitherto unheard beauties in the score and was a treat to the majority of this city's pianists who were present.

D'Albert was obliged to respond to an encore and played Rubinstein's famous Barcarole with such faultless execution and grace that it strengthened the impression that he was the most satisfactory pianist that has ever visited Chicago.

Mr. Kneisel was unable to play so his place was taken by Alwin Schroeder, violoncellist, who was in every way a perfect substitute, and was loudly rewarded for some most artistic work. Mr. Nikisch played the accompaniments on the piano and his accompaniments were alone worth the price of admission.

Arthur Nikisch is a great conductor whose work is always conscientiously and artistically done. Finish means with him perfection. For that he works and that he gets for finish a synonymous term with perfection aptly describes the playing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

THE HENSCHEL RECITAL.

A rare treat, for the lover of the artistic, was given last Tuesday matinee in Central Music Hall, and one for which the general public have to thank the Amateur Musical Club. For the club's fifty-second Artist's recital they secured Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel.

These artists were in fine voice and gave an hour and a half of intense pleasure to their auditors. A performance where everything is harmonious and artistic in the extreme is rare, yet these great artists day by day give them.

Mrs. Henschel has a charming stage presence and sings with a naive grace irresistible.

Mr. Henschel has a grand voice which he uses with a thorough knowledge of his wonderful gift.

Together these gifted singers sing duets in a manner unsurpassed.

Now add to all this the accompaniment playing of Mr. Henschel, who presides at the piano throughout the recital, which is a revelation to concert goers and you have a harmonious whole that is never seen on any stage in the world, except when these two gifted artists occupy it. The Henschels would be famous as vocalists alone, but add to that the accompaniments of Mr. Henschel and you have the secret of their phenomenal success. The performance can not be dissected, but is extremely artistic in its entirety.

There is a well founded rumor that says this is the last season that Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will give recitals. If this is so, too much credit cannot be given those singers for refraining to tour under the well worn farewell performances dodge. At the same time if these artists appear no more in recitals the world will be the poorer for there is none to take their place, absolutely none.

The principal topic of the week in Chicago musical circles has been the notice in the Sunday Tribune of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concert on Saturday night last. It is almost impossible to believe that Mr. Hubbard wrote the article in question. It looked as if the horse editor had heard of the Symphony Orchestra and was trying his apprentice hand at musical criticism. The notice contained many complimentary words for the orchestra, indeed the critic could do nothing else but express admiration, but not a word of the marvelous playing of Eugen D'Albert. It will be remembered that when D'Albert was here a few weeks ago this same critic "damned with faint praise," but his present attitude toward one of the most distinguished artists of the present day is hard to make out. The musicians of Chicago, those who are concert goers and newspaper readers, understand well the gush that the critic of the Tribune lavished upon Paderewski. Paderewski was and is this interviewer's idol, but it is hard to understand how he dare make use of the columns of an influential journal like the Tribune to exhibit his feelings toward another artist. It may be that the performance of D'Albert on this occasion so opened his eyes to the possibilities of piano forte playing that he was struck dumb. I am honestly sorry that the Tribune critic has put himself in such a position. He has laid himself open to the suspicion that his criticisms are influenced by outside (you may supply the other word), considerations. I have before this' called attention to the irresponsible productions in the way of musical criticisms in some of our daily papers, and now I wish to add a most vigorous protest against such things being allowed. Papers like the Herald and Tribune, that especially in the Sunday editions, reach thousands of readers exert a great, a not-to-be-calculated influence. In the foreign and home news department they are careful that no mistakes occur, to make them ridiculous. Why then should they make laughing stocks of themselves in an important and special department like the musical column? The Tribune critic is young yet, and has much to learn, among other things, that he must keep his prejudices better concealed if he wishes his words to have weight with the public. I can tell him that the people are not all fools, and he will soon be seen in the same light by them, as he now is by the musical world of this city.

Boston, city of classic culture and baked beans, has enjoyed each summer a series of high-class promenade concerts. They have been one of the attractions of the summer season at the Hub and this season it is proposed to make them even more enjoyable than ever before. I learn on the best of authority that the orchestra this summer will be under the direction of Romualdo Sapio. Sapio is one of the cleverest musicians in this country. He has been conductor for Patti tours, is principal of singing at the National Conservatory of Music, New York, a clever composer and an unexcelled pianist and accompanist. Last but not least he has most extraordinary good taste as evidenced by his recent marriage to that most charming singer and equally charming woman, Clementine de Vere. May all good fortune be theirs.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give one of their famous recitals next Saturday evening at the South Congregational Church, Drexel Boulevard and Fortieth Street.

MUSIC MENTION.

Times-Star - Cincinnati May 12

Congratulations are in order for the Ladies' Musical club. It has been many a day since a Cincinnati audience, and composed of her best people, have been afforded such unique enjoyment under the sweet ministration of song as that of the Henschels, man and wife, last evening at the Pike. It would be quite impossible to anticipate such entertaining variety with but two persons filling the entire evening. Mrs. Henschel's voice is a soprano of extraordinary culture and her method is perfection itself. Her portion of the entertainment comprehended every sentiment pictured in musical expression, and it all was done with that delicacy and finish and refinement that only characterize the true artist in feeling as well as in education.

Mr. Henschel is a kind of composite character in music. He plays all accompaniments for himself and wife, and in a most delighting manner, too, and yet gives full individuality to his singing. His voice is a full, rich and powerful baritone, and his interpretations are all clothed with the fullest of expression. Then he is a composer, and a conductor. He was the organizer and first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and spoke of this to the writer.

"And I am happy to say that after seven years' effort I have at last succeeded in establishing a symphonic orchestra on a successful basis in London. As in Boston I had to have a good guarantee and so in London." Mrs. Henschel is an especially charming little woman with brown hair and dark eyes.

"To-morrow night we will sing in Columbus, which is my old home, you know. Of course I love to go back there. What a lovely audience this was to-night and quite a society affair, too. It was highly gratifying to sing before such an appreciating audience. Yes, we have sung before the queen on several occasions. Our tour will end in June and then we will go back to England. I am very tired. We sang yesterday afternoon in Chicago, now to-night in Cincinnati, to-morrow night in Columbus, next night in Pittsburg, and so on."

"Do you think it necessary now for American girls to go to Europe to study?" she was asked.

"Well, I don't think I should try to answer that question, for the very reason that I would be hardly competent to judge. I have lived in England for many years, and I am not posted as to the conditions for musical education here. Perhaps it would not be necessary in the more ordinary sense. Do you understand what I mean? I think that a musical training is possible here in all the essentials, but for the finish and polish it were better to have training abroad, too. And yet among your very best teachers there is perhaps as good training as anywhere, but in Europe one is in the very atmosphere of it. Now, that is my impression, and at the same time you have asked me a question I really should not attempt to answer. I can say this, however, the amateur voice here is much better than that of Europe."

The little dressing-room of this gifted pair was thronged with congratulating people after the concert, and the happiest people alive, and because deserving, were the ladies of the Musical club. They will have quite $200 balance after paying all expenses of their high class entertainment.

Clevelander Anzeiger

und

Deutſche Preſſe.

Tägliche Ausgabe.

Herausgegeben von der

German-American Publ. Co.

Office: No. 221 St. Clair-Straße.

Donnerſtag, den 5. Mai

Das Maimuſikfeſt.

Zweiter Tag: Boſtoner Symphonieorcheſter und Eugen d'Albert.

Wohl ſelten hat ſich das herkömmliche Muſikfeſt, wie es nach altem Gebrauch um die Zeit, wenn die Knospen ſpringen, in Cleveland gefeiert wird, ſo harmoniſch und durchweg befriedigend geſtaltet, wie diesmal. Mit dem geſtrigen Abend war der Höhepunkt des gebotenen Muſikgenuſſes erreicht. Das beſte Orcheſter, das die Ver. Staaten kennen, der größte gegenwärtig in Nordamerika weilende Pianiſt, ein geſchätzter Violinvirtuoſe trugen mit vereinten Kräften zu dieſem Erfolge bei. Kapellmeiſter Arthur Nikiſch verdient auch an der Spitze eines ſolchen Orcheſters zu ſtehen, indem er die trefflichen Einzelleiſtungen zu einem abgerundeten und fein ausgearbeiteten Ganzen geſtaltet. Seine Kunſt im Dirigiren iſt bewunderswerth; ſeine Geſten, ſein geiſtiger Rapport mit dem Orcheſter ſind häufig genug dem Zuhörer kaum erkennbar. Und doch fühlt man aus der Art der Wiedergabe heraus, daß der Dirigent ſein Orcheſter ſo völlig beherrſcht, wie ein geſchickter Spieler ſein Inſtrument. Mit einem Wort, der Triumph des geiſtigen Princips über die widerſtrebende Materie, der Kunſt über die ſpröde Technik iſt es, welcher die Leiſtungen des Boſtoner Orcheſters dem Ideal am nächſten bringt. Da findet aber auch keine Probe ſtatt, damit die einzelnen Muſiker ihre Stimmen erſt mühſelig durchüben; wenn geprobt wird, iſt techniſch alles fix und fertig und es gilt nur, die künſtleriſche Auffaſſung und das harmoniſche Zuſammenſpiel zu geſtalten.

Schon der Streicherchor — beſtehend aus 14 erſten Violinen und 9 zweiten, nebſt der nöthigen Ergänzung durch Bratſchen, Celli und Contrabäſſe — imponirt durch ſein trefflich abgetöntes Zuſammenſpiel. Gehören doch die meiſten Mitglieder dem Orcheſter ſchon ſeit deſſen Beſtehen ſtändig an. Beſonders glänzend bewies ſich das Streichquartett in der das Concert eröffnenden Tannhäuſer-Ouvertüre, an deren Wiedergabe wohl Meiſter Richard ſelbſt nichts auszuſetzen gehabt hätte. Tadellos rein klangen die Geigenfiguren aus dem Venusreigen, und der Abſchluß mit der Repriſe des Lobgeſangs auf die heidniſche Frau Minne machte mit ſeinem ſchmetternden Jubel einen großartigen Eindruck.

Eine eigenartige und geiſtreiche ſymphoniſche Dichtung des Franzoſen St. Saens, betitelt „Das Spinnrad der Omphale", war eine neue Gabe, die wir mit Dank entgegennahmen: Der alte phrygiſch-helleniſche Naturmythos vom Frühlingsgott Herakles-Mythos, der von der eigentlich als Todes- oder Wintergöttin gedachten Königin Omphale in ihren Bann gezwungen und in entwürdigender Weiberkleidung an den Spinnrocken geſetzt wird, während ſie ſelbſt ſich mit dem Fell des nemäiſchen Löwen und der Keule des Zeusſohnes ſchmückt. Simſon und Delila, Baldur uud Loki, Herakles und Omphale (auch Dejanira), Achilleus und Thetis — alles nur wechſelnde Geſtalten desſelben Mythos. Der ſinnreiche Componiſt hat ein Tongemälde geſchaffen, deſſen Grundton das ſchwirrende Spinnrädchen zu ſein ſcheint, unterbrochen von dem ſpottenden Gelächter der beim Klange der phrygiſchen Flöten im Heldenſchmucke ſich brüſtenden Omphale, während das Stöhnen des gedehmüthigten Helden ab und zu aus der gequälten Bruſt emporſteigt, wie ferner Donner oder das Gebrüll des Löwen.

Mit der Brahms'ſchen zweiten Sinfonie in Ddur (opus 78), welche vollſtändig wiedergegeben wurde, ſchloß der orcheſtrale Theil des Programms. Die erſten beiden Theile, in denen vielleicht das muſikaliſche Formenwerk den geiſtigen Gehalt zu ſehr überwuchert, ließen die Hörer ziemlich kühl; erſt in den letzten beiden Theilen, wo der Quell der muſikaliſchen Erfindung friſcher ſprudelt und anmuthig dahinplätſchert, fingen die Gemüther ſich an zu erwärmen und ein lebhaftes muſikaliſchen Intereſſe zu [illegible]. Eine Brahms'ſche Sinfonie am Ende eines inhaltſchweren Programms iſt übrigens auch nicht am Platz. Die Auffaſſungsfriſche iſt da ſchon der Ermüdung gewichen, namentlich wenn Eugen d'Albert vorher geſpielt hat.

Ja, Eugen d'Albert hat geſpielt, und bei Wiedergabe des Emoll-Concerts von Liſzt vielleicht einige der glücklichſten Momente künſtleriſcher Inſpiration gehabt. Er war gegen das vorige Mal, als er krank nnd mißmuthig vor uns auftrat, wie verwandelt. Sein Auftreten war ſelbſtbewußter, ſeine Auffaſſung poetiſch verklärt und durchgeiſtigt. Die Compoſition iſt im verzwickt-geheimnißvoll Liſzt'ſchen Stil geſchrieben und kann wenig Anſpruch auf begeiſterten Beifall erheben. Der rauſchende Applaus galt daher dem Künſtler ſelbſt, der es verſtand, den widerſtrebenden Stoff zu einem Kunſtgebilde erſten Ranges zu geſtalten. D'Alberts Technik war phänomenal. Ermüdung ſcheint für ihn nicht zu exiſtiren, denn nachdem er bald darauf das ſchwierige Adur-Gondellied von Rubinſtein nnd die Tauſig'ſche Paraphraſe von Strauß' Walzer „Man lebt nur einmal" brillant geſpielt, gab er als Encore noch die ungeheuer ſchwere Staccato-Etüde von Rubinſtein dazu.

In Herrn Otto Roth, der Saraſates Fauſtphantaſie mit ſchönem reinem, wenn auch nicht großem Ton und feinem Verſtändniß vortrug, lernten wir einen Geiger kennen, der ſeiner Stellung als Concertmeiſter des Herrn Nikiſch volle Ehre macht.

Pittsburgh Dispatch
Sun May 15th '92

A great deal of interest is felt in the advent into Pittsburg society of those magnificent artists, Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel. To-morrow evening the one hundred and seventy-eighth reception of the Art Society will be held at the Pittsburg Club Theater, when the distinguished artists will be the guests of honor. They will give a programme of songs and duets, Mr. Henschel taking the pianoforte. They have a very large repertoire, and they will give some of the best selections from it for the pleasure of those at the reception. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel have been lionized in all the large cities of Europe as well as in America, and it only remains for Pittsburg to meet them and add its laurels to the wreaths they wear so gracefully.

The social features following the musical programme are in charge of a special committee composed of the following officers and members of the society: Mr. and Mrs. George A. Macbeth, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Albree, Mr. and Mrs. Charles W. Scoyel, Mr. Ross W. Drum, Mr. William B. Edwards, Mr. and Mrs. Joseph R. Woodwell, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred S. Wall, Mr. and Mrs. William N. Frew, Mr. and Mrs. John W. Beatty, Mr. and Mrs. Charles C. Mellor, Mrs. Henry Holdship, Mrs. Josiah Cohen, Mrs. Christopher L. Magee, Mrs. Christian I. McKee, Miss Kate C. McKnight, and Miss Julia M. Harding.

The reception promises to be both musically and socially one of the most brilliant ever given by the time-honored and now rejuvenated Art Society.

TRIBUNE, Detroit, Mich.

5-7-

ite

The Boston Symphony Orchestra Plays to a Big Audience.

It is to be regretted that the Boston Symphony Orchestra could not have given another performance in Detroit, so great was the demand for seats and so many were disappointed in not being able to obtain admittance at all to the Lyceum Theater last night. Seldom has a larger or more enthusiastic audience assembled in this city. The organization has created for itself a reputation that insures a crowd at every appearance. Conspicuous among the audience last night was a large number of the hotel men who are now in the city.

The symphony orchestra programs generally contain but few numbers, but it must never be judged on this account that the concerts are short. The program last night contained but four numbers, but the concert, nevertheless, was longer than the average, and demonstrated fully that Mr. Nikisch is a prince among conductors. The program opened with Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," a setting of the story of this name one of the most beautiful in the Hindoo mythology. The playing in this as in all of the other numbers was superb and the marvelous precision of the rendering and the universally harmonious effects drew out long-continued applause. Eugene D'Albert was in Detroit only a short time ago, and consequently seemed like an old friend to many in the audience as he came forward and made his precise little bow before taking his seat at the piano. The little giant, as he has been called, was quite as favorably received as during his last appearance here. The selection was Liszt's concerto in E flat.

The next number was the first and fourth movements theme with variations from Tschaikowsky's suite op. 55. The twelve variations give opportunity for wonderful range of combination and formed what was, perhaps, the feature of the evening. The last number was Beethoven's symphony No. 3, "Heroic," a piece which grows upon the listener with every hearing and which never fails to bring forth some new richness of delight.

Pittsburger Volksblatt —

Sonntag Morgen, den 15. Mai

AUS DER
MUSIC WELT

Das Ereigniß der vergangenen Woche in muſikaliſcher Hinſicht war die vom Mozart Club, im Verein mit dem Boſton Symphonie Orcheſter veranſtaltete Serie von drei Konzerten, bei welchen auch Eugen d'Albert, der rühmlichſt bekannte Pianiſt, Herr und Frau Georg Henſchel, das berühmte Sängerpaar, und Herr Alwin Schröder, ein ausgezeichneter Celliſt, mitwirkten. Die Konzerte fanden am Donnerſtag, Freitag und geſtern Abend in der Alten Stadthalle ſtatt und boten den zahlreichen Anweſenden einen ſeltenen muſikaliſchen Hochgenuß. Der Aufführung von Mendelsſohns „Elias", als letztes Konzert geſtern Abend, konnten wir zu unſerem Bedauern nicht beiwohnen und über die beiden erſten Konzerte haben wir in der täglichen Ausgabe des „Volksblatt" eingehend berichtet. Vollendetere Leiſtungen als die des Boſtoner Orcheſters, unter deſſen Dirigenten Nickiſch, kann man ſich kaum denken; und d'Albert, die Henſchels und Schröder machten ihrem Rufe alle Ehre. Der Mozart Club, unter Dirigent McCollum, leiſtete recht Lobenswerthes u. in der geſtrigen Aufführung von „Elias" gewiß ungleich Beſſeres als in Gade's „Zion", in welchem Werke es häufig an „Schattirung" der Vorträge mangelte. — Bei unſerem Rückblick auf die Konzerte können wir nicht umhin, dem Mozart = Club für ſein unermüdliches Streben unſere volle Anerkennung zu zollen; die von dieſem Klub dem Publikum gebotenen Konzerte haben ſtets ſo allgemein befriedigt und geſtalten ſich des Oefteren zu ſolch' wahren „Feſten der Muſik", daß der Klub es verdient, als wohlthätig wirkendes, bildendes Inſtitut für unſere Bevölkerung allgemeine Anerkennung und liberale Unterſtützung zu finden.

Die große Internationale Muſik- und Theaterausſtellung in Wien iſt am 7. ds. Mts. eröffnet worden. Die umfaſſendſten Abtheilungen ſind naturgemäß diejenigen von Deutſchland und Oeſterreich, und am Eröffnungstage waren es hauptſächlich die Mozart, Grillparzer, Göthe, Schiller, Beethoven und Schubert-Sammlungen, welche die Aufmerkſamkeit der Beſucher auf ſich zogen. Die Göthe-Sammlung iſt die reichhaltigſte, die außerhalb Weimar jemals ausgeſtellt worden iſt; ſie füllt eine große Abtheilung der Rotunda-Gallerie und wird gewiß allgemeines Intereſſe erregen. Dieſe, wie auch die Schiller-Sammluug iſt von dem Großherzog von Sachſen-Weimar eingeſandt worden, und beide zuſammen umfaſſen mehr als ſieben Tauſend Gegenſtände von großem hiſtoriſchen Werthe. In der ausgeſtellten Sammlung des Fürſten Eſterhazy befindet ſich eine Violine Joſeph Haydn's und Exemplare ſämmtlicher Denkmünzen, die zu Ehren Haydn's geprägt wurden. Italien iſt nicht beſonders gut vertreten. Ein Donizettizimmer, ausgeſtattet mit dem Meublement des Arbeitszimmers des Komponiſten, und eine Sammlung von Briefen und Parti[illegible] von Donizetti, Bellini, Verdi, Spontini, Ponchielli u. A., ſind das Intereſſanteſte der italieniſchen Abtheilung. — England hat eine Händelſammlung und eine Kollektion alter Muſikinſtrumente jeder Art ausgeſtellt. — Ueber die amerikaniſche Abtheilung hat der Kabeljunge noch Nichts verlauten laſſen.—Die geplanten Monſtrekonzerte, Theater- und Opernaufführungen u. ſ. w. werden die Glanzperiode der Ausſtellung bilden und es ſcheint als ob ſich die ſchönſten Hoffnungen der Unternehmer verwirklichen werden.

Das Great Weſtern Orcheſter, C. B. Weis, Dirigent, lieferte am letzten Montag Abend die Muſik bei der Unterhaltung zum Beſten des Südſeite Spitals und am Dienſtag Abend bei einer Soiree in der Wohnung von Frau A. Bodenhagen. Das Orcheſter geht mit dem Plane um, im Verein mit der Great WeſternKapelle während des Sommers in Hammel's Garten, auf Mount Oliver, Konzerte zu geben.

Die Bach'ſche „Sarabande", welche Herr Alwin Schröder am Donnerſtag Abend nicht ſpielte, figurirte dennoch in den Rezenſionen ſämmtlicher Zeitungen, mit Ausnahme der „Dipatch" und des „Volksblatt". Den Unterſchied zwiſchen einer Bach'ſchen Kompoſition und der vorgetragenen „Nocturne" von Chopin ſcheinen die Herren Muſikkritiker der anderen Zeitungen nicht erfaſſen zu können.

Bei einem Konzerte in der Alten Stadthalle am 18. ds. Mts., zum Beſten des United Republican Club, wird Herr Rocereto dirigiren und unter Anderen folgende Schaar von Soliſten mitwirken: Joſeph C. Breil, Tenor; F. A. Ammon, Bariton; C. W. Fleming, Violiniſt; H. P. Ecker, Pianiſt; Fräulein Bertha Galentin, Sopran und John Fogaci, Cornetiſt.

Anton Seidl iſt als Dirigent einer Reihe von deutſchen reſp. Wagner'ſchen Opern für die nächſte Saiſon im Metropolitan Opernhaus, in New York, engagirt worden. Unter anderen Opern ſoll auch „Triſtan und Iſolde", mit Jean de Reszke als Triſtan, gegeben werden. Neben Seidl iſt Bianchi für italieniſche Opern engagirt.

Zu Ehren des berühmten Sängerpaares, Herrn und Frau Georg Henſchel, hat die Art Society auf morgen Abend einen „Empfang" arrangirt. Derſelbe findet im Pittsburg Club Theater ſtatt und wird ſich, in muſikaliſcher wie in geſellſchaftlicher Hinſicht, zu einem Galaereigniſſe in der Geſchichte des Vereins geſtalten.

Hans Loherſtorfer, deſſen in Gemeinſchaft mit Manz verfaßtes Volksſtück „Der Muſterhof" im Münchener Theater am Gärtnerplatz zum erſten Male aufgeführt wurde, iſt am Donnerſtag, den 21. April, nach längerer Krankheit geſtorben, einen Tag nach der erfolgreichen Aufführung ſeines Stuckes.

Im Magdeburger Stadttheater gelangte eine neue komiſche Oper von Guſtav Kulenkampf: „Der Mohrenfürſt" mit einem ſtarken Achtungserfolg zur erſten Aufführung.

Ein neues Drama von Heinrich Bulthaupt, „Timon von Athen", frei nach Shakeſpeare, wird am Dresdener Hoftheater noch in dieſer Saiſon zur Aufführung gelangen.

Ein Luſtſpiel Wilh. Jordan's: „Liebe, was Du lieben darfſt", wurde in der Heimathſtadt des Dichters, Frankfurt a. M., am dortigen Stadttheater dankbar aufgenommen.

Louigi Mancinelli's romantiſche Oper „Iſora di Provence" iſt kürzlich mit großem Erfolge in Hamburg aufgeführt worden, und zwar zum erſten Male in deutſcher Sprache.

Die Great Weſtern Band wird, unter Leitung des Dirigenten B. Weis, während des Sommers im Allegheny Park ſowie im Highland Park einige Konzerte geben.

Bei einer Unterhaltung am letzten Montag Abend im Schulhauſe der 28. Ward, trat Louis Falck als Cornet-Soliſt auf und erntete lebhaften Applaus.

Gilmore's Kapelle beginnt am 30. Mai eine Serie von Sommernachts Konzerte im großen Madiſon Square Garten in New York.

August Roſe, ſeither ein Mitglied (Kontrabaß) des Duquesne Theater Orcheſters, iſt am Freitag nach Kanſas City abgereiſt.

Benjamin Godard, der franzöſiſche Komponiſt, hat kürzlich zwei Opern vollendet, „Les Guelphs" und „Ruy Blas".

Für das Henri Litolff-Monument ſind in Paris bereits mehr als 6000 Franken geſammelt worden.

PRESS, Pittsburg, Pa.

Date 5-14

A PRONOUNCED SUCCESS.

The Second Concert Given by the Mozart Club.

The Mozart club's second festival concert in old city hall last evening scored another success for that popular organization. Both the main auditorium and the gallery were filled, every seat being taken, and that, too, in spite of a heavy rain storm that prevailed during the early part of the evening.

The program was divided equall between the Boston Symphony and the Mozart club. The overture from Oberman was the opening, followed by George Henschel's introductory effort, the fantasy from Act II, Tannhaueser, "Black Ich Minher" Mr. Henschel's fine rendition of this masterpiece at once won the favor of his auditors, and at its close he was greeted by a storm of applause. He afterward sang the "Erl-King" and "The Grenadiers," in which pieces he was afforded opportunity to show the scope and fine quality of his voice. Each effort won warm applause. The appearance of D'Albert was the signal for another outburst of applause, and after the rendition of Chapin's Nocturine op. 2, No. 3, Polonaise, op. 58, and Rubinstein's etude, op. 23, No. 5, he was obliged to respond by an encore during which he played Liszt's impromptu waltz. During the second part of the program Gades' "Zion" was rendered by the Mozart chorus, with Prof. McCollum as director. The soloist was E. H. Dermitt. The cantata was well received and the work of the chorus gave evidence that the presentation of Elijah to-night will be well worth hearing. Mrs. Henschel, Adelaide Foresman, Paul Zimmerman, Irene Sample and Gardner Lamson are the soloists for to-night's concert.

TIMES, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5-13

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel at the Acad

Those two finished and accomplished artists, Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel are to give a vocal recital at the Academy of Music Wednesday evening, May 25. Their coming has been looked forward to with great pleasure and they are assured a most cordial welcome. If present indications are to be taken as a criterion the Academy will not be large enough to accommodate them. The following is the programme:

Duet from "Gianninae Bernaoone"..Cimiarosa
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Air from "Hercules" } Handel
Recitative and air from "Alessandro." }
Song of the Harem-keeper from "Il Seraglio"..........Mozart
Grugantino's Song..........Beethoven
From Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella" (1790)..........
Mr. Henschel.
The Loreley..........Liszt
The Spinning Wheel..........Hendschel
The Glen of Kenmare..........Old Irish
Mrs. Henschel.
Wohin?..........Schubert
Der Asra..........Rubinstein
The Erl-King..........Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Duet—"Gondoliera"..........Henschel
Mr and Mrs. Henschel.
Midi au Village..........A. Goring-Thomas
Serenade du Passant..........Massenet
May Song..........A Hervey
Mrs. Henschel.
Air from "Jean de Paris"..........Boieldieu
Ballad—"The Grenadiers"..........Schumann
Mr Henschel.
Duetto Buffo from "Don Pasquale"...Donizetti
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

[illegible]
Pitsburg 3/5

What Compositions Pittsburg People Need and Will Patronize.

CONCERTS OF THE MOZART CLUB.

A Choice Programme for the 178th Reception of the Art Society.

THE BARS AND SPACES EVERYWHERE

The Mozart Club's festival concert with the Boston Symphony Orchestra have proven their right to rank among the most artistic and delightful musical events Pittsburg has had—as may be seen in detail in the reviews of Friday and Saturday and elsewhere in this issue. Much fine music has been interpreted by a splendid force of performers and in a manner to be remembered with liveliest pleasure.

It is a pity that the Mozart Club comes out with a deficit, estimated to be somewhere in the neighborhood of $1,000. The cause is the same that has long hampered the growth of music in our city, namely, the lack of an adequate music hall. Old City Hall cannot hold enough people at $2 a seat, outside of the space occupied by the large body of associate members whose annual subscription amounts to only $1 a seat, to pay the expenses of any of the concerts given by the club with this orchestra. This year it was hoped to come out ahead by adding an extra concert, outside of the regular subscription series, so as to have a larger proportion of full-priced seats to be sold. The plan would probably have succeeeded if the club had only designated one of the concerts with varied programme and greater soloists to be outside the subscription series. As it was, each associate member was generously left to choose for himself, and most of them chose the first two concerts as offering the artists and works they were most curious to hear.

The "Elijah" performance was of course less attractive to all who have heard the oratorio repeatedly, and not so long ago by almost identically the same performers. It was a mistake to select that work for this occasion, even if Mr. Henschel had consented to sing the title role, as he was expected to do so when the choice was made. With the dozens of great choral works from Bach's Passion Music (not to mention Palaestrina) down to Dvorak's new Requiem that have never been heard here, it is unprofitable to permit a few works to monopolize the best opportunities for performance.

Repetitions of a standard oratorio, ranking high up among the greatest, are, however, vastly more desirable than repetitions of some other things. Berlioz, Goldmark, Wagner, Weber, Saint-Saens and Tschaikowsky were the composers represented in Mr. Nikisch's orchestral menu, as originally made up. And nearly every one of the pieces had taken up space on one or more of the precious few fine orchestral programmes given here in the past two or three years. Not one of them holds anything like the rank among orchestral works that "Elijah" does among oratorios.

Pittsburg must insist hereafter on having programmes designed to meet her peculiar position. She is the late guest at the great music banquet; the others have long finished discussing the earlier and more nutritious courses and are most interested in the game, the salad or the dessert that are still before them. Should Pittsburg be served with quantities of Goldmark salad, before they have opened for her the shell of the Bach oyster, before she has sipped the clear, fine soup of Haydn or Mozart, or has more than nibbied at the rich, full-flavored Beethoven roast?

Ridiculous metaphor aside, this city needs to hear a great many standard-giving works, those that have delighted and advanced the other great cities, before she is ready like them to enjoy or appreciate these modern, over-strained pieces that the conductors insist on giving us over and over again to the exclusion of what we most need and would at least equally enjoy.

⁂

The Art Society Reception.

At the One Hundred and Seventy-eighth reception of the Art Society, to be held in the Pittsburg Club Theater to-morrow evening, the following choice musical programme has been prepared by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, who will be the society's guests on this much-talked-of occasion:

CIMAROSA..........
....Duet from "Giannina e Bernadone"
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
HANDEL..........Air from "Alessandro"
Mrs. Henschel.
BEETHOVEN..........Crugantino's song from Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella" (1790)
Mr. Henschel.
LISZT..........The Lorely
HENSCHEL..........The Spinning Wheel
OLD IRISH..........The Glen of Kenmare
Mrs. Henschel.
SCHUBERT..........Wohin?
LOEWE..........The Erl-King
Mr. Henschel.
HENSCHEL..........Duet, "Gondoliera"
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
A. GORING THOMAS..........Mid au Village
MASSENET..........Serenade du Passant
A. HERVEY..........May Song
Mrs. Henschel.
LOEWE..........Archibald Douglas
Mr. Henschel.
DONIZETTI......Duet from "Don Pasquale"
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

⁂

PITTSBURGH
COMMERCIAL GAZETTE
FRIDAY, MAY 13, 1

CARA'S COLUMN.

MOZART MAY FESTIVAL. The Mozart May festival was inaugurated last evening at Old City hall, and the artistic success augurs well for the remaining concerts of the week. The hall was packed with an appreciative audience, and the prolonged and hearty applause which followed each number on the program testified to the keen enjoyment. The Boston Symphony orchestra, the eminent pianist, Eugen D'Albert, and Alwin Shrœder, the clever cellist, made up the attractions of the inaugural concert, and in their wonderful delineation of the art divine, but strengthed their hold upon the critical but music-loving public of the twin cities. The program gave ample range for satisfaction to all moods. From the bold and daring spirit of the Berlioz overture, the noble and poetic conception of Chopin, the ingenious and diversified movements of the Goldmark "Rustic Wedding," the captivating cello interpretations of Bach and Schubert to the concluding energy and animation of the Wagnerian compositions, there was nothing dull, awkward or strained, the whole forming one of the strongest, brightest and most artistic programs ever presented under the auspices of the enterprising Mozart club.

THE CELEBRATED ORCHESTRA.

Shortly after 8 o'clock Conductor Arthur Nikisch mounted the dais and marshaled the forces of the orchestra for the portrayal of "Benvenuto Cellini." The career of the adventuresome goldsmith, as outlined by the musicians, was both exhilarating and exciting. There was melody and counter-melody from the bold and assertive strains of the opening theme through the captivating modulations and transitions as advance was made to the strength and beauty of the triumphant close. The orchestra was in perfect accord and the daring movement was carried forward with effective smoothness.

Owing to the limitations of the stage, in keeping with all else that pertains to comfort or convenience as far as accommodation for a music-loving community is concerned, there was a general commotion next in the relegating of the orchestra to the extreme ends of the platform, and the pushing forward of the Knabe grand to the front for the selection scheduled for D'Albert. The appearance of D'Albert, who is already established in the affections of the people, was the signal for applause. The number developed by D'Albert was the concerto in E minor of Chopin, with orchestral accompaniment. This latter is by no means equal in beauty to the solo, yet exquisite effects were noticeable, and combined with the interpretation of D'Albert, the brilliant runs, the entertaining melodies, the dazzling moods and delicate measures, the effect was inexpressibly enchanting. D'Albert was repeatedly recalled at the conclusion and was obliged to respond with another captivating selection.

THE RUSTIC WEDDING.

Goldmark's symphony, "Rustic Wedding," was one of the gems of the evening. In the first movement was presented the wedding march, a theme with thirteen ingenious variations so expressive and diversified as to suggest a wedding procession "made up of all manner of parties in all manner of words." The second movement, allegretto, was expressive of a tender bridal song, this rendered with exquisite effect. Andante developed "In the Garden," and was suggestive of the love chat of the bride and groom, while the finale was an animated, vivacious dance, a combination of attractive melodies dainty and exhiliarating. The exquisite cello solos of Mr. Schroeder were favorably received. There was the rich interpretation of the Bach Sarabande, the movement musical of Schubert and a capriccio of Klenzel. The concert closed with the masterly interpretation of Lohengrin and Huldigung's march by the orchestra.

This evening the following program will be interpreted:

PART I.

Weber..........Orchestra, "Oberon"
Wagner—Fantasma from Act II..........
"Tannhæuser," "Blick ich Umher"
Mr. Henschel.
Saint-Sæns—Symphonic Poem..........
.........."Le Rouet d'Omphale"
Soli for Pianoforte.
(a) Chopin..........Nocturne, Op. 9, No. 3
(b) Chopin..........Polonaise, Op. 53
(c) Rubinstein..........Etude, Op. 23, No. 3
Songs with Piano.
(a) Loewe.........."The Erl-King"
(b) Schumann.........."The Grenadiers"
Mr. Henschel.

PART II.

Gade's Zion.
Mr. E. H. Dermitt, Chorus and Boston Symphony Orchestra.

EAGLE, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Date 5-15

It is the rule among traveling dramatic and musical companies that the members shall receive transportation from the management but that they shall pay their own hotel bills and sleeping car expenses. Of late some small companies have traveled in their own cars, but there is occasionally a slight reduction of wages as an offset to this advantage. The Boston symphony and Thomas orchestras are probably the only companies that travel regardless of expense on their tours, Mr. Thomas stipulating for and Banker Higginson offering the best accommodations, on the theory that if the musicians are left to themselves they will save money by putting up at cheap hotels and boarding houses where they will be starved or poisoned into inefficiency. Mr. Higginson engages rooms at the leading hotels and provides parlor cars and Pullman berths for the journeys. The Boston symphony orchestra is the best paid and best cared for musical organization in the country. All of its members receive salaries higher than these fixed by the musical union, and as a result there is no dissatisfaction and the changes are few. Next year the personnel of the band will be almost the same as it is now. Banker Higginson has made his will and in it has endowed the orchestra with a permanent fund of $1,000,000.

EXPRESS, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5/15

The Buffalo Musical Association has arranged a genuine treat for connoisseurs and the public generally on Wednesday evening, May 25th, when Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will give a vocal recital at the Academy of Music under the auspices of the Association. Although quite late in a brilliant season, this talented couple will be warmly welcomed in Buffalo, where they have always been popular, socially and financially. An admirable programme is announced. The sale of seats will begin on Saturday next at Peter Paul & Bro.'s.

[222]

[illegible] MAY 13

THE FIRST CONCERT

Of the Boston Symphony Series Given by the Mozart Club

SCORES A DECIDED SUCCESS.

A Programme That Tested Attentive Auditors and Proved That

PITTSBURG IS ADVANCING MUSICALLY

It is safe to say that Pittsburg has never before heard a concert devoted exclusively to instrumental music, at all comparable to the first of the Mozart Club's present series, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last evening at Old City Hall.

Indeed, since Mr. Theodore Thomas' earlier tours some 20 years ago, this city has had no concert of the first magnitude wholly given up to the instruments. The human voice is justly esteemed as the most expressive of all the vehicles of musical interpretation. Because of this quality, as also because of the aid derived from the words, vocal music has always held first place in the affection of the great mass of people. And yet, instrumental music—absolute music, soaring beyond the limits of speech into the boundless upper ether of thought and feeling—this is the truest and highest music. When music and poetry are wedded, it is the former that condescends.

There is much significance, therefore, in the fact that last night a great Pittsburg audience sat for two hours and a quarter on hard, narrow chairs in an unattractive hall and listened with unflagging attention and growing enthusiasm to a concert from which the most beautiful species of tone and the most commonly admired species of music were conspicuously absent. It is a fact that speaks much both for performers and for hearers.

The Programme Out of the Ordinary.

With the slight changes noted below, this was the programme they listened to:

Berlioz—Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."
Chopin—Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11.
- (a) Allegro Maestoso.
- (b) Romance: Larghetto.
- (c) Rondo: Vivace.

Mr. Eugen D'Albert.

Goldmark—Symphony, "Rustic Wedding."
- (a) Wedding March, with variations: Moderate molto
- (b) Bridal Song: Allegretto.
- (c) In the Garden: Andante,
- (d) Dance: Finale, Allegro molto.

Soli for Violoncello.
- (a) Bach, Sarabande.
- (b) Schubert, Moment Musical.
- (c) Klengel, Capriccio,

Mr. Alwn Schroeder.

Wagner—(a) Prelude "Lohengrin."
(b) "Huldigungs March."

Viewed in the light of Pittsburg's particular needs, these selections were not just what they ought to have been. But that is another story; one that can best be told in Sunday's retrospect of the whole series.

Viewed from a more general standpoint and upon its own merits, this is an admirable specimen of Mr. Nikisch's skill in the art of programme making. In some respects it is the best, as it is the longest, of all the programmes made up by the Boston band for its five visits to this city. Conductors are not wont to vouchsafe to us provincials a spmphony and a concerto on the same programme. Pittsburg must, indeed, be advancing musically.

Goldmark's first symphonic work is more accurately described as an orchestral suite of five parts—the third of which, a serenade, is frequently omitted, as on this occasion. The first and longest movement figured on one of the former local programmes of the Boston orchestra; its thirteen strongly contrasted variations evidence Goldmark's mastery of orchestral technique and betray much fertility of invention. The "Bridal Song," with its naive, simple phrases, smacks most of the countryside. Those two lovers "in the garden" are certainly not a pair of country bumpkins; it is the tongue of [illegible] laden with sublime, passionate devotion that speaks there—not the uncouth utterance of Audrey. There is more rusticity again in the finale, in which the nuptial festivities seem to get fast and furious, putting a very exciting climax to the work.

X The Orchestra in Good Condition. XX

The orchestra was in superb condition last night, in spite of the stormy lake voyage of the morning that threatened to keep it from getting here in time for the concert, even by the special train provided. Mr. Gericke's invaluable legacy of technical refinement and precision has been kept intact by Mr. Nikisch, who has now had time to impress his own artistic personality upon his men and give added warmth and charm to their performance. The playing throughout the evening was immaculately clean, wonderfully finished and splendidly virile. Mr. Nikisch, being most at home in the modern romantic school, gave a most sympathetic and ardent interpretation to each of the orchestral works chosen, of which all but the symphony were already known to the local audience.

Chopin's E minor concerto, if memory serves, has not been heard here in many years; perhaps, not at all. It is an early work of the great pianoforte composer whose refined face is so maligned in the programme-book. (By the way, why does the descriptive writer call "Benvenuto Cellini" Berlioz's only opera?" Surely "Les Troyens" should be remembered, if not performed.) Orchestral writing was not Chopin's forte; he had to get someone else to score his two concertos and others have since tinkered at them considerably. Naturally the concertos are not consideren his best works. Nevertheless, the work given last night has many inspired moments and it abounds in those beautiful, idiomatic pianoforte figures and passages that Chopin alone could write.

Mr. D'Albert made the most effect with the more brilliant portions of the concerto, [illegible] much feeling [illegible]. It was the splendid [illegible] of the allegro and the [illegible] exciting climax of the rondo, however (what a wonderful delivery of those interlocking octaves!), that the little giant of the keyboard fairly enthused his audience. The storm of applause refused to be stilled until Mr. D'Albert sat down and played the familiar Chopin Valse in A flat. It was a genuine ovation.

A European Reputation Upheld.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, although quite unknown to most of his hearers, also excited their enthusiasm to a degree that amply upheld his great European reputation. It is a pity that an artist of this caliber could not have been heard in some more important work. However, he gave the proper touch of light color to follow the symphony. He substituted the well-known nocturne by Chopin for the Bach piece, and played a tarantelle by Cossman for the third piece, giving the Klengel cappiccio in response to the insistent applause. A sympathetic and truly artistic tone, rarely clear phrasing, true musical feeling and a notable brilliance of execution were among the qualities displayed by Mr. Schroeder. Mr. Nikisch played the pianoforte accompaniments to the 'cello pieces, as he led the orchestral accompaniment of the concerto, with consummate skill and discretion.

This evening the string orchestra will play, in addition to the numbers programmed, an adagio and gavotte by Bach in Bachrich's arrangement. Mr. George Henschel and Mr. D'Albert will be heard in several pieces. The Mozart Club, with the orchestra and Mr. E. H. Dermitt, baritone, will perform Gade's cantata, "Zion," under Mr. Jas. P. McCollum's baton.

C. W. S.

Clipping from [illegible], Pittsburg, Pa.

Date 5-15

SOME discussion has taken place during the past week concerning the extent to which the reception of the Boston Symphony orchestra indicates the [illegible] of musical taste in Pittsburg. The Boston orchestra played nothing but music of a high order, that is to say, high enough to be out of the reach of people who have not a technical knowledge of the intricacies of the divine art. One critic who speaks with a measure of autocratic force, informs us that the willingness of a large audience to sit out a program of this character lasting more than two hours if proof positive of Pittsburg's progress. Another admits that the audience each night was steeped in gloom, but views the fact that a good-sized audience was present at all as highly encouraging and indicative of forward strides.

To those who have watched the course of musical matters in our city for the past fifteen years it is hardly necessary to recall the circumstance that this gauging of taste like a brand of whisky that improves with nursing in the cellar is a periodic amusement of the gentlemen whose business it is to put opinions on paper. It is the rule with these individuals to represent the community as being engaged in a continual struggle onward and upward towards a place on the same plane with musical professors who revel in counterpoint, shed tears over a fugue, and look with a baleful eye on poor Dave Braham, Gilbert V. Sullivan and other composers who write for the multitude and do not lay themselves out to tax the understanding.

Now, there is no use in going behind the returns and seeking to represent the good people of this town as perpetually striving after the Unattainable. Setting aside the professors of music who fatten on prejudice and the friends of the professors of music who wear out their nervous tissue with sham admiration, the intelligent men and women of Pittsburg are not susceptible of being "educated" up to a point where they can be contented only with Wagner, Saint-Saens and others of that ilk, and must look down with contempt on the plain every day ballad, the song and dance and the jingle of comic opera.

Nine hundred and ninety-nine people out of a thousand have a natural relish for the "Annie Rooney" and "Ta ra ra" style of music. They have no reason to be ashamed of it, and it is bosh to talk of "educating" them out of it. As well talk of educating the American public out of a taste for pie.

If the critics are disposed to question these views, they are respectfully referred to the stars of the concert platform, whose greatest successes are achieved when they descend from classic heights to the level of the simplest ballad music.

REPUBLIC, St. Louis, Mo.

Date 5/14

Eugen d'Albert, who has been playing in Boston and the neighboring towns the past fortnight, and who expressed himself as highly gratified with the success of his American tour, will sail from New York on Tuesday, the 17th. He will probably spend the summer in Switzerland, devoting his time to the completion of several compositions already well under way.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 18, 1892.

The d'Albert Tour.

THE following is a correct list of the performances of Eugen d'Albert in this country this season. He left for Europe yesterday:

March 11 and 12—Boston, Boston Symphony Orchestra, E flat concerto, Beethoven.
March 14—Philadelphia, Boston Symphony Orchestra, E flat concerto, Beethoven.
March 15—Washington, Boston Symphony Orchestra, concerto, Chopin, E minor.
March 17—Baltimore, Boston Symphony Orchestra, concerto, Chopin, E minor.
March 18 and 19—Brooklyn, Boston Symphony Orchestra, E flat Beethoven concerto.
March 21—Pittsburgh, recital.
March 23—Cincinnati, recital.
March 24—Chicago, first recital.
March 26—Chicago, second recital.
March 29—St. Louis, recital.
March 31—Cleveland, recital.
April 1—Detroit, recital.
April 2—Buffalo, recital.
April 5—New York, first recital.
April 6—Providence, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Chopin concerto, E minor.
April 7—New York, second recital.
April 9—New York, third recital.
April 11—Baltimore, recital.
April 18—Boston, first recital.
April 19—Cambridge, recital.
April 20—Boston, second recital. Afternoon.
April 20—Providence, recital. Evening.
April 22—Cambridge, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Chopin E minor.
April 23—Worcester, recital.
April 26—Lowell, recital.
April 28—Portland, Me., recital.

TOUR WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

May 2—New York, concertos, Chopin E minor and Liszt E flat.
May 3—Buffalo, Chopin E minor concerto.
May 4—Cleveland, Liszt E flat concerto, solos.
May 5—Columbus, Liszt E flat concerto.
May 6—Cincinnati, Beethoven E flat concerto.
May 7—Chicago, Chopin E minor concerto.
May 9—Grand Rapids, Liszt E flat concerto and solos.
May 10—Ann Arbor, Chopin E minor concerto.
May 11—Detroit, Liszt E flat concerto.
May 12—Pittsburgh, Chopin E mincr.
May 13—Pittsburgh, solo, Chopin A flat polonaise; solo, Rubinstein C major etude.

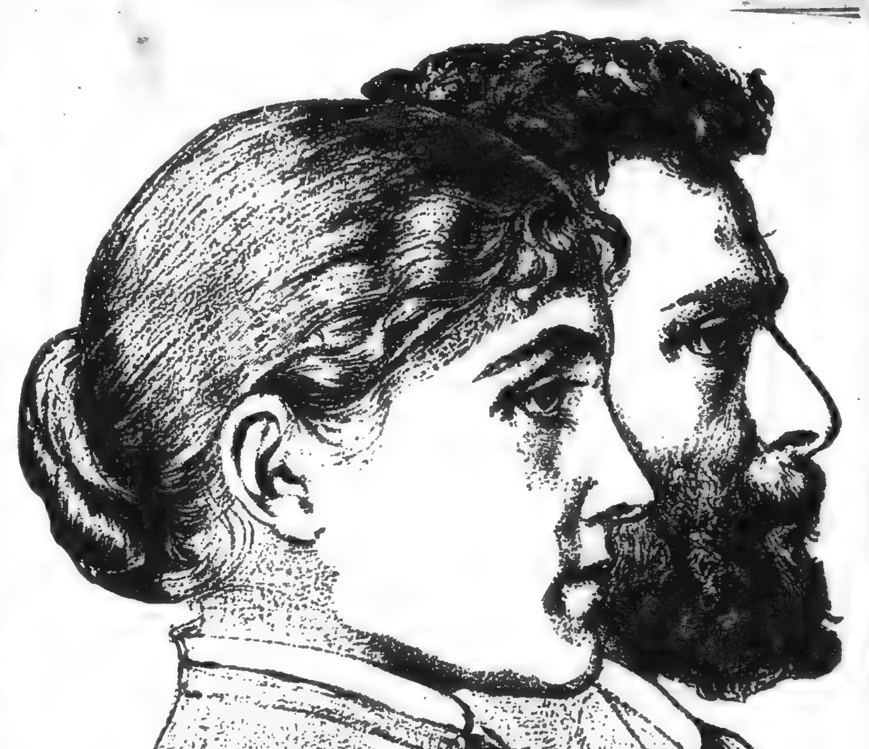
The Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive in Boston Monday morning, having then completed its sixth annual tour.

Eighteen concerts have been given in fourteen different cities, the audiences limited to the utmost capacity of the various halls, while the enthusiasm displayed upon every appearance of this matchless organization has been of the wildest description.

Artistically and financially the tour has proved the most successful in the history of the orchestra, which success is due in a large degree to the skillful management of Mr. C. A. Ellis.

The PRESTO

CHICAGO, MAY 19, 1892.



MR. AND MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL.

Saturday night in the South Congregational Church those two true artists, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, will give another of their enjoyable recitals.

Mrs. Henschel is the most enjoyable ballad singer that ever visits Chicago. Charming in manner, the possessor of a voice whose tone is velvet, she uses it with true appreciation of her wonderful gift.

Mr. Georg Henschel has done the cause of art great service in a fourfold capacity as composer, director, singer and teacher. In all four capacities he has displayed the true artist that lies within. As an accompanist he is unequalled. These two artists give recitals that are a source of delight to all auditors.

DEMOCRAT, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date 5/15

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Some Criticisms of the Program—It Was Too Heavy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been in Grand Rapids and left a bright spot in the memory of musical events of the past. Hartman hall was the scene of as brilliant an event as has ever graced its large auditorium—a splendid assembly of well dressed and cultured ladies and gentlemen, representing the best elements of refined and educated society. The event was of great musical importance and naturally has given rise to much comment. The program was a splendid one. It was a compliment to Grand Rapids to have such a program presented and was greatly to the credit of the gentlemen who were enterprising enough to bring the orchestra here. The program was severe, and there are few who could take in and digest that amount of high-class music. Even educated musicians become sated and fatigued after carefully listening for a time to classical music. As to the rest of the audience, as soon as the music given requires any brain effort and becomes anything more than a pleasurable sensation, just so sure will the pleasure seeker recalcitrate and find fault. There is such a thing as intellectual pleasure, that is certainly of a higher and more commendable order than the mere tickling of the senses. Those honest, self assertive individuals who advertise that they "hate classical music," want something with a "tune to it," and want light programs, are right as far as their own entertainment is concerned; but the cultivation and propagation of such sentiments is a blight on culture and progress. Good music should be fostered and encouraged like good literature, good art and good morals, and not discountenanced and neglected to a cheap order of trivial and sensual entertainment. It is becoming every day a stronger element in ethical culture. That sentiment which would lead one to lapse from the better class of music in favor of the more rhythm emotional, is the same sentiment that would down our high schools and degrade all the best instincts and policy of intellectual progress. But a program can be too long and too exacting for the average listener, and the length and high character of the program on Monday has caused much comment to this effect. Long it may perhaps have been, but no music can be too good. The Schumann Symphony occupied its proper position, i. e. first on the program, as this was the most difficult to understand. Its rendition was perfection. In no city in the world could it have been better given. The Liszt Concerto as played by d'Albert, justifies all that has been said or written of this prodigious little giant. Liszt's music is brilliant and fascinating, if it is, at the same time, superficial and insincere, and d'Albert interspersed it with meteoric effect. It was a marvellous effort. The other solo numbers added to the program by the pianist were given only as he can play them. Pity it was that the piano he is paid to play upon was so wooden and deficient in treble resonance that the more brilliant piano effects were not brought out as his handling deserved.

D'Albert is a wonderful little man, of great intellectual strength as well as a consummate artist. His habits are extremely simple. He eschews the license and conviviality so customary with musicians. Instead of stifling his excited nerves in a beer hall, he leaves the concert room after his numbers are performed and goes directly to bed. He is a strict vegetarian and is very particular in the keeping of his health. Like Tansig, d'Albert has very small hands, but they are of steel and rubber. If many pianists in this city were disappointed in this artist, it is due to two good causes—first, the depressing implement upon which he played; second, the fact that these critics do not know how to judge piano playing, but simply know what pleases them. European, or rather cosmopolitan, criticism has established beyond any question the position of Eugene d'Albert, and, first impressions notwithstanding, he may be regarded, to quote Scharwenka's remarks a few weeks since, "the greatest of them all." Most people would have enjoyed a few pieces upon the program which did not require so much exhaustion of brain fibre. There are many good compositions which would be admirably adapted for this purpose; things which would be a relief from the highly classical character of the Monday program—pleasing to listen to, and yet thoroughly good and not compromising the high standard of the program. But Mr. Nikisch claims that he will have nothing but the highest standard of classical music, and as the best criticism in New York, Boston and Europe has determined what this standard is, Mr. Nikisch's audiences must come up to the line or do without. So far the policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been successful in increasing its reputation, and in nearly every city where it appeared has resulted in its recall for more concerts.

HENRY C. POST.

[223]

PITTSBURG DISPATCH
FRIDAY, MAY 13,

THE FIRST CONCERT

Of the Boston Symphony Series Given by the Mozart Club

SCORES A DECIDED SUCCESS.

A Programme That Tested Attentive Auditors and Proved That

PITTSBURG IS ADVANCING MUSICALLY

It is safe to say that Pittsburg has never before heard a concert devoted exclusively to instrumental music, at all comparable to the first of the Mozart Club's present series, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, given last evening at Old City Hall.

Indeed, since Mr. Theodore Thomas' earlier tours some 20 years ago, this city has had no concert of the first magnitude wholly given up to the instruments. The human voice is justly esteemed as the most expressive of all the vehicles of musical interpretation. Because of this quality, as also because of the aid derived from the words, vocal music has always held first place in the affection of the great mass of people. And yet, instrumental music—absolute music, soaring beyond the limits of speech into the boundless upper ether of thought and feeling—this is the truest and highest music. When music and poetry are wedded, it is the former that condescends.

There is much significance, therefore, in the fact that last night a great Pittsburg audience sat for two hours and a quarter on hard, narrow chairs in an unattractive hall and listened with unflagging attention and growing enthusiasm to a concert from which the most beautiful species of tone and the most commonly admired species of music were conspicuously absent. It is a fact that speaks much both for performers and for hearers.

The Programme Out of the Ordinary.

With the slight changes noted below, this was the programme they listened to:

Berlioz—Overture, "Benvenuto Cellini."
Chopin—Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11.
(a) Allegro Maestoso.
(b) Romance: Larghetto.
(c) Rondo: Vivace.
Mr. Eugen D'Albert.
Goldmark—Symphony, "Rustic Wedding."
(a) Wedding March, with variations: Moderate molto
(b) Bridal Song: Allegretto.
(c) In the Garden: Andante,
(d) Dance: Finale, Allegro molto.
Soli for Violoncello.
(a) Bach, Sarabande.
(b) Schubert, Moment Musical.
(c) Klengel, Capriccio,
Mr. Alwn Schroeder.
Wagner—(a) Prelude "Lohengrin."
(b) "Huldigungs March."

Viewed in the light of Pittsburg's particular needs, these selections were not just what they ought to have been. But that is another story; one that can best be told in Sunday's retrospect of the whole series.

Viewed from a more general standpoint and upon its own merits, this is an admirable specimen of Mr. Nikisch's skill in the art of programme making. In some respects it is the best, as it is the longest, of all the programmes made up by the Boston band for its five visits to this city. Conductors are not wont to vouchsafe to us provincials a spmphony and a concerto on the same programme. Pittsburg must, indeed, be advancing musically.

Goldmark's first symphonic work is more accurately described as an orchestral suite of five parts—the third of which, a serenade, is frequently omitted, as on this occasion. The first and longest movement figured on one of the former local programmes of the Boston orchestra; its thirteen strongly contrasted variations evidence Goldmark's mastery of orchestral technique and betray much fertility of invention. The "Bridal Song," with its naive, simple phrases, smacks most of the countryside. Those two lovers "in the garden" are certainly not a pair of country bumpkins; it is the tongue of Isolde laden with sublime, passionate devotion that speaks there—not the uncouth utterance of Audrey. There is more rusticity again in the finale, in which the nuptial festivities seem to get fast and furious, putting a very exciting climax to the work.

X The Orchestra in Good Condition. X X

The orchestra was in superb condition last night, in spite of the stormy lake voyage of the morning that threatened to keep it from getting here in time for the concert, even by the special train provided. Mr. Gericke's invaluable legacy of technical refinement and precision has been kept intact by Mr. Nikisch, who has now had time to impress his own artistic personality upon his men and give added warmth and charm to their performance. The playing throughout the evening was immaculately clean, wonderfully finished and splendidly virile. Mr. Nikisch, being most at home in the modern romantic school, gave a most sympathetic and ardent interpretation to each of the orchestral works chosen, of which all but the symphony were already known to the local audience.

Chopin's E minor concerto, if memory serves, has not been heard here in many years; perhaps, not at all. It is an early work of the great pianoforte composer whose refined face is so maligned in the programme-book. (By the way, why does the descriptive writer call "Benvenuto Cellini" Berlioz's only opera?" Surely "Les Troyens" should be remembered, if not performed.) Orchestral writing was not Chopin's forte; he had to get someone else to score his two concertos and others have since tinkered at them considerably. Naturally the concertos are not consideren his best works. Nevertheless, the work given last night has many inspired moments and it abounds in those beautiful, idiomatic pianoforte figures and passages that Chopin alone could write.

Mr. D'Albert made the most effect with the more brilliant portions of the concerto, although the lovely larghetto was given with much feeling and finesse. It was the splendid passage-work of the allegro and the tremendously exciting climax of the rondo, however (what a wonderful delivery of those interlocking octaves!), that the little giant of the keyboard fairly enthused his audience. The storm of applause refused to be stilled until Mr. D'Albert sat down and played the familiar Chopin Valse in A flat. It was a genuine ovation.

A European Reputation Upheld.

Mr. Alwin Schroeder, although quite unknown to most of his hearers, also excited their enthusiasm to a degree that amply upheld his great European reputation. It is a pity that an artist of this caliber could not have been heard in some more important work. However, he gave the proper touch of light color to follow the symphony. He substituted the well-known nocturne by Chopin for the Bach piece, and played a tarantelle by Cossman for the third piece, giving the Klengel cappiccio in response to the insistent applause. A sympathetic and truly artistic tone, rarely clear phrasing, true musical feeling and a notable brilliance of execution were among the qualities displayed by Mr. Schroeder. Mr. Nikisch played the pianoforte accompaniments to the 'cello pieces, as he led the orchestral accompaniment of the concerto, with consummate skill and discretion.

This evening the string orchestra will play, in addition to the numbers programmed, an adagio and gavotte by Bach in Bachrich's arrangement. Mr. George Henschel and Mr. D'Albert will be heard in several pieces. The Mozart Club, with the orchestra and Mr. E. H. Dermitt, baritone, will perform Gade's cantata, "Zion," under Mr. Jas. P. McCollum's baton.

C. W. S.

Clipping from ....

....

Date 5-15

SOME discussion has taken place during the past week concerning the extent to which the reception of the Boston Symphony orchestra indicates the advancement of musical taste in Pittsburg. The Boston orchestra played nothing but music of a high order, that is to say, high enough to be out of the reach of people who have not a technical knowledge of the intricacies of the divine art. One critic who speaks with a measure of autocratic force, informs us that the willingness of a large audience to sit out a program of this character lasting more than two hours if proof positive of Pittsburg's progress. Another admits that the audience each night was steeped in gloom, but views the fact that a good-sized audience was present at all as highly encouraging and indicative of forward strides.

To those who have watched the course of musical matters in our city for the past fifteen years it is hardly necessary to recall the circumstance that this gauging of taste like a brand of whisky that improves with nursing in the cellar is a periodic amusement of the gentlemen whose business it is to put opinions on paper. It is the rule with these individuals to represent the community as being engaged in a continual struggle onward and upward towards a place on the same plane with musical professors who revel in counterpoint, shed tears over a fugue, and look with a baleful eye on poor Dave Braham, Gilbert V. Suilivan and other composers who write for the multitude and do not lay themselves out to tax the understanding.

Now, there is no use in going behind the returns and seeking to represent the good people of this town as perpetually striving after the Unattainable. Setting aside the professors of music who fatten on prejudice and the friends of the professors of music who wear out their nervous tissue with sham admiration, the intelligent men and women of Pittsburg are not susceptible of being "educated" up to a point where they can be contented only with Wagner, Saint-Saens and others of that ilk, and must look down with contempt on the plain every day ballad, the song and dance and the jingle of comic opera.

Nine hundred and ninety-nine people out of a thousand have a natural relish for the "Annie Rooney" and "Ta ra ra" style of music. They have no reason to be ashamed of it, and it is bosh to talk of "educating" them out of it. As well talk of educating the American public out of a taste for pie.

If the critics are disposed to question these views, they are respectfully referred to the stars of the concert platform, whose greatest successes are achieved when they descend from classic heights to the level of the simplest ballad music.

REPUBLIC, St. Louis, Mo.

Date 5/16

Eugen d'Albert, who has been playing in Boston and the neighboring towns the past fortnight, and who expressed himself as highly gratified with the success of his American tour, will sail from New York on Tuesday, the 17th. He will probably spend the summer in Switzerland, devoting his time to the completion of several compositions already well under way.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 18, 1892.

The d'Albert Tour.

THE following is a correct list of the performances of Eugen d'Albert in this country this season. He left for Europe yesterday:

March 11 and 12—Boston, Boston Symphony Orchestra, E flat concerto, Beethoven.
March 14—Philadelphia, Boston Symphony Orchestra, E flat concerto, Beethoven.
March 15—Washington, Boston Symphony Orchestra, concerto, Chopin, E minor.
March 17—Baltimore, Boston Symphony Orchestra, concerto, Chopin, E minor.
March 18 and 19—Brooklyn, Boston Symphony Orchestra, E flat Beethoven concerto.
March 21—Pittsburgh, recital.
March 23—Cincinnati, recital.
March 24—Chicago, first recital.
March 26—Chicago, second recital.
March 29—St. Louis, recital.
March 31—Cleveland, recital.
April 1—Detroit, recital.
April 2—Buffalo, recital.
April 5—New York, first recital.
April 6—Providence, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Chopin concerto, E minor.
April 7—New York, second recital.
April 9—New York, third recital.
April 11—Baltimore, recital.
April 18—Boston, first recital.
April 19—Cambridge, recital.
April 20—Boston, second recital. Afternoon.
April 20—Providence, recital. Evening.
April 22—Cambridge, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Chopin E minor.
April 23—Worcester, recital.
April 26—Lowell, recital.
April 28—Portland, Me., recital.

TOUR WITH BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

May 2—New York, concertos, Chopin E minor and Liszt E flat.
May 3—Buffalo, Chopin E minor concerto.
May 4—Cleveland, Liszt E flat concerto, solos.
May 5—Columbus, Liszt E flat concerto.
May 6—Cincinnati, Beethoven E flat concerto.
May 7—Chicago, Chopin E minor concerto.
May 9—Grand Rapids, Liszt E flat concerto and solos.
May 10—Ann Arbor, Chopin E minor concerto.
May 11—Detroit, Liszt E flat concerto.
May 12—Pittsburgh, Chopin E mincr.
May 13—Pittsburgh, solo, Chopin A flat polonaise; solo, Rubinstein C major etude.

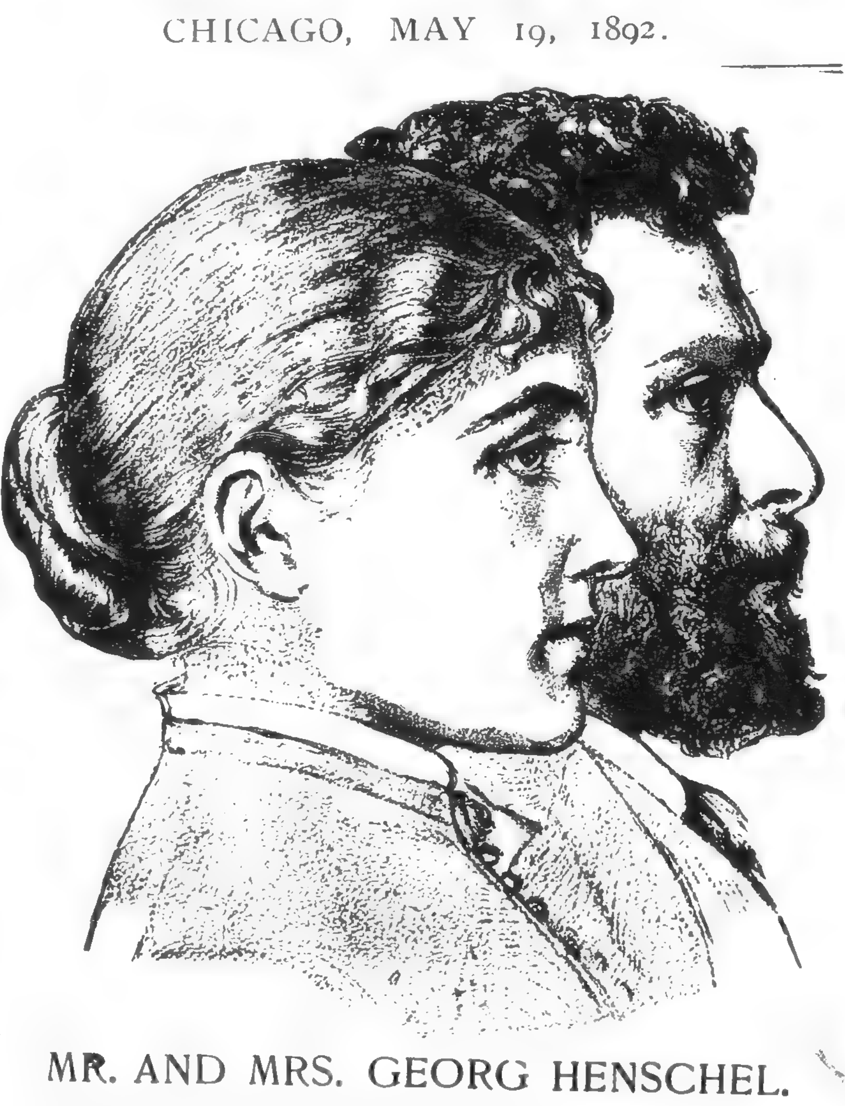
The Boston Symphony Orchestra will arrive in Boston Monday morning, having then completed its sixth annual tour.

Eighteen concerts have been given in fourteen different cities, the audiences limited to the utmost capacity of the various halls, while the enthusiasm displayed upon every appearance of this matchless organization has been of the wildest description.

Artistically and financially the tour has proved the most successful in the history of the orchestra, which success is due in a large degree to the skillful management of Mr. C. A. Ellis.

The PRESTO

CHICAGO, MAY 19, 1892.



MR. AND MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL.

Saturday night in the South Congregational Church those two true artists, Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, will give another of their enjoyable recitals.

Mrs. Henschel is the most enjoyable ballad singer that ever visits Chicago. Charming in manner, the possessor of a voice whose tone is velvet, she uses it with true appreciation of her wonderful gift.

Mr. Georg Henschel has done the cause of art great service in a fourfold capacity as composer, director, singer and teacher. In all four capacities he has displayed the true artist that lies within. As an accompanist he is unequalled. These two artists give recitals that are a source of delight to all auditors.

DEMOCRAT, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date 5/15

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Some Criticisms of the Program—It Was Too Heavy.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has been in Grand Rapids and left a bright spot in the memory of musical events of the past. Hartman hall was the scene of as brilliant an event as has ever graced its large auditorium—a splendid assembly of well dressed and cultured ladies and gentlemen, representing the best elements of refined and educated society. The event was of great musical importance and naturally has given rise to much comment. The program was a splendid one. It was a compliment to Grand Rapids to have such a program presented and was greatly to the credit of the gentlemen who were enterprising enough to bring the orchestra here. The program was severe, and there are few who could take in and digest that amount of high-class music. Even educated musicians become sated and fatigued after carefully listening for a time to classical music. As to the rest of the audience, as soon as the music given requires any brain effort and becomes anything more than a pleasurable sensation, just so sure will the pleasure seeker recalcitrate and find fault. There is such a thing as intellectual pleasure, that is certainly of a higher and more commendable order than the mere tickling of the senses. Those honest, self assertive individuals who advertise that they "hate classical music," want something with a "tune to it," and want light programs, are right as far as their own entertainment is concerned; but the cultivation and propagation of such sentiments is a blight on culture and progress. Good music should be fostered and encouraged like good literature, good art and good morals, and not discountenanced and neglected to a cheap order of trivial and sensual entertainment. It is becoming every day a stronger element in ethical culture. That sentiment which would lead one to lapse from the better class of music in favor of the more rhythm emotional, is the same sentiment that would down our high schools and degrade all the best instincts and policy of intellectual progress. But a program can be too long and too exacting for the average listener, and the length and high character of the program on Monday has caused much comment to this effect. Long it may perhaps have been, but no music can be too good. The Schumann Symphony occupied its proper position, i. e. first on the program, as this was the most difficult to understand. Its rendition was perfection. In no city in the world could it have been better given. The Liszt Concerto as played by d'Albert, justifies all that has been said or written of this prodigious little giant. Liszt's music is brilliant and fascinating, if it is, at the same time, superficial and insincere, and d'Albert interspersed it with meteoric effect. It was a marvellous effort. The other solo numbers added to the program by the pianist were given only as he can play them. Pity it was that the piano he is paid to play upon was so wooden and deficient in treble resonance that the more brilliant piano effects were not brought out as his handling deserved.

D'Albert is a wonderful little man, of great intellectual strength as well as a consummate artist. His habits are extremely simple. He eschews the license and conviviality so customary with musicians. Instead of stifling his excited nerves in a beer hall, he leaves the concert room after his numbers are performed and goes directly to bed. He is a strict vegetarian and is very particular in the keeping of his health. Like Tansig, d'Albert has very small hands, but they are of steel and rubber. If many pianists in this city were disappointed in this artist, it is due to two good causes—first, the depressing implement upon which he played; second, the fact that these critics do not know how to judge piano playing, but simply know what pleases them. European, or rather cosmopolitan, criticism has established beyond any question the position of Eugene d'Albert, and, first impressions notwithstanding, he may be regarded, to quote Scharwenka's remarks a few weeks since, "the greatest of them all." Most people would have enjoyed a few pieces upon the program which did not require so much exhaustion of brain fibre. There are many good compositions which would be admirably adapted for this purpose; things which would be a relief from the highly classical character of the Monday program—pleasing to listen to, and yet thoroughly good and not compromising the high standard of the program. But Mr. Nikisch claims that he will have nothing but the highest standard of classical music, and as the best criticism in New York, Boston and Europe has determined what this standard is, Mr. Nikisch's audiences must come up to the line or do without. So far the policy of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been successful in increasing its reputation, and in nearly every city where it appeared has resulted in its recall for more concerts.

HENRY C. POST.

Musical Matters.

Review
Grand Rapids Mich
Feb 19

ON Monday evening Hartman's Hall was indeed a gala sight. The bright lights, the evening gowns of many of the ladies, the charming neutral background of the artistic hall, enhanced the effect of the grandest musical event ever given in our city. An auditor possessing a poetic soul was lifted to the heights of divine feeling by the weird, grand strains from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the noted Mr. Arthur Nikisch as conductor. The program comprised excellent selections from such noted composers as Shumann, Liszt, Wagner and Weber. How different the works of these are! Their very lives seemed instilled into their compositions, as was shown to good advantage in the first number, which was Shumann's Symphony No. 1, in B-flat. Much of his early works are sad, and cold, which was but a counterpart of his life at that time. Later fortune favored him, and with a burst of his happiness he fairly thrilled his "Spring Symphony" with joyous melody, handling the entire theme with striking and effective movements. Liszt's Concerto for pianoforte, in E-flat, was inspiring. In this concerto the orchestral movements are but a bold, strong background for the solo instrument. From beginning to end it is one of the most difficult and brilliant pieces for both orchestra and piano. Mr. Eugen D'Albert is a musician whose soul seems filled with emotion. There is a certain delicious expressiveness about his playing that catches one's ear with rapture. Each and every note comes from his touch a sharp tone of sweetness. One's first impression of D'Albert was that of his unusual power and originality of treatment. Through the voice of the instrument he exerted a fascinating influence over the vast audience. Later in the evening he rendered two numbers not on the program—Chopin's exquisite "Berceuse," and that creative theme by Straus, "Man Lives but Once," adapted from the original orchestra score by Tousig. Technically speaking, his tender yet masterly handling was above criticism. Perhaps to the general ear Wagner's sweet prelude to Lohengrin and Weber's delicate overture to "Oberon" might have touched them as most pleasing. But who can hear the grand rendering of Wagner's "Siegfried" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and not fairly see Siegfried on his journey, feel his love for Brunnhilde, and almost behold the rising sun. In fact, before our very eyes the scenes from "Siegfried" were passing in regular rotation. Most all musicians are familiar with the overture to "Oberon." The fanciful fairy music of the first movement, which is followed by the storm and shipwreck, is but a repetition of realistic feeling. It needed the artistic appreciation of such a perfectly trained orchestra to render in a perfectly satisfactory manner the music selected for this program. THE REVIEW felt delighted to see that the public appreciated the efforts of the gentlemen connected in bringing such a rare treat to Grand Rapids.

HERALD, Rochester, N. Y.

Date 5-21

One More Musical Event.

A great deal of interest has been awakened by the announcement that one of those musical entertainments in which Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel have made such a delightful impression on music lovers in other cities, is to be given here under the auspices of the Tuesday Musicale next Thursday evening at Music Hall.

Their programmes are described as charming in their simplicity and variety; artistically rendered, instructive to students and especially delightful to the average listener. Mrs. Henschel is particularly commended for the sweetness and purity of her voice and method; and Mr. Henschel for his dramatic power. Both have been singing recently with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and at the Handel and Haydn festivals. The programme announced for the Rochester engagement of these talented and celebrated singers is as follows:

Duet from "Giannina E Bernadone"..Cimarosa
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
a Air from "Hercules" }
b Recitative and Air from "Alessandro" } .... Handel
Mrs. Henschel.
a Song of the Harem Keeper from "Il Seraglio"..................Mozart
b Crugantino's Song from Goethe's "Claudine Von Villa Bella," 1790 ....Beethoven
Mr. Henschel.
a Loreley..................................Liszt
b Spinning Wheel......................Henschel
c Glen of Kenmare......................Old Irish
Mrs. Henschel.
a Wohin? ....Schubert
b Asra..................................Rubinstein
c Erlking ....Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Duet—Gondoliera ....Henschel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
a Midi Au Village...........A. Goring Thomas
b Serenade Du Passant..................Massenet
c May Song..............................A. Hervey
Mrs. Henschel.
a Air from "Jean De Paris"............Boieldiau
b Grenadiers ....Schumann
Mr. Henschel.
Duetto Buffo from "Don Pasquale"....Donizetti
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

So high an authority as the New York Tribune, in its issue of March 26th, speaks in these enthusiastic terms of the singing of the Henschels: "There were three affairs of first class importance to enlist the attention of music lovers yesterday. The Henschel matinee was so thoroughly delightful that it gives the keenest pleasure to announce that the public interest manifested has been sufficient to persuade the management to give a supplementary recital next Saturday. The entertainment provided by the remarkably gifted artist couple is of so lofty and refined a character that to see it so thoroughly appreciated, as was the case yesterday, is to keep one's faith in the ultimate triumph of good art alive. There is nothing factitious about these recitals, which are conducted with perfect dignity, and in their way provide pleasure of the highest kind. Each recital is a highly suggestive lesson in musical history, as well as an entertainment; and we could wish that the number was extended to a dozen, if that was practicable. Yesterday's concert aroused enthusiasm at the very outset."

Next Monday morning at 9 o'clock at Scrantom, Wetmore & Co.'s the diagram for this concert will be opened to those persons only who have already purchased their tickets before going to reserve their seats. Tuesday morning at the same hour and place the sale to the general public will commence. Music Hall will undoubtedly hold a very large audience next Thursday evening.

Leader
Pitsburg
May 22

The song recital of the Henschels drew nearly all the members of the Art society to the Pittsburg club theater last Tuesday evening. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were in excellent voice and gave a delightful entertainment. The program rendered follows:

Duet from "Giannina e Bernadone," ....Cimarosa
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Air from "Alessandro,"................Handel
Mrs. Henschel.
Crugantino's song from Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella," (1790)......Beethoven
Mr. Henschel.
(a) The Lorley..................................Liszt
(b) The Spinning Wheel... ....Henschel
(c) The Glen of Kenmare..............Old Irish
Mrs. Henschel.
(a) Wohin?...............................Schubert
(b) The Erl-King.. ....Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Duet—"Gondoliera"....................Henschel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
(a) Midi au Village.........A. Goring Thomas
(b) Serenade du Passant.............Massenet
(c) May Song.........................A. Hervey
Mrs. Henschel.
Archibald Douglas........................Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Don Pasquale,"........Donizetti
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

HERALD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 7.24

The Boston Symphony Orchestra have only booked one date for Baltimore so far, on account of the impossibility of getting a suitable place. The Music Hall will hardly be ready for the Bostons during the coming season, and the Baltimore lovers of music will have to forego most of that most delightful luxury.

Mr. Charles Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, is in Europe on a visit with his friends Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel. Before leaving America he succeeded in securing one date for a concert here. It will take place at Ford's Opera House, Monday evening, October 31.

BOSTON, May 21st, 1892.

I HEREBY AGREE to play at the Promenade Concerts to be given in Music Hall each evening, except Sundays, for six weeks, beginning Tuesday Evening, May 31st, 1892, and to attend all Rehearsals. I further agree to be present at every Rehearsal and Concert, (except in case of illness), and to send no substitutes. Salary to be Dollars per week.

....

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 25, 1892.

Buffalo Music.

BUFFALO, May 16.

QUITE like the old Leipsic times did it seem at the Star Theatre last week, when Nikisch, Schroeder and d'Albert were on the stage with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A royal concert did they give and a royal house greeted them. Nikisch is a bit shorter haired, Schroeder's locks have grown still thinner and his fingers longer and d'Albert's mustache is that of the man now—otherwise they are as they were in '84. Bless me! It is nearly ten years ago—and here am I living a life of single cussedness still! But not for much longer, Deo gratia!

Now don't say Dominus vobiscum!

* * * *

Mr. Nikisch Invited.—Conductor Arthur Nikisch has been invited by Director Jahn to conduct one of the concerts at the Vienna Musical Exhibition. Mr. Nikisch had to decline the honor, as he will not leave this country during the present summer season.

Musical Matters.

Review
Grand Rapids Mich
5/17

ON Monday evening Hartman's Hall was indeed a gala sight. The bright lights, the evening gowns of many of the ladies, the charming neutral background of the artistic hall, enhanced the effect of the grandest musical event ever given in our city. An auditor possessing a poetic soul was lifted to the heights of divine feeling by the weird, grand strains from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with the noted Mr. Arthur Nikisch as conductor. The program comprised excellent selections from such noted composers as Shumann, Listz, Wagner and Weber. How different the works of these are! Their very lives seemed instilled into their compositions. as was shown to good advantage in the first number, which was Shumann's Symphony No. 1, in B-flat. Much of his early works are sad, and cold, which was but a counterpart of his life at that time. Later fortune favored him, and with a burst of his happiness he fairly thrilled his "Spring Symphony" with joyous melody, handling the entire theme with striking and effective movements. Liszt's Concerto for pianoforte, in E-flat, was inspiring. In this concerto the orchestral movements are but a bold, strong background for the solo instrument. From beginning to end it is one of the most difficult and brilliant pieces for both orchestra and piano. Mr. Eugen D'Albert is a musician whose soul seems filled with emotion. There is a certain delicious expressiveness about his playing that catches one's ear with rapture. Each and every note comes from his touch a sharp tone of sweetness. One's first impression of D'Albert was that of his unusual power and originality of treatment. Through the voice of the instrument he exerted a fascinating influence over the vast audience. Later in the evening he rendered two numbers not on the program—Chopin's exquisite "Berceuse," and that creative theme by Straus, "Man Lives but Once," adapted from the original orchestra score by Tousig. Technically speaking, his tender yet masterly handling was above criticism. Perhaps to the general ear Wagner's sweet prelude to Lohengrin and Weber's delicate overture to "Oberon" might have touched them as most pleasing. But who can hear the grand rendering of Wagner's "Siegfried" by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and not fairly see Siegfried on his journey, feel his love for Brunnhilde, and almost behold the rising sun. In fact, before our very eyes the scenes from "Siegfried" were passing in regular rotation. Most all musicians are familiar with the overture to "Oberon." The fanciful fairy music of the first movement, which is followed by the storm and shipwreck, is but a repetition of realistic feeling. It needed the artistic appreciation of such a perfectly trained orchestra to render in a perfectly satisfactory manner the music selected for this program. THE REVIEW felt delighted to see that the public appreciated the efforts of the gentlemen connected in bringing such a rare treat to Grand Rapids.

Leader
Pitsburg
May 22

The song recital of the Henschels drew nearly all the members of the Art society to the Pittsburg club theater last Tuesday evening. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel were in excellent voice and gave a delightful entertainment. The program rendered follows:

Duet from "Giannina e Bernadone," .... Cimarosa
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Air from "Alessandro," .... Handel
Mrs. Henschel.
Crugantino's song from Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella," (1790) ...... Beethoven
Mr. Henschel.
(a) The Lorley .... Liszt
(b) The Spinning Wheel .... Henschel
(c) The Glen of Kenmare .... Old Irish
Mrs. Henschel.
(a) Wohin? .... Schubert
(b) The Erl-King .... Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Duet—"Gondoliera" .... Henschel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
(a) Midi au Village .... A. Goring Thomas
(b) Serenade du Passant .... Massenet
(c) May Song .... A. Hervey
Mrs. Henschel.
Archibald Douglas .... Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Duet from "Don Pasquale," .... Donizetti
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

HERALD, Rochester, N. Y.

Date 5-21

45

One More Musical Event.

A great deal of interest has been awakened by the announcement that one of those musical entertainments in which Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel have made such a delightful impression on music lovers in other cities, is to be given here under the auspices of the Tuesday Musicale next Thursday evening at Music Hall.

Their programmes are described as charming in their simplicity and variety; artistically rendered, instructive to students and especially delightful to the average listener. Mrs. Henschel is particularly commended for the sweetness and purity of her voice and method; and Mr. Henschel for his dramatic power. Both have been singing recently with the Boston Symphony Orchestra and at the Handel and Haydn festivals. The programme announced for the Rochester engagement of these talented and celebrated singers is as follows:

Duet from "Giannina E Bernadone" .. Cimarosa
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
a Air from "Hercules"
b Recitative and Air from "Alessandro" } .... Handel
Mrs. Henschel.
a Song of the Harem Keeper from "Il Seraglio" .... Mozart
b Crugantino's Song from Goethe's "Claudine Von Villa Bella," 1790 .... Beethoven
Mr. Henschel.
a Loreley .... Liszt
b Spinning Wheel .... Henschel
c Glen of Kenmare .... Old Irish
Mrs. Henschel.
a Wohin? .... Schubert
b Asra .... Rubinstein
c Erlking .... Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Duet—Gondoliera .... Henschel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
a Midi Au Village .... A. Goring Thomas
b Serenade Du Passant .... Massenet
c May Song .... A. Hervey
Mrs. Henschel.
a Air from "Jean De Paris" .... Boieldiau
b Grenadiers .... Schumann
Mr. Henschel.
Duetto Buffo from "Don Pasquale" .... Donizetti
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

So high an authority as the New York Tribune, in its issue of March 26th, speaks in these enthusiastic terms of the singing of the Henschels: "There were three affairs of first class importance to enlist the attention of music lovers yesterday. The Henschel matinee was so thoroughly delightful that it gives the keenest pleasure to announce that the public interest manifested has been sufficient to persuade the management to give a supplementary recital next Saturday. The entertainment provided by the remarkably gifted artist couple is of so lofty and refined a character that to see it so thoroughly appreciated, as was the case yesterday, is to keep one's faith in the ultimate triumph of good art alive. There is nothing factitious about these recitals, which are conducted with perfect dignity, and in their way provide pleasure of the highest kind. Each recital is a highly suggestive lesson in musical history, as well as an entertainment; and we could wish that the number was extended to a dozen, if that was practicable. Yesterday's concert aroused enthusiasm at the very outset."

Next Monday morning at 9 o'clock at Scrantom, Wetmore & Co.'s the diagram for this concert will be opened to those persons only who have already purchased their tickets before going to reserve their seats. Tuesday morning at the same hour and place the sale to the general public will commence. Music Hall will undoubtedly hold a very large audience next Thursday evening.

HERALD, Baltimore, Md.

Date 7-24

The Boston Symphony Orchestra have only booked one date for Baltimore so far, on account of the impossibility of getting a suitable place. The Music Hall will hardly be ready for the Bostons during the coming season, and the Baltimore lovers of music will have to forego most of that most delightful luxury.

Mr. Charles Ellis, the manager of the orchestra, is in Europe on a visit with his friends Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel. Before leaving America he succeeded in securing one date for a concert here. It will take place at Ford's Opera House, Monday evening, October 31.

BOSTON, May 21st, 1892.

I HEREBY AGREE to play at the Promenade Concerts to be given in Music Hall each evening, except Sundays, for six weeks, beginning Tuesday Evening, May 31st, 1892, and to attend all Rehearsals. I further agree to be present at every Rehearsal and Concert, (except in case of illness), and to send no substitutes. Salary to be   Dollars per week.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 25, 1892.

Buffalo Music.

BUFFALO, May 16.

QUITE like the old Leipsic times did it seem at the Star Theatre last week, when Nikisch, Schroeder and d'Albert were on the stage with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. A royal concert did they give and a royal house greeted them. Nikisch is a bit shorter haired, Schroeder's locks have grown still thinner and his fingers longer and d'Albert's mustache is that of the man now—otherwise they are as they were in '84. Bless me! It is nearly ten years ago—and here am I living a life of single cussedness still! But not for much longer, Deo gratia!

Now don't say Dominus vobiscum!

* * * *

Mr. Nikisch Invited.—Conductor Arthur Nikisch has been invited by Director Jahn to conduct one of the concerts at the Vienna Musical Exhibition. Mr. Nikisch had to decline the honor, as he will not leave this country during the present summer season.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 25, 1892.

Cincinnati News.

TO know all the possibilities of orchestral music one must hear the Boston Symphony. To realize the overpowering mastery of one man in the most tremendous concerto ever composed one must hear d'Albert.

To enjoy in all its fullness the exquisite harmonies of two human voices, blended together with an accompaniment rounded to perfection, one must hear the Henschels.

This great triad Cincinnatians have had the pleasure of hearing within the past two weeks, and if, after sitting amid those harmonies whose divine waves seemed to roll in from the shore of eternity, there is anyone who does not yet know that music is heaven's best gift to man there is no musical salvation for him.

On Friday afternoon, the 6th, preceding the evening concert, the Kneisel Quartet appeared in the Odeon and rendered the following program:

Quartet in D major.......................................Haydn
Allegro moderato. Adagio menuetto. Allegro vivace.
Andante from quartet in D major.............................Tschaikowsky
Quartet in A major, op. 91, No. 3.............................Schumann
Andante expressivo. Allegro molto moderato. Assai agitato.
Adagio molto. Allegro molto vivace.

This program, rich with musical beauties, glowing with inspiration, was rendered by this matchless quartet in a manner to thrill and enthuse a stone.

Time and space forbid here to go into any extended notice. Suffice it to say that this particular concert was one of the brightest gems of the musical year—a very joy to one's soul.

It is impossible to pass this without paying one's respects to certain local matters the concert suggested.

Why do we not have chamber music here? What is the matter with the department in our beloved College of Music, to which we naturally look for this? Why does not the head of the violin department organize a quartet? Surely there is not lack of harmony in harmony's realm! Is there too much choral work and not enough of the legitimate?

It might not be amiss to put several things into print here that would not be pleasant for some people to read, but would nevertheless be interesting information for people in general; but of this more anon.

In the evening the Symphony concert filled the Odeon to overflowing with a cultured audience. D'Albert, in his triumphal rendering of the magnificent "Emperor" concerto, was the star of the evening, and as the glorious climax of the composition filled the hall the audience broke out into salvos of applause that lasted until, after bowing three times, d'Albert came back and gave a little gem by Beethoven. This man is a marvel. His fingers have steel springs in them; his intensity, fury, grandeur, delicacy, shading are unapproachable. In his power he is tremendous, in his softness thrilling.

When his velvety notes ripple like sunbeams off the keyboard a sparkle sunnier than that of wine runs through the veins, and when he storms every nerve grows tense.

What a revelation he is! He sweeps the keys with those magic fingers and heaven is opened. God himself inspired the compositions, and he gives us in every age someone equally inspired to interpret them. But when shall we have d'Albert's successor? Let us hope not for many years. The Boston Symphony Orchestra should be the pride and glory of every American who loves his country and who cares for music for music's sake.

The perfection of this organization is almost incredible when one considers it in all aspects. The tonal shadings, the delicacy, volume, richness and rhythm, the mellow floods of melody that poured forth volumes of exquisite tones that might have strayed from Eden, and, over and above all, one quiet, refined man the leader and soul, an artist with something of heaven in his soul—Nikisch, who belongs not to Boston, but to every musician. If there be such a thing as music, if Beethoven and Mendelssohn and Bach and Wagner and all the great host of composers did not live in vain, then Nikisch cannot go down. Critics or no critics, Nikisch will survive, because music will survive. The eternal must find an exponent.

It is impossible to speak in detail of the numbers of this concert. Here is the program, which speaks for itself:

Symphonic poem, "Les Préludes"..................................Liszt
Unfinished symphony in B minor...............................Schubert
"Pilgrim's March," from "Harold in Italy"........................Berlioz
"Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's rock," "Morning Dawn" and "Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried," and "Die Götterdämmerung," arranged by.................................Hans Richter

On last Wednesday evening Mr. and Mrs. Henschel gave a song recital in the Pike Opera House that was an unequaled feast of melody. Such perfect and rare balancing, such harmonious proportion, such comprehensive sympathy, such conscientious, earnest, finished work has not been heard in this field for lo! these many months. Mrs. Henschel is delicate, artistic, intuitive, comprehensive and graceful. Mr. Henschel is all this, and robust and dramatic, too. The combination of the two was rare and satisfying. When Mrs. Henschel sang it was though a pearl had been transformed into music, and when her husband added his voice it was like an opal—"a pearl with a heart of fire." One could listen to them every night in the week and never weary. We are to have all three of these attractions again next season, wherefore we have much for which to be thankful and much to look forward to.

FIDELIO.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert May 11 at the Lyceum Theatre before one of the largest and most brilliant audiences ever gathered in this city. The performance included Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, the E flat Liszt concerto (d'Albert), the first and fourth movements of the Tschaikowsky suite, op. 55, and the "Eroica" symphony. The performance of the concerto was simply electrifying, and the enthusiasm which greeted its close was of the wildest possible description.

Pittsburgh News.

PITTSBURGH, Pa., May 16, 1892.

THE musical season of 1891–2 is practically coming to an end, and Pittsburgh will soon be left in darkness and gloom, especially after the musical lights have been "shut off" and the whirl of the dynamos ceases. At this season ending condition of things all will be quiet and the musician will "fold his tent, like the Arab, and silently steal away."

One by one have the brilliant musical displays been "marked off" as things of the past, and at last the one great musical moment for which we have anxiously looked for has been entered in the big book of "have beens."

This chief epoch of this year's musical history was given last week and was in the nature of a May musical festival, given by the Mozart Club. The programs of the three concerts, the material, workmanship and workmen of which, especially the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the other artists which appeared, speak for themselves to the effect that a more artistic musical season has never before been given and enjoyed in Pittsburgh

The choral work of the club added much to the success of this quasi festival, but when one hears the perfection of shading to which orchestral performances have been brought by such masterly skill as is undoubtedly possessed by Mr. Nikisch, chorus singing suffers materially by the comparison. This was especially noticeable in these concerts. However, such interpretation of orchestral works ought to be an incentive to our best local choral club to emulate the Boston Symphony Orchestra in dynamic nuances.

Herald Chicago
5/21

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, the distinguished vocalists, will give a recital this evening at the South Congregational Church, Drexel Boulevard and Fortieth Street, under the auspices of the ladies of the Society. The mere announcement should be sufficient to fill the church to the extent of its capacity, as it is a rare opportunity to hear these superb artists. The programme is one of interest and variety and is as follows:

Two Duets—
a From "Joseph"...............................Mehul
b From "Richard Coeur de Lion"........Gretry
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
a Vergissmeinnicht (Sacred Air)......F. S. Back
b Air from "Rinaldo"...................Handel
Mr. Henschel.
a Polly Willis...............................Dr. Arne
b Nymphs and Shepherds...............Purcell
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballad, "Archibald Douglas" ....Loewe
Mr. Henschel
a "There was an Ancient King" } .....Henschel b Lullaby .... }
c "Meine Leibe ist Grun"................Brahms
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet, "Oh, That We Two Were Maying (MS)...........................Henschel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
a Ballad, "The Ruined Mill"...............Loewe
b Couplets de Vulcain from "Philemon et Bancis"...........................Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
a "The Little Red Lark".......(Old Irish Songs)
b "Le Soir"..................Ambroise Thomas
c Air from Acteon............................Auber
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet, from "Les Voitures Versees"....Boieldien
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

***

Cincinnati Gaz
May 12

THE HENSCHELS.

Opening of the Single Ticket Sale for the May Festival.

With all their wondrous popularity rarely have those charming artists, Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, received a more hearty greeting, or been accorded a more keenly appreciative hearing than last evening, in the Pike Opera-house, on the occasion of their appearance before the Ladies' Musical Club. The handsome theater was in gala dress, the stage setting being a triumph of scenic art, that was enhanced by a chaste addition of foliage plants and flowers. The picture was that of a palatial interior, with Mr. and Mrs. Henschel "at home" to their friends. The audience was brilliant, the major portion of the ladies being in full reception costume, and the men generally obeying the rule for "dress." The two singers have long since established reputations in this musical city; they are almost as well known here as in London or on the further continent, and none are quicker to do them honor than Cincinnati's music-loving circle. All compliment to the ladies of the home organization for bringing them once more Westward. More, the host of outsiders should be ready with a resolution of thanks for the generous spirit that prompted a "public" concert.

There is neither disposition nor is there room for criticism with a performance of such distinct roundness of proportion as the one under reference. While some fault has been found with Mr. Henschel in certain well-established lines of artistic endeavor, and who is there has not a limit to his individual capacity, when he is seated at the piano, whether as accompanist for his talented wife or as a singer of songs to his own accompaniment, every phrase betrays the master musician. The most delightful phase of their mutual labor is a pervading air of absorbing reverence for that which they have to do. There is no obtrusion of individuality but rather a retirement of personality behind the thought to be interpreted, leaving the listener free to enjoyment of the song. This is as rare as it is delightful. It is restful and refreshing. It is the ne plus ultra of art. Throughout a diverse and difficult, though always pleasing and affably contrasted programme, this feeling of restfulness produced by the admirable self poise of the artists was never once intruded upon, and it met a ripe return in enthusiastic manifestations of approval oft indulged and long repeated. The programme was of ample scope; but the degree of insistence was too alarming to admit of refusal, and both were compelled to respond to recalls. What need to refer in a specific way to programme numbers of what must remain as a memory. Those who heard need no such particularization, and the many who were too indifferent to attend would gain nothing from the extended analysis.

Leader
Feb 14th '92

Eugene D'Albert will give his first regular recital on his American tour in Pittsburg March 21 and 22 in Old City hall. Before coming here the great pianist will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra March 11 and 12, then a week with the orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. Then will come his first recital proper of the tour in this city.

Star 3/25/92

AMUSEMENTS.

THE HENSCHELLS.—Yesterday afternoon the Academy of Music contained a very fashionable audience to listen to the vocal recital by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschell. The program was well arranged, so as to show both artists in their best work, and it was sufficiently varied to gratify nearly every shade of musical taste. Both singers have gained in finish since they were last heard in Washington and their singing is now wellnigh perfect. Mrs. Henschell's voice, though not extremely powerful, has a deliciously sympathetic quality, which carries her audience with her and gives the liveliest satisfaction. Mr. Henschell's rich and virile baritone is always listened to with pleasure, and in his numbers yesterday he completely captured his hearers It is rarely that two people can furnish such a complete entertainment, for Mr. Henschell plays his own and his wife's accompaniments, but no more enjoyable concert has been given this season than that of yesterday afternoon. The hope that the Henschells would again visit Washington was very generally expressed.

Wash Post

The Henschel's Recital.

A large and fashionable audience gathered at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon to listen to a vocal recital by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel. The fame which these artists have won in other cities preceded them, and Washington was prepared to appreciate the singers and they were greeted with applause. The programme included duets and solos from Cimarosa, Carissimi, Handel, Beethoven, Loewe, Liszt, Massenet, Schumann, and Donizetti, and two or three ballads.

Mr. Henschel scored his first success in the rendition of "Vittoria, Vittoria," by Carissimi, and the audience was inclined to be a little partial to the rich barytone till Mrs. Henschel sang one of Handel's airs from "Semele." Is was in "Midi au Village" that she was most pleasing. Mrs. Henschel's voice is as sweet as the notes of song birds. Her high notes are full and strong, while the lower ones are as soft and sweet as a mother's lullaby. Mr. Henschel's voice is rich, strong, and of wonderful compass.

EXPRESS, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5/26

THE HENSCHELS IN CONCERT.

A Large, Brilliant and Appreciative Audience Hears These Artists.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel are great favorites in Buffalo socially as well as musically, and the Academy of Music never contained a more brilliant audience than that which greeted this gifted pair last evening. The house was filled and the Buffalo Musical Association, in the person of Mr. Hobart Weed, was greatly pleased thereat, for the box-office receipts more than made good possible losses on the Damrosch concert.

From beginning to end last evening's performance was a treat and an education, showing what perfect taste, thorough vocal culture and, more than all, high intellectual culture and refinement can do for the human voice; showing, further, the perfection to which the art of accompaniment can be carried. The programme ranged all the way from Handel to quaint old Irish ballad, but it was throughout an evidence of the Henschels' high standard. More than half of the selections were comparatively new, and none was hackneyed or musically barren. For each the words were printed on the programme, and this added not a little to the appreciation by the audience, for Mr. and Mrs. Henschel sang in English, German, Italian or French, just as it happened.

Mr. Henschel's magnificent baritone has lost none of its extraordinary power, compass or richness; his phrasing is as nearly perfect as human frailty will permit, and his dramatic force and magnetism are not to be withstood by anyone having a spark of enthusiasm in his make-up. His interpretation of Carl Loewe's familiar ballad, "The Erl-King," of the song of the harem-keeper from Mozart's "Il Seraglio," and of Schumann's "Grenadiers," was a wonderful exhibit of his range from dramatic intensity to delicate humor or pathos. The last-named number was applauded with mighty enthusiasm, which Mr. Henschel finally rewarded with an encore. A dainty song, "The Spinning Wheel," composed by Mr. Henschel, and sung by Mrs. Henschel, was also encored.

Mrs. Henschel's sweet voice and charming manner were displayed to excellent advantage in lighter ballads, such as "Midi au Village," by the lamented A. Goring-Thomas, a serenade by Massenet and a May-song by Hervey, but she is hardly equal in breadth of tone and lung power to such selections as the airs from Handel's "Hercules" and "Alessandro." She sings with exquisite taste and perfect art and has the inestimable advantage of her husband's accompaniments, the like of which was never even approached in this city except by Arthur Nikisch, of whose orchestra Mr. Henschel was, by the way, the first conductor. Mr. Henschel played with matchless grace and wondrous sympathy and expressiveness.

TIMES, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5/26

THE HENSCHEL'S RECITAL.

A Charming Concert by Two Gifted and Refined Artists.

It is not often that any city is honored with a visit from two such refined as well as gifted artists as Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel, and last evening their appearance at the Academy of Music was nothing short of an ovation. It was a brilliant audience thoroughly appreciative of the delightful programme that was presented. There are only a few vocalists in the world who have so completely mastered the art of vocal expression. Such delicacy, purity and richness of tone, charm of manner, magnetic personality, dramatic expression, faultless phrasing and perfect enunciation all seem to be equally combined in Mr. and Mrs. Henschel. The programme was one that brought out the versatility and extraordinary power and resources of the artists. Mrs. Henschel was especially pleasing in "The Spinning Wheel," and Mr. Henschel's interpretation of "The Erl King" was wonderful. Both artists graciously responded to encores. The Buffalo Musical association through the enterprise of Mr. Hobart Weld brought Mr. and Mrs. Henschel to Buffalo.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 150.

SUNDAY, MAY 29, 1892.

CONDUCTOR NIKISCH HONORED.

The following highly complimentary letter was received a few days ago by Conductor Nikisch, who unfortunately is unable to accept the invitation it extends. The selection of Mr. Nikisch as the representative American orchestral conductor is an honor which reflects great credit upon the orchestra with which he is identified.

The commission of the International Exhibition for Music and Drama, Vienna 1892.

[Translation.]

VIENNA, 1892.

Dear Sir: In the richness of the programme arranged for our musical and dramatic exhibition, to be held during the summer under the patronage of his Imperial and Royal Highness the Archduke Carl Ludwig, is included a cyclus of great concerts to be conducted by the most prominent composers and master conductors. The undersigned commission takes the liberty cordially to invite you to confer a higher glory upon our exhibition by conducting one of the proposed symphony concerts. The programme you would kindly select yourself. The exhibition lasts from May 7 to Oct. 7, and you will oblige the committee beyond your kind acceptance of this invitation by naming the date most convenient to you for the concert. Invitations have been extended to the following composers and conductors (in alphabetical order): Brahms, Bruch, Bruckner, Bulow, Cowen, Dvorak, Fuchs, Goldmark, Gounod, Grieg, Levi, Mackenzie, Mascagni, Massenet, Mottl, Rubinstein, Saint-Saens, Schuch, Sgambati, Svendsen, Sullivan, Tschaikowsky and Verdi. Awaiting your early reply, with highest regards.

(Signed) COUNT VON WALDECK,
Vice-president.

The Musical Courier.

PUBLISHED EVERY WEDNESDAY

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 25, 1892.

Cincinnati News.

TO know all the possibilities of orchestral music one must hear the Boston Symphony. To realize the overpowering mastery of one man in the most tremendous concerto ever composed one must hear d'Albert.

To enjoy in all its fullness the exquisite harmonies of two human voices, blended together with an accompaniment rounded to perfection, one must hear the Henschels.

This great triad Cincinnatians have had the pleasure of hearing within the past two weeks, and if, after sitting amid those harmonies whose divine waves seemed to roll in from the shore of eternity, there is anyone who does not yet know that music is heaven's best gift to man there is no musical salvation for him.

On Friday afternoon, the 6th, preceding the evening concert, the Kneisel Quartet appeared in the Odeon and rendered the following program:

Quartet in D major..Haydn
Allegro moderato. Adagio menuetto. Allegro vivace.
Andante from quartet in D major..........................Tschaikowsky
Quartet in A major, op. 91, No. 3.................................Schumann
Andante expressivo. Allegro molto moderato. Assai agitato.
Adagio molto. Allegro molto vivace.

This program, rich with musical beauties, glowing with inspiration, was rendered by this matchless quartet in a manner to thrill and enthuse a stone.

Time and space forbid here to go into any extended notice. Suffice it to say that this particular concert was one of the brightest gems of the musical year—a very joy to one's soul.

It is impossible to pass this without paying one's respects to certain local matters the concert suggested.

Why do we not have chamber music here? What is the matter with the department in our beloved College of Music, to which we naturally look for this? Why does not the head of the violin department organize a quartet? Surely there is not lack of harmony in harmony's realm! Is there too much choral work and not enough of the legitimate?

It might not be amiss to put several things into print here that would not be pleasant for some people to read, but would nevertheless be interesting information for people in general; but of this more anon.

In the evening the Symphony concert filled the Odeon to overflowing with a cultured audience. D'Albert, in his triumphal rendering of the magnificent "Emperor" concerto, was the star of the evening, and as the glorious climax of the composition filled the hall the audience broke out into salvos of applause that lasted until, after bowing three times, d'Albert came back and gave a little gem by Beethoven. This man is a marvel. His fingers have steel springs in them; his intensity, fury, grandeur, delicacy, shading are unapproachable. In his power he is tremendous, in his softness thrilling.

When his velvety notes ripple like sunbeams off the keyboard a sparkle sunnier than that of wine runs through the veins, and when he storms every nerve grows tense.

What a revelation he is! He sweeps the keys with those magic fingers and heaven is opened. God himself inspired the compositions, and he gives us in every age someone equally inspired to interpret them. But when shall we have d'Albert's successor? Let us hope not for many years. The Boston Symphony Orchestra should be the pride and glory of every American who loves his country and who cares for music for music's sake.

The perfection of this organization is almost incredible when one considers it in all aspects. The tonal shadings, the delicacy, volume, richness and rhythm, the mellow floods of melody that poured forth volumes of exquisite tones that might have strayed from Eden, and, over and above all, one quiet, refined man the leader and soul, an artist with something of heaven in his soul—Nikisch, who belongs not to Boston, but to every musician. If there be such a thing as music, if Beethoven and Mendelssohn and Bach and Wagner and all the great host of composers did not live in vain, then Nikisch cannot go down. Critics or no critics, Nikisch will survive, because music will survive. The eternal must find an exponent.

It is impossible to speak in detail of the numbers of this concert. Here is the program, which speaks for itself:

Symphonic poem, "Les Préludes"......................................Liszt
Unfinished symphony in B minor.................................Schubert
"Pilgrim's March," from "Harold in Italy"..........................Berlioz
"Siegfried's passage to Brunnhilde's rock," "Morning Dawn" and "Rhine Journey," from "Siegfried," and "Die Götterdämmerung," arranged by..........................Hans Richter

On last Wednesday evening Mr. and Mrs. Henschel gave a song recital in the Pike Opera House that was an unequaled feast of melody. Such perfect and rare balancing, such harmonious proportion, such comprehensive sympathy, such conscientious, earnest, finished work has not been heard in this field for lo! these many months. Mrs. Henschel is delicate, artistic, intuitive, comprehensive and graceful. Mr. Henschel is all this, and robust and dramatic, too. The combination of the two was rare and satisfying. When Mrs. Henschel sang it was though a pearl had been transformed into music, and when her husband added his voice it was like an opal—"a pearl with a heart of fire." One could listen to them every night in the week and never weary. We are to have all three of these attractions again next season, wherefore we have much for which to be thankful and much to look forward to.

FIDELIO.

◆

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert May 11 at the Lyceum Theatre before one of the largest and most brilliant audiences ever gathered in this city. The performance included Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, the E flat Liszt concerto (d'Albert), the first and fourth movements of the Tschaikowsky suite, op. 55, and the "Eroica" symphony. The performance of the concerto was simply electrifying, and the enthusiasm which greeted its close was of the wildest possible description.

Pittsburgh News.

PITTSBURGH, Pa., May 16, 1892.

THE musical season of 1891-2 is practically coming to an end, and Pittsburgh will soon be left in darkness and gloom, especially after the musical lights have been "shut off" and the whirl of the dynamos ceases. At this season ending condition of things all will be quiet and the musician will "fold his tent, like the Arab, and silently steal away."

One by [illegible] have the brilliant musical displays been "marked off" as things of the past, and at last the one great musical moment for which we have anxiously looked for has been entered in the big book of "have beens."

This chief epoch of this year's musical history was given last week and was in the nature of a May musical festival, given by the Mozart Club. The programs of the three concerts, the material, workmanship and workmen of which, especially the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the other artists which appeared, speak for themselves to the effect that a more artistic musical season has never before been given and enjoyed in Pittsburgh

The choral work of the club added much to the success of this quasi festival, but when one hears the perfection of shading to which orchestral performances have been brought by such masterly skill as is undoubtedly possessed by Mr. Nikisch, chorus singing suffers materially by the comparison. This was especially noticeable in these concerts. However, such interpretation of orchestra works ought to be an incentive to our best local ch[illegible] al club to emulate the Boston Symphony Orchestra in dynam[illegible] nuances.

Herald Chicago
5/21

Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, the distinguished vocalists, will give a recital this evening at the South Congregational Church, Drexel Boulevard and Fortieth Street, under the auspices of the ladies of the Society. The mere announcement should be sufficient to fill the church to the extent of its capacity, as it is a rare opportunity to hear these superb artists. The programme is one of interest and variety and is as follows:

Two Duets—
a From "Joseph".......................................Mebul
b From "Richard Coeur de Lion"........Gretry
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
a Vergissmeinnicht (Sacred Air)......F. S. Back
b Air from "Rinaldo"..........................Handel
Mr. Henschel.
a Polly Willis......................................Dr. Arne
b Nymphs and Shepherds....................Purcell
Mrs. Henschel.
Ballad, "Archibald Douglas"................Loewe
Mr. Henschel
a "There was an Ancient King" }
b Lullaby............................ }.....Henschel
c "Meine Leibe ist Grun"...................Brahms
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet, "Oh, That We Two Were Maying (MS)...Henschel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
a Ballad, "The Ruined Mill"................Loewe
b Couplets de Vulcain from "Philemon et Bancis"..Gounod
Mr. Henschel.
a "The Little Red Lark".......(Old Irish Songs)
b "Le Soir"....................Ambroise Thomas
c Air from Acteon..................................Auber
Mrs. Henschel.
Duet, from "Les Voitures Versees"....Boieldien
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

***

THE HENSCHELS.

Opening of the Single Ticket Sale for the May Festival.

With all their wondrous popularity rarely have those charming artists, Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, received a more hearty greeting, or been accorded a more keenly appreciative hearing than last evening, in the Pike Opera-house, on the occasion of their appearance before the Ladies' Musical Club. The handsome theater was in gala dress, the stage setting being a triumph of scenic art, that was enhanced by a chaste addition of foliage plants and flowers. The picture was that of a palatial interior, with Mr. and Mrs. Henschel "at home" to their friends. The audience was brilliant, the major portion of the ladies being in full reception costume, and the men generally obeying the rule for "dress." The two singers have long since established reputations in this musical city; they are almost as well known here as in London or on the further continent, and none are quicker to do them honor than Cincinnati's music-loving circle. All compliment to the ladies of the home organization for bringing them once more Westward. More, the host of outsiders should be ready with a resolution of thanks for the generous spirit that prompted a "public" concert.

There is neither disposition nor is there room for criticism with a performance of such distinct roundness of proportion as the one under reference. While some fault has been found with Mr. Henschel in certain well-established lines of artistic endeavor, and who is there has not a limit to his individual capacity, when he is seated at the piano, whether as accompanist for his talented wife or as a singer of songs to his own accompaniment, every phrase betrays the master musician. The most delightful phase of their mutual labor is a pervading air of absorbing reverence for that which they have to do. There is no obtrusion of individuality but rather a retirement of personality behind the thought to be interpreted, leaving the listener free to enjoyment of the song. This is as rare as it is delightful. It is restful and refreshing. It is the ne plus ultra of art. Throughout a diverse and difficult, though always pleasing and affably contrasted programme, this feeling of restfulness produced by the admirable self poise of the artists was never once intruded upon, and it met a ripe return in enthusiastic manifestations of approval oft indulged and long repeated. The programme was of ample scope; but the degree of insistence was too alarming to admit of refusal, and both were compelled to respond to recalls. What need to refer in a specific way to programme numbers of what must remain as a memory. Those who heard need no such particularization, and the many who were too indifferent to attend would gain nothing from the extended analysis.

Leader
Feb 14th 192

Eugene D'Albert will give his first regular recital on his American tour in Pittsburg March 21 and 22 in Old City hall. Before coming here the great pianist will play with the Boston Symphony orchestra March 11 and 12, then a week with the orchestra in Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington and Baltimore. Then will come his first recital proper of the tour in this city.

Star 3/25/92

AMUSEMENTS.

THE HENSCHELLS.—Yesterday afternoon the Academy of Music contained a very fashionable audience to listen to the vocal recital by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschell. The program was well arranged, so as to show both artists in their best work, and it was sufficiently varied to gratify nearly every shade of musical taste. Both singers have gained in finish since they were last heard in Washington and their singing is now wellnigh perfect. Mrs. Henschell's voice, though not extremely powerful, has a deliciously sympathetic quality, which carries her audience with her and gives the liveliest satisfaction. Mr. Henschell's rich and virile baritone is always listened to with pleasure, and in his numbers yesterday he completely captured his hearers It is rarely that two people can furnish such a complete entertainment, for Mr. Henschell plays his own and his wife's accompaniments, but no more enjoyable concert has been given this season than that of yesterday afternoon. The hope that the Henschells would again visit Washington was very generally expressed.

The Henschel's Recital.

A large and fashionable audience gathered at the Academy of Music yesterday afternoon to listen to a vocal recital by Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel. The fame which these artists have won in other cities preceded them, and Washington was prepared to appreciate the singers and they were greeted with applause. The programme included duets and solos, from Cimarosa, Carissimi, Handel, Beethoven, Loewe, Liszt, Massenet, Schumann, and Donizetti, and two or three ballads.

Mr. Henschel scored his first success in the rendition of "Vittoria, Vittoria," by Carissimi, and the audience was inclined to be a little partial to the rich barytone till Mrs. Henschel sang one of Handel's airs from "Semele." Is was in "Midi au Village" that she was most pleasing. Mrs. Henschel's voice is as sweet as the notes of song birds. Her high notes are full and strong, while the lower ones are as soft and sweet as a mother's lullaby. Mr. Henschel's voice is rich, strong, and of wonderful compass.

EXPRESS, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5/26

THE HENSCHELS IN CONCERT.

A Large, Brilliant and Appreciative Audience Hears These Artists.

Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel are great favorites in Buffalo socially as well as musically, and the Academy of Music never contained a more brilliant audience than that which greeted this gifted pair last evening. The house was filled and the Buffalo Musical Association, in the person of Mr. Hobart Weed, was greatly pleased thereat, for the box-office receipts more than made good possible losses on the Damrosch concert.

From beginning to end last evening's performance was a treat and an education, showing what perfect taste, thorough vocal culture and, more than all, high intellectual culture and refinement can do for the human voice; showing, further, the perfection to which the art of accompaniment can be carried. The programme ranged all the way from Handel to quaint old Irish ballad, but it was throughout an evidence of the Henschels' high standard. More than half of the selections were comparatively new, and none was hackneyed or musically barren. For each the words were printed on the programme, and this added not a little to the appreciation by the audience, for Mr. and Mrs. Henschel sang in English, German, Italian or French, just as it happened.

Mr. Henschel's magnificent baritone has lost none of its extraordinary power, compass or richness; his phrasing is as nearly perfect as human frailty will permit, and his dramatic force and magnetism are not to be withstood by anyone having a spark of enthusiasm in his make-up. His interpretation of Carl Loewe's familiar ballad, "The Erl-King," of the song of the harem-keeper from Mozart's "Il Seraglio," and of Schumann's "Grenadiers," was a wonderful exhibit of his range from dramatic intensity to delicate humor or pathos. The last-named number was applauded with mighty enthusiasm, which Mr. Henschel finally rewarded with an encore. A dainty song, "The Spinning Wheel," composed by Mr. Henschel, and sung by Mrs. Henschel, was also encored.

Mrs. Henschel's sweet voice and charming manner were displayed to excellent advantage in lighter ballads, such as "Midi au Village," by the lamented A. Goring-Thomas, a serenade by Massenet and a May-song by Hervey, but she is hardly equal in breadth of tone and lung power to such selections as the airs from Handel's "Hercules" and "Alessandro." She sings with exquisite taste and perfect art and has the inestimable advantage of her husband's accompaniments, the like of which was never even approached in this city except by Arthur Nikisch, of whose orchestra Mr. Henschel was, by the way, the first conductor. Mr. Henschel played with matchless grace and wondrous sympathy and expressiveness.

TIMES, Buffalo, N. Y.

Date 5 26

43

THE HENSCHEL'S RECITAL.

A Charming Concert by Two Gifted and Refined Artists.

It is not often that any city is honored with a visit from two such refined as well as gifted artists as Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel, and last evening their appearance at the Academy of Music was nothing short of an ovation. It was a brilliant audience thoroughly appreciative of the delightful programme that was presented. There are only a few vocalists in the world who have so completely mastered the art of vocal expression. Such delicacy, purity and richness of tone, charm of manner, magnetic personality, dramatic expression, faultless phrasing and perfect enunciation all seem to be equally combined in Mr. and Mrs. Henschel. The programme was one that brought out the versatility and extraordinary power and resources of the artists. Mrs. Henschel was especially pleasing in "The Spinning Wheel," and Mr. Henschel's interpretation of "The Erl King" was wonderful. Both artists graciously responded to encores. The Buffalo Musical association through the enterprise of Mr. Hobart Weld brought Mr. and Mrs. Henschel to Buffalo.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 150.

SUNDAY, MAY 29, 1892.

CONDUCTOR NIKISCH HONORED.

The following highly complimentary letter was received a few days ago by Conductor Nikisch, who unfortunately is unable to accept the invitation it extends. The selection of Mr. Nikisch as the representative American orchestral conductor is an honor which reflects great credit upon the orchestra with which he is identified.

The commission of the International Exhibition for Music and Drama, Vienna 1892.

[Translation.]

VIENNA, 1892.

Dear Sir: In the richness of the programme arranged for our musical and dramatic exhibition, to be held during the summer under the patronage of his Imperial and Royal Highness the Archduke Carl Ludwig, is included a cyclus of great concerts to be conducted by the most prominent composers and master conductors. The undersigned commission takes the liberty cordially to invite you to confer a higher glory upon our exhibition by conducting one of the proposed symphony concerts. The programme you would kindly select yourself. The exhibition lasts from May 7 to Oct. 7, and you will oblige the committee beyond your kind acceptance of this invitation by naming the date most convenient to you for the concert. Invitations have been extended to the following composers and conductors (in alphabetical order): Brahms, Bruch, Bruckner, Bulow, Cowen, Dvorak, Fuchs, Goldmark, Gounod, Grieg, Levi, Mackenzie, Mascagni, Massenet, Mottl, Rubinstein, Saint-Saens, Schuch, Sgambati, Svendsen, Sullivan, Tschaikowsky and Verdi. Awaiting your early reply, with highest regards.

(Signed) COUNT VON WALDECK,
Vice-president.

EAGLE, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date 5-22

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

The varied and interesting character of musical attractions in eastern cities this season has been great, but nothing among them all has been at once so artistic and replete with subtle charm as the song recitals of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, similar to that to be given in Hartman hall tomorrow evening. Something of the interest excited by these entertainments may be gathered from the fact that the demand for seats was so great in New York and Boston that a supplementary course had to be given in each city and not even standing room was left at any of them.

They were especially engaged for the Handel and Hayden festivals in Boston and Springfield besides the ten concerts in which they were the soloists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be remembered that Mr. Henschel organized that orchestra and conducted it for three years.

One critic speaks of their work as follows: "The movement of these recitals is perfectly smooth and graceful. There are no hitches. Everything has been thought of,—every song studied in detail, the inflections of each passage made the subject of consideration; and yet withal there is not a suspicion of anything mechanical in these concerts."

No end of comments could be quoted showing the perfect art and the unqualified delight these musical entertainments give. The art of what might be termed parlor singing as distinguished from that of the stage, has not been brought to finer perfection than by these artists. Each has a distinct artistic personality, but they sing together with wonderful unity of style and sentiment. Mrs. Henschel's voice is a pure, sweet soprano, and she sings with a purity of delivery and a refinement of sentiment that would be very difficult to excel. To this is added the peculiar charm of a very attractive presence. Mr. Heuschel's work is equally masterly, displaying extraordinary dramatic adaptability and a fluency of expression very unusual. His voice is a fine, sonorous, musical baritone with the bass quality below (he sings a strong lower F) and the smoothness of a tenor in the upper division.

The following is the programme for the evening:

Duet from "Giannina e Bernadone," .... Cimarosa
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Air from "Hercules," .... } ... Handel
Rec. and Air from "Alessandro," }
Mrs. Henschel.
Song of the Harem-keeper from "Il Seraglio," .... Mozart
Crugantino's song from Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella" (1790), ... Beethoven
Mr. Henschel.
"The Loreley," .... Liszt
"The Spinning Wheel," .... Henschel
"The Glen of Kenmare," .... (Old Irish)
Mrs. Henschel.
"Wohin?" .... Schubert
"Der Asra," .... Rubinstein
"The Erl-king," .... Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Duet, Gondoliera, ... Henschel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
"Midi au Village," .... A. Goring-Thomas
"Serenade du Passant," .... Massenet
"May Song," .... A. Hervey
Mrs. Henschel.
Air from "Jean de Paris," .... Boieldieu
Ballad, "The Grenadiers," .... Schumann
Mr. Henschel.
Duetto, Buffo from "Don Pasquale," .. Donizetti
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

SPY, Worcester, Mass.

Date 5/26

ABOUT $4000 MORE NEEDED.

Sub[illegible]tions for the Boston Sym[illegible] course of next [illegible] reached about $1000. This is one-fifth of what is necessary to bring the orchestra here. Worcester, with its musical reputation, ought to take pride in vigorously pushing the canvass for this magnificent course. The soloists will be the best to be had in the country at that time. Books are open at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s, S. R. Leland & [illegible]n's, and Putnam, Davis & Co.'s.

SENTINEL, Fitchburg, Mass.

Date 7-13

—Fred R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, went through the city, this morning, on his way to Westminster where he vacationizes.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 23, 1892.

MR. AND MRS. George Henschel, Prof. and Mrs. E. M. Bowman, Miss Agnes Huntington and Mrs. C. A. Ellis were passengers on the "City of New York" on the last trip.

REPUBLICAN, Springfield, Mass.

Date 8/8

The subscription list of the Boston symphony orchestra concerts at Worcester has been opened, and over $3000, which is half of the amount necessary to guarantee the concerts, was at once raised. The dates will not be fixed definitely till $4000, two-thirds of the required amount, has been subscribed. Reserved seats are $5 each. Subscriptions are received by Daniel F. Gay, 314 Main street, or by C. L. Gorman & Co. The course will include four concerts, and the dates temporarily assigned are November 2[illegible], December 29, February 16 and March 30.

"NO SECT IN SICKNESS."

THE BOSTON POST'S
GRAND CONCERT
IN AID OF THE
CARNEY HOSPITAL FUND,
At Music Hall, Thursday Evening, July 14, '92.

PROGRAMME.

"THE MAN OF TO-DAY" ....
WILLIE SHELDON.

"YEOMAN'S WEDDING SONG" ....
JOHN BRAND.

"CARNEY HOSPITAL" ....
Original Poem written by Mr. NAT CHILDS, of the Tremont Theatre,
Read by Mr. A. S. LIPMAN,
Of the "By Proxy" Company.

"OH, PROMISE ME" .... De Koven
MARGARET E. KELLEY.

SERENADE ....
SCHUBERT LADIES' QUARTETTE.

PIANO SOLO, "Columbine Minuet" .... Delahaye
MINNIE J. CAUL.

"THE WANDERING MINSTREL" .... Manzoni
Mr. S. KRONBERG.

OVERTURE, "Colleen Bawn" ....
BOSTON MUSEUM ORCHESTRA,
By kind permission of Mr. R. M. Field.

SELECTIONS ....
EDMUND T. PHELAN.

WHISTLING SOLO, "Fleeting Days" .... Bailey
Miss ALICE L. HODGDON.

"THE MOON SHINES BRIGHT" .... Ford
THOMAS E. CLIFFORD.

"OLD FOLKS AT HOME," specially arranged ....
SCHUBERT LADIES' QUARTETTE.

"THE HERMIT" .... Davis
J. C. MIRON.

SELECTIONS ....
EDMUND J. ELTON.

TOPICAL SONG, from "1492" ....
GEORGE A. SCHILLER.

"MY WILD LOVE" .... Neuendorf
A. C. ORCUTT.

"ESMERALDA" Piano Solo ....
MARY E. HENDRICK.

The Concert Grand Piano used at this Entertainment is from the celebrated manufactory of STEINWAY & SONS, and is generously furnished by the M. Steinert & Sons Company, Steinert Hall.

DOORS OPEN AT 7.30. CONCERT AT 8.

KILEY, PRINTER, 7 SPRING LANE, BOSTON.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 8-31

Mr. Charles A. Ellis is back from his European vacation trip and is rapidly completing the scheme for the Boston Symphony season. Among the novelties will be Rudorff's Symphony, No. 2; Saint-Säens' Symphony, opp. 55; Thierot's Symphony; Symphony in F, by D'Albert, and "Petite Suite" by César Cui.

SPY, [illegible]

Date 8/7

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

MORE THAN HALF ENOUGH SUBSCRIB

TO GUARANTEE THE ENTERTAINMENTS.

The subscription list for the symphony course in this city during this winter has been opened and already more than half of the amount necessary to guarantee the concerts has been subscribed. The course will include four concerts by the orchestra with the additional attraction at each entertainment of a soloist of international repute. The dates temporarily assigned are: November 22, December 29, February 16 and March 30. These dates will not be fixed definitely until $4000, two-thirds of the required amount, has been subscribed. Reserved seats for the course are $5 each. Subscriptions will be received by Daniel F. Gay, 314 Main street, or by C. L. Gorham & Co.

The following have already subscribed: J. F. Adams, Benj. D. Allen, E. N. Anderson, the Misses Burnside, Georgia A. Bacon, Mrs. Geo. M. Bassett, Miss Barnard, Mrs. Edwin Brown, Mrs. C. C. Baldwin, Mrs. E. F. Biscoe, F. W. Blacker, W. T. Brown, Mrs. J. W. Biscoe, Mrs. Halleck Bartlett, S. P. Blaisdell, Mrs. Geo. S. Barton, Mrs. T. C. Bates, Ward Bates, Mrs. C. A. Burleson, Gertrude I. Bass, C. M. Burt, Mrs. Bigelow, Dr. Frank Bliven, W. A. Cheney, Miss Chase, Mrs. F. L. Coes, Mrs. J. H. Coes, Miss E. P. Curtis, Mrs. J. H. Cutter, Mrs. M. W. Clarke, Mrs. Edmund Converse, Z. W. Coombs, Frank Carr, Dr. E. T. Colder, Geo. H. Corbett, Stedman Clark, Mrs. Canfield, Mrs. J. K. Comstock, Mrs. Geo. Crompton, Miss Alma Collins, Mrs. F. L. Dean, Mrs. C. H. Doe, Geo. T. Dewey, Mrs. S. F. Dickinson, Mrs. C. H. Davis, Mrs. L. M. Davis, Francis H. Dewey, C. M. DeWitt, H. L. Ellsworth, Thos. B. Eaton, Mrs. M. C. Earle, Mrs. L. A. Ely, Miss. S. Flagg, Edward Fay, Miss Rosie H. Fish, Mrs. Garver, E. B. Glasgow, F. L. Gibbs, Dr. Goodspeed, Miss Hattie Gates, Miss Mabel Gage, Mrs. H. F. Harris, Miss Hammond, Miss Carrie K. Hunt, Mrs. Heidekoper, Mrs. J. P. Hamilton, Mrs. C. H. Hutchins, Mrs. Wm. J. Hogg, L. W. Hammond, Benj. T. Hammond, M. T. Hibbard, Miss Fannie Hair, J. H. Howell, Miss F. N. Houghton, Mrs. W. S. B. Hopkins, Miss Hattie Kennedy, Mrs. L. N. Kinnicutt, Mrs. Frances B. Knowles, Miss Kinsley, Miss E. A. Kimball, Mrs. H. W. Johnson, Charles D. Lawson, Miss F. M. Lincoln, Waldo Lincoln, Mrs. H. B. Lincoln, F. A. Leland, Mrs. C. P. Lawson, Mrs. Jerome Marble, George N. Morse, A. C. Munroe, H. C. Mullett, Mrs. C. A. Merrill, George D. Moore, Mrs. Murdock, Miss Helen F. Marsh, Miss Nella Marble, Mrs. J. C. McMurray, John B. Maynard, C. P. Morrison, Mrs. O. A. Norcross, Mrs. T. L. Nelson, Mrs. Nelson, Mrs. C. H. Prentice, Miss E. A. Pratt, Mrs. Nath. Paine, Miss Perley, Henry L. Parker, Mrs. H. S. Pratt, Mrs. F. W. Ruggles, Mrs. G. I. Rockwood, Mrs. George T. Rice, Mrs. M. T. Rice, Mrs. J. H. Robinson, Mrs. W. W. Rice, Mrs. R. Ruddy, Mrs. W. E. Rice, Mrs. Sargent, Miss M. L. Sanford, Mrs. Henry Sargent, Miss Sargent, Miss A. L. Stoddard, Stephen Salisbury, Miss F. M. Sears, Arthur M. Stone, Mrs. J. A. Titus, Miss Mary F. Tucker, Mrs. S. B. Woodward, Mrs. S. E. Winslow, Mrs. H. A. White, Miss Emily Williams, Rufus S. Woodward, Miss Estelle Ward, B. H. Wright, William Woodward, Mrs. L. G. White and Mrs. Horace Wyman.

EAGLE, Grand Rapids, Mich.

Date 5-22

IN MUSICAL CIRCLES.

The varied and interesting character of musical attractions in eastern cities this season has been great, but nothing among them all has been at once so artistic and replete with subtle charm as the song recitals of Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel, similar to that to be given in Hartman hall tomorrow evening. Something of the interest excited by these entertainments may be gathered from the fact that the demand for seats was so great in New York and Boston that a supplementary course had to be given in each city and not even standing room was left at any of them.

They were especially engaged for the Handel and Hayden festivals in Boston and Springfield besides the ten concerts in which they were the soloists of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It will be remembered that Mr. Henschel organized that orchestra and conducted it for three years.

One critic speaks of their work as follows: "The movement of these recitals is perfectly smooth and graceful. There are no hitches. Everything has been thought of,—every song studied in detail, the inflections of each passage made the subject of consideration; and yet withal there is not a suspicion of anything mechanical in these concerts."

No end of comments could be quoted showing the perfect art and the unqualified delight these musical entertainments give. The art of what might be termed parlor singing as distinguished from that of the stage, has not been brought to finer perfection than by these artists. Each has a distinct artistic personality, but they sing together with wonderful unity of style and sentiment. Mrs. Henschel's voice is a pure, sweet soprano, and she sings with a purity of delivery and a refinement of sentiment that would be very difficult to excel. To this is added the peculiar charm of a very attractive presence. Mr. Heuschel's work is equally masterly, displaying extraordinary dramatic adaptability and a fluency of expression very unusual. His voice is a fine, sonorous, musical baritone with the bass quality below (he sings a strong lower F) and the smoothness of a tenor in the upper division.

The following is the programme for the evening:

Duet from "Giannina e Bernadone," .... Cimarosa
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
Air from "Hercules," .... } ... Handel
Rec. and Air from "Alessandro," }
Mrs. Henschel.
Song of the Harem-keeper from "Il Seraglio," .... Mozart
Crugantino's song from Goethe's "Claudine von Villa Bella" (1790), ... Beethoven
Mr. Henschel.
"The Loreley," .... Liszt
"The Spinning Wheel," .... Henschel
"The Glen of Kenmare," .... (Old Irish)
Mrs. Henschel.
"Wohin?" .... Schubert
"Der Asra," .... Rubinstein
"The Erl-king," .... Loewe
Mr. Henschel.
Duet, Gondoliera, ... Henschel
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.
'Midi au Village," .... A. Goring-Thomas
'Serenade du Passant," .... Massenet
'May Song," .... A. Hervey
Mrs. Henschel.
Air from "Jean de Paris," .... Boieldieu
Ballad, "The Grenadiers," .... Schumann
Mr. Henschel.
Duetto, Buffo from "Don Pasquale." .. Donizetti
Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

SPY, Worcester, Mass.

Date 7/26

ABOUT $4000 MORE NEEDED.

Subscriptions for the Boston Symphony course of next season have reached about $1000. This is one-fifth of what is necessary to bring the orchestra here. Worcester, with its musical reputation, ought to take pride in vigorously pushing the canvass for this magnificent course. The soloists will be the best to be had in the country at that time. Books are open at C. L. Gorham & Co.'s, S. R. Leland & Son's, and Putnam, Davis & Co.'s.

SENTINEL, Fitchburg, Mass.

Date 7-13

—Fred R. Comee, assistant manager of the Boston Symphony orchestra, went through the city, this morning, on his way to Westminster where he vacationizes.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, JULY 23, 1892.

Mr. and Mrs. George Henschel, Prof. and Mrs. E. M. Bowman, Miss Agnes Huntington and Mrs. C. A. Ellis were passengers on the "City of New York" on the last trip.

REPUBLICAN, Springfield, Mass.

Date 8/8

The subscription list of the Boston symphony orchestra concerts at Worcester has been opened, and over $3000, which is half of the amount necessary to guarantee the concerts, was at once raised. The dates will not be fixed definitely till $4000, two-thirds of the required amount, has been subscribed. Reserved seats are $5 each. Subscriptions are received by Daniel F. Gay, 314 Main street, or by C. L. Gorman & Co. The course will include four concerts, and the dates temporarily assigned are November 22, December 29, February 16 and March 30.

"NO SECT IN SICKNESS."

THE BOSTON POST'S GRAND CONCERT

IN AID OF THE

CARNEY HOSPITAL FUND,

At Music Hall, Thursday Evening, July 14, '92.

PROGRAMME.

"The Man of To-day" ....
WILLIE SHELDON.

"Yeoman's Wedding Song" ....
JOHN BRAND.

"Carney Hospital" ....
Original Poem written by Mr. Nat Childs, of the Tremont Theatre,
Read by Mr. A. S. LIPMAN,
Of the "By Proxy" Company.

"Oh, Promise Me" .... De Koven
MARGARET E. KELLEY.

Serenade ....
SCHUBERT LADIES' QUARTETTE.

Piano Solo, "Columbine Minuet" .... Delahaye
MINNIE J. CAUL.

"The Wandering Minstrel" .... Manzoni
Mr. S. KRONBERG.

Overture, "Colleen Bawn" ....
BOSTON MUSEUM ORCHESTRA,
By kind permission of Mr. R. M. Field.

Selections ....
EDMUND T. PHELAN.

Whistling Solo, "Fleeting Days" .... Bailey
Miss ALICE L. HODGDON.

"The Moon Shines Bright" .... Ford
THOMAS E. CLIFFORD.

"Old Folks at Home," specially arranged ....
SCHUBERT LADIES' QUARTETTE.

"The Hermit" .... Davis
J. C. MIRON.

Selections ....
EDMUND J. ELTON.

Topical Song, from "1492" ....
GEORGE A. SCHILLER.

"My Wild Love" .... Neuendorf
A. C. ORCUTT.

"Esmeralda" Piano Solo ....
MARY E. HENDRICK.

The Concert Grand Piano used at this Entertainment is from the celebrated manufactory of Steinway & Sons, and is generously furnished by the M. Steinert & Sons Company, Steinert Hall.

DOORS OPEN AT 7.30. CONCERT AT 8.

KILEY, PRINTER, 7 SPRING LANE, BOSTON.

JOURNAL, Lewiston, Me.

Date 8-31

Mr. Charles A. Ellis is back from his European vacation trip and is rapidly completing the scheme for the Boston Symphony season. Among the novelties will be Rudorff's Symphony, No. 2; Saint-Saëns' Symphony, opp. 55; Thierot's Symphony; Symphony in F, by D'Albert, and "Petite Suite" by César Cui.

Spy, Worcester, Mass.

Date 8/7

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

MORE THAN HALF ENOUGH SUBSCRIBED TO GUARANTEE THE ENTERTAINMENTS.

The subscription list for the symphony course in this city during this winter has been opened and already more than half of the amount necessary to guarantee the concerts has been subscribed. The course will include four concerts by the orchestra with the additional attraction at each entertainment of a soloist of international repute. The dates temporarily assigned are: November 22, December 29, February 16 and March 30. These dates will not be fixed definitely until $4000, two-thirds of the required amount, has been subscribed. Reserved seats for the course are $5 each. Subscriptions will be received by Daniel F. Gay, 314 Main street, or by C. L. Gorham & Co.

The following have already subscribed: J. F. Adams, Benj. D. Allen, E. N. Anderson, the Misses Burnside, Georgia A. Bacon, Mrs. Geo. M. Bassett, Miss Barnard, Mrs. Edwin Brown, Mrs. C. C. Baldwin, Mrs. E. F. Biscoe, F. W. Blacker, W. T. Brown, Mrs. J. W. Biscoe, Mrs. Halleck Bartlett, S. P. Blaisdell, Mrs. Geo. S. Barton, Mrs. T. C. Bates, Ward Bates, Mrs. C. A. Burleson, Gertrude I. Bass, C. M. Burt, Mrs. Bigelow, Dr. Frank Bliven, W. A. Cheney, Miss Chase, Mrs. F. L. Coes, Mrs. J. H. Coes, Miss E. P. Curtis, Mrs. J. H. Cutter, Mrs. M. W. Clarke, Mrs. Edmund Converse, Z. W. Coombs, Frank Carr, Dr. E. T. Colder, Geo. H. Corbett, Stedman Clark, Mrs. Canfield, Mrs. J. K. Comstock, Mrs. Geo. Crompton, Miss Alma Collins, Mrs. F. L. Dean, Mrs. C. H. Doe, Geo. T. Dewey, Mrs. S. F. Dickinson, Mrs. C. H. Davis, Mrs. L. M. Davis, Francis H. Dewey, C. M. De Witt, H. L. Ellsworth, Thos. B. Eaton, Mrs. M. C. Earle, Mrs. L. A. Ely, Miss S. Flagg, Edward Fay, Miss Rosie H. Fish, Mrs. Garver, E. B. Glasgow, F. L. Gibbs, Dr. Goodspeed, Miss Hattie Gates, Miss Mabel Gage, Mrs. H. F. Harris, Miss Hammond, Miss Carrie K. Hunt, Mrs. Heidekoper, Mrs. J. P. Hamilton, Mrs. C. H. Hutchins, Mrs. Wm. J. Hogg, L. W. Hammond, Benj. T. Hammond, M. T. Hibbard, Miss Fannie Hair, J. H. Howell, Miss F. N. Houghton, Mrs. W. S. B. Hopkins, Miss Hattie Kennedy, Mrs. L. N. Kinnicutt, Mrs. Frances B. Knowles, Miss Kinsley, Miss E. A. Kimball, Mrs. H. W. Johnson, Charles D. Lawson, Miss F. M. Lincoln, Waldo Lincoln, Mrs. H. B. Lincoln, F. A. Leland, Mrs. C. P. Lawson, Mrs. Jerome Marble, George N. Morse, A. C. Munroe, H. C. Mullett, Mrs. C. A. Merrill, George D. Moore, Mrs. Murdock, Miss Helen F. Marsh, Miss Nella Marble, Mrs. J. C. McMurray, John B. Maynard, C. P. Morrison, Mrs. O. A. Norcross, Mrs. T. L. Nelson, Mrs. Nelson, Mrs. C. H. Prentice, Miss E. A. Pratt, Mrs. Nath. Paine, Miss Perley, Henry L. Parker, Mrs. H. S. Pratt, Mrs. F. W. Ruggles, Mrs. G. I. Rockwood, Mrs. George T. Rice, Mrs. M. T. Rice, Mrs. J. H. Robinson, Mrs. W. W. Rice, Mrs. R. Ruddy, Mrs. W. E. Rice, Mrs. Sargent, Miss M. L. Sanford, Mrs. Henry Sargent, Miss Sargent, Miss A. L. Stoddard, Stephen Salisbury, Miss F. M. Sears, Arthur M. Stone, Mrs. J. A. Titus, Miss Mary F. Tucker, Mrs. S. B. Woodward, Mrs. S. E. Winslow, Mrs. H. A. White, Miss Emily Williams, Rufus S. Woodward, Miss Estelle Ward, B. H. Wright, William Woodward, Mrs. L. G. White and Mrs. Horace Wyman.

BLANK PAGE

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 4

PROMENADE (POPS)

1892

HALL

ADE

MMES

2.

SHIPMAN'S
Invoice & Scrap BOOK

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

MUSIC HALL
PROMENADE CONCERTS

SEVENTH SEASON.

EVENINGS, EIGHT TO ELEVEN.

GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI, CONDUCTOR.

POPULAR PROGRAMMES,
ABLE SOLOISTS,
FINE FLORAL DISPLAY,
LIGHT REFRESHMENTS.
All the attractive features of past seasons.

FIRST NIGHT.
TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1892.

Programme.

KRONUNGSMARSCH.	Meyerbeer
BALLET MUSIC. "Henry VIII." a) GYPSY DANCE. b) GIGUE.	Saint-Saens
WALTZ. "Kaiser." (new)	Strauss
OVERTURE. "Orpheus."	Offenbach
OVERTURE. "Die Meistersinger."	Wagner
BALLET MUSIC. "Boabdil." a) SCHERZO WALTZ. b) MALAGUENA. (First time in America.)	Moszkowski
HYMN to "St. Cecilia."	Gounod
OVERTURE. "Fledermaus."	Strauss
SELECTION. "Cavalleria Rusticana."	Mascagni
LOIN DES BAL.	Gillet
POLKA. "Libelle."	Strauss
MARCH. "Boccacio."	Suppe

Popular Prices. Reserved Seats on Floor or Balcony 50 Cts.
TICKETS, 25 CENTS.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL. BOSTON, TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1892. SUMMER SEASON. Vol. VII. No. 1.

S. S. P. & CO.

Guinness' Stout
and Bass' Ale.

FOSTER'S BOTTLING,
WHITE LABEL,
and DOG'S HEAD.

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Scollay Square Copley Square.
209 and 211 State Street.

THE
ÆOLIAN

The programme opposite is only one of many you could enjoy in your home any evening, if you possessed an Æolian; and you, yes, you or any member of your family could be the musical director, after a few days' practice. Doubtless our statement seems a broad one, but that does not alter the fact that any one who loves good music need not be without it, and that they can play it for themselves on this instrument with full orchestral effect.

JEAN de RESZKE, the famous tenor, says: "The Æolian affords the performer every facility for interpreting the music with feeling and sentiment."

Furthermore, as the ÆOLIAN has the capacity to make one familiar with the best works of the masters, its value as an educator must not be overlooked. Call and examine it.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Tuesday Evening, May 31, 8 to 11.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	KROENUNGSMARSCH	Meyerbeer
2.	BALLET MUSIC, "Henry VIII." a "Dance de la Gipsy." b "Gigue."	Saint-Saëns
3.	KAISER WALZER First time.	Joh. Strauss
4.	OVERTURE, "Orpheus"	Offenbach
5.	OVERTURE, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
6.	a SCHERZO WALTZ b MALAGUENA } from "Boabdil" First time in America.	Moszkowski
7.	HYMN TO ST. CECILIA	Gounod
8.	OVERTURE, "Fledermaus"	J. Strauss
9.	SELECTION from "Cavalleria Rusticana" First time at these Concerts.	Mascagni
10.	LOIN DU BAL	Gillet
11.	POLKA, "Libelle"	J. Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Boccacio"	Suppe

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

THE MOULTON, 24 Summer St., The Restaurant PAR EXCELLENCE of Boston.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE PROGRAMME

PUBLISHED EVERY EVENING DURING THE SUMMER SEASON.

NOTICE TO ADVERTISERS.

The advertising columns in the "Bulletin" are controlled SOLELY by F. R. Comee, Boston Music Hall Box Office, to whom all communications should be addressed.

Press of Geo. H. Ellis.

GRACE NOTES.

"If the artist gravely writes,
To sleep it will beguile;
If the artist gayly writes,
It is a vulgar style.

"If the artist writes at length,
How sad his hearers' lot!
If the artist briefly writes,
No man will care one jot.

"If an artist simply writes,
A fool he's said to be.
If an artist deeply writes,
He's mad, 'tis plain to see.

"In whatsoever way he writes,
He can't please every man:
Therefore, let an artist write
How he likes and can."

J. C. GERLACH,

Sole New England Agent for the

BARTHOLOMAY BREWING CO.'S

CELEBRATED

Lager Beers.

FINE STANDARD, EXTRA PALE BOHEMIAN; EXTRA DARK BAVARIAN.

☞ This beer is furnished exclusively to the patrons of these concerts.

Bottled for HOTEL and FAMILY USE, SUMMER RESORTS, MOUNTAIN HOUSES. YACHTSMEN, etc., should not be without it, as it will keep for any length of time

Imported Rhine Wines, Clarets, and all kinds of Liquors, THE RHENS CELEBRATED TABLE WATER.

361 Atlantic Ave. and 22 Purchase St., Boston, Mass.

Telephone 1152.

VINCENT HATHAWAY & CO.
IMPORTERS AND BOTTLERS
BOSTON MASS. U.S.A.
TRADE MARK
BASS & CO'S PALE ALE

PHILIP KRIM,

IMPORTER OF RHINE WINES,

Warranted Unadulterated, and Dealer in

GROCERIES AND FOREIGN PRODUCE,

No. 163 SHAWMUT AVE.

Knabe

Manufacturers of Grand, Upright, and Square Pianofortes.

Unequalled in Tone, Touch, Workmanship, and Durability.

E. W. TYLER, Agent,
178 Tremont St.

ROYAL BLUE LINE FOR WASHINGTON.

Central R.R. of New Jersey,
Phila. and Reading R.R.,
Baltimore & Ohio R.R.,

FOR

BALTIMORE, WASHINGTON, CINCINNATI, COLUMBUS, CHICAGO, ST. LOUIS, INDIANAPOLIS, PITTSBURG.

ONLY LINE VIA WASHINGTON TO THE WEST.

Two Through Trains Daily to Chicago, Cincinnati, and St. Louis Without Change. Six Fast Trains Daily to Washington.

Magnificent Pullman Palace, Drawing-room and Sleeping Cars on all Night Trains.

NEW YORK TO WASHINGTON IN FIVE HOURS.

Your . . . Summer Vacation

Is doubtless now upon your mind. Why not try, this year, the new and inviting field offered by picturesque and delightful

NOVA SCOTIA?

This popular and health-giving resort is yearly becoming the Mecca of thousands of tourists and vacationists. It can be reached in 16 hours from Boston by the speedy and elegant steamers of the

YARMOUTH STEAMSHIP CO.,

which leave Lewis Wharf, Boston, every Tuesday and Friday at noon. For comfort and reliability they are unsurpassed. The company has just issued a magnificently illustrated guide book of the province, and offers to Halifax, with a week's hotel expenses paid, to the person who, before July 1, sends in the best original descriptive poem on Nova Scotia, based on the material found in this book. Send 25 cents in stamps for a sample copy to J. F. SPINNEY, Agent, Lewis Wharf, Boston (to whom the poems must be mailed).

A Free Excursion

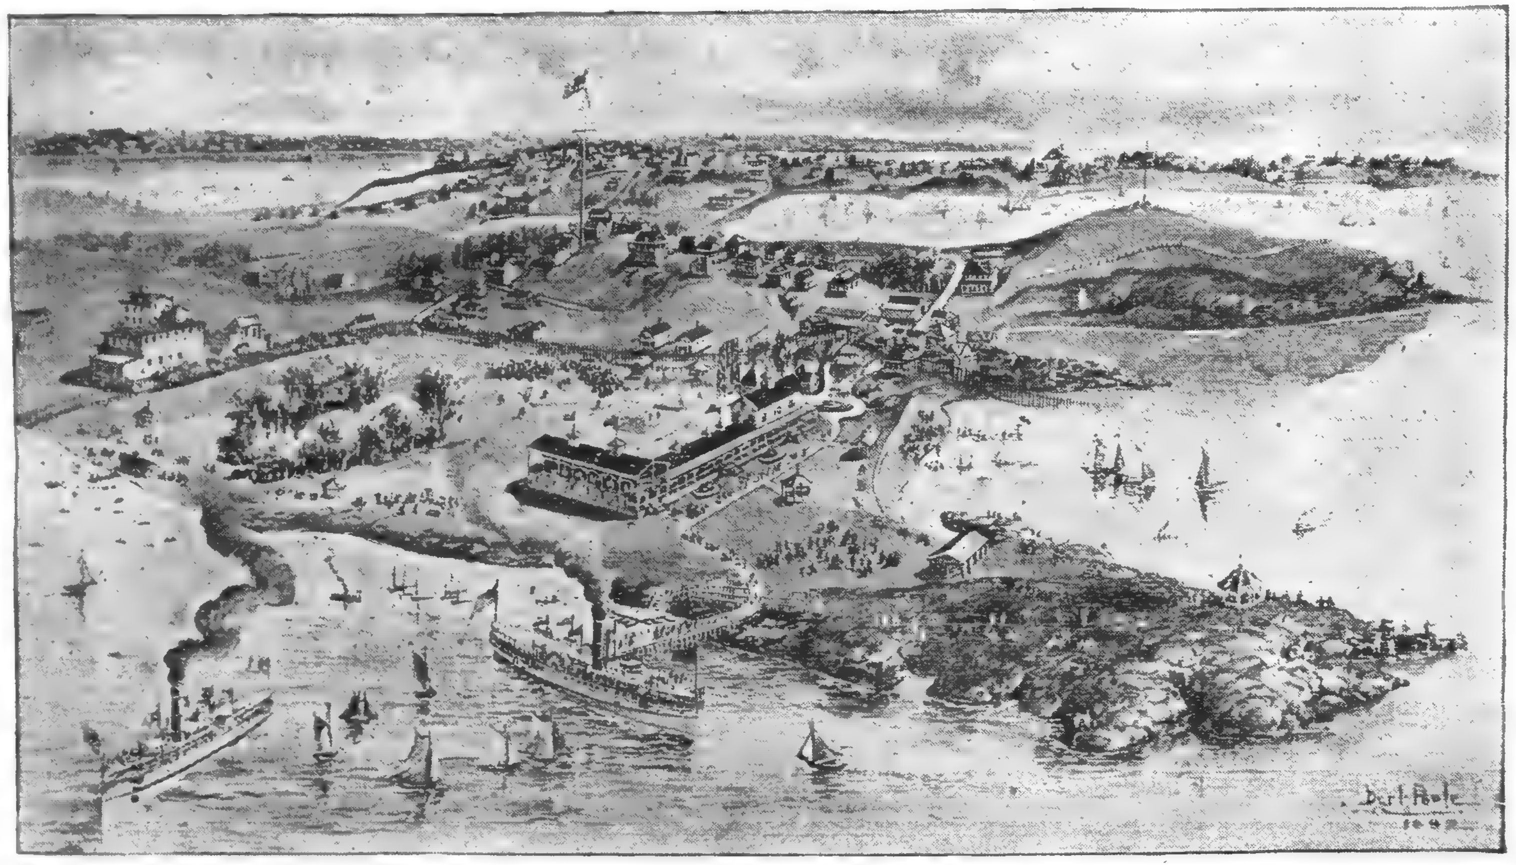
For tickets and further information, apply also to JOHN G. HALL & CO., 64 Chatham St.; THOMAS COOK & SON, 332 Washington St.; RAYMOND & WHITCOMB, 296 Washington St.; W. H. EAVES, Parker House, Boston.



Bass Point, Nahant,

Opens June 12.

Band Concerts.

Fish Dinners.

Frequent trips by steamer from Battery Wharf. For time table see daily papers.

M. STEINERT & SONS COMPANY,

Representing STEINWAY & SONS.

The Recognized Standard Pianos of the World.

Pre-eminently the Best Instruments Made.

Exported and Sold in all Art Centres of the globe.

Preferred by the Greatest Living Artists.

M. Steinert & Sons Co.,

— ALSO —

Wholesale and Retail Representatives in the New England States for

Weber, Hardman,

Gabler, Henning,

Webster, and Pease

PIANOS.

. . . STEINERT HALL, . . .

190 TREMONT STREET, CORNER BOYLSTON, - - - BOSTON, Mass.

PIANO-FORTES

The Mason & Hamlin Pianos embody many important improvements found in no other instruments,—notably, the patented method of stringing, which is now an assured success, having been used by this Company for over ten years.

CATALOGUES MAILED ON APPLICATION.

MASON & HAMLIN

ORGAN & PIANO CO.,

154 and 155 Tremont Street, BOSTON.

Mason & Hamlin

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL.
BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1, 1892.
SUMMER SEASON. Vol. VII. No. 2.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Wednesday Evening, June 1.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "La Reine de Saba"	Gounod
2.	SLAVONIC DANCES	Dvorak
3.	WALTZ, "Doctrinen"	J. Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "The Gondoliers"	Sullivan
5.	POLONAISE	Liszt
6.	PRELUDE, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
7.	BALLET MUSIC, from the Opera "Ritter Pasman" First time.	J. Strauss
8	SELECTION from "Robin Hood"	De Koven
9.	OVERTURE, "Galatea"	Suppe
10.	POLKA, "Unparteiische Kritik" First time.	Strauss
11.	WALTZ, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
12.	MARCH, "Juanita" First time.	Suppe

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

S. S. P. & CO.
Guinness' Stout
and Bass' Ale.
FOSTER'S BOTTLING,
WHITE LABEL,
and DOG'S HEAD.
S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Scollay Square. Copley Square.
209 and 211 State Street.

THE
ÆOLIAN

The programme opposite is only one of many you could enjoy in your home any evening, if you possessed an Æolian; and you, yes, you or any member of your family could be the musical director, after a few days' practice. Doubtless our statement seems a broad one, but that does not alter the fact that any one who loves good music need not be without it, and that they can play it for themselves on this instrument with full orchestral effect.

JEAN de RESZKE, the famous tenor, says: "The Æolian affords the performer every facility for interpreting the music with feeling and sentiment."

Furthermore, as the ÆOLIAN has the capacity to make one familiar with the best works of the masters, its value as an educator must not be overlooked. Call and examine it.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.
THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer
LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or
Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL.
BOSTON, THURSDAY, JUNE 2, 1892.
SUMMER SEASON. Vol. VII. No. 3.

S. S. P. & CO.

Guinness' Stout and Bass' Ale.

FOSTER'S BOTTLING,
WHITE LABEL,
and DOG'S HEAD.

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Scollay Square Copley Square.
209 and 211 State Street.

THE

ÆOLIAN

The programme opposite is only one of many you could enjoy in your home any evening, if you possessed an Æolian; and you, yes, you or any member of your family could be the musical director, after a few days' practice. Doubtless our statement seems a broad one, but that does not alter the fact that any one who loves good music need not be without it, and that they can play it for themselves on this instrument with full orchestral effect.

JEAN de RESZKE, the famous tenor, says: "The Æolian affords the performer every facility for interpreting the music with feeling and sentiment."

Furthermore, as the ÆOLIAN has the capacity to make one familiar with the best works of the masters, its value as an educator must not be overlooked. Call and examine it.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Thursday Evening, June 2.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1. PERSIAN MARCH . . . . Joh. Strauss
2. OVERTURE, "Rienzi" . . . . Wagner
3. WALTZ, "Morgenblatter" . . . . Joh. Strauss
4. SELECTION, "La Grande Duchesse" . . . . . Offenbach

5. OVERTURE, "Zampa" . . . . Herold
6. BALLET MUSIC, "Le Cid" . . . . Massenet
7. LARGO . . . . Haendel
8. SELECTION, "Sphinx" . . . . Thompson

(First time.)

(Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College and specially arranged for Full Orchestra for the Promenade Concerts.)

9. OVERTURE, "Poet and Peasant" . . . . . Suppé
10. WALTZ, "Waldgeister" . . . . Zach
11. POLKA, "Woman's Heart" . . . . Jos. Strauss
12. MARCH, "Hoch Habsburg" . . . . Kral

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S

Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, FRIDAY, JUNE 3, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 4.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

S. S. P. & CO.

Guinness' Stout
and Bass' Ale.

FOSTER'S BOTTLING,
WHITE LABEL,
and DOG'S HEAD.

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Scollay Square Copley Square.
209 and 211 State Street.

THE
ÆOLIAN

The programme opposite is only one of many you could enjoy in your home any evening, if you possessed an Æolian; and you, yes, you or any member of your family could be the musical director, after a few days' practice. Doubtless our statement seems a broad one, but that does not alter the fact that any one who loves good music need not be without it, and that they can play it for themselves on this instrument with full orchestral effect.

JEAN de RESZKE, the famous tenor, says: "The Æolian affords the performer every facility for interpreting the music with feeling and sentiment."

Furthermore, as the ÆOLIAN has the capacity to make one familiar with the best works of the masters, its value as an educator must not be overlooked. Call and examine it.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Friday Evening, June 3.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1. WEDDING MARCH . . . . Mendelssohn
2. OVERTURE, "Mignon" . . . . A. Thomas
3. WALTZ, "Seid umschlungen Millionen" . . . Joh. Strauss
   (First time in America.)
4. SELECTION, "The Gondoliers" . . . . Sullivan

---

5. OVERTURE, "Le Roi d'Ys" . . . . . . Lalo
6. BALLET MUSIC, "Sylvia" . . . . . . Delibes
   a Prelude Les Chasseresses.
   b Intermezzo et Valse lente.
   c Pizzicati.
   d Cortege de Bacchus.
7. CAVATINA for Strings and Harp . . . . Raff
8. OVERTURE, "Tannhaeuser" . . . . . . Wagner

---

9. SELECTION, "The Pirates of Penzance" . . . Sullivan
10. WALTZ, "Violets" . . . . Waldteufel
11. POLKA MAZURKA, "Die Emancipirte" . . . Jos. Strauss
12. RADETZKY MARCH . . . . Joh. Strauss

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON. Vol. VII. No. 5.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Saturday Evening, June 4.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Hoch Habsburg"	Joh. Strauss
2.	OVERTURE, "Raymond"	A. Thomas
3.	WALTZ, "Kaiser"	Joh. Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Les Brigands"	Offenbach
5.	SELECTION, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
6.	"Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from "Die Walkuere"	Wagner
7.	HYMN TO ST. CECILIA	Gounod
8.	BALLET MUSIC, "Henry VIII." a "Dance de la Gipsy." b "Gigue."	Saint-Saëns
9.	SELECTION, "Mikado"	Sullivan
10.	LOIN DU BAL	Gillet
11.	POLKA, "Unparteische Kritik"	Joh. Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Boccaccio"	Suppe

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

S. S. P. & CO.

Guinness' Stout
and Bass' Ale.

FOSTER'S BOTTLING,
WHITE LABEL,
and DOG'S HEAD.

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Scollay Square Copley Square.
209 and 211 State Street.

THE
ÆOLIAN

The programme opposite is only one of many you could enjoy in your home any evening, if you possessed an Æolian; and you, yes, you or any member of your family could be the musical director, after a few days' practice. Doubtless our statement seems a broad one, but that does not alter the fact that any one who loves good music need not be without it, and that they can play it for themselves on this instrument with full orchestral effect.

JEAN de RESZKE, the famous tenor, says: "The Æolian affords the performer every facility for interpreting the music with feeling and sentiment."

Furthermore, as the ÆOLIAN has the capacity to make one familiar with the best works of the masters, its value as an educator must not be overlooked. Call and examine it.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, MONDAY, JUNE 6, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 6.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

THE
ÆOLIAN

The programme opposite is only one of many you could enjoy, in your home any evening, if you possessed an Æolian; and you, yes, you or any member of your family could be the musical director, after a few days' practice. Doubtless our statement seems a broad one, but that does not alter the fact that any one who loves good music need not be without it, and that they can play it for themselves on this instrument with full orchestral effect.

JEAN de RESZKE, the famous tenor, says: "The Æolian affords the performer every facility for interpreting the music with feeling and sentiment."

Furthermore, as the ÆOLIAN has the capacity to make one familiar with the best works of the masters, its value as an educator must not be overlooked. Call and examine it.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Monday Evening, June 6.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1. MARCH, "Tannhaeuser" . . . . Wagner
2. DANSE MACABRE . . . . Saint-Saëns
3. WALTZ, "Artist Life" . . . . Joh. Strauss
4. SELECTION, "Robin Hood" . . . . De Koven

---

5. OVERTURE, "Flying Dutchman" . . . . . . Wagner
6. SUITE, "Scenes Pittoresques" . . . . . . Massenet
    March.
    Air de Ballet.
    Angelus.
    Fete Boheme.
7. ENTR'ACTE, "Philemon et Baucis" . . . . . . Gounod
8. OVERTURE, "Sphinx" . . . . Thompson

(Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College, and specially arranged for Full Orchestra for the Promenade Concerts.)

---

9. OVERTURE, "Orpheus" . . . . Offenbach
10. WALTZ, "Les Patineurs" . . . . Waldteufel
11. POLKA, "Tout a la Joie" . . . . Fahrbach
12. MARCH, "Teufels" . . . . Suppe

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET
Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.
Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the
NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.
This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, TUESDAY, JUNE 7, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 7.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

THE
ÆOLIAN

The programme opposite is only one of many you could enjoy in your home any evening, if you possessed an Æolian; and you, yes, you or any member of your family could be the musical director, after a few days' practice. Doubtless our statement seems a broad one, but that does not alter the fact that any one who loves good music need not be without it, and that they can play it for themselves on this instrument with full orchestral effect.

JEAN de RESZKE, the famous tenor, says: "The Æolian affords the performer every facility for interpreting the music with feeling and sentiment."

Furthermore, as the ÆOLIAN has the capacity to make one familiar with the best works of the masters, its value as an educator must not be overlooked. Call and examine it.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Tuesday Evening, June 7.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Heroic"	Saint-Saëns
2.	OVERTURE, "William Tell"	Rossini
3.	WALTZ, "Waldgeister"	Zach
4.	SELECTION, "Madame Favart"	Offenbach
5.	OVERTURE, "Le Part du Diable"	Auber
6.	a SCHERZO WALTZ b MALAGUENA } from "Boabdil"	Moszkowski
7.	LARGO	Haendel
8.	OVERTURE, "Fledermaus"	Joh. Strauss
9.	SELECTION, "Madame Angot"	Lecocq
10.	WALTZ, "Blue Danube"	Joh. Strauss
11.	POLKA, "Herz Dame"	Fahrbach
12.	MARCH, "Fuers Vaterland"	Milloecker

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET

Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

[9]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 8, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 8.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money: —

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3 00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

THE
ÆOLIAN

The programme opposite is only one of many you could enjoy in your home any evening, if you possessed an Æolian; and you, yes, you or any member of your family could be the musical director, after a few days' practice. Doubtless our statement seems a broad one, but that does not alter the fact that any one who loves good music need not be without it, and that they can play it for themselves on this instrument with full orchestral effect.

JEAN de RESZKE, the famous tenor, says: "The Æolian affords the performer every facility for interpreting the music with feeling and sentiment."

Furthermore, as the ÆOLIAN has the capacity to make one familiar with the best works of the masters, its value as an educator must not be overlooked. Call and examine it.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Wednesday Evening, June 8.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Celebre"	Lachner
2.	OVERTURE, "Les Dragons de Villars"	Maillard
3.	WALTZ, "Sweethearts"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Poor Jonathan"	Milloecker
5.	OVERTURE, "Semiramide"	Rossini
6.	LA NUIT (First time.)	Augusta Holmes
7.	RIDE OF THE WALKYRIES	Wagner
8.	a PRELUDES b MAURISCHE FANTASIE (First time in America.)	Moszkowski
9.	SELECTION, "La Belle Helene"	Offenbach
10.	WALTZ, "Violets"	Waldteufel
11.	POLKA, "Libelle"	Strauss
12.	PERSIAN MARCH	Suppe

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or
Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Offices, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JUNE 9, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 9.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money: —

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" No. 1, 100s,	3.00
[illegible], 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
[illegible], 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

THE
ÆOLIAN

The programme opposite is only one of many you could enjoy in your home any evening, if you possess an Æolian; and you, yes, you or any member of your family could be the musical director, after a few days' practice. Doubtless our statement seems a broad one, but that does not alter the fact that any one who loves good music need not be without it, and that they can play it for themselves on this instrument with full orchestral effect.

JEAN de RESZKE, the famous tenor, says: "The Æolian affords the performer every facility for interpreting the music with feeling and sentiment."

Furthermore, as the ÆOLIAN has the capacity to make one familiar with the best works of the masters, its value as an educator must not be overlooked. Call and examine it.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Thursday Evening, June 9.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Boccaccio"	Suppe
2.	OVERTURE, "Le Pre aux Clercs"	Herold
3.	WALTZ, "Child of Fortune"	Milloecker
4.	SELECTION, "Erminie"	Jakobowski
5.	POLONAISE	Chopin
6.	SUITE, "Peer Gynt" a The death of Aase. b In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains. (The imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)	Grieg
7.	a AIR, Louis XIII.	Ghys
	b INTERMEZZO, "Naila"	Delibes
8.	SELECTION, "Carmen"	Bizet
9.	SELECTION, "La Grande Duchesse"	Offenbach
10.	WALTZ, "Wine, Woman, and Song"	Joh. Strauss
11.	POLKA, "Promenade"	Metra
12.	MARCH, "Hoch Habsburg"	Kral

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.

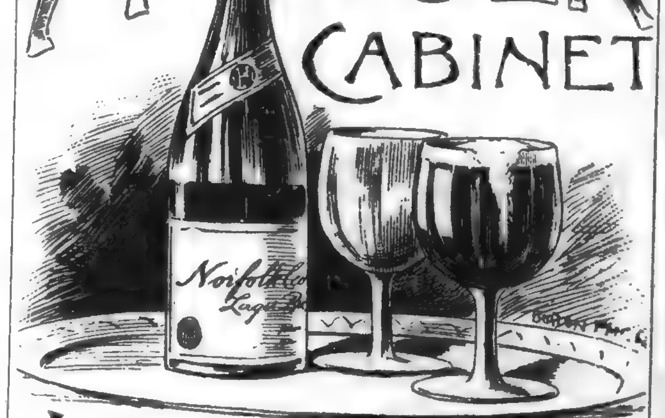
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET



LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, FRIDAY, JUNE 10, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 10.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money: —

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3 00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

THE
ÆOLIAN

The programme opposite is only one of many you could enjoy in your home any evening, if you possessed an Æolian; and you, yes, you or any member of your family could be the musical director, after a few days' practice. Doubtless our statement seems a broad one, but that does not alter the fact that any one who loves good music need not be without it, and that they can play it for themselves on this instrument with full orchestral effect.

JEAN de RESZKE, the famous tenor, says: "The Æolian affords the performer every facility for interpreting the music with feeling and sentiment."

Furthermore, as the ÆOLIAN has the capacity to make one familiar with the best works of the masters, its value as an educator must not be overlooked. Call and examine it.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Friday Evening, June 10.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	WEDDING MARCH	Mendelssohn
2.	OVERTURE, "Barber of Seville"	Rossini
3.	WALTZ, "Thousand and One Nights"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Faust"	Gounod
5.	OVERTURE, "Phedre"	Massenet
6.	SUITE, "L'Arlesienne" a Prelude. b Minuet. c Carillon.	Bizet
7.	POLKA, "Deux Pigeons"	Muller
8.	OVERTURE, "Rienzi"	Wagner
9.	SELECTION, "Mikado"	Sullivan
10.	LOIN DU BAL	Gillet
11.	POLKA, "Pizzicato"	Joh. Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Juanita"	Suppe

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S

Restaurant · Parisien,

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 11.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Saturday Evening, June 11.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
2.	OVERTURE, "Robespierre"	Litolff
3.	WALTZ, "Kaiser"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Pirates of Penzance"	Sullivan
5.	PRELUDE, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
6.	BALLET MUSIC, "Henry VIII." a "Gipsy Dance." b "Gigue."	Saint-Saëns
7.	TRAEUMEREI	Schumann
8.	OVERTURE, "Poet and Peasant"	Suppe
9.	SELECTION, "Beggar Student"	Milloecker
10.	WALTZ, "Lagunen"	Strauss
11.	POLKA, "Woman's Heart"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Fuers Vaterland"	Milloecker

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money: —

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One

Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,

Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire

Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.
Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the
NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, MONDAY, JUNE 13, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 12.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Monday Evening, June 13.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Juanita"	Suppe
2.	OVERTURE, "Zampa"	Herold
3.	WALTZ, "Seid umschlungen Millionen"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "The Brigands"	Offenbach
5.	OVERTURE, "Rienzi"	Wagner
6.	SUITE II., "L'Arlesienne" a Pastorale. b Minuet. c Farandole.	Bizet
7.	LOIN DU BAL	Gillet
8.	SELECTION, "Robin Hood"	De Koven
9.	OVERTURE, "Sphinx" (Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College, and specially arranged for Full Orchestra for the Promenade Concerts.)	Thompson
10.	POLKA, "Unparteische Kritik"	Strauss
11.	WALTZ, "Artist Life"	Strauss
12.	TEUFEL'S MARCH	Suppe

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One
Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,
Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire
Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.
Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the
NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.
This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, TUESDAY, JUNE 14, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 13.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money: —

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.

Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One

Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,

Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire

Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Tuesday Evening, June 14.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Prophet"	Meyerbeer
2.	OVERTURE, "Rip Van Winkle"	Chadwick
3.	WALTZ, "Sounds from the Vienna Woods"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Romeo and Juliet"	Gounod
5.	FINALE, ACT III., "Lohengrin"	Wagner
6.	INVITATION TO DANCE	Weber
7.	AVE MARIA	Gounod
8.	BALLET MUSIC from "Ritter Pasman"	Strauss
9.	SELECTION, "Pirates of Penzance"	Sullivan
10.	WALTZ, "La Vague"	Metra
11.	POLKA, "Enthusiasm"	Mueller
12.	PERSIAN MARCH	Strauss

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S

Restaurant · Parisien,

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.

Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL.
BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 15, 1892.
SUMMER SEASON. Vol. VII. No. 14.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One
Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,
Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire
Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Wednesday Evening, June 15.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Rakoczy"	Berlioz
2.	OVERTURE, "Galatea"	Suppe
3.	WALTZ, "Morgenblaetter"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Erminie"	Jakobowski
5.	OVERTURE, "Fra Diavolo"	Auber
6.	SELECTION, "Carmen"	Bizet
7.	MINUET	Boccherini
8.	OVERTURE, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
9.	SELECTION, "The Gondoliers"	Sullivan
10.	WALTZ, "Carlotta"	Milloecker
11.	POLKA, "Bella Boca"	Waldteufel
12.	MARCH, "Hoch Habsburg"	Kral

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL
PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JUNE 16, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 15.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money: —

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One

Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,

Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire

Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Thursday Evening, June 16.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
2.	OVERTURE, "Oberon"	Weber
3.	WALTZ, "Doctrinen"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Heart and Hand"	Lecocq
5.	OVERTURE, "Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
6.	FUNERAL MARCH OF A MARIONETTE	Gounod
7.	OVERTURE, "Fledermaus"	Strauss
8	HYMN TO ST. CECILIA	Gounod
9.	SELECTION, "La Fille de Tambour-major"	Offenbach
10.	WALTZ, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
11.	POLKA, "Woman's Heart"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Boccaccio"	Suppe

. Monday, June 20, OFFENBACH NIGHT .

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.

Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or
Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

MUSIC HALL
PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, FRIDAY, JUNE 17, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 16.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

Importers and Grocers,

Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.

Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One

Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,

Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire

Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Friday Evening, June 17.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1. MARCH, "Tannhaeuser" . . . Wagner
2. OVERTURE, "Jubel" . . . Weber
3. WALTZ, "Child of Fortune" . . . Milloecker
4. SELECTION, "Cavalleria Rusticana" . . . Mascagni

5. RIDE OF THE WALKYRIES . . . Wagner
6. BALLET MUSIC, "Sylvia" . . . Delibes
   a Prelude, Les Chasseuresses.
   b Intermezzo et Valse lente.
   c Pizzicati.
   d Cortege de Bacchus.
7. LARGO . . . Haendel
8. SELECTION, "Melodien Congress" . . . Conradi

9. SELECTION, "Robin Hood" . . . De Koven
10. WALTZ, "Cagliostro" . . . Strauss
11. POLKA, "Bella Boca" . . . Waldteufel
12. MARCH, "Fuers Vaterland" . . . Milloecker

. Monday, June 20, OFFENBACH NIGHT .

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S

Restaurant · Parisien,

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.

Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET

Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 17.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Saturday Evening, June 18.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Boccaccio"	Suppe
2.	OVERTURE, "Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
3.	WALTZ, "Roses of the South"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Pinafore"	Sullivan
5.	SELECTION, "Fatinitza"	Suppe
6.	OVERTURE, "William Tell"	Rossini
7.	FLIRTATION	Steck
8.	OVERTURE, "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
9.	SELECTION, "Chimes of Normandy"	Planquette
10.	WALTZ, "Blue Danube"	Strauss
11.	POLKA, "Emancipirte"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Hoch Habsburg"	Kral

Monday, June 20, OFFENBACH NIGHT.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One
Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,
Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire
Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, MONDAY, JUNE 20, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 18.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Monday Evening, June 20.

OFFENBACH NIGHT.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Le Prophete"	Meyerbeer
2.	SELECTION, "La Fille du Tambour-major"	Offenbach
3.	WALTZ, "Artists' Life"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Brigands	Offenbach
5.	PRELUDE, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
6.	BARCAROLLE, from "Le Comte d'Hoffman"	Offenbach
7.	BALLET MUSIC, "Henry VIII." a "Gipsy Dance." b "Gigue."	Saint-Saëns
8.	OFFENBACHIANA	Conradi
9.	OVERTURE, "Orpheus"	Offenbach
10.	LOIN DU BAL	Gillet
11.	WALTZ, "Pesther"	Lanner
12.	BOULANGER MARCH	Kral

. Thursday, June 23, SULLIVAN NIGHT .

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money: —

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One

Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,

Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire

Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE ÆOLIAN COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET
LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.
Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the
NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.
This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS, 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

[20]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, TUESDAY, JUNE 21, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 19.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.

Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One

Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,

Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire

Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Tuesday Evening, June 21.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	PERSIAN MARCH	Strauss
2.	OVERTURE, "Ruy Blas"	Mendelssohn
3.	WALTZ, "Kaiser"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Boccaccio"	Suppe
5.	FINALE, ACT I., "Lohengrin"	Wagner
6.	SUITE I.	Moszkowski
7.	FLIRTATION	Steck
8.	SELECTION, "Faust"	Gounod
9.	SELECTION, "Obisbah" Written for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College.	Atkinson
10.	WALTZ, "Carlotta"	Milloecker
11.	POLKA, "Du Fou"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Boulanger"	Kral

Thursday, June 23, SULLIVAN NIGHT.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S

Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL

BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 20.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

Importers and Grocers,

Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.

Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One
Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,
Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire
Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

= Promenade · Concerts =

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Wednesday Evening, June 22.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Radetzky"	Strauss
2.	OVERTURE, "Mignon"	A. Thomas
3.	WALTZ, "Sounds from the Vienna Woods"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Fatinitza"	Suppe
5.	LE ROUET D'OMPHALE	Saint-Saëns
6.	OVERTURE, "Rip Van Winkle"	Chadwick
7.	TRAEUMEREI	Schumann
8.	SELECTION, "Erminie"	Jakobowski
9.	SELECTION, "Madame Angot"	Lecocq
10.	WALTZ, "La Vague"	Metra
11.	POLKA, "Tout a la Joie"	Fahrbach
12.	MARCH, "Teufels"	Suppe

. Thursday, June 23, SULLIVAN NIGHT .

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or
Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JUNE 23, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 21.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One
Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,
Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire
Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Thursday Evening, June 23.

SULLIVAN NIGHT.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Celebre"	Lachner
2.	SELECTION, "Patience"	Sullivan
3.	WALTZ, "Pesther"	Lanner
4.	SELECTION, "Pirates of Penzance"	Sullivan
5.	HULDIGUNGS MARCH	Wagner
6.	SELECTION, "Pinafore"	Sullivan
7.	RHAPSODY No. 2	Liszt
8.	SELECTION, "Mikado"	Sullivan
9.	GRACEFUL DANCE	Sullivan
10.	SELECTION, "Gondoliers"	Sullivan
11.	WALTZ, "Estudiantina"	Waldteufel
12.	MARCH, "Hoch Habsburg"	Kral

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, FRIDAY, JUNE 24, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 22.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

Importers and Grocers,

Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.

Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One
Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,
Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire
Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Friday Evening, June 24.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1. POLONAISE . . . . Chopin
2. OVERTURE, "Euryanthe" . . . . Weber
3. WALTZ, "Wine, Woman, and Song" . . . . Strauss
4. SELECTION, "La Perichole" . . . . . . Offenbach

5. SERENATA . . . . Moszkowski
6. SELECTION, "Obisbah" . . . . Atkinson
   Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College.
7. FLIRTATION . . . . Steck
8. INVITATION TO DANCE . . . . Weber

9. SELECTION, "Beggar Student" . . . . . . Milloecker
10. OVERTURE, "Sphinx" . . . . Thompson
    (Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College, and specially arranged for Full Orchestra for the Promenade Concerts.)
11. GALOP, "Champagne" . . . . Goublet
12. MARCH, "Pour la Patrie" . . . . . . Milloecker

. . Monday, June 27, WAGNER NIGHT . .

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S

Restaurant · Parisien,

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest In America.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
C. H. Hibby

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 23.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Saturday Evening, June 25.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	POLONAISE	Liszt
2.	OVERTURE, "Martha"	Flotow
3.	WALTZ, "Thousand and One Nights"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Chimes of Normandy"	Planquette
5.	OVERTURE, "Rienzi"	Wagner
6.	a PRELUDE b MALAGUENA } from "Boabdil"	Moszkowski
7.	AIR, "Louis XIII."	Ghys
8.	SELECTION, "Fatinitza"	Suppe
9.	SELECTION, "Robin Hood"	De Koven
10.	LOIN DU BAL	Gillet
11.	POLKA, "Unparteische Kritik"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Boulanger"	Kral

. . Monday, June 27, WAGNER NIGHT . .

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3 00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One
Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,
Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire
Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.
Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the
NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL

BOSTON, MONDAY, JUNE 27, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 24.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money: —

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One
Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,
Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire
Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.   C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Monday Evening, June 27.

WAGNER NIGHT.

PROGRAMME

1.	MARCH, "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
2.	WALDWEBEN	Wagner
3.	WALTZ, "Seid umschlungen Millionen"	Strauss
4.	OVERTURE, "Meistersinger"	Wagner
5.	SELECTION, "Boccaccio,"	Suppe
6.	PRIZE SONG, from "Meistersinger"	Wagner
7.	SELECTION, "Carmen"	Bizet
8.	PRELUDE, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
9.	SELECTION, "La Grande Duchesse"	Offenbach
10.	OVERTURE, "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
11.	POLKA, "La Dame de Coeur"	Fahrbach
12.	GALOP, "Champagne"	Goulet

. . Thursday, June 30, STRAUSS NIGHT . .

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the
NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or
Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL

BOSTON, TUESDAY, JUNE 28, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 25.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One
Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,
Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire
Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
Tremont Street, Boston.
West Twenty-third Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Tuesday Evening, June 28.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	SWEDISH WEDDING MARCH	Sodermann
2.	OVERTURE, "Raymond"	Thomas
3.	WALTZ, "Carlotta"	Milloecker
4.	SELECTION, "Rigoletto"	Verdi
5.	ENTR'ACTE, "Philemon et Baucis"	Gounod
6.	COLUMBIAN TRIUMPH MARCH (NEW.)	Schulz
7.	SERENATA	Moszkowski
8.	SELECTION, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
9.	SELECTION, "Chimes of Normandy"	Planquette
10.	WALTZ, "Violets"	Waldteufel
11.	POLKA, "Libelle"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Teufels"	Suppe

. . Thursday, June 30, STRAUSS NIGHT . .

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston, 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

[27]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
C.H. Kilby

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL

BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 29, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 26.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager

Wednesday Evening, June 29.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Juanita"	Suppe
2.	BALLET MUSIC, "Feramors"	Rubinstein
3.	WALTZ, "Fesche Geister"	Edouard Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Les Brigands"	Offenbach
5.	OVERTURE, "Semiramide"	Rossini
6.	SUITE II., "L'Arlesienne" a Pastorale. b Minuet. c Farandole	Bizet
7.	LARGO	Haendel
8.	MELODIEN CONGRESS	Conradi
9.	OVERTURE, "Sphinx" (Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College, and specially arranged for Full Orchestra for the Promenade Concerts.)	Thompson
10.	FLIRTATION	Steck
11.	WALTZ, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
12.	MARCH, "Boccaccio"	Suppe

. . Thursday, June 30, STRAUSS NIGHT . .

MONDAY, July 4, Patriotic Music.
TUESDAY, July 5, Sullivan Night.
WEDNESDAY, July 6, Wagner Night.
THURSDAY, July 7, Suppe Night.
FRIDAY, July 8, French Composers.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON

Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One
Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,
Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire
Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled,

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or
Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N.S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JUNE 30, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 27.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Thursday Evening, June 30.

STRAUSS NIGHT.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1. PERSIAN MARCH . . . . Strauss
2. OVERTURE, "Martha" . . . . Flotow
3. WALTZ, "Wiener Blut" . . . . Strauss
4. SELECTION, "Fatinitza" . . . . Suppe

5. PIZZICATO POLKA . . . . Strauss
6. FINALE, ACT I., "Lohengrin" . . . . Wagner
7. BALLET MUSIC, "Ritter Pasman" . . . . Strauss
8. CAVATINA . . . . Raff

9. OVERTURE, "Fledermaus" . . . . Strauss
10. POLKA, "Woman's Heart" . . . . Strauss
11. WALTZ, "Blue Danube" . . . . Strauss
12. MARCH "Radetzky" . . . . Strauss

MONDAY, July 4, Patriotic Music.
TUESDAY, July 5, Sullivan Night.
WEDNESDAY, July 6, Wagner Night.
THURSDAY, July 7, Suppe Night.
FRIDAY, July 8, French Composers.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money: —

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s, .	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s, . .	3.00
Balkan, 100s, ...	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s, ...	4.00
Futura, 100s, ...	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.

Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

Any One
Can learn, in a few days, to play upon the Æolian, with correct expression, any piece of music ever composed.

The Musical Expression,
Or tone color, can be varied entirely at the will of the player, the Æolian responding as promptly to any change in tempo, or degree of power, from the softest pianissimo to a loud fortissimo, as a well drilled orchestra under the baton of an experienced Director.

Æolian Repertoire
Is unlimited. Any piece of music ever published can be obtained for this wonderful instrument. All music for the Æolian is arranged from the full orchestral score, and is, therefore, more perfect than a simple piano or organ arrangement.

We extend to all a cordial invitation to come and see the Æolian.

THE
ÆOLIAN
COMPANY,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West Twenty-third Street, New York.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N.S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

[29]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
C H W

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, FRIDAY, JULY 1, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 28.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money: —

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s, .	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s, . . .	3.00
Balkan, 100s, ...	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s, ...	4.00
Futura, 100s, ...	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

Importers and Grocers,

Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.

Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

ÆOLIAN

The Æolian and the Business Man.

The active man of business does not have sufficient leisure to enable him to give music enough time to learn to play, or to keep up his practice, if he has taken lessons when younger: he is, therefore, entirely dependent upon the performance of others for any music he may desire to hear.

For people in this situation the Æolian is especially adapted. The knowledge necessary to enable a person to play is so slight that any one can master the instrument with a few weeks' practice, your mood can then dictate you selections. A Symphony or an Opera can be played as readily as a Waltz or a Ballad, and anything ever written can be obtained for the Æolian.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West 23d Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager

Friday Evening, July 1.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1. MARCH, "Hoch Habsburg" . . . . Kral
2. OVERTURE, "Martha" . . . . Flotow
3. WALTZ, "Doctrinen" . . . . Edouard Strauss
4. THEME with Variations, imitating various Composers, Ochs
   1 Bach. 2 Haydn. 3 Mozart. 4 Strauss. 5 Verdi. 6 Gounod. 7 Wagner. 8 Meyerbeer. 9 Military March.

5. INTERMEZZO, "Naila" . . . . Delibes
6. OVERTURE, "Light Cavalry" . . . . Suppe
7. FLIRTATION . . . . Steck
8. a PRELUDE / b MAURISCHE FANTASIE } from "Boabdil" . Moszkowski

9. TYMPANI SOLO.
10. SELECTION, "Gondoliers" . . . . Sullivan
11. CHAMPAGNE GALOP . . . . Wiegand
12. MARCH, "Fuers Vaterland" . . . . Milloecker

MONDAY, July 4, Patriotic Music.
TUESDAY, July 5, Sullivan Night.
WEDNESDAY, July 6, Wagner Night.
THURSDAY, July 7, Suppe Night.
FRIDAY, July 8, French Composers.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S

Restaurant · Parisien,

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N.S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
C. H. Higby

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 29.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Saturday Evening, July 2.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
2.	OVERTURE, "Phedre"	Massenet
3.	WALTZ, "Thousand and One Nights"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Mignon"	A. Thomas
5.	RIDE OF THE WALKYRIES	Wagner
6.	SUITE, "Peer Gynt" a Aase's Death. b In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains. The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt.	Grieg
7.	AWAKENING OF SPRING	Bach
8.	OVERTURE, "William Tell"	Rossini
9.	WALTZ, "Estudiantina"	Waldteufel
10.	LOIN DU BAL	Gillet
11.	POLKA, "One Heart, One Mind"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Boccaccio"	Suppe

MONDAY, July 4, Patriotic Music.
TUESDAY, July 5, Sullivan Night.
WEDNESDAY, July 6, Wagner Night.
THURSDAY, July 7, Suppe Night.
FRIDAY, July 8, French Composers.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

ÆOLIAN

The Æolian and the Business Man.

The active man of business does not have sufficient leisure to enable him to give music enough time to learn to play, or to keep up his practice, if he has taken lessons when younger: he is, therefore, entirely dependent upon the performance of others for any music he may desire to hear.

For people in this situation the ÆOLIAN is especially adapted. The knowledge necessary to enable a person to play is so slight that any one can master the instrument with a few weeks' practice, your mood can then dictate you selections. A Symphony or an Opera can be played as readily as a Waltz or a Ballad, and anything ever written can be obtained for the ÆOLIAN.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West 23d Street, New York.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or
Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N.S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

[31]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

DO NOT

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
CH. HIGBY

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, MONDAY, JULY 4, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 30.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3 00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.

Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

ÆOLIAN

The Æolian and the Business Man.

The active man of business does not have sufficient leisure to enable him to give music enough time to learn to play, or to keep up his practice, if he has taken lessons when younger: he is, therefore, entirely dependent upon the performance of others for any music he may desire to hear.

For people in this situation the ÆOLIAN is especially adapted. The knowledge necessary to enable a persont o play is so slight that any one can master the instrument with a few weeks' practice, your mood can then dictate you selections. A Symphony or an Opera can be played as readily as a Waltz or a Ballad, and anything ever written can be obtained for the ÆOLIAN.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West 23d Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Monday Evening, July 4.

PATRIOTIC MUSIC.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	SWEDISH WEDDING MARCH	Sodermann
2.	OVERTURE, "Prometheus Bound"	Goldmark
3.	WALTZ, "Seid umschlungen Millionen"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Falka"	Chassaigne
5.	HUNGARIAN DANCES	Brahms
6.	OVERTURE, "La Fille de Tambour-major"	Offenbach
7.	TWO MOVEMENTS for String Orchestra	Hannemann
8.	JUBEL OVERTURE	Weber
9.	OVERTURE, "Banditen Streiche"	Suppe
10.	GAVOTTE, "Secret Love"	Resch
11.	POLKA, "Tout a la Joie"	Fahrbach
12.	MARCH, "American Republic"	Thiele

TUESDAY, July 5, Sullivan Night.
WEDNESDAY, July 6, Wagner Night.
THURSDAY, July 7, Suppe Night.
FRIDAY, July 8, French Composers.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

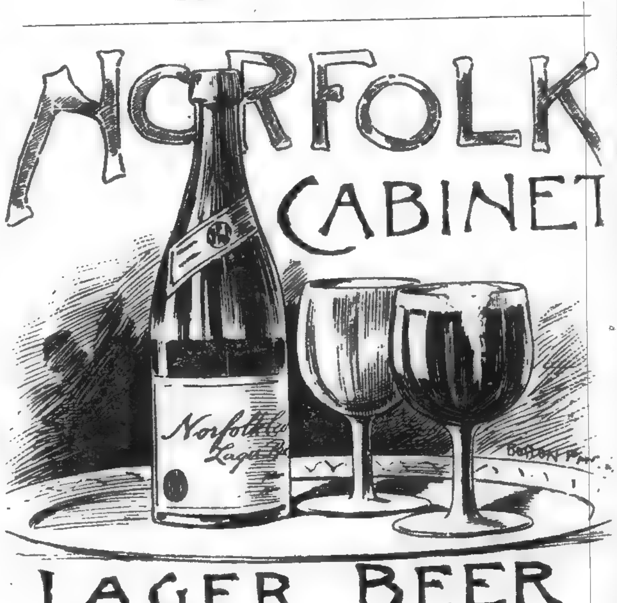
BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.

Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.



LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N.S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, TUESDAY, JULY 5, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 31.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

ÆOLIAN

The Æolian and the Business Man.

The active man of business does not have sufficient leisure to enable him to give music enough time to learn to play, or to keep up his practice, if he has taken lessons when younger; he is, therefore, entirely dependent upon the performance of others for any music he may desire to hear.

For people in this situation the ÆOLIAN is especially adapted. The knowledge necessary to enable a personto play is so slight that any one can master the instrument with a few weeks' practice, your mood can then dictate you selections. A Symphony or an Opera can be played as readily as a Waltz or a Ballad, and anything ever written can be obtained for the ÆOLIAN.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West 23d Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Tuesday Evening, July 5.

SULLIVAN NIGHT.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Le Prophete"	Meyerbeer
2.	SELECTION, "Princess Ida"	Sullivan
3.	WALTZ, "Child of Fortune"	Milloecker
4.	SELECTION, "Iolanthe"	Sullivan
5.	OVERTURE, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
6.	SELECTION, "Ruddigore"	Sullivan
7.	AIR, "Louis XIII."	Ghys
8.	SELECTION, "Robin Hood"	De Koven
9.	SELECTION, "Gondoliers"	Sullivan
10.	WALTZ, "Je t'aime"	Waldteufel
11.	POLKA, "Unparteische Kritik"	Strauss
12.	BOULANGER MARCH	Kral

WEDNESDAY, July 6, Wagner Night. THURSDAY, July 7, Suppe Night.
FRIDAY, July 8, French Composers.

Saturday, July 9, CLOSING CONCERT.
Complimentary Testimonial to Mr. T. Adamowski. Tickets now ready.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

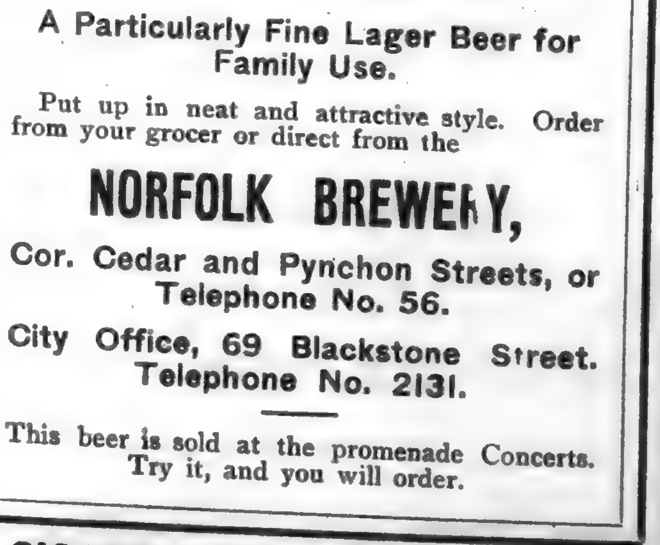
The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.



LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N.S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
C H Wigby

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, JULY 6, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 32.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money: —

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s, .	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s, . .	3.00
Balkan, 100s, ...	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s, ...	4.00
Futura, 100s, ...	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

ÆOLIAN

The Æolian and the Business Man.

The active man of business does not have sufficient leisure to enable him to give music enough time to learn to play, or to keep up his practice, if he has taken lessons when younger: he is, therefore, entirely dependent upon the performance of others for any music he may desire to hear.

For people in this situation the ÆOLIAN is especially adapted. The knowledge necessary to enable a personto play is so slight that any one can master the instrument with a few weeks' practice, your mood can then dictate you selections. A Symphony or an Opera can be played as readily as a Waltz or a Ballad, and anything ever written can be obtained for the ÆOLIAN.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West 23d Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Wednesday Evening, July 6.

WAGNER NIGHT.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	HULDIGUNGS MARCH	Wagner
2.	KISS WALTZ	Strauss
3.	PRIZE SONG, from "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
4.	OVERTURE, "Fra Diavolo"	Auber
5.	WALDWEBEN, from "Siegfried"	Wagner
6.	SELECTION, "Poor Jonathan"	Milloecker
7.	PRELUDE, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
8.	OVERTURE, "Sphinx"	Thompson
9.	OVERTURE, "Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
10.	WALTZ, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
11.	LOIN DU BAL	Gillet
12.	MARCH, New	Gungl

(Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College, and specially arranged for Full Orchestra for the Promenade Concerts.)

THURSDAY, July 7, Suppe Night. FRIDAY, July 8, French Composers.

Saturday, July 9, CLOSING CONCERT.
Complimentary Testimonial to Mr. T. Adamowski. Tickets now ready.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N.S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

[34]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
C. H. H.

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JULY 7, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 33.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.
Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

ÆOLIAN

The Æolian and the Business Man.

The active man of business does not have sufficient leisure to enable him to give music enough time to learn to play, or to keep up his practice, if he has taken lessons when younger: he is, therefore, entirely dependent upon the performance of others for any music he may desire to hear.

For people in this situation the ÆOLIAN is especially adapted. The knowledge necessary to enable a personto play is so slight that any one can master the instrument with a few weeks' practice, your mood can then dictate you selections. A Symphony or an Opera can be played as readily as a Waltz or a Ballad, and anything ever written can be obtained for the ÆOLIAN.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West 23d Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Thursday Evening, July 7.

SUPPE NIGHT.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Teufels"	Suppe
2.	OVERTURE, "Light Cavalry"	Suppe
3.	OVERTURE, "Zampa"	Herold
4.	SELECTION, "Galatea"	Suppe
5.	COLUMBIAN MARCH	Schulz
6.	SELECTION, "Boccaccio"	Suppe
7.	CAVATINA	Raff
8.	OVERTURE, "Poet and Peasant"	Suppe
9.	SELECTION, "Faust"	Gounod
10.	SELECTION, "Fatinitza"	Suppe
11.	WALTZ, "Espana"	Waldteufel
12.	GALOP, "Champagne"	Goulet

FRIDAY, JULY 8, ... BALL-ROOM NIGHT.

Saturday, July 9, CLOSING CONCERT.
Complimentary Testimonial to Mr. T. Adamowski. Tickets now ready.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant · Parisien,
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or
Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N.S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
CH. HIGBY

PUBLISHED BY C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL

BOSTON, FRIDAY, JULY 8, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 34.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

	Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	4.00
Futura, 100s,	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

Importers and Grocers,

Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.

Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

ÆOLIAN

The Æolian and the Business Man.

The active man of business does not have sufficient leisure to enable him to give music enough time to learn to play, or to keep up his practice, if he has taken lessons when younger; he is, therefore, entirely dependent upon the performance of others for any music he may desire to hear.

For people in this situation the ÆOLIAN is especially adapted. The knowledge necessary to enable a personto play is so slight that any one can master the instrument with a few weeks' practice, your mood can then dictate you selections. A Symphony or an Opera can be played as readily as a Waltz or a Ballad, and anything ever written can be obtained for the ÆOLIAN.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West 23d Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Friday Evening, July 8.

BALL-ROOM NIGHT.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1. POLONAISE . . . . Chopin
2. PIZZICATO POLKA . . . . Strauss
3. WALTZ, "Kaiser" . . . . Strauss
4. SELECTION, "La Perichole" . . . . . Offenbach

5. OVERTURE, "Tannhaeuser" . . . . . Wagner
6. WALTZ, "Reminiscences of Hutteldorf" . . . Hofmann
   (First time.)
7. AIR, "Louis XIII." . . . . Ghys
8. SELECTION, "Obisbah" . . . . . Atkinson
   Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College.

9. POLKA, "Libelle" . . . . Strauss
10. WALTZ, "Violets" . . . . Waldteufel
11. POLKA, "Cœur Dame" . . . . . . Fahrbach
12. MARCH, "American Republic" . . . . . Thiele

Saturday, July 9, CLOSING CONCERT.
Complimentary Testimonial to Mr. T. Adamowski. Tickets now ready.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S

Restaurant · Parisien,

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

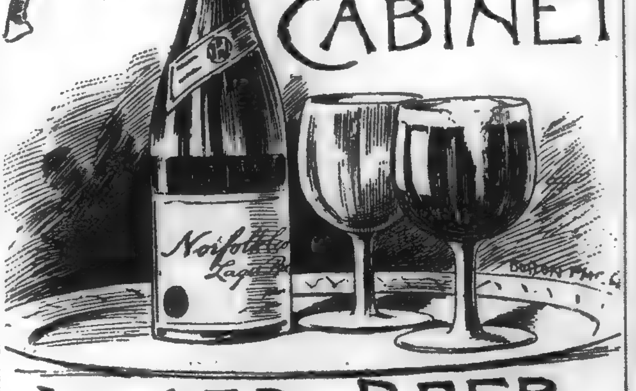
BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET



LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N.S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 9, 1892.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VII. No. 35.

S. S. P. & CO.

The Consumption of EGYPTIAN CIGARETTES appears to be on the increase, and, in order to meet the growing demand, we have selected from a great many samples the following brands, which show Best Value for the money:—

		Per 100
Egyptian Deities, No. 5, 10s and 100s,	.	$2.00
" " No. 1, 100s,	.	3.00
Balkan, 100s,	.	4.50
Th. Vafiadis, 10s,	.	4.00
Futura, 100s,	.	3.50

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

Importers and Grocers,
Cor. Tremont and Court Sts.,
Cor. Huntington Ave. and Dartmouth St.,
Wholesale Dept. & Warehouse, Cen'l Wharf,
BOSTON.

Send for Price-list of Cigars, Groceries, Wines, etc.

ÆOLIAN

The Æolian and the Business Man.

The active man of business does not have sufficient leisure to enable him to give music enough time to learn to play, or to keep up his practice, if he has taken lessons when younger: he is, therefore, entirely dependent upon the performance of others for any music he may desire to hear.

For people in this situation the ÆOLIAN is especially adapted. The knowledge necessary to enable a personto play is so slight that any one can master the instrument with a few weeks' practice, your mood can then dictate you selections. A Symphony or an Opera can be played as readily as a Waltz or a Ballad, and anything ever written can be obtained for the ÆOLIAN.

THE ÆOLIAN CO.,
180 Tremont Street, Boston.
18 West 23d Street, New York.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

SEVENTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Saturday Evening, July 9.

LAST NIGHT.

COMPLIMENTARY TESTIMONIAL TO MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

. . PROGRAMME . .

1.	MARCH, "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
2.	SELECTION, "Mignon"	A. Thomas
3.	WALTZ, "Espana"	Waldteufel
4.	LARGO (Solo Violin, Mr. T. Adamowski)	Haendel
5.	SELECTION, from Operetta "The Regiment of One" (First time.)	Adamowski
6.	POLONAISE	Liszt
7.	OVERTURE, "William Tell"	Rossini
8.	SELECTION, "Mikado"	Sullivan
9.	OVERTURE, "Sphinx" (Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College, and specially arranged for Full Orchestra for the Promenade Concerts.)	Thompson
10.	LOIN DU BAL	Gillet
11.	WALTZ, "Blue Danube"	Strauss
12.	WEDDING MARCH	Mendelssohn

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S

Restaurant · Parisien,

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or
Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N.S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Established 1829. Lewando's French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment, 17 Temple Place, Boston. 365 Fifth Avenue, New York. Largest in America.

SALEM WILLOWS AND BEVERLY Steamer Philadelphia Snow's Arch Wharf. 430 Atlantic Avenue Week-days 10.30 A.M., 5.45 P.M.

Summer Season of 1893

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
C. H. Hubt

PUBLISHED BY C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL. BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1893. SUMMER SEASON. Vol. VIII. No. 1.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

……

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.

Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, 30 Avery Street. BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL

• Promenade • Concerts •

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

FIRST NIGHT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1893.

PROGRAMME.

1.	POLONAISE	Liszt
2.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
3.	WALTZ, "Tales from the Orient" (First time.)	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Gondoliers"	Sullivan
5.	SUITE, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1 I. Prelude. II. Menuetto. III. Adagietto. IV. Carillon.	Bizet
6.	INTERMEZZO, from "Pagliacci" (First time.)	Leoncavallo
7.	OVERTURE, "Rienzi"	Wagner
8.	"LOVE'S DREAM AFTER THE BALL" (First time at these concerts.)	Czibulka
9.	SELECTION, "The Fencing Master" (First time at these concerts.)	De Koven
10.	LOIN DU BAL	Gillet
11.	ESPANA	Chabrier
12.	RAKOCZY MARCH	Berlioz

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S

Restaurant : Parisien

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.

Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place, BOSTON.

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, MONDAY, JUNE 5, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 2.

Egyptian Deities.

he most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

collay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

nly One Profit Between he Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

rank SHOE Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.

etail
tore, } 165 Tremont St.

OTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

ochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, very Street. BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL

• Promenade · Concerts •

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Monday Evening, June 5.

PROGRAMME.

1.	POLONAISE	Chopin
2.	OVERTURE, "Si j'etais Roi"	Adam
3.	WALTZ, "Seid umschlungen Millionen"	Strauss
4.	OVERTURE, "Orpheus aux Enfers"	Offenbach
5.	BALLET MUSIC, "Faust"	Gounod
6.	OVERTURE, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
7.	BERCEUSE, for String Orchestra (First time.)	Clayton Johns
8.	SELECTION, "Robin Hood"	DeKoven
9.	SELECTION, "Aida"	Verdi
10.	WALTZ, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
11.	POLKA FRANCAIS, "Violanta" (First time.)	Knecht
12.	TEUFELS MARCH	Suppe

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S

Restaurant : Parisien

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET
Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DNIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, TUESDAY, JUNE 6, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 3.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

• • • • • •

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank SHOE Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.

Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

• • • • • • • • •

THE MUSIC HALL

• Promenade • Concerts •

• • • • • • • • •

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Tuesday Evening, June 6, 1893.

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Prophete"	Meyerbeer
2.	OVERTURE, "Le Roi d'Ys"	Lalo
3.	WALTZ, "Donauwellen"	Ivanovici
4.	SELECTION, "Mikado"	Sullivan
5.	BALLET MUSIC from "Boabdil" a. Waltz Scherzo. b. Malaguena.	Moszkowski
6.	OVERTURE, "Fledermaus"	Strauss
7.	FUNERAL MARCH OF A MARIONETTE"	Gounod
8.	OVERTURE, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
9.	WALTZ, "Waldgeister"	Zach
10.	FLIRTATION	Steck
11.	POLKA, "Deux Pigeons"	Muller
12	MARCH, "Fatinitza"	Suppe

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S Restaurant : Parisien

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
C.H. Rigby

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 4.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank SHOE Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.

Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL

· Promenade · Concerts ·

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Wednesday Evening, June 7.

PROGRAMME.

1.	TANNHAUSER MARCH	Wagner
2.	OVERTURE, "La Part du Diable"	Auber
3.	WALTZ, "Tales from the Orient"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Pirates of Penzance"	Sullivan
5.	BALLET MUSIC, "Ritter Pasman"	Strauss
6.	LARGO	Haendel
7.	OVERTURE, "Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
8.	SELECTION, "Sphinx" Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College, and specially arranged for Full Orchestra for the Promenade Concerts.	Thompson
9.	OVERTURE, "Poet and Peasant"	Suppe
10.	WALTZ, "Doctrinen"	Ed. Strauss
11.	POLKA, "Unparteische Kritik"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Hoch Habsburg"	Kral

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S Restaurant : Parisien

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET

Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment. Main Office, 17 Temple Place,

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
CH. HUGET

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JUNE 8, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 5.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
· Promenade · Concerts ·

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Thursday Evening, June 8, 1893.

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
2.	OVERTURE, "Les Dragons de Villars"	Maillart
3.	KAISER WALTZ	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Pinafore"	Sullivan
5.	SCENES PITTORESQUES March. Air de Ballet. Angelus Fete Boheme.	Massenet
6.	PRELUDE, "Deluge"	Saint-Saens
7.	FINALE, Act I. "Lohengrin"	Wagner
8.	OVERTURE, "Zampa"	Herold
9.	SELECTION, "Madame Angot"	Lecocq
10.	CARLOTTA WALTZ	Millocker
11.	LIBELLE POLKA	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Juanita"	Suppe

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street. BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or
Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
CH RIGBY

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, FRIDAY, JUNE 9, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 7.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
· Promenade · Concerts ·

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Friday Evening, June 9, 1893.

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Austria" (First time.)	Zach
2.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
3.	WALTZ, "Freut euch des Lebens"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "La Grande Duchesse"	Offenbach
5.	OVERTURE, "Semiramide"	Rossini
6.	a. "LA DERNIERE SOMMEIL D'UNE VIERGE" b. SEVILLIANA (First Time)	Massenet
7.	OVERTURE, "Rienzi"	Wagner
8.	"LOVE'S DREAM AFTER THE BALL"	Czibulka
9.	SELECTION, "Merry War"	Strauss
10.	WALTZ, "Les Violettes"	Waldteufel
11.	POLKA FRANCAIS, "Violanta"	Knecht
12.	MARCH, "Boulanger"	Sousa

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET
LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW. LEWANDO'S French Dyeing and Cleansing Establishment

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 10, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 8.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade · Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Saturday Evening, June 10, 1893.

PROGRAMME.

1. MARCH, "Boccaccio"	Suppe
2. OVERTURE, "Barber of Seville"	Rossini
3. WALTZ, "Wiener Blut"	Strauss
4. SELECTION, "Les Brigands"	Offenbach
5. BALLET MUSIC, "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
6. PRELUDE, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
7. VALSE CAPRICE	Rubinstein
8. HYMN TO ST. CECILIA	Gounod
9. SELECTION, "Fencing Master"	DeKoven
10. WALTZ, "La Vague"	Metra
11. POLKA, "Cœur de Dame"	Fahrbach
12. PERSIAN MARCH	Strauss

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

• • • • • •

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

OBER'S
Restaurant ∶ Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

[44]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL.
BOSTON, MONDAY, JUNE 12, 1893.
SUMMER SEASON. Vol. VIII. No. 8.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade · Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Monday Evening, June 12.

PROGRAMME.

1.	WEDDING MARCH	Mendelssohn
2.	OVERTURE, "Martha"	Flotow
3.	WALTZ, "Christmas Eve" (First time.)	Clayton Johns
4.	SELECTION, "Heart and Hand"	Lecocq
5.	OVERTURE, "William Tell"	Rossini
6.	BERCEUSE, for String Orchestra	Clayton Johns
7.	OVERTURE, "La Jolie Parfumeuse"	Offenbach
8.	SELECTION, "Carmen"	Bizet
9.	OVERTURE, "Galatea"	Suppe
10.	WALTZ, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
11.	POLKA, "Libelle"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "La Patrie"	Millocker

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

······

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LIKE NEW LEWANDO'S

[45]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, TUESDAY, JUNE 13, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 9.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade · Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.   C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Tuesday Evening, June 13, 1893.

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Austria"	Zach
2.	OVERTURE, "Raymond"	Thomas
3.	WALTZ, for String Orchestra (First time.)	Mackay
4.	SELECTION, "Fatinitza"	Suppe
5.	BALLET MUSIC, "Queen of Sheba"	Goldmark
6.	COLUMBIAN MARCH	Schulz
7.	INTERMEZZO, from "Pagliacci"	Leoncavallo
8.	SELECTION, "Faust"	Gounod
9.	SELECTION, "Poor Jonathan"	Millocker
10.	FLIRTATION	Steck
11.	WALTZ. "Barcarolle"	Waldteufel
12.	MARCH, "White Horse"	Tellam

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

[46]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 14, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 10.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade · Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Wednesday Evening, June 14.

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Tschin Boom"	Kraus
2.	OVERTURE, "Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicolai
3.	WALTZ, "Thousand and One Nights"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Chimes of Normandy"	Planquette
5.	HUNGARIAN DANCES	Brahms
6.	FIRE CHARM, from "Die Walkyrie"	Wagner
7.	PRELUDE to "The Deluge"	Saint-Saens
8.	SELECTION, "Pounce & Co." (First Time)	Woolf
9.	OVERTURE, "Fledermaus"	Strauss
10.	WALTZ, "Espana"	Waldteufel
11.	POLKA, "One Heart, One Mind"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Prince Eugene"	Leonhardt

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or
Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK [illegible] LEWANDO'S

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JUNE 15, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 11.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade · Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Thursday Evening, June 15.

PROGRAMME.

1. MARCH, "Queen of Sheba" . . . . Gounod
2. OVERTURE, "Zampa" . . . . Herold
3. WALTZ, "Carlotta" . . . . Millocker
4. SELECTION, "Sphinx" . . . . Thompson
   Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College, and specially arranged for Full Orchestra for the Promenade Concerts.

5. OVERTURE, "Martha" . . . . Flotow
6. a LA DERNIERE SOMMEIL D'UNE VIERGE } Massenet b SEVILLIANA }
7. PRELUDE to "Die Meistersinger" . . . . Wagner
8. SUITE, "Peer Gynt" . . . . Grieg
   a Aase's Death.
   b In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains.
   (The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)

9. SELECTION, "Fencing Master" . . . . DeKoven
10. LOIN DU BAL . . . . Gillet
11. WALTZ, "Les Patineurs" . . . . Waldteufel
12. MARCH, "Juanita" . . . . Suppe

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

• • • • • •

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank SHOE Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET

Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, FRIDAY, JUNE 16, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 12.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade · Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Friday Evening, June 16.

PROGRAMME.

1.	PERSIAN MARCH	Strauss
2.	OVERTURE, "Stradella"	Flotow
3.	WALTZ, "Waldgeister"	Zach
4.	SELECTION, "Pirates of Penzance"	Sullivan
5.	BALLET MUSIC, "Sylvia" a Prelude, Les Chasseresses. b Intermezzo et Valse lente. c Pizzicati. d Cortege de Bacchus	Delibes
6.	VENEZIANA (First Time)	Bereny
7.	FINALE, Act I. "Lohengrin"	Wagner
8.	SELECTION, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
9.	OVERTURE, "Light Cavalry"	Suppe
10.	KISS WALTZ	Strauss
11.	POLKA, "Unparteische Kritik"	Strauss
12	MARCH, "Hoch Habsburg"	Kral

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

……

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET
LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 13.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.

Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL

• Promenade • Concerts •

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Saturday Evening, June 17.

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Boccaccio"	Suppe
2.	OVERTURE, "Ruy Blas"	Mendelssohn
3.	WALTZ, "Blue Danube"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Gondoliers"	Sullivan
5.	OVERTURE, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
6.	TRAUMEREI	Schumann
7.	BALLET MUSIC, from "Boabdil" a Scherzo Waltz. b Malaguena.	Moszkowski
8.	SELECTION, "Robin Hood"	DeKoven
9.	OVERTURE, "Banditen Streiche"	Suppe
10.	WALTZ, "Tour de Monde"	Metra
11.	POLKA FRANCAIS, "Violanta"	Knecht
12.	MARCH, "Austria"	Zach

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S Restaurant Parisien

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.

Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET
Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Fami'y Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Te'ephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
CH. HIGBY

PUBLISHED BY C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL. | BOSTON, MONDAY, JUNE 19, 1893. | SUMMER SEASON. Vol. VIII. No. 14.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Monday Evening, June 19.

PROGRAMME.

1.	CORONATION MARCH, from "Le Prophete"	Meyerbeer
2.	OVERTURE, "Fra Diavolo"	Auber
3.	WALTZ, "Legends from the Forest"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Pounce & Co."	Woolf
5.	SLAVONIC DANCES	Dvorak
6.	"DANSE DES BACCHANTES," from "Philemon et Baucis"	Gounod
7.	OVERTURE, "Rienzi"	Wagner
8.	SELECTION, "Aida"	Verdi
9.	SELECTION, "La Fille de Madame Angot"	Lecocq
10.	WALTZ, "Toujours ou Jamais"	Waldteufel
11.	POLKA, "Enthusiasm"	P. Muller
12.	MARCH, "White Horse"	Tellam

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, TUESDAY, JUNE 20, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 15.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Tuesday Evening, June 20.

PROGRAMME.

1.	POLONAISE	Chopin
2.	OVERTURE, "Phedre"	Massenet
3.	WALTZ, "Morgenblatter"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Mignon"	A. Thomas
5.	AIR, Louis XIII.	Ghys
6.	POLONAISE	Liszt
7.	INTERMEZZO, "Naila"	Delibes
8.	RIDE OF THE WALKYRIES	Wagner
9.	SELECTION, "La Grande Duchesse"	Offenbach
10.	WALTZ, "Spanish Serenade"	Metra
11.	POLKA, "Bella Bocca"	Waldteufel
12.	MARCH, "Prince Eugene"	Leonhardt

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET

Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK
LEWANDO

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 21, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 16.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

……

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Wednesday Evening, June 21.

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Austria"	Zach
2.	OVERTURE, "Merry Wives of Windsor"	Nicola
3.	KAISER WALTZ	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Boccaccio"	Suppe
5.	INTERMEZZO, "Narcissa"	Goodrich
6.	OVERTURE, "Oberon"	Weber
7.	"LE DERNIER SOMMEIL D'UNE VIERGE"	Massenet
8.	SELECTION, "Faust"	Gounod
9.	OVERTURE, "Light Cavalry"	Suppe
10.	LOVE'S DREAM AFTER THE BALL	Czibulka
11.	WALTZ, "Seid umschlungen Millionen"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Furs Vaterland"	Millocker

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
C H HIGBY

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JUNE 22, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 17.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between
The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank SHOE Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Thursday Evening, June 22.

PROGRAMME.

1.	HUNGARIAN MARCH	Berlioz
2.	SUITE, "From all Countries"	Moszkowski
3.	WALTZ, "Morgenblatter"	Strauss
4.	OVERTURE, "Orpheus aux Enfers"	Offenbach
5.	BALLET MUSIC, "Sylvia" a Prelude. Les Chasseresses. b Intermezzo et Valse Lente. c Pizzicati. d Cortege de Bacchus.	Delibes
6.	BALLET MUSIC, from "Boabdil" a Scherzo Waltz. b Malaguena.	Moszkowski
7.	OVERTURE, "William Tell"	Rossini
8.	SELECTION, "Carmen"	Bizet
9.	FLIRTATION	Steck
10.	WALTZ, "Espana"	Waldteufel
11.	"N. E. ACCIDENT POLKA	Knecht

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET

Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
CH HIGBY

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, FRIDAY, JUNE 23, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 18.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

. . . . . .

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank SHOE Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.

Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Friday Evening, June 23.

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Baden-Baden"	Kral
2.	OVERTURE, "Euryanthe"	Weber
3.	WALTZ, "Waldgeister"	Zach
4.	SELECTION, "Mikado"	Sullivan
5.	SUITE, "L'Arlesienne," No. 1 I. Prelude. II. Menuetto. III. Adagietto. IV. Carillon.	Bizet
6.	MINUET	Boccherini
7.	OVERTURE, "Zampa"	Herold
8.	PRELUDE, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
9.	SELECTION, "Fencing Master"	DeKoven
10.	WALTZ, "Estudiantina"	Waldteufel
11.	POLKA, "Enthusiasm"	P. Muller
12.	MARCH, "Pour la Patrie"	Millocker

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S Restaurant : Parisien

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.

Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
CH. MILBY

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 24, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 19.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade · Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Saturday Evening, June 24.

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Hoch Habsburg"	Kral
2.	OVERTURE, "Martha"	Flotow
3.	WALTZ, "Artists' Life"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Les Brigands"	Offenbach
5	BALLET MUSIC, "Faust"	Gounod
6.	SERENADE	Haydn
7.	RIDE OF THE WALKYRIES	Wagner
8.	OVERTURE, "Poet and Peasant"	Suppe
9.	SELECTION, "Robin Hood"	DeKoven
10.	WALTZ, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
11.	POLKA, "Violonta"	Knecht
12.	MARCH, "White Horse"	Tellam

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, MONDAY, JUNE 26, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 20.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.

Retail Store, } 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Monday Evening, June 26.

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
2.	OVERTURE, "Barber of Seville"	Rossini
3.	WALTZ, "Doctrinen"	Ed. Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Fatinitza"	Suppe
5.	SCENES PITTORESQUES March. Air de Ballet. Angelus. Fete Boheme.	Massenet
6.	PRELUDE, "Deluge"	Saint-Saens
7.	WOTAN'S FAREWELL AND FIRE-CHARM	Wagner
8.	SELECTION, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
9.	SELECTION, "Chimes of Normandy"	Planquette
10.	WALTZ, "Serenade Espagnol"	Metra
11.	POLKA, "Bella Bocca"	Waldteufel
12.	MARCH, "Austria"	Zach

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S Restaurant : Parisien

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.

Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET
Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
C.H. HIGBY

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, TUESDAY, JUNE 27, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 21.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian
Cigarette on the market.

……

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between
The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank SHOE Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR
ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
· Promenade · Concerts ·

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

· Tuesday Evening, June 27.

DeKOVEN NIGHT.

PROGRAMME.

1. HUNGARIAN MARCH . . . . Berlioz
2. OVERTURE, "Phedre" . . . . Massenet
3. INTERMEZZO, "Naila" . . . . Delibes
4. SELECTION, "Robin Hood" . . . . DeKoven
   Conducted by the Composer.

5. BERCEUSE . . . . Clayton Johns
6. SELECTION, "Knickerbockers" . . . . . . DeKoven
   (First time.)
   Conducted by the Composer.
7. OVERTURE, "Tannhauser" . . . . Wagner
8. MARCH OF THE GNOMES . . . . DeKoven
   Conducted by the Composer.

9. OVERTURE, "Light Cavalry" . . . . Suppe
10. SELECTION, "Fencing Master" . . . . . . DeKoven
    Conducted by the Composer.
11. ESPANA . . . . Chabrier
12. MARCH "Austria" . . . . Zach

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET

Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets, or
Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK LEWANDO'S

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
C. H. Higby

PUBLISHED BY C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL.
BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 28, 1893.
SUMMER SEASON. Vol. VIII. No. 22.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Wednesday Evening, June 28.

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Prophete"	Meyerbeer
2.	OVERTURE, "Si j'etais Roi"	Adam
3.	WALTZ, "Tales of the Orient"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Erminie"	Jakobowski
5.	BALLET MUSIC, "Faust"	Gounod
6.	HYMN TO ST. CECILIA	Gounod
7.	WALDWEBEN	Wagner
8.	OVERTURE, "Raymond"	A. Thomas
9.	SELECTION, "La Grande Duchesse"	Offenbach
10.	WALTZ, "Je t'aime"	Waldteufel
11.	POLKA, "Unparteische Kritik"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Baden-Baden"	Kral

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET

Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.
Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the
NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.
This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
G H Higby

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JUNE 29, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 23.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
· Promenade · Concerts ·

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Thursday Evening, June 29.

PROGRAMME.

1.	PERSIAN MARCH	Strauss
2.	OVERTURE, "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
3.	WALTZ, "Carlotta"	Millocker
4.	OVERTURE, "Mignon"	A. Thomas
5.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "Le Rouet d'Omphale"	Saint-Saens
6.	OVERTURE, "Rienzi"	Wagner
7.	DANSE DES BACCHANTES, from "Philemon et Baucis"	Gounod
8.	SELECTION, "Carmen"	Bizet
9.	SELECTION, "Fatinitza"	Suppe
10.	WALTZ, "Esperanza"	Metra
11.	POLKA, "Bella Bocca"	Waldteufel
12.	TEUFELS MARCH	Suppe

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank SHOE Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.

Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

OBER'S

Restaurant : Parisien

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.

Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET
Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
CH RIGBY

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, FRIDAY, JUNE 30, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 24.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

……

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Friday Evening, June 30.

PROGRAMME.

1.	POLONAISE	Chopin
2.	OVERTURE, "Les Dragons de Villars"	Maillart
3.	WALTZ, "Child of Fortune"	Millocker
4.	SELECTION, "Knickerbockers"	DeKoven
5.	SUITE, "Peer Gynt" a Aase's Death. b In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains. (The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)	Grieg
6.	HUNGARIAN RHAPSODY	Liszt
7.	PRELUDE, from "St. Mary Magdalen"	Martin Roeder
8.	OVERTURE, "Stradella"	Flotow
9.	SELECTION, "La Belle Helene"	Offenbach
10.	WALTZ, "Barcarolle"	Waldteufel
11.	POLKA, "Libelle"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Pour la Patrie"	Millocker

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S Restaurant Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 1, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 25.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
• Promenade · Concerts •

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Saturday Evening, July 1.

PROGRAMME.

1. MARCH, "Juanita" . . . . Suppe
2. OVERTURE, "Oberon" . . . . Weber
3. WALTZ, "Artists' Life" . . . . Strauss
4. SELECTION, "Fencing Master" . . . . . DeKoven

5. SELECTION, "Faust" . . . . Gounod
6. PRELUDE, "Meistersingers" . . . . . Wagner
7. INTERMEZZO, "Cavalleria Rusticana" . . . Mascagni
8. SELECTION, "Sphinx" . . . . Thompson
   Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College, and specially arranged for Full Orchestra for the Promenade Concerts.

9. SELECTION, "Gondoliers" . . . . . . Sullivan
10. WALTZ, "Blue Danube" . . . . Strauss
11. POLKA, "Woman's Heart" . . . . . . Fahrbach
12. MARCH, "Hoch Habsburg" . . . . Kral

Monday, July 3, ... WAGNER NIGHT
Tuesday, July 4, . . PATRIOTIC PROGRAMME
Wednesday, July 5, . . OFFENBACH NIGHT

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

• • • • • •

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET

Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, MONDAY, JULY 3, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 26.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade · Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Monday Evening, July 3.

WAGNER NIGHT.

PROGRAMME.

1.	TANNHAUSER MARCH	Wagner
2.	INTERMEZZO, "Naila"	Delibes
3.	WALDWEBEN	Wagner
4.	SELECTION, "Robin Hood"	DeKoven
5.	a BERCEUSE b SCHERZO	Clayton Johns
6.	OVERTURE, "Rienzi"	Wagner
7.	SELECTION, "Carmen"	Bizet
8.	PRELUDE, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
9.	SELECTION, "Mignon"	A. Thomas
10.	FIRE CHARM, from "Die Walkyrie"	Wagner
11.	POLKA, "Enthusiasm"	P. Muller
12.	HUNGARIAN MARCH	Berlioz

Tuesday, July 4, . . . PATRIOTIC PROGRAMME
Wednesday, July 5, . . OFFENBACH NIGHT

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

• • • • • •

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street. BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or
Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, TUESDAY, JULY 4, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 27.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
· Promenade · Concerts ·

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Tuesday Evening, July 4.

PATRIOTIC PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Le Prophete"	Meyerbeer
2.	OVERTURE, "Jubel"	Weber
3.	WALTZ, "Artists' Life"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Madame Angot"	Lecocq
5.	BALLET MUSIC, "Sylvia" a Prelude. Les Chasseresses. b Intermezzo et Valse Lente. c Pizzicati. d Cortege de Bacchus.	Delibes
6.	COLUMBIAN MARCH	Schulz
7.	SELECTION, "Fencing Master"	DeKoven
8.	SELECTION, "Sphinx" Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College, and specially arranged for Full Orchestra for the Promenade Concerts.	Thompson
9.	SELECTION, "Chimes of Normandy"	Planquette
10.	WALTZ, "Blue Danube"	Strauss
11.	POLKA, "Bella Bocca"	Waldteufel
12.	MARCH, "Austria"	Zach

Wednesday, July 5, . . OFFENBACH NIGHT

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between
The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, } 165 Tremont St.

OTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 0 Avery Street. BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

ANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, JULY 5, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 28.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Wednesday Evening, July 5.

OFFENBACH NIGHT.

PROGRAMME.

1.	WEDDING MARCH	Mendelssohn
2.	OVERTURE, "La Jolie Parfumeuse"	Offenbach
3.	WALTZ, "Wine, Women, and Song"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Brigands"	Offenbach
5.	BALLET MUSIC, "Coppelia"	Bizet
6.	SELECTION "La Belle Helene"	Offenbach
7.	OVERTURE, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
8.	SELECTION, "La Grande Duchesse"	Offenbach
9.	WALTZ, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
10.	OVERTURE, "Orpheus aux Enfers"	Offenbach
11.	POLKA, "Unparteische Kritik"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Baden-Baden"	Kral

Friday, July 7, ... SULLIVAN NIGHT

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S Restaurant : Parisien

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JULY 6, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 29.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.

Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
· Promenade · Concerts ·

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Thursday Evening, July 6.

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Queen of Sheba"	Gounod
2.	OVERTURE, "Le Roi d'Ys"	Lalo
3.	WALTZ, "Barcarolle"	Waldteufel
4.	SELECTION, "Erminie"	Jakobowski
5.	INVITATION TO DANCE	Weber-Berlioz
6.	PRELUDE, "The Deluge"	Saint-Saens
7.	FINALE, Act I., "Lohengrin"	Wagner
8.	OVERTURE, "Galatea"	Suppe
9.	SELECTION, "Knickerbockers"	DeKoven
10.	FLIRTATION	Steck
11.	WALTZ, "Lagunen"	Strauss
12.	TEUFELS MARCH	Suppe

Friday, July 7, ... SULLIVAN NIGHT

Monday, July 10, Vocal Selections by the following Artists:

Thomas E. Johnson.
J. C. Bartlett.
E. M. Spears.
W. H. Fessenden.
E. F. Webber.
H. A. Cook.
C. E. Hay.
Robert Bruce.
Geo. R. Titus.
M. W. Whitney.
G. Rob. Clark.
L. B. Merrill.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S Restaurant Parisien

3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.

Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

European Waiters.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or
Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

[66]

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
C H HUBY

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, FRIDAY, JULY 7, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 30.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank SHOE Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
Promenade · Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Friday Evening, July 7.

SULLIVAN NIGHT.

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
2.	SELECTION, "Pinafore"	Sullivan
3.	OVERTURE, "Freischutz"	Weber
4.	SELECTION, "Mikado"	Sullivan
5.	DANSE MACABRE	Saint-Saens
6.	GRACEFUL DANCE	Sullivan
7.	OVERTURE, "Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
8.	SELECTION, "Pirates of Penzance"	Sullivan
9.	LE DERNIER SOMMEIL DE LA VIERGE	Massenet
10.	SELECTION, "Gondoliers"	Sullivan
11.	SPANISH SERENADE	Metra
12.	MARCH, "Pour la Patrie"	Millocker

Monday, July 10, Vocal Selections by the following Artists:

Thomas E. Johnson.
J. C. Bartlett.
E. M. Spears.
W. H. Fessenden.
E. F. Webber.
H. A. Cook.
C. E. Hay.
Robert Bruce.
Geo. R. Titus.
M. W. Whitney.
G. Rob. Clark.
L. B. Merrill.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or
Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square. Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
C H HIGBY

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 31.

Egyptian
Deities.

The most popular Egyptian
Cigarette on the market.

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between
The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank
SHOE Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR
ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL

Promenade · Concerts

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Saturday Evening, July 8.

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Fatinitza"	Suppe
2.	OVERTURE, "Raymond"	A. Thomas
3.	WALTZ, "Morgenblatter"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Boccaccio"	Suppe
5.	BALLET MUSIC, "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
6.	LARGO	Haendel
7.	SELECTION, "Sphinx" Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College, and specially arranged for Full Orchestra for the Promenade Concerts.	Thompson
8.	SELECTION, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
9.	OVERTURE, "Martha"	Flotow
10.	CARLOTTA WALTZ	Millocker
11.	POLKA, "Blumen"	Ziehrer
12.	BOULANGER MARCH	Sousa

Tuesday, July 11,	STRAUSS NIGHT
Wednesday, July 12,	DeKOVEN NIGHT (By request)
Thursday, July 13,	BALL-ROOM NIGHT
Friday, July 14,	SUPPE NIGHT
Saturday, July 15,	Closing Night and Complimentary Testimonial to Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or
Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
CH WILBY

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, MONDAY, JULY 10, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 32.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL

• Promenade • Concerts •

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Monday Evening, July 10.

Vocal Selections by the following Artists:

THOMAS E. JOHNSON. W. H. FESSENDEN. C. E. HAY. M. W. WHITNEY.
J. C. BARTLETT. E. F. WEBBER. ROBERT BRUCE. G. ROB. CLARK.
E. M. SPEARS. H. A. COOK. GEO. R. TITUS. L. B. MERRILL.

PROGRAMME.

1.	POLONAISE	Chopin
2.	OVERTURE, "William Tell"	Rossini
3.	VOCAL SELECTION, "Comrades in Arms"	Adam
4.	SELECTION, "Aida"	Verdi
5.	BALLET MUSIC, "Boabdil" a Scherzo. b Malaguena.	Moszkowski
6.	VOCAL SELECTION, "The Owl and the Pussy Cat"	DeKoven
7.	OVERTURE, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
8.	VOCAL SELECTION, "Strike the Lyre"	Bishop
9.	POLONAISE	Liszt
10.	VOCAL WALTZ	Vogel
11.	LOIN DU BAL	Gillet
12.	MARCH, "Austria"	Zach

Tuesday, July 11,	STRAUSS NIGHT
Wednesday, July 12,	DeKOVEN NIGHT (By request)
Thursday, July 13,	BALL-ROOM NIGHT
Friday, July 14,	SUPPE NIGHT

Saturday, July 15, Closing Night and Complimentary Testimonial to Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.
All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or
Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts.
Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
C H Hilby

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, TUESDAY, JULY 11, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 33.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

······

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
· Promenade · Concerts ·

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Tuesday Evening, July 11.

STRAUSS NIGHT.

PROGRAMME.

1.	PERSIAN MARCH	Strauss
2.	OVERTURE, "Fra Diavolo"	Auber
3.	WALTZ, "Tales of the Orient"	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Mignon"	A. Thomas
5.	OVERTURE, "Fledermaus"	Strauss
6.	OVERTURE, "Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
7.	PIZZICATO POLKA	Strauss
8.	SELECTION, "Merry War"	Strauss
9.	WALTZ, "Thousand and One Nights"	Strauss
10.	SELECTION, "Faust"	Gounod
11.	WALTZ, "Blue Danube"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Hoch Habsburg"	Kral

Wednesday, July 12, . . . DeKOVEN NIGHT (By request)
Thursday, July 13, . . . BALL-ROOM NIGHT
Friday, July 14, . . . SUPPE NIGHT
Saturday, July 15, Closing Night and Complimentary Testimonial to Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.

Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street, Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, JULY 12, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 34.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
· Promenade · Concerts ·

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Wednesday Evening, July 12.

DeKOVEN NIGHT. (By request.)

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Prophete"	Meyerbeer
2.	SUITE, "L'Arlesienne No. 2"	Bizet
3.	KAISER WALTZ	Strauss
4.	SELECTION, "Robin Hood"	DeKoven
5.	BALLET MUSIC, "Feramors"	Rubinstein
6.	MARCH OF THE GNOMES	DeKoven
7.	SECRET LOVE	Resch
8.	SELECTION, "Knickerbockers"	DeKoven
9.	OVERTURE, "Stradella"	Flotow
10.	SELECTION, "Fencing Master"	DeKoven
11.	POLKA, "Enthusiasm"	P. Muller
12.	MARCH "Austria"	Zach

Thursday, July 13, ... BALL-ROOM NIGHT
Friday, July 14, ... SUPPE NIGHT
Saturday, July 15, Closing Night and Complimentary Testimonial to Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

· · · · · ·

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street. BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET
Norfolk Lager

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square. Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, THURSDAY, JULY 13, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 35.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

• • • • • •

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.

Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
· Promenade · Concerts ·

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Thursday Evening, July 13.

BALL-ROOM NIGHT.

PROGRAMME.

1.	MARCH, "Austria"	Zach
2.	WALTZ, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
3.	SLAVONIC DANCES	Dvorak
4.	POLKA, "La Czarina"	Ganne
5.	SELECTION, "Carmen"	Bizet
6.	SERENATA	Moszkowski
7.	WALTZ	Zach
8.	SELECTION, "La Grande Duchesse"	Offenbach
9.	SELECTION, "La Fille de Madame Angot"	Lecocq
10.	ESPANA	Chabrier
11.	POLKA, "Violonta"	Knecht
12.	MARCH, "Washington Post"	Sousa

Friday, July 14. . . . . SUPPE NIGHT
Saturday, July 15, Closing Night and Complimentary Testimonial to Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.

Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

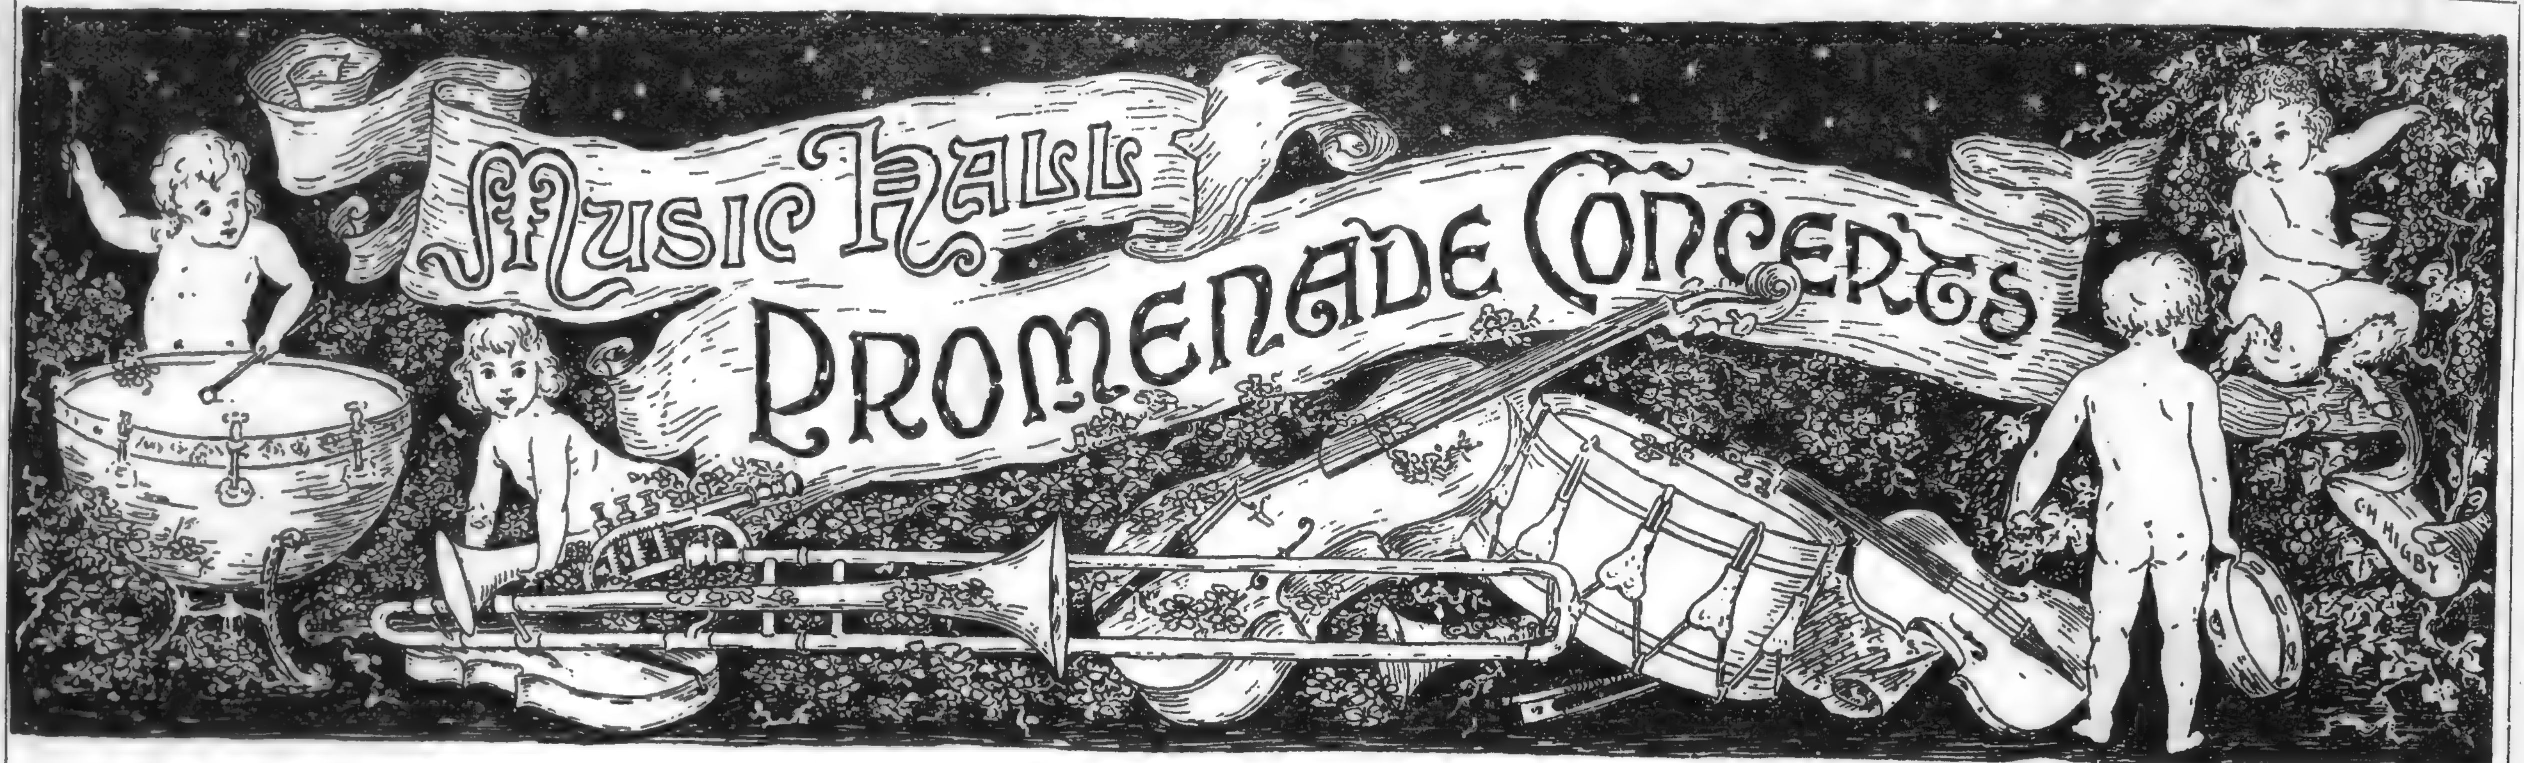
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square. Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES



PUBLISHED BY C. A. ELLIS, MUSIC HALL. BOSTON, FRIDAY, JULY 14, 1893. SUMMER SEASON. Vol. VIII. No. 36.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL

· Promenade · Concerts ·

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Friday Evening, July 14.

SUPPÉ NIGHT.

PROGRAMME.

1.	TEUFELS MARCH	Suppe
2.	OVERTURE, "Euryanthe"	Weber
3.	SELECTION, "Boccaccio"	Suppe
4.	OVERTURE, "Light Cavalry"	Suppe
5.	BALLET MUSIC	Massenet
6.	OVERTURE, "Poet and Peasant"	Suppe
7.	TRAUMEREI	Schumann
8.	OVERTURE, "Banditen Streiche"	Suppe
9.	SELECTION, "Fatinitza"	Suppe
10.	WALTZ, "Estudiantina"	Waldteufel
11.	POLKA, "Libelle"	Strauss
12.	MARCH, "Juanita"	Suppe

Saturday, July 15, Closing Night and Complimentary Testimonial to Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

······

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,
Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank SHOE Co.
Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer
SOLD HERE.
In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:
OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

OBER'S Restaurant : Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK CABINET

LAGER BEER
A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,
Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or Telephone No. 56.
City Office, 69 Blackstone Street.
Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square, Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts
C H HIGBY

PUBLISHED BY
C. A. ELLIS,
MUSIC HALL.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1893.

SUMMER SEASON.
Vol. VIII. No. 37.

Egyptian Deities.

The most popular Egyptian Cigarette on the market.

......

S. S. PIERCE & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND GROCERS,

Scollay Square,
Copley Square,
Central Wharf.

Only One Profit Between The Foot and the Factory. (Trade Mark.)

Frank Shoe Co.

Manufacturers Men's Fine Shoes.
Retail Store, 165 Tremont St.

NOTED THE WORLD OVER FOR ITS PURITY.

Rochester Brew. Co.'s Lager Beer

SOLD HERE.

In bottles and on draught.

BOSTON BRANCH:

OFFICE, 30 Avery Street.
BOTTLING DEPT., 295-305 "A" Street.

SUMMER SEASON OF 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL
· Promenade · Concerts ·

EIGHTH SEASON

T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Saturday Evening, July 15.

Closing Night and Complimentary Testimonial to Mr. T. Adamowski.

PROGRAMME.

1. WEDDING MARCH . . . . Mendelssohn
2. OVERTURE, "Meistersinger" . . . . . . Wagner
3. VIOLIN SOLOS.
   - a Melody . . . . . . Paderewski
   - b Hungarian Dance . . . . Nachez

   Mr. T ADAMOWSKI.
4. WALTZ, "Harlequin's Voyage." (First time) . . . . Zach

   Dedicated to Mr. T. Adamowski.

---

5. BALLET MUSIC, "Sylvia" . . . . Delibes
   - a Prelude. Les Chasseresses.
   - b Intermezzo et Valse Lente.
   - c Pizzicati.
   - d Cortege de Bacchus.
6. RIDE OF THE WALKYRIES . . . . Wagner
7. LE DERNIER SOMMEIL DE LA VIERGE . . Massenet
8. SUITE, "Peer Gynt" . . . . Grieg
   - a Morning Dawn.
   - b In the Halls of the King of the Dovre Mountains.

   (The Imps are chasing Peer Gynt.)

---

9. SELECTION, "Gondoliers" . . . . Sullivan
10. LOIN DU BAL . . . . Gillet
11. MARCH . . . . Gounod

Steinway Pianos used at these concerts, from the Warerooms of M. Steinert & Sons Company, 190 Tremont St., cor. Boylston.

The Mason & Hamlin Liszt Organs used at these concerts.

HAT-RACKS MAY BE FOUND UNDER EACH CHAIR.

OBER'S
Restaurant Parisien
3 AND 4 WINTER PLACE.

THE MOST ELEGANT CAFE IN THE CITY.

Rooms for private supper parties before and after theatres and concerts.

The French Cuisine is Unexcelled.

BIRD DINNERS.
WELSH RAREBIT.
GOLDEN BUCK.
Cold Cuts and Salads, all sorts.

WINES OF MY OWN IMPORTATION.

All the Latest Fancy Drinks.

EUROPEAN WAITERS.

NORFOLK
CABINET
Norfolk Lager Beer

LAGER BEER

A Particularly Fine Lager Beer for Family Use.

Put up in neat and attractive style. Order from your grocer or direct from the

NORFOLK BREWERY,

Cor. Cedar and Pynchon Streets or Telephone No. 56.

City Office, 69 Blackstone Street. Telephone No. 2131.

This beer is sold at the Promenade Concerts. Try it, and you will order.

DANIEL FRANK & CO.'S Imported and Domestic CIGARS. 10 Post-office Square. Boston. Depot for the Celebrated N. S. CIGARS. For sale at these concerts. Telephone 1655.

BLANK PAGE

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK

BLANK PAGE

COLORED PAPER

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

31

Promenade Concerts

SEASON 1893.

Saturday Evening, July 8.

ADMIT ONE. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

RETAIN THIS CHECK.

EVE. JULY 8.

FLOOR

ONE CHAIR

TABLE

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

Promenade Concerts

Season 1893.

Monday Evening, July 3.

ADMIT ONE. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

MUSIC HALL LW3501

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

SEASON 1893.

ADMIT ONE.

Not Good July 15 C. A. Ellis Manager

BOSTON MUSIC HALL

Promenade Concerts

Complimentary Testimonial to Mr. T. Adamowski

SATURDAY EVENING, JULY 15, 1893

ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV, NO. 16.

SUNDAY, JULY 16, 1893.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Promenades Ended—Tributes to Mr. Adamowski.

Pauline Hall's Popularity in "Amorita"—Mme. Nordica's Common Sense Opinions—Today's City Concert—Musical Plans at the Pines—News Notes, Gossip, Comment.

The eighth season of the Music Hall promenades ended last evening, and the brilliant series of concerts which has for the last six weeks been the delight of all musical Boston was brought to a close in a scene of enthusiasm, which reflected highest credit upon all who have been associated in this amusement enterprise.

Boston claims Mr. Adamowski as one of her own, and, despite the successes of his youth in his native country, it is to the recognition given him in this city that he owes his present prominence in the musical profession of America.

He has made the success of his career in the promenades of the present season, and his skill, taste and good judgment as a conductor have been recognized and commended by audiences that have a full knowledge of the requirements of the position he has filled with so much credit.

His programmes have been made with a view to meeting the tastes of all classes of music lovers, and in his readings of the hundreds of compositions included in the season's scheme he has shown the same care and attention to the gay dance music as to the excerpts from the Wagner concert repertoire.

He appeared as soloist last evening in the first part of the programme, playing a melodie by Paderewski and some Hungarian dances by Nachez, displaying his fine gifts as a violinist to the best advantage in both these numbers. He was not left in doubt as to the value put upon his playing by his audience, for more rapturous expressions of delight have not often been given by the promenade patrons. He merited all that he was given, and it was a pleasure to see such a spontaneous tribute to the genius of the soloist. Repeated recalls followed his appearance, and he was presented with many offerings from his artistic admirers.

Mr. Max Zach, one of the viola players of the orchestra, contributed the evening's novelty, a waltz, "The Harlequin's Voyage," written for the occasion and dedicated to Mr. Adamowski. The composition is in keeping with the reputation Mr. Zach has gained as an original and very melodious writer in his earlier contributions to the promenade programmes, and its merits were quickly recognized and most heartily applauded. the composer modestly acknowledging the honor from his seat among his fellow-players. Credit is due to Mr. Adamowski for the recognition he has shown of local composers during the season, and "The Harlequin's Voyage" waltzes, like many other compositions produced under his baton, will testify his good judgment in estimating the value of compositions submitted to his inspection.

The future of the Music Hall promenades is a matter of uncertainty, but if the progress of the times and the new elevated railroad wipes out the scene of these entertainments before another season, Manager Charles A. Ellis, to whom Boston owes the excellent conduct of these concerts, can "point with pride" to the record he has made, and safely challenge competition should he again assume control of them elsewhere.

COLORED PAPER

31

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

Promenade Concerts

SEASON 1893.

Saturday Evening, July 8.

ADMIT ONE. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

TABLE
ONE CHAIR
FLOOR
EVE. JULY 8.
RETAIN THIS CHECK.

26

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

Promenade Concerts

SEASON 1893.

Monday Evening, July 3.

ADMIT ONE. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

TABLE
Q
ONE CHAIR
FIRST BALCONY.
EVE. JULY 3.
RETAIN THIS CHECK.

37

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

Promenade Concerts

SEASON 1893.

Saturday Evening, July 15.

ADMIT ONE. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

617
FIRST BALCONY.
EVE. JULY 15.
RETAIN THIS CHECK.

MUSIC HALL LW350

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

SEASON 1893.

ADMIT ONE.

Not Good July 15 C. A. Ellis Manager

BOSTON MUSIC HALL

Promenade Concerts

Complimentary Testimonial to Mr. T. Adamowski

SATURDAY EVENING, JULY 15, 1893

ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis Manager

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV, NO. 16.

SUNDAY, JULY 16, 1893.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Promenades Ended—Tributes to Mr. Adamowski.

Pauline Hall's Popularity in "Amorita" – Mme. Nordica's Common Sense Opinions—Today's City Concert—Musical Plans at the Pines—News Notes, Gossip, Comment.

The eighth season of the Music Hall promenades ended last evening, and the brilliant series of concerts which has for the last six weeks been the delight of all musical Boston was brought to a close in a scene of enthusiasm, which reflected highest credit upon all who have been associated in this amusement enterprise.

Boston claims Mr. Adamowski as one of her own, and, despite the successes of his youth in his native country, it is to the recognition given him in this city that he owes his present prominence in the musical profession of America.

He has made the success of his career in the promenades of the present season, and his skill, taste and good judgment as a conductor have been recognized and commended by audiences that have a full knowledge of the requirements of the position he has filled with so much credit.

His programmes have been made with a view to meeting the tastes of all classes of music lovers, and in his readings of the hundreds of compositions included in the season's scheme he has shown the same care and attention to the gay dance music as to the excerpts from the Wagner concert repertoire.

He appeared as soloist last evening in the first part of the programme, playing a melodie by Paderewski and some Hungarian dances by Nachez, displaying his fine gifts as a violinist to the best advantage in both these numbers. He was not left in doubt as to the value put upon his playing by his audience, for more rapturous expressions of delight have not often been given by the promenade patrons. He merited all that he was given, and it was a pleasure to see such a spontaneous tribute to the genius of the soloist. Repeated recalls followed his appearance, and he was presented with many offerings from his artistic admirers.

Mr. Max Zach, one of the viola players of the orchestra, contributed the evening's novelty, a waltz, "The Harlequin's Voyage," written for the occasion and dedicated to Mr. Adamowski. The composition is in keeping with the reputation Mr. Zach has gained as an original and very melodious writer in his earlier contributions to the promenade programmes, and its merits were quickly recognized and most heartily applauded. the composer modestly acknowledging the honor from his seat among his fellow-players. Credit is due to Mr. Adamowski for the recognition he has shown of local composers during the season, and "The Harlequin's Voyage" waltzes, like many other compositions produced under his baton, will testify his good judgment in estimating the value of compositions submitted to his inspection.

The future of the Music Hall promenades is a matter of uncertainty, but if the progress of the times and the new elevated railroad wipes out the scene of these entertainments before another season, Manager Charles A. Ellis, to whom Boston owes the excellent conduct of these concerts, can "point with pride" to the record he has made, and safely challenge competition should he again assume control of them elsewhere.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK

Music Hall
Promenade Concerts

THE "POPS." SYMPHONY HALL.

SONGS

TA-RA-RA BOOM-DE-AY

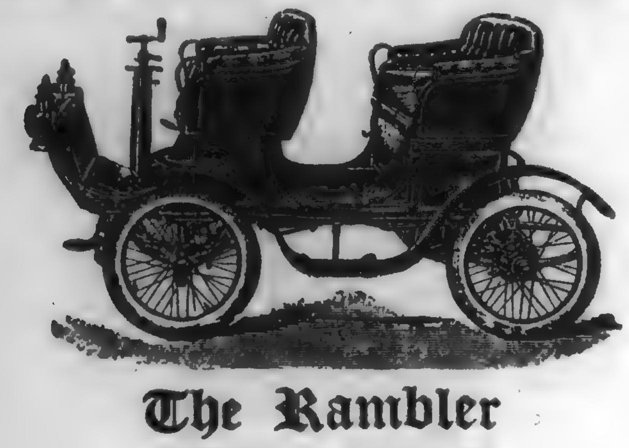
A bright and stylish girl you see,
Belle of good society;
Not too strict, but rather free,
Yet as right as right can be.
Never forward, never bold,
Not too shy, and not too cold;
But the very thing, I'm told,
That in your arms you'd like to fold.

Ta-ra-ra boom-de-ay, ta-ra-ra boom-de-ay,
Ta-ra-ra boom-de-ay, ta-ra-ra boom-de-ay,
Ta-ra-ra boom-de-ay, ta-ra-ra boom-de-ay,
Ta-ra-ra boom-de-ay, ta-ra-ra boom-de-ay.

THE BOWERY

Oh, the night that I struck New York,
I went out for a quiet walk;
Folks that are on to the city say,
Better by far had I taken Broadway.

THE AUTO'S THE THING!



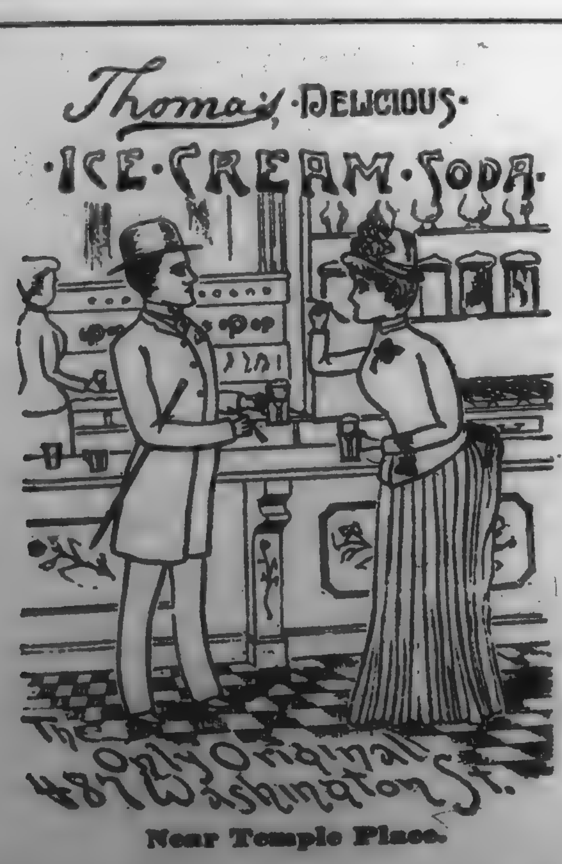
The Rambler
SPORT FLYABOUT

Mr. Ad. Neuendorff, the esteemed leader of our Promenades, was taken by surprise at the new Central Park Garden Sunday night, being made the recipient of an ebony conductor's desk, closely followed by flowers and applause.

The pig piano was a reality and not a freak of the humorist. Abbé Montendre of Louis XIV time was the inventor. He had a chest in which were placed pigs of various ages whose voices ranged from a dulcet tenor to E-flat in alt. They were manipulated by a piano keyboard, the ends of the keys being armed with needles which were poked into the porkers' flanks. (Exchange.)

A big difference—some men go to Music Hall in dress suits, and others in street cars.

A dispute as to the best cigar sold in Boston for ten cents, which arose at a Promenade Concert the other day, was settled in the following novel manner: The first ten gentlemen who came from the Hall smoking were asked their opinion; six decided on the "Sapristi," and four on the "N. S." The loser paid for a box of "Sapristi." Thus an embarrassing scandal was happily avoided and all concerned departed in good spirits.



Near Temple Place.

BOSTON, WEDNESDAY, MAY 18, 1932
47th Season
ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor

GAY NINETIES NIGHT

I was out to enjoy the sights,
There was the Bowery ablaze with lights;
I had one of the devil's own nights,
And I'll never go there any more.
The Bow'ry, the Bow'ry,
They say such things, and they do strange things on the Bow'ry, the Bow'ry,
I'll never go there any more.

THE SIDEWALKS OF NEW YORK

East side, West side, all around the town,
The tots sang "Ring-a-Rosie,
London Bridge is falling down";
Boys and girls together, me and Mamie O'Rourke,
Tripped the light fantastic
On the sidewalks of New York.

SWEET ROSIE O'GRADY

Sweet Rosie O'Grady, my dear little Rose,
You're my steady lady, 'most everyone knows;
And when we are married, how happy we'll be,
For I love sweet Rosie O'Grady, and Rosie O'Grady loves me.

DAISY (On a bicycle built for two)

Daisy, Daisy, give me your answer true,
I'm half crazy all for the love of you.
It won't be a stylish marriage—
I can't afford a carriage;
But you'll look sweet on the seat
Of a bicycle built for two.

COMRADES

Comrades, comrades, ever since we were boys,
Sharing each other's sorrows, sharing each other's joys;
Comrades, when manhood was dawning,
Faithful whate'er might betide,
When danger threatened, my darling old comrade was there by my side.

LITTLE ANNIE ROONEY

She's my sweetheart, I'm her beau;
She's my Annie, I'm her Joe.
Soon we'll marry, never to part;
Little Annie Rooney is my sweetheart.

SHE MAY HAVE SEEN BETTER DAYS

She may have seen better days,
When she was in her prime;
She may have seen better days,
Once upon a time.
Though by the wayside she fell,
She may yet mend her ways;
Some poor old mother is waiting for her
Who has seen better days.

WHILE THE BAND PLAYED ON

Casey would waltz with a strawberry blond,
While the band played on.
He waltzed 'round the floor with the girl he adored,
While the band played on.
His head, it was loaded, it nearly exploded;
The poor girl, she shook with alarm.
He ne'er left the girl with the strawberry curl,
While the band played on.

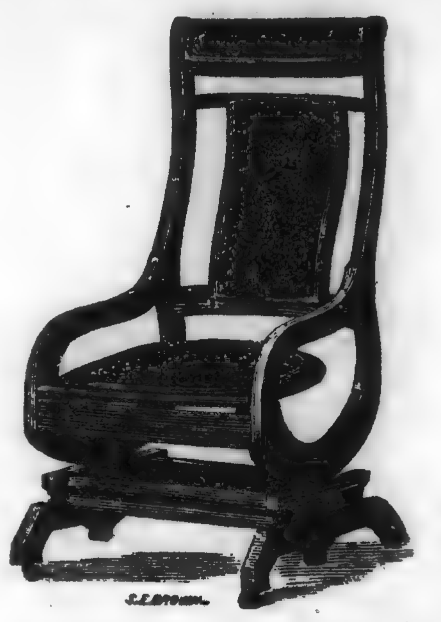
AFTER THE BALL

After the ball was over,
After the break of morn,
After the dancers' leaving,
After the stars are gone,
Many a heart is aching,
If you could read them all;
Many the hopes that have vanished
After the ball.

A HOT TIME IN THE OLD TOWN

When you hear dem bells go ding, ling, ling,
All join 'round and sweetly you must sing;
And when the verse am through, in the chorus all join in—

There'll be a hot time in the old town to-night!



The "Ideal" CHAIR

Supports the Small of the Back.

Nothing ever like it.

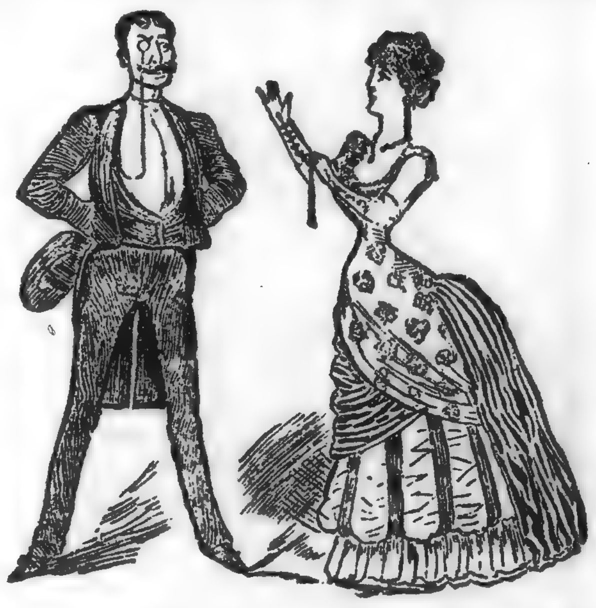
50,000 ladies and gentlemen have pronounced the above verdict on this chair.

She: "There, what do you think of that?"
He: "Grand, by jove, that is the best thing I ever saw for a glove fastener. Did you get those at



Sears' Glove Establishment
7 Temple Place

A man, inquiring at a news store recently for a libretto of the "Mikado," was met by a blank stare from the clerk and the interrogative inflection "Beg pardon?" "Mikado libretto," the purchaser repeated. Another blank stare, followed by a brightening up of the face, indicative of an idea. The shopkeeper shook his head with a smile: "No speak Italiano." (Exchange.)

"Break, break, break," is what the waves sing at the seashore. "Broke, broke, broke," is what the guests sing when they leave the summer hotel. (Transcript.)

Sir George Smart's readiness at repartee was strikingly illustrated in the reproof which he administered to Mrs. Salmon, a celebrated soprano, who was unfortunately addicted to the too frequent use of intoxicants. As she appeared upon the platform, he remarked: "Madame, you are a large, a fine and a handsome fish, but to a certainty you will flounder tonight." Which she most certainly did, breaking down at her first attempt to sing and being literally hissed off the stage. (London Mirth.)

"Piccaninny is the best tenor I have ever heard," said a New York lady, meaning Campanini or Giannini, and unconscious of any error.

"Wa-al, dern this thing, anyway! The feller at the store told me it was a music stool, but I have been twisting the dern thing every which way fur an hour and not a gol darn bit of music kin I get out o' it nohow." (Chicago Rambler.)

I WILL SELL MY "RUDGE" BICYCLE
Solid Tires
Cowhorn Handle Bars
E. L. NUGENT
32 Main Street, Hyde Park

The above advertisements and droll anecdotes have all been taken from old copies of the Music Hall Bulletin (Promenade Concerts)

8.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 14.
FRIDAY, JULY 14, 1893.

AN EVENING AT THE "POPS."

Music Hall a Good Place to Study Humanity.

All Classes and Conditions of Men and Women Represented in the Audiences—Patrons Are Very Sociable, but They Enjoy the Music Just as Well—Peep Into Bohemia.

The "Pops" are going!

Boston's gray old Music Hall is at the best much like a bleak November sky. Through the winter the Symphonies echo in the heart and warm the mind to forgetfulness of the bare surroundings. But when summer has closed around us with its world of sunlight and flowers and foliage then does the Wotan-like garb of the old hall seem striking by contrast. Then come the "Pops," and the attempt to brighten the interior; but it is all in vain. The dead mass of gray is everywhere, and surface decorations of festooned ivy and evergreen make no difference. You can scarcely make Music Hall festive in appearance.

But it matters not. The "Pops," like the Symphonies, are also absorbing in a way. Few people think of the hall. They rather think of tickling their palates with a strawberry, orange or pineapple laden lemonade, or a big, luscious beer, or a wonderful wine cobbler. If they love man and the study of him, there is the place to see him—from the waiter to the millionaire. The waiter does not appear to take in the music; but you can never tell. We sometimes learn great truths from children and babes; and, perhaps, a flying remark from a waiter will sometimes astonish you. Nothing is more penetrating and awakening than music. To nothing is man more universally susceptible. The waiter's lot, like the policeman's, may not be a happy one, but it must certainly take on something of Isaac Disraeli's "amenities" when it is lightened by the fantastical.

Strains of the Gay "Pops."

Perchance yonder millionaire may have no higher capacity for enjoying them. He may be clad loosely and look wonderfully cool in his English suit. You know he must enjoy that cigar whose fragrance is wafted to you occasionally. But there are some deep vertical lines between his eyebrows, and he seems not at ease. Atchison or the General Electric may be falling.

But another type of his class sits at a neighboring table in the midst of those reserved chairs, almost on the spot of the Symphony seat which sold last fall for a $190 premium. He probably looks out on a genial world. He is one of these two New York millionaries whose double wedding at Bar Harbor last summer was the talk of the polite world. Two daughters of a celebrated Boston artist were the brides. His fashionable young wife sits by his side, and not one nor twice she bends to whisper in his willing ear.

How everybody smokes! It is a field of disportment for the mature smoker and of training for the miniature one. Old boys, young boys, and every kind of nondescript puff incense to the comfortable god of tobacco. But surely that youngster up under the orchestra, apparently with his mother and a few maiden aunts, has entered the lists too soon. He is not a thriving shoot of mankind, and looks younger than 16. He exchanges frequent words with his mother between puffs, glancing around the while to see who is observing him. But if any one had been doing so it was quickly done, and the conclusions quickly drawn.

Meanwhile the strains of a

Swinging Strauss Waltz

are beating their way through the circumjacent smoke-clad atmosphere. A rythmical movement of the hands or body, which you observe in many youthful listeners, and haply a tapping of the foot in older ones, you accept as involuntary tributes to the great composers of waltzes. The waltz ends with an agreeable lack of orchestral flourishes—one likes Strauss for that. Then the dim and misty "Flying Dutchman" of Wagner starts up, and a fastidious young instructor in history at Harvard remarks in a lull that "that is the most imaginative thing in the world!"

On the floor, under the balcony, the music can be perfectly heard, so wonderful are the acoustic properties of Music Hall; but the glare is so intense from the arc lights that it is not an agreeable place to sit. Here the people are less select, and there is loud talking.

But the music swells through the lofty hall, and your thoughts run away to the sweet country where the clover is blossoming. They are brought back by the clash of Wagner again, and you awaken to the amusing position of a couple who are exasperatingly divided by one of the columns which supports the balcony. They do wish to talk, and there is no way of doing it but to

Peep Around the Post.

There is lots of clatter and conversation, but the noise dies down upon the sharp click of Conductor Adamowski's baton. Boston loves it. It is not so charming as the music gardens of Berlin, nor the cafes chantons of Paris, with their tables along the boulevard, but Boston likes it.

Did you ever see a child at the "Pops?" It is doubtful. Parents, it would seem, draw the line at about 16, and then they take their daughters in the balconies as spectators. Yet, on the continent, they would probably take the whole family to a less reputable place in order to show them the spectacle.

It is democratic, much more democratic than the Casino in New York. The collection of humanity is really more polyglot. There is a greater range of types and classes, for the Casino is merely a resort of fast New York. But here comes the poor German or Italian who loves music, and [illegible]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1893.

THE PROMENADES.

This is the last week and tonight is the last night of the "Pop" concerts, without which the first six weeks of summer would be a weary waste, musically speaking. They have been well patronized and have long ago become a regularly established feature of the early summer season. All the fashionable folk attend and when a merry party can be made up there is no better way of passing the June evenings.

The programmes through the week have been quite varied. Monday night, a triple quartette of male voices, including Messrs. W. H. Fessenden, C. E. Hay, Myron W. Whitney and other well-known singers gave vocal selections. Tuesday night was a Strauss night, Wednesday Beethoven was the leading composer, Thursday ball room music was made a feature and Friday was a Suppé night. The series will close tonight with a testimonial to Adamowski, who has arranged a strong programme, including as one of its novelties a romance by Svendsen.

The Boston Commercial.

SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1893.

Music Hall Promenade Concerts.

The season of popular concerts at Music Hall comes to an end tonight. The entire series of concerts for the final week have been most interesting and called forth a very large attendance. A testimonial to Director Adamowski has been arranged for this evening and the programme, which is a very strong one, will include a number of novelties. Success has attended all of these concerts and it is to be regretted that the season is to close so early.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JULY 9, 1893.

Music Hall Promenades.

The annual season of promenade concerts at Music hall will end on Saturday evening, and for the final week manager Ellis makes announcements which will greatly please the patrons of these entertainments.

Tomorrow evening the program will introduce a number of vocal selections, which will be contributed by a triple quartet of male voices, including Messrs T. M. Johnson, J. C. Bartlett, E. M. Spears, W. H. Fessenden, E. F. Webber, H. A. Cook, C. E. Hay, Robert Bruce, George R. Titus, M. W. Whitney, G. Rob Clark and L. B. Merrill. The numbers named for these singers are "Comrades in Arms," "The Owl and the Pussy Cat," and a vocal waltz by Vogel.

On Tuesday evening the music of the Strauss waltz composers will be made a prominent feature, and on Wednesday a number of selections from Reginald de Koven's operas will be played. For Thursday evening a "ballroom program" is announced, and all who know the charm of the dance music selections played during the season will eagerly await a hearing of the list chosen for this evening.

Suppe will be the prominent composer represented in the Friday evening concert, and the season will have for its closing event on Saturday evening a testimonial to the conductor, Mr Adamowski, whose efforts in the interest of the season's success have given so much pleasure to the patrons of these concerts.

Mr Adamowski is planning a program of rare interest for the final concert, and is to appear as soloist, playing the Svendsen "Romance." An early application for seats and tables should be made, as the demand promises to largely exceed the supply.

THE BEACON SATURDAY, JULY 8,

THE PROMENADES.

There will be but one week more of the "Pop" concerts, and the music-loving public are already beginning to bewail that fact. The season has never been so successful or, perhaps, the concerts so truly "popular." An unusually large audience was present Tuesday evening, when selections from Schulz's "Columbian March," and "La Prophete," "Mme. Angot," "The Fencing Master," Strauss music and other popular airs were played. Wednesday evening was Offenbach night, and last night Sir Arthur Sullivan's music was a prominent feature. Mr. Adamowski has proved his fitness for the position he holds as leader, and thousands of people will be sorry to see him lay down his baton a week from tonight.

The Boston Commercial.

SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1893.

Music Hall Promenades.

The season of these delightful entertainments is now nearing its end, next week being the last of these very popular concerts. Manager Ellis promises many interesting features for the concluding performances, and programmes of popular selections will be given each evening. The success of the present season has been unprecedented, the concerts have been attended by larger and more fashionable audiences than ever before, and Mr. Adamowski and his orchestra have given the promenades, artistically, a record to be proud of. The composers prominently represented this week have been Wagner, Offenbach and Sullivan. On the evening of the Glorious Fourth a popular programme was arranged.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1893.

The "Pops" end this week, and it is to be regretted that they are not prolonged at least until August. They have given amusement of a healthy nature to many, and a summer in the city without some such amusement is dreary. The weather does not inspire a lonely man with the desire to stay at home of an evening in a heated room and read "improving books."

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIV. NO. 14.
FRIDAY, JULY 14, 1893.

AN EVENING AT THE "POPS."

Music Hall a Good Place to Study Humanity.

All Classes and Conditions of Men and Women Represented in the Audiences—Patrons Are Very Sociable, but They Enjoy the Music Just as Well—Peep Into Bohemia.

The "Pops" are going!

Boston's gray old Music Hall is at the best much like a bleak November sky. Through the winter the Symphonies echo in the heart and warm the mind to forgetfulness of the bare surroundings. But when summer has closed around us with its world of sunlight and flowers and foliage then does the Wotan-like garb of the old hall seem striking by contrast. Then come the "Pops," and the attempt to brighten the interior; but it is all in vain. The dead mass of gray is everywhere, and surface decorations of festooned ivy and evergreen make no difference. You can scarcely make Music Hall festive in appearance.

But it matters not. The "Pops," like the Symphonies, are also absorbing in a way. Few people think of the hall. They rather think of tickling their palates with a strawberry, orange or pineapple laden lemonade, or a big, luscious beer, or a wonderful wine cobbler. If they love man and the study of him, there is the place to see him—from the waiter to the millionaire. The waiter does not appear to take in the music; but you can never tell. We sometimes learn great truths from children and babes; and, perhaps, a flying remark from a waiter will sometimes astonish you. Nothing is more penetrating and awakening than music. To nothing is man more universally susceptible. The waiter's lot, like the policeman's, may not be a happy one, but it must certainly take on something of Isaac Disraeli's "amenities" when it is lightened by the fantastical.

Strains of the Gay "Pops."

Perchance yonder millionaire may have no higher capacity for enjoying them. He may be clad loosely and look wonderfully cool in his English suit. You know he must enjoy that cigar whose fragrance is wafted to you occasionally. But there are some deep vertical lines between his eyebrows, and he seems not at ease. Atchison or the General Electric may be falling.

But another type of his class sits at a neighboring table in the midst of those reserved chairs, almost on the spot of the Symphony seat which sold last fall for a $190 premium. He probably looks out on a genial world. He is one of these two New York millionaries whose double wedding at Bar Harbor last summer was the talk of the polite world. Two daughters of a celebrated Boston artist were the brides. His fashionable young wife sits by his side, and not one nor twice she bends to whisper in his willing ear.

How everybody smokes! It is a field of disportment for the mature smoker and of training for the miniature one. Old boys, young boys, and every kind of nondescripts puff incense to the comfortable god of tobacco. But surely that youngster up under the orchestra, apparently with his mother and a few maiden aunts, has entered the lists too soon. He is not a thriving shoot of mankind, and looks younger than 16. He exchanges frequent words with his mother between puffs, glancing around the while to see who is observing him. But if any one had been doing so it was quickly done, and the conclusions quickly drawn.

Meanwhile the strains of a

Swinging Strauss Waltz

are beating their way through the circumjacent smoke-clad atmosphere. A rythmical movement of the hands or body, which you observe in many youthful listeners, and haply a tapping of the foot in older ones, you accept as involuntary tributes to the great composers of waltzes. The waltz ends with an agreeable lack of orchestral flourishes—one likes Strauss for that. Then the dim and misty "Flying Dutchman" of Wagner starts up, and a fastidious young instructor in history at Harvard remarks in a lull that "that is the most imaginative thing in the world!"

On the floor, under the balcony, the music can be perfectly heard, so wonderful are the acoustic properties of Music Hall; but the glare is so intense from the arc lights that it is not an agreeable place to sit. Here the people are less select, and there is loud talking.

But the music swells through the lofty hall, and your thoughts run away to the sweet country where the clover is blossoming. They are brought back by the clash of Wagner again, and you awaken to the amusing position of a couple who are exasperatingly divided by one of the columns which supports the balcony. They do wish to talk, and there is no way of doing it but to

Peep Around the Post.

There is lots of clatter and conversation, but the noise dies down upon the sharp click of Conductor Adamowski's baton. Boston loves it. It is not so charming as the music gardens of Berlin, nor the cafes chantons of Paris, with their tables along the boulevard, but Boston likes it.

Did you ever see a child at the "Pops?" It is doubtful. Parents, it would seem, draw the line at about 16, and then they take their daughters in the balconies as spectators. Yet, on the continent, they would probably take the whole family to a less reputable place in order to show them the spectacle.

It is democratic, much more democratic than the Casino in New York. The collection of humanity is really more polyglot. There is a greater range of types and classes, for the Casino is merely a resort of fast New York. But here comes the poor German or Italian who loves music, and enjoys it the most behind a little beer. Here is the clerk, business man, professional man, student, the various gradations of society, men and women alike, the wayfarer, the seedy poor and the prosperous rich. Everybody goes, smokes and drinks a little, and feels agreeably relaxed by observing his neighbors as well as hearing the tuneful music selected by the well-groomed Adamowski. And you may see the colored folk also, well dressed and comporting themselves unexceptionably well.

But the sweet, fresh girls are to be seen in the first balcony at the east end of the hall. The predominance of gay hats and gowns there is usually noteworthy, and forms a pleasing spectacle against the gray walls, and, if you go closer, you will find them pretty, too.

To the right and left of them in the balcony are the conservative spectators, who have come partly to hear the music and partly to see "Bohemia." Their scruples will not permit them to sit on the floor and drink. But Bohemia, being a mysterious country, and only perfectly well known to Bohemians, they do not enter upon its most distant threshold. It is probable, since most of them are ladies, that they think they have seen the bewitching country just in proportion to their possession of that most lovable and feminine quality—innocence!

The Beacon.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1893.

THE PROMENADES.

This is the last week and tonight is the last night of the "Pop" concerts, without which the first six weeks of summer would be a weary waste, musically speaking. They have been well patronized and have long ago become a regularly established feature of the early summer season. All the fashionable folk attend and when a merry party can be made up there is no better way of passing the June evenings.

The programmes through the week have been quite varied. Monday night, a triple quartette of male voices, including Messrs. W. H. Fessenden, C. E. Hay, Myron W. Whitney and other well-known singers gave vocal selections. Tuesday night was a Strauss night, Wednesday Beethoven was the leading composer, Thursday ball room music was made a feature and Friday was a Suppé night. The series will close tonight with a testimonial to Adamowski, who has arranged a strong programme, including as one of its novelties a romance by Svendsen.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JULY 9, 1893.

Music Hall Promenades.

The annual season of promenade concerts at Music hall will end on Saturday evening, and for the final week manager Ellis makes announcements which will greatly please the patrons of these entertainments.

Tomorrow evening the program will introduce a number of vocal selections, which will be contributed by a triple quartet of male voices, including Messrs T. M. Johnson, J. C. Bartlett, E. M. Spears, W. H. Fessenden, E. F. Webber, H. A. Cook, C. E. Hay, Robert Bruce, George R. Titus, M. W. Whitney, G. Rob Clark and L. B. Merrill. The numbers named for these singers are "Comrades in Arms," "The Owl and the Pussy Cat," and a vocal waltz by Vogel.

On Tuesday evening the music of the Strauss waltz composers will be made a prominent feature, and on Wednesday a number of selections from Reginald de Koven's operas will be played. For Thursday evening a "ballroom program" is announced, and all who know the charm of the dance music selections played during the season will eagerly await a hearing of the list chosen for this evening.

Suppe will be the prominent composer represented in the Friday evening concert, and the season will have for its closing event on Saturday evening a testimonial to the conductor, Mr Adamowski, whose efforts in the interest of the season's success have given so much pleasure to the patrons of these concerts.

Mr Adamowski is planning a program of rare interest for the final concert, and is to appear as soloist, playing the Svendsen "Romance." An early application for seats and tables should be made, as the demand promises to largely exceed the supply.

The Boston Commercial.
SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1893.

Music Hall Promenade Concerts.

The season of popular concerts at Music Hall comes to an end tonight. The entire series of concerts for the final week have been most interesting and called forth a very large attendance. A testimonial to Director Adamowski has been arranged for this evening and the programme, which is a very strong one, will include a number of novelties. Success has attended all of these concerts and it is to be regretted that the season is to close so early.

THE BEACON SATURDAY, JULY 8,

THE PROMENADES.

There will be but one week more of the "Pop" concerts, and the music-loving public are already beginning to bewail that fact. The season has never been so successful or, perhaps, the concerts so truly "popular." An unusually large audience was present Tuesday evening, when selections from Schulz's "Columbian March," and "La Prophete," "Mme. Angot," "The Fencing Master," Strauss music and other popular airs were played. Wednesday evening was Offenbach night, and last night Sir Arthur Sullivan's music was a prominent feature. Mr. Adamowski has proved his fitness for the position he holds as leader, and thousands of people will be sorry to see him lay down his baton a week from tonight.

The Boston Commercial.
SATURDAY, JULY 8, 1893.

Music Hall Promenades.

The season of these delightful entertainments is now nearing its end, next week being the last of these very popular concerts. Manager Ellis promises many interesting features for the concluding performances, and programmes of popular selections will be given each evening. The success of the present season has been unprecedented, the concerts have been attended by larger and more fashionable audiences than ever before, and Mr. Adamowski and his orchestra have given the promenades, artistically, a record to be proud of. The composers prominently represented this week have been Wagner, Offenbach and Sullivan. On the evening of the Glorious Fourth a popular programme was arranged.

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.
SATURDAY, JULY 15, 1893.

The "Pops" end this week, and it is to be regretted that they are not prolonged at least until August. They have given amusement of a healthy nature to many, and a summer in the city without some such amusement is dreary. The weather does not inspire a lonely man with the desire to stay at home of an evening in a heated room and read "improving books."

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV, NO. 9.

SUNDAY, JULY 9, 1893.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Promenades Last Week---The Adamowski Testimonial.

Continued Popularity of "Amorita" at the Tremont Theatre—Today's City Concert—Notable Events at the Pines—News Notes, Current Gossip and Comment.

The final week of the promenade concerts at Music Hall is announced by Manager Ellis, and the closing events of the season will undoubtedly attract big audiences.

For tomorrow evening a very notable announcement is made, the engagement of a triple quartet of male voices, including Messrs. Thomas E. Johnson, J. C. Bartlett, E. M. Spears, W. H. Fessenden, E. F. Webber, H. A. Cook, C. E. Hay, Robert Bruce, George R. Titus, M. W. Whitney, G. Rob Clark and L. B. Merrill.

The programme arranged for this occasion is as follows:

Polonaise	Chopin
Overture, "William Tell"	Rossini
Vocal selection, "Comrades in Arms"	Adam
Selection, "Aida"	Verdi
Ballet music, "Boabdil"	Moszkowski
Vocal selection, "The Owl and the Pussy Cat,"	DeKoven
Overture, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Vocal selection, "Strike the Lyre"	Bishop
Polonaise	Liszt
Vocal waltz	Vogel
Loin du Bal	Gillet
March, "Austria"	Zach

Tuesday evening's programme will give prominence to the music of the Strauss family, Wednesday will be a DeKoven night, Thursday evening will be given up to ballroom music, and Friday will be a Suppe night.

For Saturday evening it has been arranged that Mr. T. Adamowski shall be given a testimonial as an evidence of the appreciation of his efforts for the pleasure of the vast audiences of the season. This plan will meet the heartiest favor of all the Promenade patrons, for Mr. Adamowski has made himself even more popular than ever by his devotion to the pleasure of the public throughout the series of concerts now ending.

Few realize the excessive demands made upon the conductor at these concerts, and the rare skill, good judgment and unfailing good nature and courtesy shown by Mr. Adamowski in this position merit the hearty recognition which will unquestionably be shown at next Saturday evening's concert.

A particularly choice programme is being arranged for this final event of the season, and in response to many requests Mr. Adamowski will appear as soloist, playing a romance by Svensen.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JULY 9, 1893.

LAST WEEK OF THE "POPS."

The coming week will end the season of the Music hall promenades, and for the final evenings a series of notable attractions has been arranged.

On Monday evening a triple quartette, including Messrs. W. H. Fessenden, C. E. Hay, Myron W. Whitney and other equally well-known singers, will contribute vocal selections.

Tuesday evening will be a Strauss night.

On Wednesday evening Beethoven will be the leading composer.

On Thursday evening, ball room music will be made a feature.

Friday evening will be a Suppe night.

The concerts will close on Saturday evening with a testimonial to Conductor Adamowski, who has arranged an especially strong programme, including as one of its novelties a Romanza by Svendsen.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JULY 10, 1893.

Local Announcements.

This is the last week of the promenade concerts in the Music Hall and for each evening special features are announced. Tonight, a triple quartet of male voices, including Messrs. W. H. Fessenden, C. E. Hay, Myron W. Whitney and other well-known singers will give vocal selections. Tomorrow night will be a Strauss night, Wednesday Beethoven will be the leading composer, Thursday ball room music will be made a feature and Friday will be a Suppé night. The series will close on Saturday night with a testimonial to Adamowski, who has arranged a strong programme including as one of its novelties a romance by Svendsen.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 178.

TUESDAY, JUNE 27, 1893.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The success of the Music Hall promenades continues to attest the skill of Mr. Adamowski as a conductor, the sterling worth of the organization he so ably directs and the general excellence of the arrangements made for the season by Manager Charles A. Ellis.

Last evening the great audience present were entertained with an admirably chosen programme, in which the various forms of light music were most happily contrasted and some more serious compositions introduced with excellent taste. Director Adamowski has rare success in holding the interest of his audiences, and the obedient fashion in which they forsake the charms of social chat to pay strict attention to any particularly dainty musical gem shows a good feeling toward the director that has much to do with the popularity of the promenades.

This evening Mr. Reginald DeKoven is to be present by invitation of Mr. Adamowski, and he has consented to direct the performance of the compositions selected from his own writings for the occasion. The programme will be as follows:

Hungarian march	Berlioz
Overture, "Phedre"	Massenet
Intermezzo, "Naila"	Delibes
Selection, "Robin Hood"	DeKoven
Conducted by the composer.
a Berceuse b Scherzo	Clayton Johns
March	DeKoven
Conducted by the composer.
Overture, "Tannhauser"	Wagner
Danse Macabre	Saint-Saens
Overture, "Light Cavalry"	Suppe
Selection, "Fencing Master"	DeKoven
Conducted by the composer.
Espana	Chabrier
March, "Austria"	Zach

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JULY 2, 1893.

—The DeKoven night at the Music hall pops Tuesday evening drew an immense audience, which filled every seat at the tables, up stairs and down, and overflowed into every available inch of standing room. The young composer, who is just about the same height and build and coloring as his friend Mr Adamowski, although much less graceful, received a very hearty welcome as he first stepped upon the stand and raised his baton. Both he and Mr Adamowski were most enthusiastically applauded after almost every number. The company, for so late in the season, are unusually smart. Mr and Mrs Frank Zerrahn, whom it is good to see in public after their long period of mourning, had a party at their table and Mr DeKoven and Mr Adamowski joined them when not on the stand. Mrs Frank Watson, in an old rose and white india gown and big white hat with black plumes, came in with a party, and Mrs Gardner had with her at her table two very pretty young girls, Mr Russell Sullivan, Mr John Lavalle, Mr Clayton Johns and others. Mrs Gardner was gowned in light tan cloth, trimmed with magenta velvet ribbon and a small bonnet with magenta roses violently suggesting the Harvard colors. Mr and Mrs Curtis Guild made a family party, having with them their daughter, Curtis Guild Jr and Mr Courtenay Guild. Miss Gertrude Rice, looking very handsome, was with some ladies. Mr Charles Sturgis had with him Miss Stickney of Jamaica Plain, Miss Eldridge and others. Mr Harry Gay was with Mr Edward Priest, Mr J. C. Abbot Jr and Mr Ralph Cram were at a table together. Mr T. D. Barroll, Mr Roger Allen, Prof J. J. Hayes of Harvard and Mr Fred and Mr Cyrus Beebe, with ladies, were among the many seen around the many tables.

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIV, NO. 2.

SUNDAY, JULY 2, 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The season of the Music Hall promenade concerts is rapidly drawing to a close, only two more weeks of the time of these pleasant entertainments remaining.

The record of the four weeks ending last evening has been unprecedented in the history of the promenades, and it is gratifying to record such a fact, in view of the intelligent and artistic efforts made by all concerned in the conduct of this amusement scheme.

Director Adamowski has planned some very attractive programmes for the coming week, three "composers' nights" and a "popular" evening being included in his scheme. Tomorrow evening Wagner will be the composer prominently represented in the list of selections, which is as follows:

"Tannhauser" march, Wagner; intermezzo, "Naila," Delibes; "Waldweben," Wagner; selection, "Robin Hood," DeKoven; a "Berceuse," b "Scherzo," Clayton Johns; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner; selection, "Carmen," Bizet; prelude, "Lohengrin," Wagner; selection, "Mignon," A. Thomas; "Spanish Serenade," Metra; polka, "Enthusiasm," P. Muller; "Hungarian March," Berlioz.

For the evening of the "glorious Fourth" a popular programme is announced; on Wednesday evening Offenbach's music will be the leading feature, and for Friday a "Sullivan night" is promised, the concerts lasting from 8 to 11 each evening.

THE BOSTON HERALD
WEDNESDAY, JUNE 28.

MUSICAL MATTER.

Composer De Koven at the Music Hall Promenades.

"All sold" was the discouraging reply to applicants for seats at Music Hall last evening after 8 o'clock.

The capacity of the hall was thus tested because of the presence of Reginald De Koven, the popular composer, and the fact that, by Mr. Adamowski's invitation, he directed the orchestra in some of his own compositions.

He chose arrangements of his own from the operas of "Robin Hood," "The Fencing Master" and "The Knickerbockers," as well as his "March of the Gnomes," and in the performance of these numbers he showed a command of the orchestra which was productive of the best results. He had an immense ovation upon his entrance, and after each selection the audience gave evidence of their partiality for the composer equalling that for his music. The evening was an event of great interest, and reflected great credit upon the American composer, in whose honor it was arranged.

This evening's programme is as follows: March, "Prophete," Meyerbeer; overture, "Si j'etais Roi," Adam; waltz, "Tales of the Orient," Strauss; selection, "Erminie," Jakobowski; ballet music, "Coppelia," Delibes; hymn to St. Cecilia, Gounod; Waldweben, Wagner; overture, "Raymond," A. Thomas; selection, "Le Grande Duchesse," Offenbach; waltz, "Je t'aime," Waldteufel; polka, "Unparteische Kritik," Strauss; "N. E. Accident Polka," Knecht.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JUNE 28, '93.

* * *

The presence of Mr. Reginald DeKoven as conductor of some of his own compositions at the "Pop" last evening had the effect of crowding Music Hall.

Mr. DeKoven conducts with his whole body and both hands. His stage presence, so to speak, is peculiar, and he has a habit of bending his body at the hips, toggle-joint fashion, which would be amusing if it were not so earnest, and which, despite its frequent approach to the grotesque, carries with it a force and magnetism which have their effect upon his band.

With the baton in his right hand, in forte passages, he resembles a blacksmith pounding on his anvil—although few blacksmiths can hammer out such financial results. His left hand, when not moving in sympathy with its fellow, is rested on his hip or thrust into his pocket.

But thanks to that toggle-joint movement, he has come near to the discovery of perpetual motion, for the tails of his dress coat are never still; indeed, they are frequently dangerously near a right-angle to the rest of his garment.

I am pained to relate that Mr. DeKoven dangled in front of his vest a monocle, and, horror of horrors, his trousers were perilously close to the fashion said to be affected by one Newman Noggs.

* * *

The Boston Commercial.

SATURDAY, JULY 1, 1893.

The Promenade Concerts at Music Hall.

Great audiences continue to be entertained by the excellent programmes provided by Mr. Adamowski and his talented orchestra. All of the music is admirably chosen, thus keeping the entertainments up to the highest standard. Surely both Director Adamowski and Manager Ellis should feel proud of the patronage bestowed upon these popular concerts, for it is larger this year than ever. Many interesting plans are being made for the final weeks of the present season, and as late comers are unable to secure good places, it is advisable to secure seats in advance.

[79]

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JUNE 25, 1893.

Music Hall Promenades.

The Music hall promenades have been more largely attended than ever, during the week just ended, the advance sales having made it difficult to secure desirable places after 6 o'clock any evening. Every effort is evidently made by Manager Ellis to maintain the high reputation of these summer night concerts, and the public shows its appreciation of these efforts in the most commendable fashion.

Some notable attractions are being arranged for the final weeks of what may be the last season of the promenades in this old hall. For the present week the scheme of programs will include many novelties which have been chosen from the immense library supplied for the orchestra.

The selections for tomorrow evening will include the overture to "The Barber," selections from "Fatinitza," "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Chimes of Normandy," Massenet's "Scenes Pittoresque," the prelude to Saint-Saens' "Deluge," "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from the Walkyries, the waltzes "Doctrinuen" and serenade "Espagnol" and the polka "Bella Bocca."

——So great is the popularity of the Pops, that, notwithstanding the intense heat of the first evenings of the week, the attendance was fully up to the high standard set by the opening week. On Tuesday night the tables were every one occupied, including those in the balcony, which seem to be specially in demand. Mrs Gardner, who came in to her table accompanied by Mr George Gardner and Mr Theodore Dwight, was later joined by her husband. She looked cool and chic in a light colored gown of thin texture and small white bonnet. Mr Thomas Russell and his sister, Miss Marian Russell, were at a table with a party, and the architect, Mr Ralph Adams Cram, had a party of men at his table. Mr and Mrs Harry Gay had with them at a balcony table Miss Francesca Lunt, Mr William Wilder and other young people. Mr Frank Morse had a party at a table near by, including Miss Mabel Haskell, lately from Europe, a strikingly pretty girl and beautifully gowned, his cousin, Mr Walter Haskell, and Mr George Forbes, the famous horseman and yachtsman, and the Misses Woodbury, who had arrived but a few days before from Europe, were with a party of relatives also at a table in the balcony.

WERE AS QUIET AS MUMMIES.

Harvard Spirits Pent Up and Beer was Drunk to Music Without Words.

Harvard students did not have a jamboree at the pop concert in Music hall, last night, owing to the postponement of the base ball game and the consequent temporary damming up of vociferous hilarity that generally signalizes such occasions.

The hall was packed, notwithstanding the nastiness of the night, the inner circle containing a select and respectably large contingent of the Back Bay's fashionable women, while the fringe of tables all around outside the railing was largely monopolized by the university boys, who poured in arrayed in their mackintoshes and gay with boutonnieres and hatbands of Harvard's lively color.

The boys behaved themselves very well considering the number present, and some one suggested that they felt obliged to set a good example to the visiting Yale men.

There were only two little breaks in the quiet and harmony during the evening.

The first was during one of the softest and most exquisite bars of Delibes' ballet, when the buzz of conversation and the music were simultaneously stopped like magic by a series of sharp, loud raps of Adamowski's baton that brought a season of quiet that would have done credit to an audience of mummies. The orchestra began all over again, and there was no further interruption during that piece.

A little later a Harvard senior of athletic mien and pugnacious disposition had trouble with a young man sitting near him, who was talking with a friend.

"Shut up!" said Harvard.

The other ignored the charge.

"Shut up!" again exclaimed Harvard, with a threatening gleam in his eye.

The other turned around, looked at Harvard, and said with mock politeness, "Excuse me, sir, I'm deaf," and then went on talking as before.

A bluecoat put in a word or two and peace was restored until the next intermission, when the young man with the troublesome tongue walked out into Hamilton pl, followed by the Harvard man, who jammed his red-ribboned hat down on his forehead and took a friend along with him.

The controversy was renewed on the sidewalk and a lively verbal battle took place in the center of a ring formed of hack drivers and herdic men, thankful for anything in the shape of a bit of enlivening diversion on such a cheerless night.

After the two had indulged for a while in a spirited combat with their mouths, they separated without bloodshed, and the talky individual told his sympathetic audience what he would have done had the Harvard gladiator only been alone. He thought it a little unreasonable to expect him to knock out two men at once.

Neither Yale nor Harvard had any immediate sorrows to drown, but they both imbibed courage and hopefulness for the coming fray in many a glass of sparkling, foaming beer.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1893.

THE "POPS."

The popular concerts at Music Hall have long ago become established as one of the most entertaining features of summer life in Boston. During the weeks before "everybody" shuts his town house and establishes himself in the country, social Boston would be at its wits' ends for its evening's entertainment. While they last, one may see, any evening at Music Hall, some representatives of our most exclusive social set, enjoying the music, partaking of refreshments and indulging in the interchange of pleasant gossip and opinions.

The music, under Mr. Timothy Adamowski's able leadership, is not so heavy as to require one's whole attention, or so light as to become frivolous and undignified. The programmes during the present week have been varied and pleasing, including selections from Flotow, Waldteufel, Massenet, Millocker, Gillet and even Wagner. There has been something to appeal to every taste with any degree of cultivation, and every taste has been gratified. The only regret is that the season of the "Pop" concerts is not a longer one.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 18, 1893.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

MUSIC HALL POPS.

The season of promenade concerts at Music Hall has been the most successful ever known since these popular summer night entertainments were instituted by Manager Ellis nine years ago, and the merits of the programmes, arranged by and played under the direction of Mr. T. Adamowski, have fully justified the enthusiastic praise bestowed upon them by the thousands of patrons of the week. The audiences that attend these concerts are well worth winning the favor of, and Conductor Adamowski is untiring in his efforts to maintain the strong position he has gained in former seasons. His programmes show a willingness to admit new men to a hearing, even if they are of local repute, and it is more than likely that he will make public a composition by a new composer of the gentler sex during the coming week, who owns a residence in this vicinity. The music by resident composers that has already been heard this season justifies a regret that more extended opportunities cannot be had for such productions throughout the year. However, it is a subject for congratulation that Manager Ellis has a director for those concerts who shows a disposition to see what is good and enjoyable, and does his best with all compositions which he accepts for these programmes. The concerts are to continue for four weeks longer, the programmes lasting from eight to eleven each week day evening.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 24, 1893.

THE PROMENADES.

Whether Music Hall must go or not, the "Pop" concerts have become a regular part of the established order of things in June, and the public will be only a little less anxious to save them than the Symphonies. Their six weeks' course is already half run and every night sees a good attendance among our best social and musical circles. The sociability of these affairs is one of the most enjoyable features of these eminently enjoyable concerts. The musical side of them, however, is equally praiseworthy. The programmes which Mr. Adamowski gives every night are admirably adapted to please every taste and the work of the orchestra under his leadership ought to satisfy the most critical and cultivated musical taste. During the week selections have been given from a wide range of composers, including Chopin, Massenet, Strauss, Thomas, Gounod, Liszt, Delibes, Wagner, Offenbach, Waldteufel, Leonhardt, Metra and others. Certainly, the person who could not find something to his taste among some of these must be hard to please. There is a peculiar distinctiveness about the "Pop" concerts that to be appreciated must be seen and felt.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7, 1893.

DAILY TRAVELLER, 2 CENTS

UNCONVENTIONAL CONVENTIONALITY

At the Music Hall Concerts.

More Popular This Year Than Ever Before,

Which is Saying a Good Deal.

"Give me a table, please, on the main floor," said the Traveller young man to the ticket man in the box office of Music Hall last night.

"Haven't a table in the place, sir; everything sold," replied the ticket man.

"What, I cannot get even a table in the gallery?"

"No, sir, everything is sold. You had better engage a table a day ahead if you want to be sure of one. I can give you some seats in the gallery, the best I can do for you tonight, or you can take your chances of getting a table on the main floor."

The Traveller man took the admission check and went into the hall. It was a scene of peculiar interest and unique.

Of peculiar interest because of the great informal gathering of Bostonians, of people stylishly dressed in a somewhat neglige way,—outing shirts of the starched collar variety with cutaway coats and straw hats, and ladies in challies and muslins of the high shoulder and wide collar variety, and straw hats with wide brims; altogether a very cool and comfortable assemblage.

A scene familiar to all Bostonians who are lovers of good music and summer-time relaxation.

A scene that under the excellent management which characterizes the Music Hall summer concerts, never has, and in all probability never will, degenerate from the unconventional conventionality which characterized it last night and on all nights. The Traveller man strolled among the tables for a little time, meeting a score or more of friends and acquaintances, listened to a couple of selections from the excellent programme, sipped a glass of lemonade with the rest, and then went down to the office and had a chat with Manager Charles A. Ellis.

"Yes sir, the concerts are more popular than ever this year," said Mr. Ellis. "We have endeavored to arrange a series of programmes unusually attractive. The success of the concerts in past years has laid a firm foundation for a much greater success this year. The entire capacity of the hall is engaged at least a day ahead. Of course you will note that our programme is peculiarly attractive, comprising as it does a delightful mixture of light music and classical music."

The programme for tonight is as follows:

1. Tannhauser March..............Wagner
2. Overture, La Part du Diable......Auber
3. Waltz, Tales from the Orient... Strauss
4. Selection, "Pirates of Penzance"..................Sulliv[illegible]
5. Ballet music, Ritter Pasman.....Strauss
6. Largo..............................Haendel
7. Overture, "Flying Dutchman"..Wagner
8. Selection, Sphinx..............Thompson
   Composed for the Hasty Pudding Society of Harvard College, and specially arranged for full orchestra for the promenade concerts.
9. Overture, Poet and Peasant.......Suppe
10. Waltz, Doctrinen..............Ed. Strauss
11. Polka, Unparteische Kritik.....Straus
12. March, Hoch Habsburg..............Kral

THE REPUBLIC.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1893.

The season of promenade concerts at Music Hall has been the most successful ever known since these popular summer night entertainments were instituted by Manager Ellis, nine years ago, and the merits of the programmes, arranged by and played under the direction of Mr. T. Adamowski, have fully justified the enthusiastic praise bestowed upon them by the thousands of patrons of the week. The audiences that attend these concerts are well worth winning the favor of, and Conductor Adamowski is untiring in his efforts to maintain the strong position he has gained in former seasons. The concerts are to continue for four weeks longer, the programmes lasting from 8 to 11 each week-day evening.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JUNE 25, 1893.

Music Hall Promenades.

The Music hall promenades have been more largely attended than ever during the week just ended, the advance sales having made it difficult to secure desirable places after 6 o'clock any evening. Every effort is evidently made by Manager Ellis to maintain the high reputation of these summer night concerts, and the public shows its appreciation of these efforts in the most commendable fashion.

Some notable attractions are being arranged for the final weeks of what may be the last season of the promenades in this old hall. For the present week the scheme of programs will include many novelties which have been chosen from the immense library supplied for the orchestra.

The selections for tomorrow evening will include the overture to "The Barber," selections from "Fatinitza," "Cavalleria Rusticana" and "Chimes of Normandy," Massenet's "Scenes Pittoresque," the prelude to Saint-Saens' "Deluge," "Wotan's Farewell" and "Fire Charm," from the Walkyries, the waltzes "Doctrinuen" and serenade "Espagnol" and the polka "Bella Bocca."

—So great is the popularity of the Pops, that, notwithstanding the intense heat of the first evenings of the week, the attendance was fully up to the high standard set by the opening week. On Tuesday night the tables were every one occupied, including those in the balcony, which seem to be specially in demand. Mrs Gardner, who came in to her table accompanied by Mr George Gardner and Mr Theodore Dwight, was later joined by her husband. She looked cool and chic in a light colored gown of thin texture and small white bonnet. Mr Thomas Russell and his sister, Miss Marian Russell, were at a table with a party, and the architect, Mr Ralph Adams Cram, had a party of men at his table. Mr and Mrs Harry Gay had with them at a balcony table Miss Francesca Lunt, Mr William Wilder and other young people. Mr Frank Morse had a party at a table near by, including Miss Mabel Haskell, lately from Europe, a strikingly pretty girl and beautifully gowned, his cousin, Mr Walter Haskell, and Mr George Forbes, the famous horseman and yachtsman, and the Misses Woodbury, who had arrived but a few days before from Europe, were with a party of relatives also at a table in the balcony.

WERE AS QUIET AS MUMMIES.

Harvard Spirits Pent Up and Beer was Drunk to Music Without Words.

Harvard students did not have a jamboree at the pop concert in Music hall, last night, owing to the postponement of the base ball game and the consequent temporary damming up of vociferous hilarity that generally signalizes such occasions.

The hall was packed, notwithstanding the nastiness of the night, the inner circle containing a select and respectably large contingent of the Back Bay's fashionable women, while the fringe of tables all around outside the railing was largely monopolized by the university boys, who poured in arrayed in their mackintoshes and gay with boutonnieres and hatbands of Harvard's lively color.

The boys behaved themselves very well considering the number present, and some one suggested that they felt obliged to set a good example to the visiting Yale men.

There were only two little breaks in the quiet and harmony during the evening.

The first was during one of the softest and most exquisite bars of Delibes' ballet, when the buzz of conversation and the music were simultaneously stopped like magic by a series of sharp, loud raps of Adamowski's baton that brought a season of quiet that would have done credit to an audience of mummies. The orchestra began all over again, and there was no further interruption during that piece.

A little later a Harvard senior of athletic mien and pugnacious disposition had trouble with a young man sitting near him, who was talking with a friend.

"Shut up!" said Harvard.

The other ignored the charge.

"Shut up!" again exclaimed Harvard, with a threatening gleam in his eye.

The other turned around, looked at Harvard, and said with mock politeness, "Excuse me, sir. I'm deaf," and then went on talking as before.

A bluecoat put in a word or two and peace was restored until the next intermission, when the young man with the troublesome tongue walked out into Hamilton pl, followed by the Harvard man, who jammed his red-ribboned hat down on his forehead and took a friend along with him.

The controversy was renewed on the sidewalk and a lively verbal battle took place in the center of a ring formed of hack drivers and herdic men, thankful for anything in the shape of a bit of enlivening diversion on such a cheerless night.

After the two had indulged for a while in a spirited combat with their mouths, they separated without bloodshed, and the talky individual told his sympathetic audience what he would have done had the Harvard gladiator only been alone. He thought it a little unreasonable to expect him to knock out two men at once.

Neither Yale nor Harvard had any immediate sorrows to drown, but they both imbibed courage and hopefulness for the coming fray in many a glass of sparkling, foaming beer.

[80]

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1893.

THE "POPS."

The popular concerts at Music Hall have long ago become established as one of the most entertaining features of summer life in Boston. During the weeks before "everybody" shuts his town house and establishes himself in the country, social Boston would be at its wits' ends for its evening's entertainment. While they last, one may see, any evening at Music Hall, some representatives of our most exclusive social set, enjoying the music, partaking of refreshments and indulging in the interchange of pleasant gossip and opinions.

The music, under Mr. Timothy Adamowski's able leadership, is not so heavy as to require one's whole attention, or so light as to become frivolous and undignified. The programmes during the present week have been varied and pleasing, including selections from Flotow, Waldteufel, Massenet, Millocker, Gillet and even Wagner. There has been something to appeal to every taste with any degree of cultivation, and every taste has been gratified. The only regret is that the season of the "Pop" concerts is not a longer one.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 18, 1893.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

MUSIC HALL POPS.

The season of promenade concerts at Music Hall has been the most successful ever known since these popular summer night entertainments were instituted by Manager Ellis nine years ago, and the merits of the programmes, arranged by and played under the direction of Mr. T. Adamowski, have fully justified the enthusiastic praise bestowed upon them by the thousands of patrons of the week. The audiences that attend these concerts are well worth winning the favor of, and Conductor Adamowski is untiring in his efforts to maintain the strong position he has gained in former seasons. His programmes show a willingness to admit new men to a hearing, even if they are of local repute, and it is more than likely that he will make public a composition by a new composer of the gentler sex during the coming week, who owns a residence in this vicinity. The music by resident composers that has already been heard this season justifies a regret that more extended opportunities cannot be had for such productions throughout the year. However, it is a subject for congratulation that Manager Ellis has a director for those concerts who shows a disposition to see what is good and enjoyable, and does his best with all compositions which he accepts for these programmes. The concerts are to continue for four weeks longer, the programmes lasting from eight to eleven each week day evening.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 24, 1893.

THE PROMENADES.

Whether Music Hall must go or not, the "Pop" concerts have become a regular part of the established order of things in June, and the public will be only a little less anxious to save them than the Symphonies. Their six weeks' course is already half run and every night sees a good attendance among our best social and musical circles. The sociability of these affairs is one of the most enjoyable features of these eminently enjoyable concerts. The musical side of them, however, is equally praiseworthy. The programmes which Mr. Adamowski gives every night are admirably adapted to please every taste and the work of the orchestra under his leadership ought to satisfy the most critical and cultivated musical taste. During the week selections have been given from a wide range of composers, including Chopin, Massenet, Strauss, Thomas, Gounod, Liszt, Delibes, Wagner, Offenbach, Waldteufel, Leonhardt, Metra and others. Certainly, the person who could not find something to his taste among some of these must be hard to please. There is a peculiar distinctiveness about the "Pop" concerts that to be appreciated must be seen and felt.

BOSTON DAILY TRAVELLER

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 7, 1893.

DAILY TRAVELLER, 2 CENTS

UNCONVENTIONAL CONVENTIONALITY

At the Music Hall Concerts.

More Popular This Year Than Ever Before,

Which is Saying a Good Deal.

"Give me a table, please, on the main floor," said the Traveller young man to the ticket man in the box office of Music Hall last night.

"Haven't a table in the place, sir; everything sold," replied the ticket man.

"What, I cannot get even a table in the gallery?"

"No, sir, everything is sold. You had better engage a table a day ahead if you want to be sure of one. I can give you some seats in the gallery, the best I can do for you tonight, or you can take your chances of getting a table on the main floor."

The Travelle man took the admission check and went into the hall. It was a scene of peculiar interest and unique.

Of peculiar interest because of the great informal gathering of Bostonians, of people stylishly dressed in a somewhat negligé way,—outing shirts of the starched collar variety with cutaway coats and straw hats, and ladies in challies and muslins of the high shoulder and wide collar variety, and straw hats with wide brims; altogether a very cool and comfortable assemblage.

A scene familiar to all Bostonians who are lovers of good music and summer-time relaxation.

A scene that under the excellent management which characterizes the Music Hall summer concerts, never has, and in all probability never will, degenerate from the unconventional conventionality which characterized it last night and on all nights. The Traveller man strolled among the tables for a little time, meeting a score or more of friends and acquaintances, listened to a couple of selections from the excellent programme, sipped a glass of lemonade with the rest, and then went down to the office and had a chat with Manager Charles A. Ellis.

"Yes sir, the concerts are more popular than ever this year," said Mr. Ellis. "We have endeavored to arrange a series of programmes unusually attractive. The success of the concerts in past years has laid a firm foundation for a much greater success this year. The entire capacity of the hall is engaged at least a day ahead. Of course you will note that our programme is peculiarly attractive, comprising as it does a delightful mixture of light music and classical music."

The programme for tonight is as follows:

1.	Tannhauser March	Wagner
2.	Overture, La Part du Diable	Auber
3.	Waltz, Tales from the Orient	Strauss
4.	Selection, "Pirates of Penzance"	Sulliv
5.	Ballet music, Ritter Pasman	Strauss
6.	Largo	Haendel
7.	Overture, "Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
8.	Selection, Sphinx Composed for the Hasty Pudding Society of Harvard College, and specially arranged for full orchestra for the promenade concerts.	Thompson
9.	Overture, Poet and Peasant	Suppe
10.	Waltz, Doctrinen	Ed. Strauss
11.	Polka, Unparteische Kritik	Straus
12.	March, Hoch Habsburg	Kral

THE REPUBLIC.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 17, 1893.

The season of promenade concerts at Music Hall has been the most successful ever known since these popular summer night entertainments were instituted by Manager Ellis, nine years ago, and the merits of the programmes, arranged by and played under the direction of Mr. T. Adamowski, have fully justified the enthusiastic praise bestowed upon them by the thousands of patrons of the week. The audiences that attend these concerts are well worth winning the favor of, and Conductor Adamowski is untiring in his efforts to maintain the strong position he has gained in former seasons. The concerts are to continue for four weeks longer, the programmes lasting from 8 to 11 each week-day evening.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JUNE 11, 1893.

Music Hall Popular Concerts.

The Music hall promenades of the present season have entered upon what promises to be a most successful career, the music-loving public having taken to them with even greater favor than last season, which was the most liberally patronized of any in the history of these pleasant summer night entertainments.

Manager Ellis has provided director Adamowski with an excellent orchestra, and the men have been used to the best advantage in the concerts of the week. Hearings of a number of high compositions by resident composers have been given thus far. Considerable interest is felt in a waltz which he is to bring out early in the coming week by Miss McKey, a lady who has the good fortune to have gained as a composer the approval of Prof Paine of Harvard.

Thus far the public has made all the evenings popular nights, although the concerts of Saturday nights retain their old-time prominence as the gala events of the week.

For tomorrow evening the selections will be as follows: The overtures to "Martha," "William Tell," "Lavolie Parfumeuse" and Suppe's "Galatea," a new waltz by Clayton John's, "Christmas Eve;" and that by Waldtenfel, "Les Patineurs," selections from "Heart and Hand" and "Carmen," Mendelssohn's "Wedding March"; and Millocecker's "LaPatrie," the "Libelle" polka, by Strauss, and a Berceuse for string orchestra by Clayton Johns.

---

opened brilliantly—and Music hall in its summer promenade dress looked very gay and attractive. Every table was filled—even the new ones in the balcony—which proved a very convenient addition to the comfort of the patrons. Mr Adamowski received a right royal welcome as he entered, and the unusual attention of silence was paid to the greater part of his admirable program. Around the tables on the floor nearest the platform were grouped many well-known people. Col and Mrs Henry L. Higginson had with them Gov and Mrs Russell and their party. Mrs J. L. Gardner had with her Dr W. Sturgis Bigelow, Mr Russell Sturgis and Mr Theodore Dwight. Mr and Mrs R. C. Dixey were there. So were Mr and Mrs Charles Head, Mr W. P. Blake, the James Jacksons, the Charles E. Cottings, Col Hugh Cochrane and E. D. Jordan Jr.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 10, 1893.

THE PROMENADES.

This current season of the Music Hall Promenades has begun with unprecedented éclat, and is going on at a great pace with affluence of fashionable and general patronage. No sooner was the sale of places for the first night begun than the public swooped down and bought up every reserved seat at the tables, so that early in the week there was not a place to be had, and Manager Ellis had to improvise some special provision for the members of the press, whom it is his pleasant custom to expect on the opening night. And this demand was in face of the considerably increased accommodation that has been gained by putting tables on the broad steps of the front balcony, where many people will find a desirable position. The engagement of Mr. T. Adamowski as conductor, based upon his previous acceptance and success, has been warmly acclaimed, and he has already had several opportunities to demonstrate that he means to provide programmes of substantial excellence and to have them well played. There must be some music against which it will do no harm to talk and to jingle glasses, and such he places in the first and third parts of the programme, while between these he makes room for some things of more delicate or thoughtful character, to which the audiences, it is pleasant to observe, are quite ready to pay the proper attention of silence. There is a recognition of the natural desire for novelties, and a favorite ballabile, or song arrangement, has always a good place. The season must be short—one-sixth of it is already gone—and the enjoyment of the music and the light refreshments is certain.

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 162.

SUNDAY, JUNE 11, 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The season of promenade concerts at Music Hall has been the most successful ever known since these popular summer night entertainments were instituted by Manager Ellis, nine years ago, and the merits of the programmes, arranged by and played under the direction of Mr. T. Adamowski, have fully justified the enthusiastic praise bestowed upon them by the thousands of patrons of the week.

The audiences that attend these concerts are well worth winning the favor of, and Conductor Adamowski is untiring in his efforts to maintain the strong position he has gained in former seasons. His programmes show a willingness to admit new men to a hearing, even if they are of local repute, and it is more than likely that he will make public a composition by a new composer of the gentler sex during the coming week, who owns a residence in this vicinity.

The music by resident composers that has already been heard this season justifies a regret that more extended opportunities cannot be had for such productions throughout the year. However, it is a subject for congratulation that Manager Ellis has a director for those concerts who shows a disposition to see what is good and enjoyable and does his best with all compositions which he accepts for these programmes.

The concerts are to continue for five weeks longer, the programmes lasting from 8 to 11 each week day evening. For tomorrow evening the selections are as follows:

Wedding march	Mendelssohn
Overture, "Martha"	Flotow
Waltz, "Christmas Eve"	Clayton Johns
(First time.)
Selection, "Heart and Hand"	Lecocq
Overture, "William Tell"	Rossini
Berceuse for string orchestra	Clayton Johns
Overture, "La Jolie Parfumeuse"	Offenbach
Selection, "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture, "Galatea"	Suppe
Waltz, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
Polka, "Libelle"	Strauss
March, "La Patrie"	Millocker

The Music Hall Pops hold their own because they are essentially young in spirit. Youth in gigot sleeves and sailor hats frequent them, and heads which have parted with almost their last hair will always be found in its company. Extremes meet. But the hairless variety is of that young and giddy order, that has not gone beyond the milestone of regard for a pretty girl. It has been out in full force at the concerts the past week, and it takes its beer and puffs its cigar like a Trojan, while the element politely called "Harvard boys" strolls back and forth seeking whom it may devour with love and kindness. Mr. Adamowski is to the pretty girl a magnet that never fails to awaken the green-eyed monster in her best young man. She can't help it anyway, and it is one of the dark clouds on the best young man's horizon, this undisguised preference of hers for a "Pop" with Adamonski to a Symphony concert with any other conductor. But what an autocratic conductor "Taddy" is, to be sure! He raps like a martinet on the music stand when he wants silence in the hall, and it really shows what well behaved people we are, for not an eye lash winks, not a lip moves, until his baton gives us the signal to breathe again. All of swelldom that remained in town showed up at the first concert, Saturday week, and a better send-off could not be imagined, with Mr. Higginson and Mrs. Gardner to open the season, as it were. May the "Pops" live a thousand summers! They are the one evidence Boston gives of aspiring to a cosmopolitan progression.

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON JUNE 11, 1893.

Music Hall was packed last night to overflowing every desirable seat having been engaged before the performances began. Never have the popular concerts opened more prosperously than they have this season. The programme for tomorrow night is: Wedding March, Mendelssohn; overture, "Martha," Flotow; waltz, "Christmas Eve," Clayton Johns (first time); selection, "Heart and Hand," Lecocq; overture, "William Tell," Rossini; Berceuse, for String Orchestra, Clayton Johns; overture, "La Jolie Parfumeuse," Offenbach; selection, "Carmen," Bizet; overture, "Galatea," Suppe; waltz, "Les Patineurs," Waldteufel; polka, "Libelle," Strauss; march, "La Patrie," Millocker.

—A striking gown worn by a distinguished looking girl at the "Pop" concert, on Monday evening last, was of pearl gray crêpon with a jacket of golden brown satin, made with wide revers and immensely full sleeves. The flowing skirt was piped around the edge with the satin, but was otherwise entirely plain. A large gray chip hat, adorned with brown feathers and a cluster of violets, completed a costume that was noticeable even in that assembly of well-dressed women.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, JUNE 5, 1893.

The "pop" concerts opened in Music Hall Saturday evening most auspiciously. The building was packed, and the excellent programme rendered by Mr. Adamowski and his selected orchestra was listened to with great pleasure. The numbers were chosen with great care and pleased both the popular and artistic taste. Tonight the programme will be as follows:

Polonaise	Chopin
Overture, "Si j'etais Roi"	Adam
Waltz, "Seid umschlungen Millionen"	Strauss
Overture, "Orpheus aux Enfers"	Offenbach
Ballet music, "Faust"	Gounod
Berceuse, for string orchestra	Clayton Johns
(First time.)
Overture, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
Selection, "Robin Hood"	DeKoven
Selection, "Aida"	Verd
Waltz, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufe
Polka Francais	Knech
(First time.)
Teufels March	Supp

* * *

Maybe Governor Russell is not popula but his reception at the opening "pop on Saturday night didn't look that way He came in late, and no sooner was h recognized than the house set up a roun of applause and cheers, which lasted lon enough to delay Conductor Adamowsk in beginning the number for which h had just rapped his band to order.

The Governor appeared to be a littl disconcerted by his unexpected welcome which did not cease until he had acknowl edged it.

* * *

Of course, Mrs. "Jack" Gardner joine in observing the opening of the "pops" a Music Hall on Saturday night. She sat near the front of the pen, and with her were Mr. Russell Sturgis, 3d, Dr. Bigelow and Librarian Theodore F. Dwight. Mr. Higginson, who sat near, joined the party once or twice, and with him Mrs. Gardner watched and discussed the band.

It was amusing to see the way in which heads were twisted and necks stretched all over the hall, to catch a glimpse of Boston's 150, when she entered.

By the way, no refreshments were served at that table.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JUNE 4, 1893.

OPENING OF THE "POPS."

Music Hall Thronged Last Evening by Delighted Music-Lovers.

Music hall, in spite of the threatening weather, was thronged last evening by those who heartily approve of Manager Ellis's "popular" promenade concerts, and a very delighted audience it was.

And why should it not be?

Manager Ellis caters directly to the wishes of the stay-at-home public by these entertainments, where one, in the most informal manner, can spend an evening listening to choice music delighfully played, partake of light refreshments, smoke, and in general be surrounded by a thoroughly "summer" atmosphere.

The six-weeks' season was most auspiciously opened last evening. Mr. Adamowski was given a rousing welcome, and encores were frequent. The orchestra of fifty were picked men and played excellently. The front of the first balcony also is this year supplied with tables. The general features, otherwise, are the same as in previous seasons.

That the coming evenings at Music hall will be full of enjoyment, none can doubt who has been there in the past or was there last evening. Constant novelties will be provided in the programmes.

The programme last evening was:

Polonaise	Liszt
Overture, "Le Roi D'Ys"	Lalo
Waltz, "Seid umschlungen millionen"	Strauss
Selection, "Gondoliers"	Sullivan
L'Arlesienne	Bizet
Entr'acte, "Traviata"	Verdi
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
"Love's Dream After the Ball"	Czibulka
(First time.)
Selection, "The Fencing Master"	De Koven
(First time in these concerts)
Loin Du Bal	Gillet
Espana	Chabrier
Rakoczy March	Berlioz

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JUNE 11, 1893.

Music Hall Popular Concerts.

The Music hall promenades of the present season have entered upon what promises to be a most successful career, the music-loving public having taken to them with even greater favor than last season, which was the most liberally patronized of any in the history of these pleasant summer night entertainments.

Manager Ellis has provided director Adamowski with an excellent orchestra, and the men have been used to the best advantage in the concerts of the week. Hearings of a number of high compositions by resident composers have been given thus far. Considerable interest is felt in a waltz which he is to bring out early in the coming week by Miss McKey, a lady who has the good fortune to have gained as a composer the approval of Prof Paine of Harvard.

Thus far the public has made all the evenings popular nights, although the concerts of Saturday nights retain their old-time prominence as the gala events of the week.

For tomorrow evening the selections will be as follows: The overtures to "Martha," "William Tell," "Lavolie Parfumeuse" and Suppe's "Galatea," a new waltz by Clayton John's, "Christmas Eve;" and that by Waldtenfel, "Les Patineurs," selections from "Heart and Hand" and "Carmen," Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" and Milloecker's "LaPatrie," the "Libelle" polka, by Strauss, and a Berceuse for string orchestra by Clayton Johns.

---

opened brilliantly—and Music hall in its summer promenade dress looked very gay and attractive. Every table was filled—even the new ones in the balcony—which proved a very convenient addition to the comfort of the patrons. Mr Adamowski received a right royal welcome as he entered, and the unusual attention of silence was paid to the greater part of his admirable program. Around the tables on the floor nearest the platform were grouped many well-known people. Col and Mrs Henry L. Higginson had with them Gov and Mrs Russell and their party. Mrs J. L. Gardner had with her Dr W. Sturgis Bigelow, Mr Russell Sturgis and Mr Theodore Dwight. Mr and Mrs R. C. Dixey were there. So were Mr and Mrs Charles Head, Mr W. P. Blake, the James Jacksons, the Charles E. Cottings, Col Hugh Cochrane and E. D. Jordan Jr.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 10, 1893.

THE PROMENADES.

This current season of the Music Hall Promenades has begun with unprecedented éclat, and is going on at a great pace with affluence of fashionable and general patronage. No sooner was the sale of places for the first night begun than the public swooped down and bought up every reserved seat at the tables, so that early in the week there was not a place to be had, and Manager Ellis had to improvise some special provision for the members of the press, whom it is his pleasant custom to expect on the opening night. And this demand was in face of the considerably increased accommodation that has been gained by putting tables on the broad steps of the front balcony, where many people will find a desirable position. The engagement of Mr. T. Adamowski as conductor, based upon his previous acceptance and success, has been warmly acclaimed, and he has already had several opportunities to demonstrate that he means to provide programmes of substantial excellence and to have them well played. There must be some music against which it will do no harm to talk and to jingle glasses, and such he places in the first and third parts of the programme, while between these he makes room for some things of more delicate or thoughtful character, to which the audiences, it is pleasant to observe, are quite ready to pay the proper attention of silence. There is a recognition of the natural desire for novelties, and a favorite ballabile, or song arrangement, has always a good place. The season must be short—one-sixth of it is already gone—and the enjoyment of the music and the light refreshments is certain.

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 162.

SUNDAY, JUNE 11, 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The season of promenade concerts at Music Hall has been the most successful ever known since these popular summer night entertainments were instituted by Manager Ellis, nine years ago, and the merits of the programmes, arranged by and played under the direction of Mr. T. Adamowski, have fully justified the enthusiastic praise bestowed upon them by the thousands of patrons of the week.

The audiences that attend these concerts are well worth winning the favor of, and Conductor Adamowski is untiring in his efforts to maintain the strong position he has gained in former seasons. His programmes show a willingness to admit new men to a hearing, even if they are of local repute, and it is more than likely that he will make public a composition by a new composer of the gentler sex during the coming week, who owns a residence in this vicinity.

The music by resident composers that has already been heard this season justifies a regret that more extended opportunities cannot be had for such productions throughout the year. However, it is a subject for congratulation that Manager Ellis has a director for those concerts who shows a disposition to see what is good and enjoyable and does his best with all compositions which he accepts for these programmes.

The concerts are to continue for five weeks longer, the programmes lasting from 8 to 11 each week day evening. For tomorrow evening the selections are as follows:

Wedding march	Mendelssohn
Overture, "Martha"	Flotow
Waltz, "Christmas Eve"	Clayton Johns
(First time.)
Selection, "Heart and Hand"	Lecocq
Overture, "William Tell"	Rossini
Berceuse for string orchestra	Clayton Johns
Overture, "La Jolie Parfumeuse"	Offenbach
Selection, "Carmen"	Bizet
Overture, "Galatea"	Suppe
Waltz, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
Polka, "Libelle"	Strauss
March, "La Patrie"	Millocker

The Music Hall Pops hold their own because they are essentially young in spirit. Youth in gigot sleeves and sailor hats frequent them, and heads which have parted with almost their last hair will always be found in its company. Extremes meet. But the hairless variety is of that young and giddy order, that has not gone beyond the milestone of regard for a pretty girl. It has been out in full force at the concerts the past week, and it takes its beer and puffs its cigar like a Trojan, while the element politely called "Harvard boys" strolls back and forth seeking whom it may devour with love and kindness. Mr. Adamowski is to the pretty girl a magnet that never fails to awaken the green-eyed monster in her best young man. She can't help it anyway, and it is one of the dark clouds on the best young man's horizon, this undisguised preference of hers for a "Pop" with Adamonski to a Symphony concert with any other conductor. But what an autocratic conductor "Taddy" is, to be sure! He raps like a martinet on the music stand when he wants silence in the hall, and it really shows what well behaved people we are, for not an eye lash winks, not a lip moves, until his baton gives us the signal to breathe again. All of swelldom that remained in town showed up at the first concert, Saturday week, and a better send-off could not be imagined, with Mr. Higginson and Mrs. Gardner to open the season, as it were. May the "Pops" live a thousand summers! They are the one evidence Boston gives of aspiring to a cosmopolitan progression.

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON JUNE 11, 1893.

Music Hall was packed last night to overflowing every desirable seat having been engaged before the performances began. Never have the popular concerts opened more prosperously than they have this season. The programme for tomorrow night is: Wedding March, Mendelssohn; overture, "Martha," Flotow; waltz, "Christmas Eve," Clayton Johns (first time); selection, "Heart and Hand," Lecocq; overture, "William Tell," Rossini; Berceuse, for String Orchestra, Clayton Johns; overture, "La Jolie Parfumeuse," Offenbach; selection, "Carmen," Bizet; overture, "Galatea," Suppe; waltz, "Les Patineurs," Waldteufel; polka, "Libelle," Strauss; march, "La Patrie," Millocker.

——A striking gown worn by a distinguished looking girl at the "Pop" concert, on Monday evening last, was of pearl gray crêpon with a jacket of golden brown satin, made with wide revers and immensely full sleeves. The flowing skirt was piped around the edge with the satin, but was otherwise entirely plain. A large gray chip hat, adorned with brown feathers and a cluster of violets, completed a costume that was noticeable even in that assembly of well-dressed women.

BOSTON POST.
The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, JUNE 5, 1893.

The "pop" concerts opened in Music Hall Saturday evening most auspiciously. The building was packed, and the excellent programme rendered by Mr. Adamowski and his selected orchestra was listened to with great pleasure. The numbers were chosen with great care and pleased both the popular and artistic taste. Tonight the programme will be as follows:

Polonaise	Chopin
Overture, "Si j'etais Roi"	Adam
Waltz, "Seid umschlungen Millionen"	Strauss
Overture, "Orpheus aux Enfers"	Offenbach
Ballet music, "Faust"	Gounod
Berceuse, for string orchestra	Clayton Johns
(First time.)
Overture, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
Selection, "Robin Hood"	DeKoven
Selection, "Aida"	Verdi
Waltz, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
Polka Francais	Knech
(First time.)
Teufels March	Supp

* * *

Maybe Governor Russell is not popula but his reception at the opening "pop on Saturday night didn't look that way He came in late, and no sooner was h recognized than the house set up a roun of applause and cheers, which lasted lon enough to delay Conductor Adamowsk in beginning the number for which h had just rapped his band to order.

The Governor appeared to be a littl disconcerted by his unexpected welcome which did not cease until he had acknowl edged it.

* * *

Of course, Mrs. "Jack" Gardner joined in observing the opening of the "pops" at Music Hall on Saturday night. She sat near the front of the pen, and with her were Mr. Russell Sturgis, 3d, Dr. Bigelow and Librarian Theodore F. Dwight. Mr. Higginson, who sat near, joined the party once or twice, and with him Mrs. Gardner watched and discussed the band.

It was amusing to see the way in which heads were twisted and necks stretched all over the hall, to catch a glimpse of Boston's 150, when she entered.

By the way, no refreshments were served at that table.

* * *

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JUNE 4, 1893.

OPENING OF THE "POPS."

Music Hall Thronged Last Evening by Delighted Music-Lovers.

Music hall, in spite of the threatening weather, was thronged last evening by those who heartily approve of Manager Ellis's "popular" promenade concerts, and a very delighted audience it was.

And why should it not be?

Manager Ellis caters directly to the wishes of the stay-at-home public by these entertainments, where one, in the most informal manner, can spend an evening listening to choice music delighfully played, partake of light refreshments, smoke, and in general be surrounded by a thoroughly "summer" atmosphere.

The six- weeks' season was most auspiciously opened last evening. Mr. Adamowski was given a rousing welcome, and encores were frequent. The orchestra of fifty were picked men and played excellently. The front of the first balcony also is this year supplied with tables. The general features, otherwise, are the same as in previous seasons.

That the coming evenings at Music hall will be full of enjoyment, none can doubt who has been there in the past or was there last evening. Constant novelties will be provided in the programmes.

The programme last evening was:

Polonaise	Liszt
Overture, "Le Roi D'Ys"	Lalo
Waltz, "Seid umschlungen millionen"	Strauss
Selection, "Gondoliers"	Sullivan
L'Arlesienne	Bizet
Entr'acte, "Traviata"	Verdi
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
"Love's Dream After the Ball"	Czibulka
(First time.)
Selection, "The Fencing Master"	De Koven
(First time in these concerts)
Loin Du Bal	Gillet
Espana	Chabrier
Rakoczy March	Berlioz

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 155.

SUNDAY, JUNE 4, 1893.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Promenades Begun—Light Opera at the Bowdoin Square.

George A. Baker's Company in "The Beggar Student"—The Season's Music at the Point of Pines—Sunday Concert at Mechanics' Hall—Those Assistant Teachers—Gossip.

The eighth season of the Music Hall promenades had a brilliant beginning last evening, as the big auditorium was filled, both on the floor and in the balconies, and the audience in attendance gave ample evidence of a due appreciation of the opportunities afforded for enjoyment. "Propriety tinged with just enough freedom to oil the wheels of sociability" characterized the occasion, and, all in all, this annual series of entertainments was most auspiciously begun.

The usual adornments of the hall for the promenades in the shape of pot plants and festoons of green were in place. The entire floor was filled with tables and chairs for the accommodation of patrons, and the space given to the serving of refreshments was added to by the use of the front first balcony for this purpose, a change which will unquestionably prove very popular as the season advances.

Manager Charles A. Ellis, to whom the public is so greatly indebted for these concerts, has assembled his usual able corps of assistants for the season, and the comfort and convenience of patrons were attended to with admirable results. In the appointment of Mr. Adamowski as the musical director of the season the wishes of the public have unquestionably been catered to, as the reception given him as he took his place at the conductor's desk showed the favor with which he was regarded by those present in the most pronounced fashion. He combines more of the elements needed for such a position than any other orchestral leader now before the public, in this section of the country at least, and he constantly labors to deserve the good will of his many admirers.

His skill and tact as a programme maker for such concerts has become proverbial, and that of last evening was an excellent example of his ability in this direction, the numbers being as follows:

Polonaise	Liszt
Overture, "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Waltz, "Tales from the Orient" (first time)	Strauss
Selection, "Gondoliers"	Sullivan
"L'Arlesienne," No. 1	Bizet
Intermezzo, from "Pagliacci" (First time.)	Leoncavallo
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
"Love's Dream After the Ball" (First time at these concerts.)	Czibulka
Selection, "The Fencing Master" (First time at these concerts.)	De Koven
Loin Du Bal	Gillet
Espana	Chabrier
Rakoczy march	Berlioz

The orchestra of 50 musicians drawn from the membership of the Symphony players of the winter concerts were directed by Mr. Adamowski with all the grace, precision and effect which have characterized his former seasons in this line of effort. The dainty beauties of Gillet's "Loin du Bal," the rhythm of the Strauss waltz, the massive effects of the "Rienzi" overture, and the brilliant Liszt polonaise, and the "Rakoczy" march all showed the catholicity of this conductor, and his admirable treatment of the strongly contrasted selections was warmly commended on all sides.

The Czibulka "Dream After the Ball" was the principal novelty of the evening, and its many beauties will undoubtedly make it a prominent favorite in the season's programmes.

These concerts will be continued each week day evening for six weeks, the programme lasting from 8 to 11 o'clock. The selections for Monday evening are as follows:

Polonaise	Chopin
Overture, "Si j'etais Roi"	Adam
Waltz, "Seid Umschlungen Millionen"	Strauss
Overture, "Orpheus aux Enfers"	Offenbach
Ballet music, "Faust"	Gounod
Berceuse for string orchestra (first time)	Clayton Johns
Overture, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
Selection, "Robin Hood"	DeKoven
Selection, "Aida"	Verdi
Waltz, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
Polka, Francais (first time)	Knecht
Teufels March	Suppe

THE GEORGE A. BAKER OPERA.

The season of light opera performances to

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JUNE 11, 1893.

The promenades at Music hall have had a continued success throughout the week, and the audiences have been limited only by the capacity of the tables and balcony chairs. Manager Ellis and Conductor Adamowski know well how to please Boston "stay-at-homes."

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, JUNE 5, 1893.

DRAMA AND MUSIC.

The First of This Season's Promenade Concerts.

Brilliant Ending of Mr. Willard's Successful Season.

The Run of "Rosedale" at The Grand Terminates This Week.

There was smoking, and there was drinking, and there was the sound of musical instruments of many kinds in Music Hall last Saturday evening.

To change the bleak, shabby, cheerless hall into a "Dream of Elysian Delight," after the fashion of the final scene of a pantomime, would indeed be a hopeless task.

Yet the ingenuity and the energy of Mr. Ellis had done much, and the scene, viewed from a balcony, was one of pleasing jollity.

The crowd was bent on pleasure, and the crowd was great.

Mr. Adamowski was there.

So were the faithful men under his baton.

Marlboro' Street sat by the side of Columbus Avenue.

Neither was injured by temporary proximity.

The matron who at the strains of the waltz recalled the days of maidenhood was there.

The maiden who longed for a clear floor and the music of Strauss was there.

Gov. Russell was there.

The young man apparently created for the sole purpose of wearing this summer's broad and low straw hat was there.

The man with white whiskers was there, and he eyed approvingly beauty opposite, behind him and above him, until he was reminded forcibly of the presence of his estimable wife.

The lonely man was there, the man without friends, who welcomes a moment's chat with a waiter.

The passing stranger who wonders at Boston and its inhabitants was there.

And the mother and the child were there.

⁂

It was hot and there was an unflagging demand for cooling drinks.

Women drank strange, soft and sugary decoctions with pink and crimson and orange linings.

If drops fell on their gowns, they laughed good-naturedly, that is, when there were men present.

They did not object to tobacco smoke, oh, no, they were used to it; and they coughed violently from very delight.

There was a drawing of corks, and light wines cheered a little party.

Young fellows with heavy sticks felt "real devilish," as they called for bottled beer.

And music accompanied the jest, the gossip, the business talk of those whom black Care follows everywhere, the mother's praise of favorite daughter, the daughter's timid answer and shy glance.

⁂

And how about the music?

> "Come, fill the Cup, and in the fire of Spring
> Your Winter garment of Repentance fling
> The Bird of Time has but a little way
> To flutter—and the Bird is on the Wing."

And with the garment of repentance let criticism be thrown away.

For twenty-four weeks were we all dosed with tonic of a symphony.

For 24 weeks was there alleged necessity of opinion concerning the symphony.

"For lo, the winter is passed, the rain is over and gone, the flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land: the fig tree putteth forth her green figs and the vines with the tender grapes give a good smell; arise, my love, my fair one," and come to the Pop with me.

And let there be no talk of rubato and modern allegro, and dotted sixteenths, and temperament.

And Timothy, O son of long oppressed Poland, look kindly this year, as in the past, on Strauss, Offenbach, Suppe, Waldteufel, Czibulka, and all other makers of gay, frivolous, heel-exciting, pulse-quickening, thirst-provoking tunes.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 11, 1893.

—The beginning of the promenade concerts, more familiarly known as the "Pops," at the Music Hall, in Boston, always marks the ebb tide of the society season in town, although not by any means the absence of a smart clientele which is always within available distance. That this is due to the fact that "Tim" Adamowski, the supreme society favorite of all the violinists, wields the baton, is a very natural conclusion. The young conductor had a fine send-off as he mounted the platform and saw before him a long stretch of tables occupied by his personal friends. The presence of the Governor and party helped to make the opening night one of notable distinction. They were seated at Colonel Henry Higginson's table. Mrs. "Jack" Gardner, who is sure to be on view several nights in the week until her cottage at Beverly is opened the last of the month, brought in a party from Brookline—her immediate home, as it were. In her train were Russell Sturgis, 3d, Theodore Dwight, the swell librarian of the Public Library, and handsome Dr. Sturgis Bigelow, who has been a sojourner in Japan for some years. The Richard Dixeys, just on the eve of their departure for Lenox, were there, and so were the Jim Jacksons, Billy Blake, better known as "Eveowski" (being Mr. Adamowski's intimate friend), the Charles Heads and Colonel Hugh Cochrane, all of the swagger set, who were chatting and enjoying their mild drinks at the tables in true Continental style. The concerts will continue for six weeks, after which Mr. Adamowski will sail at once for Europe for his abbreviated vacation.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JUNE 5, 1893.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Promenade Concerts.

Apollo and Bacchus joined hands in Music Hall on Saturday, and a vast audience was present to approve of the union. Never have the "pops" begun more auspiciously than at this concert. Before the music began every available space in the hall was occupied, and the audience was far removed from the ultra-bohemian type, the highest dignitary of the Commonwealth and many social lions being present.

The music, too, was of a higher type than usual, and was more attentively followed than is generally the case in such informal concerts. Mr. T. Adamowski was the conductor, and received the heartiest of welcomes as he stepped upon the stand. There is nothing new to tell of his manner of leading; he is still the most graceful of conductors, and his beat is evidently quite intelligible to his men. There is nothing radical in his work, but it is imbued with a sincere love of music and an appreciation of the intention of the composer, especially in the sweeter phases. Liszt's polonaise, which began the programme has been given in a more fiery manner by our vanished Hungarian: it is a work which bears fiery treatment like a salamander. The overture to "Sakuntala" was evidently repented of, for it was metamorphosed into the more melodic overture to "Mignon." This was excellently played. As usual, the second part contained the best numbers of the concert, and among these was a new work, the intermezzo from "Pagliacci," by Leoncavallo. This opera was, like "Cavalleria Rusticana," discovered by Sonzogno, and the intermezzo seems a twin brother to the one found in the latter opera. The modern Italian school is evidently under the tutelage of Eros.

One of the pleasantest parts of the programme was the Suite Arlesienne, No. 1, by Bizet. This is much more interesting than the second suite on the same subject. The carillon with which it ends is a wonderful number. The work is a proof of Bizet's romantic power; had he lived, he would have become the greatest of modern French composers. It is strange that while the music lives on, the play by Alphonse Daudet, which inspired it, has become obsolete; yet it is one of the strongest works in modern literature. Some of the music was too dainty for a popular concert of this description, where absolute silence on the part of the audience is unattainable, but the pretty minuet in C minor, and the carillon with its bells ringing out continually on the horns (G sharp, E, F sharp) were very effective. The Rienzi overture received a splendid performance. Altogether the programme was of notably high cast for the occasion, while, as intimated, the best numbers were grouped together in the middle of the concert. Part I, contained a good overture and a Liszt polonaise, and even part III. contained numbers that are not banished from Symphony concert programmes. Mr. Adamowski succeeded in forcing a good degree of quiet during the performance of some of the softer numbers, yet "Love's Dream" by Czibulka, the intermezzo described above, and the Adagietto of Bizet's Suite were out of place; it was like exhibiting the fragrance of a violet at 50 yards or examining a Malbone miniature through a telescope. But the desire of Mr. Adamowski to elevate the musical character of these informal concerts is as evident as it is commendable.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Stadt und Umgegend

Dienſtag, den 6. Juni 1893.

Theater und Muſik.

Promenaden-Konzerte. Am Sonnabend Abend fand die Eröffnung der Promenaden-Konzerte ſtatt, welche einen geradezu glänzenden Verlauf nahm. Die Muſik-Halle war derart überfüllt, daß eine große Zahl Beſucher darauf Verzicht leiſten mußten, in bequemer Weiſe am Tiſche ſitzend dem Konzerte zu lauſchen. Das Orcheſter iſt faſt ausſchließlich aus Mitgliedern des hieſigen Symphonie-Orcheſters zuſammengeſetzt und hat in Herrn Adamowsky einen geſchickten und populären Leiter. Das Programm war ein gutgewähltes, doch leider lag es manchmal außerhalb des Bereiches der Möglichkeit, auf der hinteren Gallerie von den Tönen des Orcheſters etwas zu vernehmen und wäre da eine Aenderung dieſes Uebelſtandes höchſt wünſchenswerth. Zu der Eröffnungsfeier hatten ſich die höchſten Geſellſchaften eingefunden u. A. Gouverneur Ruſſel, welcher mit großem Jubel begrüßt wurde. Die Promenaden-Konzerte finden an allen Wochentagen von Abends 8—11 ſtatt.

SUNDAY HERALD

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCIII, NO. 155.

SUNDAY, JUNE 4, 1893.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Promenades Begun—Light Opera at the Bowdoin Square.

George A. Baker's Company in "The Beggar Student"—The Season's Music at the Point of Pines—Sunday Concert at Mechanics' Hall—Those Assistant Teachers—Gossip.

The eighth season of the Music Hall promenades had a brilliant beginning last evening, as the big auditorium was filled, both on the floor and in the balconies, and the audience in attendance gave ample evidence of a due appreciation of the opportunities afforded for enjoyment. "Propriety tinged with just enough freedom to oil the wheels of sociability" characterized the occasion, and, all in all, this annual series of entertainments was most auspiciously begun.

The usual adornments of the hall for the promenades in the shape of pot plants and festoons of green were in place. The entire floor was filled with tables and chairs for the accommodation of patrons, and the space given to the serving of refreshments was added to by the use of the front first balcony for this purpose, a change which will unquestionably prove very popular as the season advances.

Manager Charles A. Ellis, to whom the public is so greatly indebted for these concerts, has assembled his usual able corps of assistants for the season, and the comfort and convenience of patrons were attended to with admirable results. In the appointment of Mr. Adamowski as the musical director of the season the wishes of the public have unquestionably been catered to, as the reception given him as he took his place at the conductor's desk showed the favor with which he was regarded by those present in the most pronounced fashion. He combines more of the elements needed for such a position than any other orchestral leader now before the public, in this section of the country at least, and he constantly labors to deserve the good will of his many admirers.

His skill and tact as a programme maker for such concerts has become proverbial, and that of last evening was an excellent example of his ability in this direction, the numbers being as follows:

Polonaise	Liszt
Overture, "Sakuntala"	Goldmark
Waltz, "Tales from the Orient" (first time)	Strauss
Selection, "Gondoliers"	Sullivan
"L'Arlesienne," No. 1	Bizet
Intermezzo, from "Pagliacci" (First time.)	Leoncavallo
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
"Love's Dream After the Ball" (First time at these concerts.)	Czibulka
Selection, "The Fencing Master" (First time at these concerts.)	De Koven
Loin Du Bal	Gillet
Espana	Chabrier
Rakoczy march	Berlioz

The orchestra of 50 musicians drawn from the membership of the Symphony players of the winter concerts were directed by Mr. Adamowski with all the grace, precision and effect which have characterized his former seasons in this line of effort. The dainty beauties of Gillet's "Loin du Bal," the rhythm of the Strauss waltz, the massive effects of the "Rienzi" overture, and the brilliant Liszt polonaise, and the "Rakoczy" march all showed the catholicity of this conductor, and his admirable treatment of the strongly contrasted selections was warmly commended on all sides.

The Czibulka "Dream After the Ball" was the principal novelty of the evening, and its many beauties will undoubtedly make it a prominent favorite in the season's programmes.

These concerts will be continued each week day evening for six weeks, the programme lasting from 8 to 11 o'clock. The selections for Monday evening are as follows:

Polonaise	Chopin
Overture, "Si j'etais Roi"	Adam
Waltz, "Seid Umschlungen Millionen"	Strauss
Overture, "Orpheus aux Enfers"	Offenbach
Ballet music, "Faust"	Gounod
Berceuse for string orchestra (first time)	Clayton Johns
Overture, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
Selection, "Robin Hood"	DeKoven
Selection, "Aida"	Verdi
Waltz, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
Polka, Francais (first time)	Knecht
Teufels March	Suppe

THE GEORGE A. BAKER OPERA.

The season of light opera performances to

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JUNE 11, 1893.

The promenades at Music hall have had a continued success throughout the week, and the audiences have been limited only by the capacity of the tables and balcony chairs. Manager Ellis and Conductor Adamowski know well how to please Boston "stay-at-homes."

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, JUNE 5, 1893.

DRAMA AND MUSIC.

The First of This Season's Promenade Concerts.

Brilliant Ending of Mr. Willard's Successful Season.

The Run of "Rosedale" at The Grand Terminates This Week.

There was smoking, and there was drinking, and there was the sound of musical instruments of many kinds in Music Hall last Saturday evening.

To change the bleak, shabby, cheerless hall into a "Dream of Elysian Delight," after the fashion of the final scene of a pantomime, would indeed be a hopeless task.

Yet the ingenuity and the energy of Mr. Ellis had done much, and the scene, viewed from a balcony, was one of pleasing jollity.

The crowd was bent on pleasure, and the crowd was great.

Mr. Adamowski was there.

So were the faithful men under his baton.

Marlboro' Street sat by the side of Columbus Avenue.

Neither was injured by temporary proximity.

The matron who at the strains of the waltz recalled the days of maidenhood was there.

The maiden who longed for a clear floor and the music of Strauss was there.

Gov. Russell was there.

The young man apparently created for the sole purpose of wearing this summer's broad and low straw hat was there.

The man with white whiskers was there, and he eyed approvingly beauty opposite, behind him and above him, until he was reminded forcibly of the presence of his estimable wife.

The lonely man was there, the man without friends, who welcomes a moment's chat with a waiter.

The passing stranger who wonders at Boston and its inhabitants was there.

And the mother and the child were there.

⁂

It was hot and there was an unflagging demand for cooling drinks.

Women drank strange, soft and sugary decoctions with pink and crimson and orange linings.

If drops fell on their gowns, they laughed good-naturedly, that is, when there were men present.

They did not object to tobacco smoke, oh, no, they were used to it; and they coughed violently from very delight.

There was a drawing of corks, and light wines cheered a little party.

Young fellows with heavy sticks felt "real devilish," as they called for bottled beer.

And music accompanied the jest, the gossip, the business talk of those whom black Care follows everywhere, the mother's praise of favorite daughter, the daughter's timid answer and shy glance.

⁂

And how about the music?

> "Come, fill the Cup, and in the fire of Spring
> Your Winter garment of Repentance fling
> The Bird of Time has but a little way
> To flutter—and the Bird is on the Wing."

And with the garment of repentance let criticism be thrown away.

For twenty-four weeks were we all dosed with tonic of a symphony.

For 24 weeks was there alleged necessity of opinion concerning the symphony.

"For lo, the winter is passed, the rain is over and gone, the flowers appear on the earth, the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land: the fig tree putteth forth her green figs and the vines with the tender grapes give a good smell; arise, my love, my fair one," and come to the Pop with me.

And let there be no talk of rubato and modern allegro, and dotted sixteenths, and temperament.

And Timothy, O son of long oppressed Poland, look kindly this year, as in the past, on Strauss, Offenbach, Suppe, Waldteufel, Czibulka, and all other makers of gay, frivolous, heel-exciting, pulse-quickening, thirst-provoking tunes.

PHILIP HALE.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 11, 1893.

—The beginning of the promenade concerts, more familiarly known as the "Pops," at the Music Hall, in Boston, always marks the ebb tide of the society season in town, although not by any means the absence of a smart clientele which is always within available distance. That this is due to the fact that "Tim" Adamowski, the supreme society favorite of all the violinists, wields the baton, is a very natural conclusion. The young conductor had a fine send-off as he mounted the platform and saw before him a long stretch of tables occupied by his personal friends. The presence of the Governor and party helped to make the opening night one of notable distinction. They were seated at Colonel Henry Higginson's table. Mrs. "Jack" Gardner, who is sure to be on view several nights in the week until her cottage at Beverly is opened the last of the month, brought in a party from Brookline—her immediate home, as it were. In her train were Russell Sturgis, 3d, Theodore Dwight, the swell librarian of the Public Library, and handsome Dr. Sturgis Bigelow, who has been a sojourner in Japan for some years. The Richard Dixeys, just on the eve of their departure for Lenox, were there, and so were the Jim Jacksons, Billy Blake, better known as "Eveowski" (being Mr. Adamowski's intimate friend), the Charles Heads and Colonel Hugh Cochrane, all of the swagger set, who were chatting and enjoying their mild drinks at the tables in true Continental style. The concerts will continue for six weeks, after which Mr. Adamowski will sail at once for Europe for his abbreviated vacation,

---

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.

MONDAY MORNING, JUNE 5, 1893.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Promenade Concerts.

Apollo and Bacchus joined hands in Music Hall on Saturday, and a vast audience was present to approve of the union. Never have the "pops" begun more auspiciously than at this concert. Before the music began every available space in the hall was occupied, and the audience was far removed from the ultra-bohemian type, the highest dignitary of the Commonwealth and many social lions being present.

The music, too, was of a higher type than usual, and was more attentively followed than is generally the case in such informal concerts. Mr. T. Adamowski was the conductor, and received the heartiest of welcomes as he stepped upon the stand. There is nothing new to tell of his manner of leading; he is still the most graceful of conductors, and his beat is evidently quite intelligible to his men. There is nothing radical in his work, but it is imbued with a sincere love of music and an appreciation of the intention of the composer, especially in the sweeter phases. Liszt's polonaise, which began the programme has been given in a more fiery manner by our vanished Hungarian: it is a work which bears fiery treatment like a salamander. The overture to "Sakuntala" was evidently repented of, for it was metamorphosed into the more melodic overture to "Mignon." This was excellently played. As usual, the second part contained the best numbers of the concert, and among these was a new work, the intermezzo from "Pagliacci," by Leoncavallo. This opera was, like "Cavalleria Rusticana," discovered by Sonzogno, and the intermezzo seems a twin brother to the one found in the latter opera. The modern Italian school is evidently under the tutelage of Eros.

One of the pleasantest parts of the programme was the Suite Arlesienne, No. 1, by Bizet. This is much more interesting than the second suite on the same subject. The carillon with which it ends is a wonderful number. The work is a proof of Bizet's romantic power; had he lived, he would have become the greatest of modern French composers. It is strange that while the music lives on, the play by Alphonse Daudet, which inspired it, has become obsolete; yet it is one of the strongest works in modern literature. Some of the music was too dainty for a popular concert of this description, where absolute silence on the part of the audience is unattainable, but the pretty minuet in C minor, and the carillon with its bells ringing out continually on the horns (G sharp, E, F sharp) were very effective. The Rienzi overture received a splendid performance. Altogether the programme was of notably high cast for the occasion, while, as intimated, the best numbers were grouped together in the middle of the concert. Part I, contained a good overture and a Liszt polonaise, and even part III. contained numbers that are not banished from Symphony concert programmes. Mr. Adamowski succeeded in forcing a good degree of quiet during the performance of some of the softer numbers, yet "Love's Dream" by Czibulka, the intermezzo described above, and the Adagietto of Bizet's Suite were out of place; it was like exhibiting the fragrance of a violet at 50 yards or examining a Malbone miniature through a telescope. But the desire of Mr. Adamowski to elevate the musical character of these informal concerts is as evident as it is commendable.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Stadt und Umgegend

Dienſtag, den 6. Juni 1893.

Theater und Muſik.

Promenaden-Konzerte. Am Sonnabend Abend fand die Eröffnung der Promenaden-Konzerte ſtatt, welche einen geradezu glänzenden Verlauf nahm. Die Muſik-Halle war derart überfüllt, daß eine große Zahl Beſucher darauf Verzicht leiſten mußten, in bequemer Weiſe am Tiſche ſitzend dem Konzerte zu lauſchen. Das Orcheſter iſt faſt ausſchließlich aus Mitgliedern des hieſigen Symphonie-Orcheſters zuſammengeſetzt und hat in Herrn Adamowsky einen geſchickten und populären Leiter. Das Programm war ein gutgewähltes, doch leider lag es manchmal außerhalb des Bereiches der Möglichkeit, auf der hinteren Gallerie von den Tönen des Orcheſters etwas zu vernehmen und wäre da eine Aenderung dieſes Uebelſtandes höchſt wünſchenswerth. Zu der Eröffnungsfeier hatten ſich die höchſten Geſellſchaften eingefunden u. A. Gouverneur Ruſſel, welcher mit großem Jubel begrüßt wurde. Die Promenaden-Konzerte finden an allen Wochentagen von Abends 8–11 ſtatt.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JUNE 4 1893.

OPENING OF THE "POPS."

Music Hall Thronged Last Evening by Delighted Music-Lovers.

Music hall, in spite of the threatening weather, was thronged last evening by those who heartily approve of Manager Ellis's "popular" promenade concerts, and a very delighted audience it was.

And why should it not be?

Manager Ellis caters directly to the wishes of the stay-at-home public by these entertainments, where one, in the most informal manner, can spend an evening listening to choice music delighfully played, partake of light refreshments, smoke, and in general be surrounded by a thoroughly "summer" atmosphere.

The six- weeks' season was most auspiciously opened last evening. Mr. Adamowski was given a rousing welcome, and encores were frequent. The orchestra of fifty were picked men and played excellently. The front of the first balcony also is this year supplied with tables. The general features, otherwise, are the same as in previous seasons.

That the coming evenings at Music hall will be full of enjoyment, none can doubt who has been there in the past or was there last evening. Constant novelties will be provided in the programmes.

The programme last evening was:

Polonaise	Liszt
Overture, "Le Roi D'Ys"	Lalo
Waltz, "Seid umschlungen millionen"	Strauss
Selection, "Gondoliers"	Sullivan
L'Arlesienne	Bizet
Entr'acte, "Traviata"	Verdi
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
"Love's Dream After the Ball" (First time.)	Czibulka
Selection, "The Fencing Master" (First time in these concerts)	De Koven
Loin Du Bal	Gillet
Espana	Chabrier
Rakoczy March	Berlioz

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JUNE 4, 1893.

THIRTY-TWO PAGES.

MUSIC AND MENUS.

Eighth Season of the Music Hall "Pops."

Large and Fashionable Audience Enjoy Melodies and Viands.

Conductor Adamowski's Admirable Programme Heartily Applauded.

The eighth season of the promenade concerts began in Music Hall last evening under favorable auspices. The enterprising manager, Mr. C. A. Ellis, has every reason to feel satisfied with his "premier," for the audience was large and demonstrative, the music was excellent, the weather favorable and the performance was a success from every point of view.

That is, all but one, and that one was the disadvantage ground where elbow room and chairs could not be obtained, and personal comfort, on account of the crowd, was almost impossible.

Mr. Ellis and his lieutenant, Mr. Fred R. Comee, had so systematized matters that the service at the tables was highly satisfactory, and they and their assistants are to be commended for the celerity with which orders were served to patrons of light refreshments.

The buzz of conversation which had been steadily growing for a half-hour ceased to be heard as Conductor Adamowski came forward to his stand, bowed half a dozen times, as if to quell the applause caused by his appearance, turned to the musicians, raised his baton, and began the first number.

Both balconies were crowded, the central floor with its handy little tables was filled, and the outside was crowded with standing music lovers with their faces piously turned to the orchestra. The management for the first time placed tables in the balcony facing the stage and at these tables were seated some of the prettiest and best dressed women in Boston, with their sombre-clad squires, three or four ladies to each squire.

The majority of those in the first balcony were music lovers pure and simple, but there were some who cared more for friendly chat and claret lemonade than they did for even Goldmark's dainty overture.

Of course, all women are young, and all young women are pretty, yet it did seem at times as if the plainest enjoyed the music best. Down on the floor, where it was handy for the waiters, music was engaged in a death grapple for the victory with cold drinks, and only the intermissions saved the muse from a humiliating defeat.

The crowd kept growing, each minute bringing its complement, until a little after 9, when

Gov. Russell and Party entered from Winter st., it was almost impossible to find a vacant table, and difficult to reach it when found.

But one was found for the Governor, and he was hardly inside the door when some sharp-eyed and enthusiastic individual spied him and began to applaud.

The enthusiasm and the handclapping spread like a storm at sea, and before the Governor had reached his seat the hall was in an uproar. It subsided in a few minutes, and then way off in a corner a few strong-lunged lads started the familiar, "Rah! rah! rah!"

Another group, in another corner, took it up, carried it forward for all it was worth, and only ceased when the Governor took his seat after bowing smilingly to the assembled thousands.

Among the prominent people present were Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson and party, Mrs. John L. Gardner and Mr. R. C. Dixey, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Head, Mr. Hugh Cochran, Dr. Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. James Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Cotting and party, Mr. W. P. Blake, Mr. Eben Jordan, Jr., Mr. Louis C. Elson, Miss Gertrude Franklin and party, Mr. George Spaulding, Mr. Dexter Smith, and Mr. and Mrs. C. S. Dana and party.

The hall was decorated with festoons of green draped about the balconies, and on either side of the stage were placed large floral designs.

For the second year Mr. T. Adamowski wielded the baton over the orchestra which was composed, as usual, of Symphony men. The members from their long association in musical work were able to present an ensemble which is rare at a so-called "first concert," and the dozen numbers on the programme were interpreted in a thoroughly satisfactory manner.

Mr. Adamowski's Orchestra

Is particularly strong in the brass contingent, for "people will talk, you know," at promenades and his arrangement of instruments and selections of music is intended to suit this particular style of entertainment.

The programme was as follows:

Polonaise	Liszt
Overture. Le Roi D'Ys	Lalo
Waltz. Tales from the Orient	Strauss
Selection. Gondoliers	Sullivan
L'Arlesienne	Bizet
Intermezzo. Pagliacci	Leoncavallo
Overture. Rienzi	Wagner
Love's Dream After the Ball. (First time.)	Czibulka
Selection. The Fencing Master (First time in these concerts.)	De Koven
Loin du Bal	Gillet
Espana	Chabrier
Rakoczy March	Berlioz

The Liszt and Goldmark numbers were smoothly performed and the Strauss waltz seemed to set the ball of jollity fairly in motion, for after that applause was most hearty.

Sullivan's "Gondoliers" was charmingly played and received a deserved encore. The Leoncavallo intermezzo lacked somewhat in refinement of execution. The composition by Czibulka, composer of the opera "Amorita," was the most satisfactory number in the second part of the programme, the dainty string effects being given with exquisite finish by the violins.

The third part was made up of familiar numbers, the selection from "The Fencing Master" eliciting great enthusiasm and necessitating a repetition. The Rakoczy march was played with great spirit and sent every one home in good humor.

The next concert will be given on Monday evening and the series will continue for six weeks.

Music Hall Promenades.

The first of this season's promenade concerts in Music Hall was given last evening, and the size of the audience present and the pleasure manifested gave assurance that the concerts retain all their former popularity with the public. A review of last night's concert will be found in another column.

The programme tomorrow night will be as follows:

Polonaise	Chopin
Overture, Si j'etais Roi	Adam
Waltz, Seid umschlungen millionen	Strauss
Overture, Orpheus aux enfers	Offenbach
Ballet music, Faust	Gounod
Berceuse, For string orchestra (First time.)	Clayton Johns
Overture, Die Meistersinger	Wagner
Selection, Robin Hood	De Koven
Selection, Aida	Verdi
Waltz, Les Patineurs	Waldteufel
Polka Francais (First time.)	Knecht
Teufels march	Suppe

——A very pleasant innovation at the first of Mr. Ellis' promenade concerts at Music Hall last night was the tables set in the front of the lower balcony. They gave an additional festive air to the hall, and proved very convenient as well as ornamental. Every seat at the tables on the floor and the new balcony ones was filled, and Mr. Adam- [illegible]

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

MUSIC HALL
PROMENADE CONCERTS

EIGHTH SEASON.

EVENINGS, EIGHT TO ELEVEN.

GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI, CONDUCTOR.

POPULAR PROGRAMMES,
LIGHT REFRESHMENTS.
All the attractive features of past seasons.

FIRST NIGHT.
SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1893.

PROGRAMME.

POLONAISE.	Liszt
OVERTURE. "Le Roi D'Ys."	Lalo
WALTZ. "Seid umschlungen millionen."	Strauss
SELECTION. "Gondoliers."	Sullivan
L'ARLESIENNE.	Bizet
ENTR' ACTE. "Traviata."	Verdi
OVERTURE. "Rienzi."	Wagner
"LOVE'S DREAM AFTER THE BALL." (First time.)	Czibulka
SELECTION. "The Fencing Master." (First time in these concerts.)	De Koven
LOIN DU BAL.	Gillet
ESPANA.	Chabrier
RAKOCZY MARCH.	Berlioz

Popular Prices. Reserved Seats on Floor or Balcony 50 Cts.
TICKETS, 25 CENTS.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, JUNE 12, 1893.

Come, come, Mr. Adamowski, don't take these promenade concerts so seriously. Don't frown, and scowl, and rap on your stand when people talk. They do not go to Music Hall for education. Besides, your facial indignation is not personally becoming.

MUSIC HALL,
TONIGHT.
OPENING OF THE SUMMER SEASON.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

EIGHTH SEASON.
GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.
Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.
THIS (Saturday) EVENING, 8 to 11.

Programme:

Polonaise........................
Overture, "Sakuntata"..................Liszt
Waltz, "Tales from the Orient"..........Goldmark
(First time.)..........Strauss
Selection. "Gondoliers"
L'Arles enne "Pogliacci"..................Sullivan
Intermezzo from "Faust"..................Bizet
(First time.)..........Leoncavallo
Overture. "Rienzi"
"Love's Dream After the Ball"..................Wagner
(First time.)..........Czibulka
Selection, "The Fencing Master".......De Koven
"Loin du Bal"........................Gillet
"Espana"........................Chabrier
"Rakoczy March"........................Berlioz

Tickets 25 Cents. Reserved Seats on Floor or Balcony 50 cents.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 4, 1893.

THE PROMENADES.

Manager Charles A. Ellis opened the popular summer promenade concerts last night in Music Hall with an excellent programme of music interpreted by an orchestra of fifty men under the direction of T. Adamowski. The scheme of the present series will be the same as in seasons past; light music, as a rule, and light refreshments combined for the enjoyment of the great "stay-at-home" club.

Tables were arranged on the floor of the hall and in the front balcony. Admission is 25 cents, with some reserved seats at fifty cents.

A large audience was present last evening, nearly all of the reserved places being taken. The programme was as follows:

Polonaise	Liszt
Overture. Le Roi D'Ys	Lalo
Waltz. Seid umschlungen millionen	Strauss
Selection. Gondoliers	Sullivan
L'Arsenienne	Bizet
Entr' Acte. Traviata	Verdi
Overture. Rienzi	Wagner
Love's Dream After the Ball (First time.)	Czibulka
Selection. The Fencing Master (First time in these concerts.)	De Koven
Loin du Bal	Gillet
Espana	Chabrier
Rakoczy March	Berlioz

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON JUNE 4, 1893.

FIRST NIGHT OF THE "POPS."

A Tremendous Large Audience Gives Mr. Adamowski a Cordial Greeting.

Of the different indications of the beginning of the Boston summer season, no one is more certain than the opening of the course of popular concerts at Music Hall, the start of the six weeks of Bohemian enjoyment to which all classes look forward with pleasant anticipation for the remainder of the year.

There could be no question of the auspicious opening of the season last night, for Music Hall was filled with a tremendously large and delighted audience. All the desirable reserved seats had been bespoken long before the time for the concert and, last evening, there were waiting, when the doors opened, enough persons to occupy all the remaining seats on the floor. But the fact that no seats were left did not make any difference to hundreds of others, and the promenades around the tables afforded no opportunities for promenading. Who were there? It would be easier to say who were not there, for look where one would, he would see friends at the tables, walking about or sitting in the balconies.

The hall was brightly decked in green for the concerts; festoons were draped about the balconies and the stage back of the musicians was made to resemble a bower by means of small trees. At either side of the stage last evening were two large bouquets. Mr. Adamowski received a warm greeting when he mounted the conductor's stand, and applause was unstinted throughout the evening. Noticeable novelties of the programme were a new Strauss waltz and an intermezzo from "Pagliacci," while two other selections were given for the first time at these concerts. So pleased were the listeners at the playing of a selection from "The Gondoliers" and of "Loin du Bal," that repetitions were inevitable. The programme was a varied one, and all tastes were more than satisfied with the entertainment.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

MUSIC HALL
PROMENADE CONCERTS

EIGHTH SEASON.

EVENINGS, EIGHT TO ELEVEN.

GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI, CONDUCTOR.

POPULAR PROGRAMMES,
LIGHT REFRESHMENTS.

All the attractive features of past seasons.

FIRST NIGHT.

SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1893.

PROGRAMME.

POLONAISE.	Liszt
OVERTURE. "Le Roi D'Ys."	Lalo
WALTZ. "Seid umschlungen millionen."	Strauss
SELECTION. "Gondoliers."	Sullivan

L'ARLESIENNE.	Bizet
ENTR' ACTE. "Traviata."	Verdi
OVERTURE. "Rienzi."	Wagner
"LOVE'S DREAM AFTER THE BALL." (First time.)	Czibulka

SELECTION. "The Fencing Master." (First time in these concerts.)	De Koven
LOIN DU BAL.	Gillet
ESPANA.	Chabrier
RAKOCZY MARCH.	Berlioz

Popular Prices. Reserved Seats on Floor or Balcony 50 Cts.
TICKETS, 25 CENTS.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, JUNE 12, 1893.

Come, come, Mr. Adamowski, don't take these promenade concerts so seriously. Don't frown, and scowl, and rap on your stand when people talk. They do not go to Music Hall for education. Besides, your facial indignation is not personally becoming.

MUSIC HALL,
TONIGHT.
OPENING OF THE SUMMER SEASON.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

EIGHTH SEASON.
GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.
Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.
THIS (Saturday) EVENING, 8 to 11.

Programme:

Polonaise
Overture, "Sakuntata"	Liszt
Waltz, "Tales from the Orient"	Goldmark
(First time.)	Strauss
Selection. "Gondoliers"
L'Arles enne "Pogliacci"	Sullivan
Intermezzo from "Faust"	Bizet
(First time.)	Leoncavallo
Overture. "Rienzi"
"Love's Dream After the Ball"	Wagner
(First time.)	Czibulka
Selection, "The Fencing Master"	De Koven
"Loin du Bal"	Gillet
"Espana"	Chabrier
"Rakoczy March"	Berlioz

Tickets 25 Cents. Reserved Seats on Floor or Balcony 50 cents.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 4, 1893.

THE PROMENADES.

Manager Charles A. Ellis opened the popular summer promenade concerts last night in Music Hall with an excellent programme of music interpreted by an orchestra of fifty men under the direction of T. Adamowski. The scheme of the present series will be the same as in seasons past; light music, as a rule, and light refreshments combined for the enjoyment of the great "stay-at-home" club.

Tables were arranged on the floor of the hall and in the front balcony. Admission is 25 cents, with some reserved seats at fifty cents.

A large audience was present last evening, nearly all of the reserved places being taken. The programme was as follows:

Polonaise	Liszt
Overture. Le Roi D'Ys	Lalo
Waltz. Seid umschlungen millionen	Strauss
Selection. Gondoliers	Sullivan
L'Arsenienne	Bizet
Entr' Acte. Traviata	Verdi
Overture. Rienzi	Wagner
Love's Dream After the Ball (First time.)	Czibulka
Selection. The Fencing Master (First time in these concerts.)	De Koven
Loin du Bal	Gillet
Espana	Chabrier
Rakoczy March	Berlioz

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION.

BOSTON JUNE 4, 1893.

FIRST NIGHT OF THE "POPS."

A Tremendous Large Audience Gives Mr. Adamowski a Cordial Greeting.

Of the different indications of the beginning of the Boston summer season, no one is more certain than the opening of the course of popular concerts at Music Hall, the start of the six weeks of Bohemian enjoyment to which all classes look forward with pleasant anticipation for the remainder of the year.

There could be no question of the auspicious opening of the season last night, for Music Hall was filled with a tremendously large and delighted audience. All the desirable reserved seats had been bespoken long before the time for the concert and, last evening, there were waiting, when the doors opened, enough persons to occupy all the remaining seats on the floor. But the fact that no seats were left did not make any difference to hundreds of others, and the promenades around the tables afforded no opportunities for promenading. Who were there? It would be easier to say who were not there, for look where one would, he would see friends at the tables, walking about or sitting in the balconies.

The hall was brightly decked in green for the concerts; festoons were draped about the balconies and the stage back of the musicians was made to resemble a bower by means of small trees. At either side of the stage last evening were two large bouquets. Mr. Adamowski received a warm greeting when he mounted the conductor's stand, and applause was unstinted throughout the evening. Noticeable novelties of the programme were a new Strauss waltz and an intermezzo from "Pagliacci," while two other selections were given for the first time at these concerts. So pleased were the listeners at the playing of a selection from "The Gondoliers" and of "Loin du Bal," that repetitions were inevitable. The programme was a varied one, and all tastes were more than satisfied with the entertainment.

Promenade Concerts

Season 1893

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, MAY 8, 1893.

Manager Ellis of Music Hall has made the preliminary arrangements for the annual season of promenade concerts at that hall, and upon his return from the tour of the Symphony Orchestra all the details will be quickly put in shape.

The season will begin on Saturday evening, June 3, and probably continue for five weeks, with concerts each week day evening. The orchestra will be made up of 60 of the symphony men, and it is certain that a conductor of eminent ability will lead them, although it is undesirable to name him now.

During the year the library for the promenades has been greatly added to, and many novelties will have a first hearing during the season. Soloists will probably be used to some extent. The plans for the concerts will not vary materially from those of former years, and the continuous success which has followed these concerts under Manager Ellis's direction is a sufficient guarantee that the season will be a brilliant one.

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MAY 7, 18

THE PROMENADES.

Manager Ellis of Music Hall has made the preliminary arrangements for the annual season of promenade concerts at that hall, and upon his return from the tour of the Symphony orchestra all the details will be quickly put in shape.

The season will begin on Saturday evening, June 3, and probably continue for five weeks, with concerts each week day evening. The orchestra will be made up of 50 of the symphony men, and it is certain that a conductor of eminent ability will lead them, although it is undesirable to name him now.

During the year the library for the promenades has been greatly added to, and many novelties will have a first hearing during the season. Soloists will probably be used to some extent. The plans for the concerts will not vary materially from those of former years and the continuous success which has followed these concerts under Manager Ellis' direction is a sufficient guarantee that the season will be a brilliant one.

SUNDAY HERALD
BOSTON, MAY 21.

THE MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The ever-welcome Music Hall promenades will begin on Saturday evening, June 3, and continue each weekday evening for six weeks, the programme, as usual, lasting from 8 to 11 o'clock.

The plans of previous seasons will be followed in the main in the conduct of these concerts, a uniform admission charge of 25 cents being made, the added charge of a similar sum entitling to the use of seats within the rail on the floor and in the front of the first balcony.

The orchestra will be made up of 50 of the men of the Symphony organization, and will include almost all of the leading and solo players of the winter season. The delayed return of Manager Ellis, who has been absent with the orchestra on its western tour, has prevented the completion of certain matters incidental to the choice of the conductor for the season, but the public has no need to fear the selection of other than a popular and competent man for this position.

A large addition has been made to the library of former seasons, and the latest novelties will be introduced throughout the coming series of concerts.

Boston Journal.
TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1893.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The first of the Music Hall promenade concerts, under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, will be given this evening. Mr. T. Adamowski will be the conductor, and the concert will last from 8 till 11. There will be light refreshments and all the attractive features of last season. The programme will be as follows:

Polonaise....Liszt
Overture, "Le Roi D'Ys."....Lalo
W[illegible] "Seid umschlungen millionen."....Strauss
[illegible] "Gondoliers,"....Sullivan
L'Arlesienne....Bizet
[illegible] "Traviata."....Verdi
Overture, "Rienzi."....Wagner
"Love's Dream After the Ball."....Czibulka
(First time.)
Selection, "The Fencing Master."....De Koven
(First time in these concerts.)
[illegible]....Gillet
[illegible]....Chabrier
[illegible]....Berlioz

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MAY 28, 1893.

THE "POP" CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL.

Manager Ellis has completed his arrangements for the opening of the Music hall promenades next Saturday evening, having engaged Mr. T. Adamowski as conductor and secured the services of fifty members of the Symphony orchestra which include nearly all of the leading players. The concerts will be given as in forme rseasons from eight to eleven o'clock each week day evening with a general admission of twenty-five cents and a slight extra fee for reserved seats at the tables and in the baloonies. In addition to the usual tables on the floor of the hall the front of the first baloony will also be used in this way. Mr. Adamowsky has chosen the following as the programme for the opening night:

Polonaise....Liszt
Overture, "Le Roi Dy's"....Lalo
Waltz, "Seid Umschlungen Millioneir"
Dedicated to Brahms....J. Strauss
Arlesienne....Bizet
Selection, "Gondolier's"....Sullivan
Entre' acte, "Traviata"....Verdi
Overture, "Rienzi"....Wagner
"Love's Dream After the Ball"....Czibulka
Selection, "Fencing Master"....De Koven
"Loin du Bal"....Gillet
"Espana"....Chabrier
Rakoczy March"....Berlioz

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 28.

Manager Ellis has completed his arrangements for the opening of Music Hall promenades next Saturday evening, having engaged Mr. T. Adamowsky as conductor, and secured the services of fifty members of the Symphony Orchestra. The concerts will be given, as in former seasons, from eight to eleven o'clock each week day evening, with a general admission of twenty-five cents and a slight extra fee for reserved seats at the tables and in the balconies. In addition to the usual tables on the floor of the hall, the front of the first balcony will also be used in this way. Mr. Adamowsky has chosen the following as the programme for the opening night: Polonaise, Liszt; overture, "Le Rois D'Ys," Lalo; waltz, "Seid Umschlungen Millioneir" (dedidated to Brahms), J. Strauss; "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; selection, "Gondoliers," Sullivan; Entr'acte, "Traviata," Verdi; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner; "Love's Dream After the Ball," Czibulka; selection, "Fencing Master," De Koven; "Loin du Bal," Gillet; "Espana," Chabrier; "Rakoczy March," Berlioz.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 28, 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL POPS.

Manager Ellis has completed his arrangements for the opening of the Music Hall promenades next Saturday evening, having engaged Mr. T. Adamowsky as conductor and secured the services of fifty members of the Symphony Orchestra, which include nearly all of the leading players. The concerts will be given as in former seasons, from 8 to 11 o'clock each week day evening, with a general admission of twenty-five cents and a slight extra fee for reserved seats at the tables and in the balconies. In addition to the usual tables on the floor of the hall the front of the first balcony will also be used in this way. Mr. Adamowsky has chosen the following as the programme for the opening night: Polonaise, Liszt; overture, "Le Roi D'ys," Lalo; waltz, "Seid Umschlungen Millioneir," J. Strauss; dedicated to Brahms. Arlesienne, Bizot; selection, "Gondoliers," Sullivan; entr' acte, "Traviata," Verdi; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner; "Love's Dream After the Ball," Czibulka; selection, "Fencing Master," De Koven; "Loin du Bal," Gillet; "Espana," Chabrier; "Rakoczy March," Berlioz.

· · Season 1893 · ·

Music Hall Promenade Concerts

1893

· COMPLIMENTARY ·

Admit ____________________

POSITIVELY NOT TRANSFERABLE.

____________________ Manager.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1893.

THE PROMENADES.

There is no need to define what the promenades are or where to find them. All Boston and its most distant suburbs know and will receive with great joy the announcement that on this very evening the doors of Music Hall will open to receive the throngs who are even now waiting to renew the pleasures of the summer evenings of several successive years. The discretion and liberality of Manager Ellis have established precedents of success of which there will be no modification in the season which is about to begin. The only thing needed to make that which is almost perfection completely such would be to impart to the walls of Music Hall an expansive elasticity which would enable them to find ample elbow-room on special occasions for all the multitude that comes surging in. The plan hitherto followed will be that of this year. The Symphony organization will furnish the fifty members of the orchestra, and the baton will be in the hand of the favorite and competent Adomowski; the programme will include standard music and novelties of the day, the solid and grandiose along with the light and gay, and upon occasion soloists will step forward to vary the sequence of numbers. The refreshment department will be furnished and conducted upon the same pleasant basis as heretofore and patrons will have the privilege of securing tables in the small reserved space upon the floor or seats in the first balcony upon application in advance.

The programme for this initial evening stands thus attractively:

Polonaise....Liszt
Overture, "Le Roi D'Ys"....Lalo
Waltz, "Seid umschlungen millionen"....Strauss
Selection, "Gondoliers"....Sullivan
L'Arlesienne....Bizet
Entr' Acte, "Traviata"....Verdi
Overture, "Rienzi"....Wagner
"Love's Dream After the Ball"....Czibulka
(First time.)
Selection, "The Fencing Master"....De Koven
(First tims in these concerts.)
Loin Du Bal....Gillet
Espana....Chabrier
Rakoczy March....Berlioz

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 154.

SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1893.

An immense audience will assist at the opening concert of the Music Hall Promenades this evening. Mr. Adamowski has made a particularly pleasing programme, which includes many novelties. The orchestra of 50 men has the leading players of the Symphony concerts in its membership.

Promenade Concerts

Season 1893

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

MONDAY MORNING, MAY 8, 1893.

Manager Ellis of Music Hall has made the preliminary arrangements for the annual season of promenade concerts at that hall, and upon his return from the tour of the Symphony Orchestra all the details will be quickly put in shape.

The season will begin on Saturday evening, June 3, and probably continue for five weeks, with concerts each week day evening. The orchestra will be made up of 50 of the symphony men, and it is certain that a conductor of eminent ability will lead them, although it is undesirable to name him now.

During the year the library for the promenades has been greatly added to, and many novelties will have a first hearing during the season. Soloists will probably be used to some extent. The plans for the concerts will not vary materially from those of former years, and the continuous success which has followed these concerts under Manager Ellis's direction is a sufficient guarantee that the season will be a brilliant one.

E SUNDAY HERALD

BOSTON. MAY 7. 18

THE PROMENADES.

Manager Ellis of Music Hall has made the preliminary arrangements for the annual season of promenade concerts at that hall, and upon his return from the tour of the Symphony orchestra all the details will be quickly put in shape.

The season will begin on Saturday evening, June 3, and probably continue for five weeks, with concerts each week day evening. The orchestra will be made up of 50 of the symphony men, and it is certain that a conductor of eminent ability will lead them, although it is undesirable to name him now.

During the year the library for the promenades has been greatly added to, and many novelties will have a first hearing during the season. Soloists will probably be used to some extent. The plans for the concerts will not vary materially from those of former years and the continuous success whie has followed these concerts under Manager Ellis' direction is a sufficient guarantee that the season will be a brilliant one.

SUNDAY HERALD

BOSTON, MAY 21.

THE MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The ever-welcome Music Hall promenades will begin on Saturday evening, June 3, and continue each weekday evening for six weeks, the programme, as usual, lasting from 8 to 11 o'clock.

The plans of previous seasons will be followed in the main in the conduct of these concerts, a uniform admission charge of 25 cents being made, the added charge of a similar sum entitling to the use of seats within the rail on the floor and in the front of the first balcony.

The orchestra will be made up of 50 of the men of the Symphony organization, and will include almost all of the leading and solo players of the winter season. The delayed return of Manager Ellis, who has been absent with the orchestra on its western tour, has prevented the completion of certain matters incidental to the choice of the conductor for the season, but the public has no need to fear the selection of other than a popular and competent man for this position.

A large addition has been made to the library of former seasons, and the latest novelties will be introduced throughout the coming series of concerts.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1893.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The first of the Music Hall promenade concerts, under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, will be given this evening. Mr. T. Adamowski will be the conductor, and the concert will last from 8 till 11. There will be light refreshments and all the attractive features of last season. The programme will be as follows:

Polonaise..........Liszt
Overture. "Le Roi D'Ys."..........Lalo
Waltz. "Seid umschlungen millionen."..........Strauss
Selection. "Gondoliers,"..........Sullivan
L'Arlesienne..........Bizet
Entr'acte. "Traviata."..........Verdi
Overture. "Rienzi."..........Wagner
"Love's Dream After the Ball."..........Czibulka
(First time.)
Selection. "The Fencing Master."..........De Koven
(First time in these concerts.)
Loin Du Bal..........Gillet
Espana..........Chabrier
Rakoczy March..........Berlioz

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MAY 28, 1893.

THE "POP" CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL.

Manager Ellis has completed his arrangements for the opening of the Music hall promenades next Saturday evening, having engaged Mr. T. Adamowski as conductor and secured the services of fifty members of the Symphony orchestra which include nearly all of the leading players. The concerts will be given as in forme rseasons from eight to eleven o'clock each week day evening with a general admission of twenty-five cents and a slight extra fee for reserved seats at the tables and in the balconies. In addition to the usual tables on the floor of the hall the front of the first balcony will also be used in this way. Mr. Adamowsky has chosen the following as the programme for the opening night:

Polonaise..........Liszt
Overture, "Le Roi Dy's"..........Lalo
Waltz, "Seid Umschlungen Millioneir"
Dedicated to Brahms..........J. Strauss
Arlesienne..........Bizet
Selection, "Gondolier's"..........Sullivan
Entre' acte, "Traviata"..........Verdi
Overture, "Rienzi"..........Wagner
"Love's Dream After the Ball"..........Czibulka
Selection, "Fencing Master"..........De Koven
"Loin du Bal"..........Gillet
"Espa a"..........Chabrier
Rakoczy March"..........Berlioz

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 28.

Manager Ellis has completed his arrangements for the opening of Music Hall promenades next Saturday evening, having engaged Mr. T. Adamowsky as conductor, and secured the services of fifty members of the Symphony Orchestra. The concerts will be given, as in former seasons, from eight to eleven o'clock each week day evening, with a general admission of twenty-five cents and a slight extra fee for reserved seats at the tables and in the balconies. In addition to the usual tables on the floor of the hall, the front of the first balcony will also be used in this way. Mr. Adamowsky has chosen the following as the programme for the opening night: Polonaise, Liszt; overture, "Le Rois D'Ys," Lalo; waltz, "Seid Umschlungen Millioneir" (dedidated to Brahms), J. Strauss; "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; selection, "Gondoliers," Sullivan; Entr'acte, "Traviata," Verdi; overture. "Rienzi," Wagner; "Love's Dream After the Ball," Czibulka; selection, "Fencing Master," De Koven; "Loin du Bal," Gillet; "Espana," Chabrier; "Rakoczy March," Berlioz.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MAY 28, 1893.

THE MUSIC HALL POPS.

Manager Ellis has completed his arrangements for the opening of the Music Hall promenades next Saturday evening, having engaged Mr. T. Adamowsky as conductor and secured the services of fifty members of the Symphony Orchestra, which include nearly all of the leading players. The concerts will be given as in former seasons, from 8 to 11 o'clock each week day evening, with a general admission of twenty-five cents and a slight extra fee for reserved seats at the tables and in the balconies. In addition to the usual tables on the floor of the hall the front of the first balcony will also be used in this way. Mr. Adamowsky has chosen the following as the programme for the opening night: Polonaise, Liszt; overture, "Le Roi D'ys," Lalo; waltz, "Seid Umschlungen Millioneir," J. Strauss; dedicated to Brahms. Arlesienne, Bizot; selection, "Gondoliers," Sullivan; entr' acte, "Traviata," Verdi; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner; "Love's Dream After the Ball," Czibulka; selection, "Fencing Master," De Koven; "Loin du Bal," Gillet; "Espana," Chabrier; "Rakoczy March," Berlioz.

· · Season 1893 · ·

Music Hall Promenade Concerts

· COMPLIMENTARY ·

Admit

Manager.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1893.

THE PROMENADES.

There is no need to define what the promenades are or where to find them. All Boston and its most distant suburbs know and will receive with great joy the announcement that on this very evening the doors of Music Hall will open to receive the throngs who are even now waiting to renew the pleasures of the summer evenings of several successive years. The discretion and liberality of Manager Ellis have established precedents of success of which there will be no modification in the season which is about to begin. The only thing needed to make that which is almost perfection completely such would be to impart to the walls of Music Hall an expansive elasticity which would enable them to find ample elbow-room on special occasions for all the multitude that comes surging in. The plan hitherto followed will be that of this year. The Symphony organization will furnish the fifty members of the orchestra, and the baton will be in the hand of the favorite and competent Adomowski; the programme will include standard music and novelties of the day, the solid and grandiose along with the light and gay, and upon occasion soloists will step forward to vary the sequence of numbers. The refreshment department will be furnished and conducted upon the same pleasant basis as heretofore and patrons will have the privilege of securing tables in the small reserved space upon the floor or seats in the first balcony upon application in advance.

The programme for this initial evening stands thus attractively:

Polonaise..........Liszt
Overture, "Le Roi D'Ys"..........Lalo
Waltz, "Seid umschlungen millionen"..........Strauss
Selection, "Gondoliers"..........Sullivan
L'Arlesienne..........Bizet
Entr' Acte, "Traviata"..........Verdi
Overture, "Rienzi"..........Wagner
"Love's Dream After the Ball"..........Czibulka
(First time.)
Selection, "The Fencing Master"..........De Koven
(First time in these concerts.)
Loin Du Bal..........Gillet
Espana..........Chabrier
Rakoczy March..........Berlioz

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCIII, NO. 154.

SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1893.

An immense audience will assist at the opening concert of the Music Hall Promenades this evening. Mr. Adamowski has made a particularly pleasing programme, which includes many novelties. The orchestra of 50 men has the leading players of the Symphony concerts in its membership.

TENNIS SUITS CLEANSED TO LOOK

[85]

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCII., NO. 5.
TUESDAY, JULY 5, 1892.

LAST OF THE PROMENADES.

The last week of the Music Hall promenades was begun last evening, and the patriotic programme played by Director Adamowski was greatly enjoyed.

The arrangements for the week include a Sullivan programme this evening, one in which Wagner's music will be given prominence tomorrow evening, a Suppe programme for Thursday, a lot of numbers by French composers on Friday evening, and a grand testimonial to Director Adamowski on Saturday night to end the season.

In the Saturday evening programme there will be included a selection of the leading numbers from Mr. Adamowski's operetta, "A Regiment of One," and the popular conductor will appear as the soloist in the Handel "Largo."

HERALD, Boston, Mass

Date........7-17

Mr. Charles A. Ellis, the popular manager of the "Pop" concerts at Music Hall, sailed for Europe on Wednesday to pass the summer abroad, a great part of his time being spent in London,

---

THE REPUBLIC.
BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1892.

A few more evenings of delightful music interpreted by Director Adamowski's excellent band of players and then good by to the "pops." It is really too bad that we cannot enjoy these promenade concerts all summer. There is no doubt of their paying if only the musicians could be secured. However, nearly all of the present orchestra have engagements for the summer, and Manager Ellis refuses to fill their places with inferior men, for he feels that so high has been the standard of the concerts in the past, it would not be fair to his audiences to lower it now. So those who enjoy good music, together with liquid refreshments of a light nature, had better attend the few remaining concerts.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCII., NO. 3.
SUNDAY, JULY 3, 1892.

LAST OF THE PROMENADES.

The final promenades of the Music Hall season are announced for the coming week, the engagements of the musicians and other plans dependent upon these summer night entertainments necessitating an ending of the concerts in the midst of their greatest popularity.

The present series has far surpassed in financial results the record of any preceding year, and Manager Ellis, Director Adamowski and all who have been identified with this enterprise have good cause for pride in the high standard of artistic merit that has been maintained throughout the season.

It is a noteworthy fact that the orchestra and the orchestra alone, has been relied upon as an attraction in the present year's concerts, it having been found unnecessary to introduce either vocal or instrumental soloists to hold the favor of patrons. This is in itself a high compliment to Director Adamowski and his excellent band of musicians, the members of which have given their conductor such faithful support.

For the final week Director Adamowski announces that on Tuesday evening he will give prominence to the music of Sir Arthur Sullivan, on Wednesday to that of Wagner, and Suppe's music will be the feature of Thursday evening's programme. The French school of composers will be largely drawn upon for next Friday evening's selections, and, unless all indications fail, the programme for the closing concert next Saturday evening will make a fitting finale for the season's successes, and the occasion will take the form of a complimentary testimonial to Director Adamowski, who will appear also as a composer and give a first hearing of selections from his opera "A Regiment of One." In the Handel "Largo" Mr. Adamowski will play the violin solo.

A programme of patriotic music will be played tomorrow evening.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JULY 3, 1892.

Music Hall Promenades.

So great is the popularity of the promenade concerts at Music Hall that it is to be regretted that the season cannot be extended, but other engagements prevent, and, in accordance with the original plan, the concerts will close with the performances of this week.

To make the last week a notable one special features have been arranged by Conductor Adamowski for each evening. On Monday a programme appropriate to Independence day will be given. The selections are as follows:

Swedish Wedding March	Sodermann
Overture, Prometheus Bound	Goldmark
Waltz, Seid umschlungen Millionen	Strauss
Selection, Falka	Chassaigne
Hungarian dances	Brahms
Overture, La Fille de Tambour-major	Offenbach
Two movements for string orchestra	Hannemann
Jubel overture	Weber
Overture, Banditen Streiche	Suppe
Gavotte, Secret Love	Resch
Polka, Tout a la Joie	Fahrbach
March, American Republic	Thiele

Tuesday will be Sullivan night; Wednesday, Wagner selections will be the feature; Thursday, Suppe's music will have prominence, and Friday's concert will be devoted to French composers.

On Saturday evening a complimentary testimonial will be given to Mr. Adamowski, who has been so successful in the conduct of these concerts. On this occasion the music of the new opera, "The Regiment of One," Adamowski, will be heard for the first time, and other numbers of special interest are promised.

—Mr. Adamowski is winning golden opinions for his dignified and manly bearing as conductor of the Pops. A true musician always, he has this season brought to his high reputation a new honor and charm. This is the last week of these delightful concerts, and already the tables are fast being

---

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
MONDAY MORNING, JULY 4, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Promenade Concerts.

Beginning tonight these popular concerts at Music Hall enter upon the sixth and last week of a most successful season. Mr. Adamowski, in making the programme for this week, has selected only the most popular numbers. Tuesday will be devoted principally to Sullivan, Wednesday, Wagner, Thursday, Suppe, and Friday to French composers. The programme tonight is made up of airs from the works of Sodermann, Goldmark, Strauss, Chassaigne, Brahms, Offenbach, Hannemann, Weber, Suppe, Resch, Fahrbach and Thiele.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.
SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1892

I noticed the other evening at the Promenade Concert how strangely attentive the audience were (and they were not a particularly enlightened multitude) when the Lohengrin Prelude was played. There was a mystery about the first few bars for the violins, with their supernatural pianissimo, that stole even thought away, and made men listen. Then when the story slowly unwinds and there is given a hurried taste of the themes that are to be developed, and a climax is slowly reached by devious and winding ways, a Wagner climax, with the tremendous clash of the cymbals as a pinnacle on the fortissimo of the entire orchestra and brasses, it was as if the head of Medusa had been suddenly flashed before the Grecian rabble; the audience looked fixed and stony. They knew not what to make of that concordance of sounds. There is but one other piece in my experience where people are so affected: that is the height of the storm in Beethoven's "Pastoral." Men know not whether it be fear or admiration seizes them.

* * * * *

Next week is the last of the promenade concerts in Music Hall and each night will be made a special one, as follows: Monday night, patriotic music; Tuesday, Sullivan night; Wednesday, Wagner night; Thursday, Suppé night; Friday, French composers.

THE SOUTH BOSTON NEWS.

Pop Concerts.—But one week of the "pop concert" season remains, to the great regret of the stay-at-homes. So popular have these concerts become that it is believed they could be run profitably during the entire summer. Conductor Adamowski is to prepare some of his best musical programs for the last week, all of which will contain selections that have proved most popular with the attendants at these concerts. Music Hall is an interesting scene during the "pop" season, and is well worth a visit if only for the purpose of beholding it. There will be no other opportunity this summer to hear such delightful music as is furnished at them.

Gazette
SUNDAY MORNING EDITION

The promenade concerts at Music Hall, in accordance with the original plan, will close with the performances of this week. Special features are promised for each evening. To-morrow a patriotic programme, appropriate to Independence Day, will be given. Tuesday will be a Sullivan night; on Wednesday, Wagner selections will be given; Thursday, Suppe's music will have prominence, and Friday's concert will be devoted to the French composers. On Saturday a complimentary testimonial will be given to Mr. Adamowski, who has been so successful in the direction of these concerts. On this occasion the music of the new opera, "Regiment of One," by Adamowski, will have its first hearing, and other interesting numbers may be expected.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, JULY 3, 1892.

The Popular Concerts at Music Hall enter upon their last week tomorrow night, much to the regret of everybody who is unable to leave the city. The programmes for these last concerts are to be especially attractive. That for tomorrow night will be as follows: Swedish wedding march, Sodermann; overture, "Prometheus Bound," Goldmark; waltz, "Seid umschlurgen Millionen," Strauss; selection, "Falka," Chassaigne; Hungarian dances, Brahms; overture, "La Fille de Tambour-major," Offenbach; two movements for string orchestra, Hannemann; Jubel overture, Weber; overture, "Banditen Streiche," Suppe; gavotte, "Secret Love," Resch; polka, "Tout a la Joie," Fahrbach; march, "American Republic," Thiele. Tuesday evening will be devoted to Sullivan: Wednesday to Wagner; Thursday to Suppe; Friday to French composers and Saturday night will be a grand benefit concert to Mr. Adamowski. The music of the new opera, "The Regiment of One," by Adamowski, will be performed for the first time and a new overture by Ecker will be played.

SUNDAY, JUNE 26, 1892.

Music Hall Promenades.

The popular promenade concerts at Music Hall will continue only two weeks longer, other engagements of the conductor and orchestra preventing an extension of the time allotted to them.

A Wagner programme will be given tomorrow evening, and Thursday's concert will be devoted principally to selections from the operatic and dance music of Johann Strauss. Tomorrow's programme in full is as follows:

March, Juanita	Suppe
Waldweben	Wagner
Waltz, Seid umschlungen Millionen	Strauss
Overture, Meistersinger	Wagner
Selection, Boccaccio	Suppe
Prize song, from Meistersinger	Wagner
Selection, Carmen	Bizet
Prelude, Lohengrin	Wagner
Selection, La Grande Duchesse	Offenbach
Overture, Tannhauser	Wagner
Polka, Woman's Heart	Strauss
March, Teufels	Suppe

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 180.

TUESDAY, JUNE 28, 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

Director Adamowski improved the cool weather last evening by doing his duty to Wagner and affording the followers of this composer their share of the honors of the season.

A half-dozen of selections from the familiar concert repertoire of the compositions of "the Master" were played with admirable effect, the readings given showing a broad mental grasp of the several numbers and admirable skill in the direction of the band in their performances.

The audience was about as large as any of the season, and most enthusiastic throughout the evening.

The concerts can be continued only this and next week, owing to the engagements of the musicians, but the remaining nights will be made particularly interesting. This evening the programme will be as follows:

Swedish wedding march	Soedermann
Overture, "Raymond"	Thomas
Waltz, "Carlotta"	Milloecker
Selection, "Rigoletto"	Verdi
Entr'acte, "Philemon et Baucis"	Gounod
March, "Triomphe"	Schultz
Serenata	Moszkowski
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
Selection, "Chimes of Normandy"	Planquette
Waltz, "Violets"	Waldteufel
Polka, "Libelle"	Strauss
March, "Teufels"	Suppe

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, JULY 1, 1892.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

Another large audience greeted Mr. Adamowski and his orchestra last evening at Music Hall, when selections from Strauss were given prominence. But a few more opportunities remain to visit this popular summer entertainment, with its excellent orchestra and freedom to enjoy a good cigar with light refreshments. The following programme is announced for to-night:

March, "Hoch Habsburg"	Kral
Overture, "Martha"	Flotow
Waltz, "Doctrinen"	Edouard Strauss
Theme, with variations imitating various composers 1, Bach; 2, Haydn; 3, Mozart; 4, Strauss; 5, Verdi; 6, Gounod; 7, Wagner; 8, Meyerbeer; 9, Military March.	Ochs
Intermezzo, "Naila"	Delibes
Overture, "Light Cavalry"	Suppe
Flirtation	Steck
a Prelude. b Maurische Fantasie. } from "Boabdil"	Moszkowski
Tympani Solo
Selection, "Gondoliers"	Sullivan
Champagne Galop	Wiegand
March, "Fuers Vaterland"	Milloecker

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

How time does fly! It seems scarcely a week since the Music Hall was thrown open for the pleasant Promenades, and now the announcement is made that the series is almost at an end. It is a pity that the end should be reached so soon; and although something is undoubtedly gained by the concentration of patronage into a few weeks, it still seems as though there would be profit as well as pleasure in a prolongation of the season. A good many of the players have summer engagements to fulfil, but there are others who would do good service, particularly under the direction of Mr. Adamowski, who has shown himself to be a strong leader as well as a musician of taste. But, as matters now stand, it behooves the public to improve the few opportunities which yet remain for hearing fine programmes finely performed and for taking its ease with a cigar and a cool glass in the comfortable hall.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 178.

SUNDAY, JUNE 26, 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The final weeks of the Music Hall promenades will undoubtedly be fully improved by the vast public that has come to look upon these summer night entertainments as a necessity, and Director Adamowski's appointments for the coming two weeks will add still more to their popularity.

The concerts of the week just ended have been attended by immense audiences, and, despite the other attractions for those on the floor, the music has been listened to and appreciated with rare interest. The talented conductor has ample evidence that his work is appreciated by the patrons of the promenades, and he finds no difficulty in holding the attention of the audience whenever silence is demanded by the character of the composition. The series of composers' nights will be continued the coming week, with a Wagner programme tomorrow evening and one in which Strauss will be given prominence on Thursday evening next. Tomorrow evening's selections are as follows:

March, "Juanita"	Suppe
Waldweben	Wagner
Waltz, "Seid Umschlungen Millionen"	Strauss
Overture, "Meistersinger"	Wagner
Selection, "Boccaccio"	Suppe
Prize song, from "Meistersinger"	Wagner
Selection, "Carmen"	Bizet
Prelude, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Selection, "Le Grande Duchesse	Offenbach
Overture, "Tannhæuser"	Wagner
Polka, "Woman's Heart"	Strauss
March, "Teufels"	Suppe

The Music Hall Pops have been an undoubted success, and as their end draws near their popularity increases rather than wanes. But the series has been splendidly managed, and it would have been odd, indeed, had Boston's best and fairest neglected to show up at this evening symposium of beer and music. And of the latter, praise only can be spoken; the programmes are always admirable, and the band playing much better than any one has any right to expect when the mercury has been doing such high kicking on its own account. The Pops, however, are the fashion, and in these times that is guarantee sufficient of success.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 26, 1892.

The Music Hall popular concerts were never more popular than they are this season. The hall is crowded every evening and only those who secure their seats in advance are sure of finding vacant tables when they arrive. The concerts will continue but two weeks longer, much to the regret of the large army of stay at homes. The programme for tomorrow night will be as follows: March, "Juanita," Suppe; "waldweben," Wagner; waltz, "Seid umschlungen Millionen," Strauss; overture, "Meistersinger," Wagner; selection, "Boccaccio," Suppe; prize song from "Meistersinger," Wagner; selection, "Carmen," Bizet; prelude, "Lohengrin," Wagner; selection, "La Grande Duchesse," Offenbach; overture, "Tannhaeuser," Wagner; polka, "Woman's Heart," Strauss; march, "Teufels," Suppe." Tomorrow night, as will be seen by the programmes, will be a Wagner night and Thursday night will be a Strauss night.

THE SOUTH BOSTON NEWS.

SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1892.

POP CONCERTS.—To night will mark the end of the fourth week of the popular promenade concerts at Music Hall, and they have proved to be a treat for Bostonians during the warm spell. Mr. Adamowski and his corps of eminent musicians hold their own valiantly against the attractions of light opera in town, and each night the tables have held a goodly number of the society set not yet out of Boston for the summer. Notwithstanding the warm weather the audiences every night are large and enthusiastic. The stay-at-homes may well congratulate themselves on having something in these concerts that the dwellers in the mountains and at the seaside have to do without. Refreshments of all kinds are served by attentive waiters, and in fact everything to insure the comfort of patrons is done. The admission tickets are twenty-five cents; reserved seats on floor or balcony fifty cents.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

Music Hall has had no series of summer-night concerts superior to that which is now going on—perhaps none quite equal to it. Mr. Adamowski's work improves from week to week—and it was very good, to begin with. He chooses his music well; and although it is not possible to have a completely new programme every evening, he manages to intersperse his novelties so ingeniously and to recur frequently only to those selections which the public likes to hear often that each concert is entertaining throughout and has an atmosphere of freshness. His conducting gains in freedom and breadth, and his fine natural taste and liberal experience make him equal to the really classical reading of a great overture, the higher touches needed for an operatic pot pourri or the strong sweep of a march, while he is fast approaching the true swing and clinging suspensions of the best waltz-playing. The audiences, although they may seem to be devoted to their glasses, their cigars and their chat, understand all this nevertheless, and when something fine or delicate is performing sit as still as mice and as closely attent as if every one were a dilettante. The larger works are always intelligently applauded, and no well-taken point fails of recognition. The attendance is always large and the floor service deserves commendation.

Visitors to the Promenade concert at Music Hall last Thursday night were treated to an agreeable surprise. More than 100 Harvard boys were in the hall, but their deportment was of the most orderly and praiseworthy sort. They mounted the stage about 10 o'clock and sang "Fair Harvard" with much effect, Mr. Adamowski's orchestra furnishing an accompaniment. At the close of the singing cheers were given for the successful ball-players who had routed Yale, for Adamowski and for everybody who was known to be friendly to the crimson. The whole proceeding was orderly and decorous and reflected much credit upon the young gentlemen engaged in it.

THE REPUBLIC.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1892.

Music Hall is still one of the most popular places in town. On a warm evening it is extremely pleasant to listen to the music of the famous composers interpreted by an excellent band of musicians under the baton of Mr. T. Adamowski. This young director is nightly giving proof that he is the right man in the right place, and Manager Ellis and the public are both to be congratulated on securing his services during the promenades. The hall has been comfortable on even the hottest nights of the week. The attendance has been most gratifying, including as it does many fashionable groups at the tables and hosts of music lovers in the balconies. But few more evenings remain for the "pops," as they close this month.

The Boston Commercial

SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

A most popular resort on these warm summer evenings is the MUSIC HALL, where a choice musical entertainment is offered every night. The programmes are filled with bright music and form an uninterrupted pleasure to all. The orchestra, under Director Adamowski, is all that could be desired, and completely captures the audience by the skill shown in its work.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JUNE 26, 1892.

Music Hall Promenades.

The popular promenade concerts at Music Hall will continue only two weeks longer, other engagements of the conductor and orchestra preventing an extension of the time allotted to them.

A Wagner programme will be given tomorrow evening, and Thursday's concert will be devoted principally to selections from the operatic and dance music of Johann Strauss. Tomorrow's programme in full is as follows:

March, Juanita	Suppe
Waldweben	Wagner
Waltz, Seid umschlungen Millionen	Strauss
Overture, Meistersinger	Wagner
Selection, Boccaccio	Suppe
Prize song, from Meistersinger	Wagner
Selection, Carmen	Bizet
Prelude, Lohengrin	Wagner
Selection, La Grande Duchesse	Offenbach
Overture, Tannhauser	Wagner
Polka, Woman's Heart	Strauss
March, Teufels	Suppe

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 180.

TUESDAY, JUNE 28, 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

Director Adamowski improved the cool weather last evening by doing his duty to Wagner and affording the followers of this composer their share of the honors of the season.

A half-dozen of selections from the familiar concert repertoire of the compositions of "the Master" were played with admirable effect, the readings given showing a broad mental grasp of the several numbers and admirable skill in the direction of the band in their performances.

The audience was about as large as any of the season, and most enthusiastic throughout the evening.

The concerts can be continued only this and next week, owing to the engagements of the musicians, but the remaining nights will be made particularly interesting. This evening the programme will be as follows:

Swedish wedding march	Soedermann
Overture, "Raymond"	Thomas
Waltz, "Carlotta"	Milloecker
Selection, "Rigoletto"	Verdi
Entr'acte, "Philemon et Baucis"	Gounod
March, "Triomphe"	Schultz
Serenata	Moszkowski
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
Selection, "Chimes of Normandy"	Planquette
Waltz, "Violets"	Waldteufel
Polka, "Libelle"	Strauss
March, "Teufels"	Suppe

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, JULY 1, 1892.

PROMENADE CONCERTS.

Another large audience greeted Mr. Adamowski and his orchestra last evening at Music Hall, when selections from Strauss were given prominence. But a few more opportunities remain to visit this popular summer entertainment, with its excellent orchestra and freedom to enjoy a good cigar with light refreshments. The following programme is announced for tonight:

March, "Hoch Habsburg"	Kral
Overture, "Martha"	Flotow
Waltz, "Doctrinen"	Edouard Strauss
Theme, with variations imitating various composers. 1, Bach; 2, Haydn; 3, Mozart; 4, Strauss; 5, Verdi; 6, Gounod; 7, Wagner; 8, Meyerbeer; 9, Military March.	Ochs
Intermezzo, "Naila"	Delibes
Overture, "Light Cavalry"	Suppe
Flirtation	Steck
a Prelude. b Maurische Fantasie. } from "Boabdil"	Moszkowski
Tympani Solo
Selection, "Gondoliers"	Sullivan
Champagne Galop	Wiegand
March, "Fuers Vaterland"	Milloecker

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JULY 2, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

How time does fly! It seems scarcely a week since the Music Hall was thrown open for the pleasant Promenades, and now the announcement is made that the series is almost at an end. It is a pity that the end should be reached so soon; and although something is undoubtedly gained by the concentration of patronage into a few weeks, it still seems as though there would be profit as well as pleasure in a prolongation of the season. A good many of the players have summer engagements to fulfil, but there are others who would do good service, particularly under the direction of Mr. Adamowski, who has shown himself to be a strong leader as well as a musician of taste. But, as matters now stand, it behooves the public to improve the few opportunities which yet remain for hearing fine programmes finely performed and for taking its ease with a cigar and a cool glass in the comfortable hall.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 178.

SUNDAY, JUNE 26, 1892.

THE MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The final weeks of the Music Hall promenades will undoubtedly be fully improved by the vast public that has come to look upon these summer night entertainments as a necessity, and Director Adamowski's appointments for the coming two weeks will add still more to their popularity.

The concerts of the week just ended have been attended by immense audiences, and, despite the other attractions for those on the floor, the music has been listened to and appreciated with rare interest. The talented conductor has ample evidence that his work is appreciated by the patrons of the promenades, and he finds no difficulty in holding the attention of the audience whenever silence is demanded by the character of the composition. The series of composers' nights will be continued the coming week, with a Wagner programme tomorrow evening and one in which Strauss will be given prominence on Thursday evening next. Tomorrow evening's selections are as follows:

March, "Juanita"	Suppe
Waldweben	Wagner
Waltz, "Seid Umschlungen Millionen"	Strauss
Overture, "Meistersinger"	Wagner
Selection, "Boccaccio"	Suppe
Prize song, from "Meistersinger"	Wagner
Selection, "Carmen"	Bizet
Prelude, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Selection, "Le Grande Duchesse"	Offenbach
Overture, "Tannhæuser"	Wagner
Polka, "Woman's Heart"	Strauss
March, "Teufels"	Suppe

The Music Hall Pops have been an undoubted success, and as their end draws near their popularity increases rather than wanes. But the series has been splendidly managed, and it would have been odd, indeed, had Boston's best and fairest neglected to show up at this evening symposium of beer and music. And of the latter, praise only can be spoken; the programmes are always admirable, and the band playing much better than any one has any right to expect when the mercury has been doing such high kicking on its own account. The Pops, however, are the fashion, and in these times that is guarantee sufficient of success.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 26, 1892.

The Music Hall popular concerts were never more popular than they are this season. The hall is crowded every evening and only those who secure their seats in advance are sure of finding vacant tables when they arrive. The concerts will continue but two weeks longer, much to the regret of the large army of stay at homes. The programme for tomorrow night will be as follows: March, "Juanita," Suppe; "waldweben," Wagner; waltz, "Seid umschlungen Millionen," Strauss; overture, "Meistersinger," Wagner; selection, "Boccaccio," Suppe; prize song from "Meistersinger," Wagner; selection, "Carmen," Bizet; prelude, "Lohengrin," Wagner; selection, "La Grande Duchesse," Offenbach; overture, "Tannhaeuser," Wagner; polka, "Woman's Heart," Strauss; march, "Teufels," Suppe." Tomorrow night, as will be seen by the programmes, will be a Wagner night and Thursday night will be a Strauss night.

THE SOUTH BOSTON NEWS.

SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1892.

POP CONCERTS.—To night will mark the end of the fourth week of the popular promenade concerts at Music Hall, and they have proved to be a treat for Bostonians during the warm spell. Mr. Adamowski and his corps of eminent musicians hold their own valiantly against the attractions of light opera in town, and each night the tables have held a goodly number of the society set not yet out of Boston for the summer. Notwithstanding the warm weather the audiences every night are large and enthusiastic. The stay-at-homes may well congratulate themselves on having something in these concerts that the dwellers in the mountains and at the seaside have to do without. Refreshments of all kinds are served by attentive waiters, and in fact everything to insure the comfort of patrons is done. The admission tickets are twenty-five cents; reserved seats on floor or balcony fifty cents.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

Music Hall has had no series of summer-night concerts superior to that which is now going on—perhaps none quite equal to it. Mr. Adamowski's work improves from week to week—and it was very good, to begin with. He chooses his music well; and although it is not possible to have a completely new programme every evening, he manages to intersperse his novelties so ingeniously and to recur frequently only to those selections which the public likes to hear often that each concert is entertaining throughout and has an atmosphere of freshness. His conducting gains in freedom and breadth, and his fine natural taste and liberal experience make him equal to the really classical reading of a great overture, the higher touches needed for an operatic pot pourri or the strong sweep of a march, while he is fast approaching the true swing and clinging suspensions of the best waltz-playing. The audiences, although they may seem to be devoted to their glasses, their cigars and their chat, understand all this nevertheless, and when something fine or delicate is performing sit as still as mice and as closely attent as if every one were a dilettante. The larger works are always intelligently applauded, and no well-taken point fails of recognition. The attendance is always large and the floor service deserves commendation.

Visitors to the Promenade concert at Music Hall last Thursday night were treated to an agreeable surprise. More than 100 Harvard boys were in the hall, but their deportment was of the most orderly and praiseworthy sort. They mounted the stage about 10 o'clock and sang "Fair Harvard" with much effect, Mr. Adamowski's orchestra furnishing an accompaniment. At the close of the singing cheers were given for the successful ball-players who had routed Yale, for Adamowski and for everybody who was known to be friendly to the crimson. The whole proceeding was orderly and decorous and reflected much credit upon the young gentlemen engaged in it.

THE REPUBLIC.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1892.

Music Hall is still one of the most popular places in town. On a warm evening it is extremely pleasant to listen to the music of the famous composers interpreted by an excellent band of musicians under the baton of Mr. T. Adamowski. This young director is nightly giving proof that he is the right man in the right place, and Manager Ellis and the public are both to be congratulated on securing his services during the promenades. The hall has been comfortable on even the hottest nights of the week. The attendance has been most gratifying, including as it does many fashionable groups at the tables and hosts of music lovers in the balconies. But few more evenings remain for the "pops," as they close this month.

The Boston Commercial

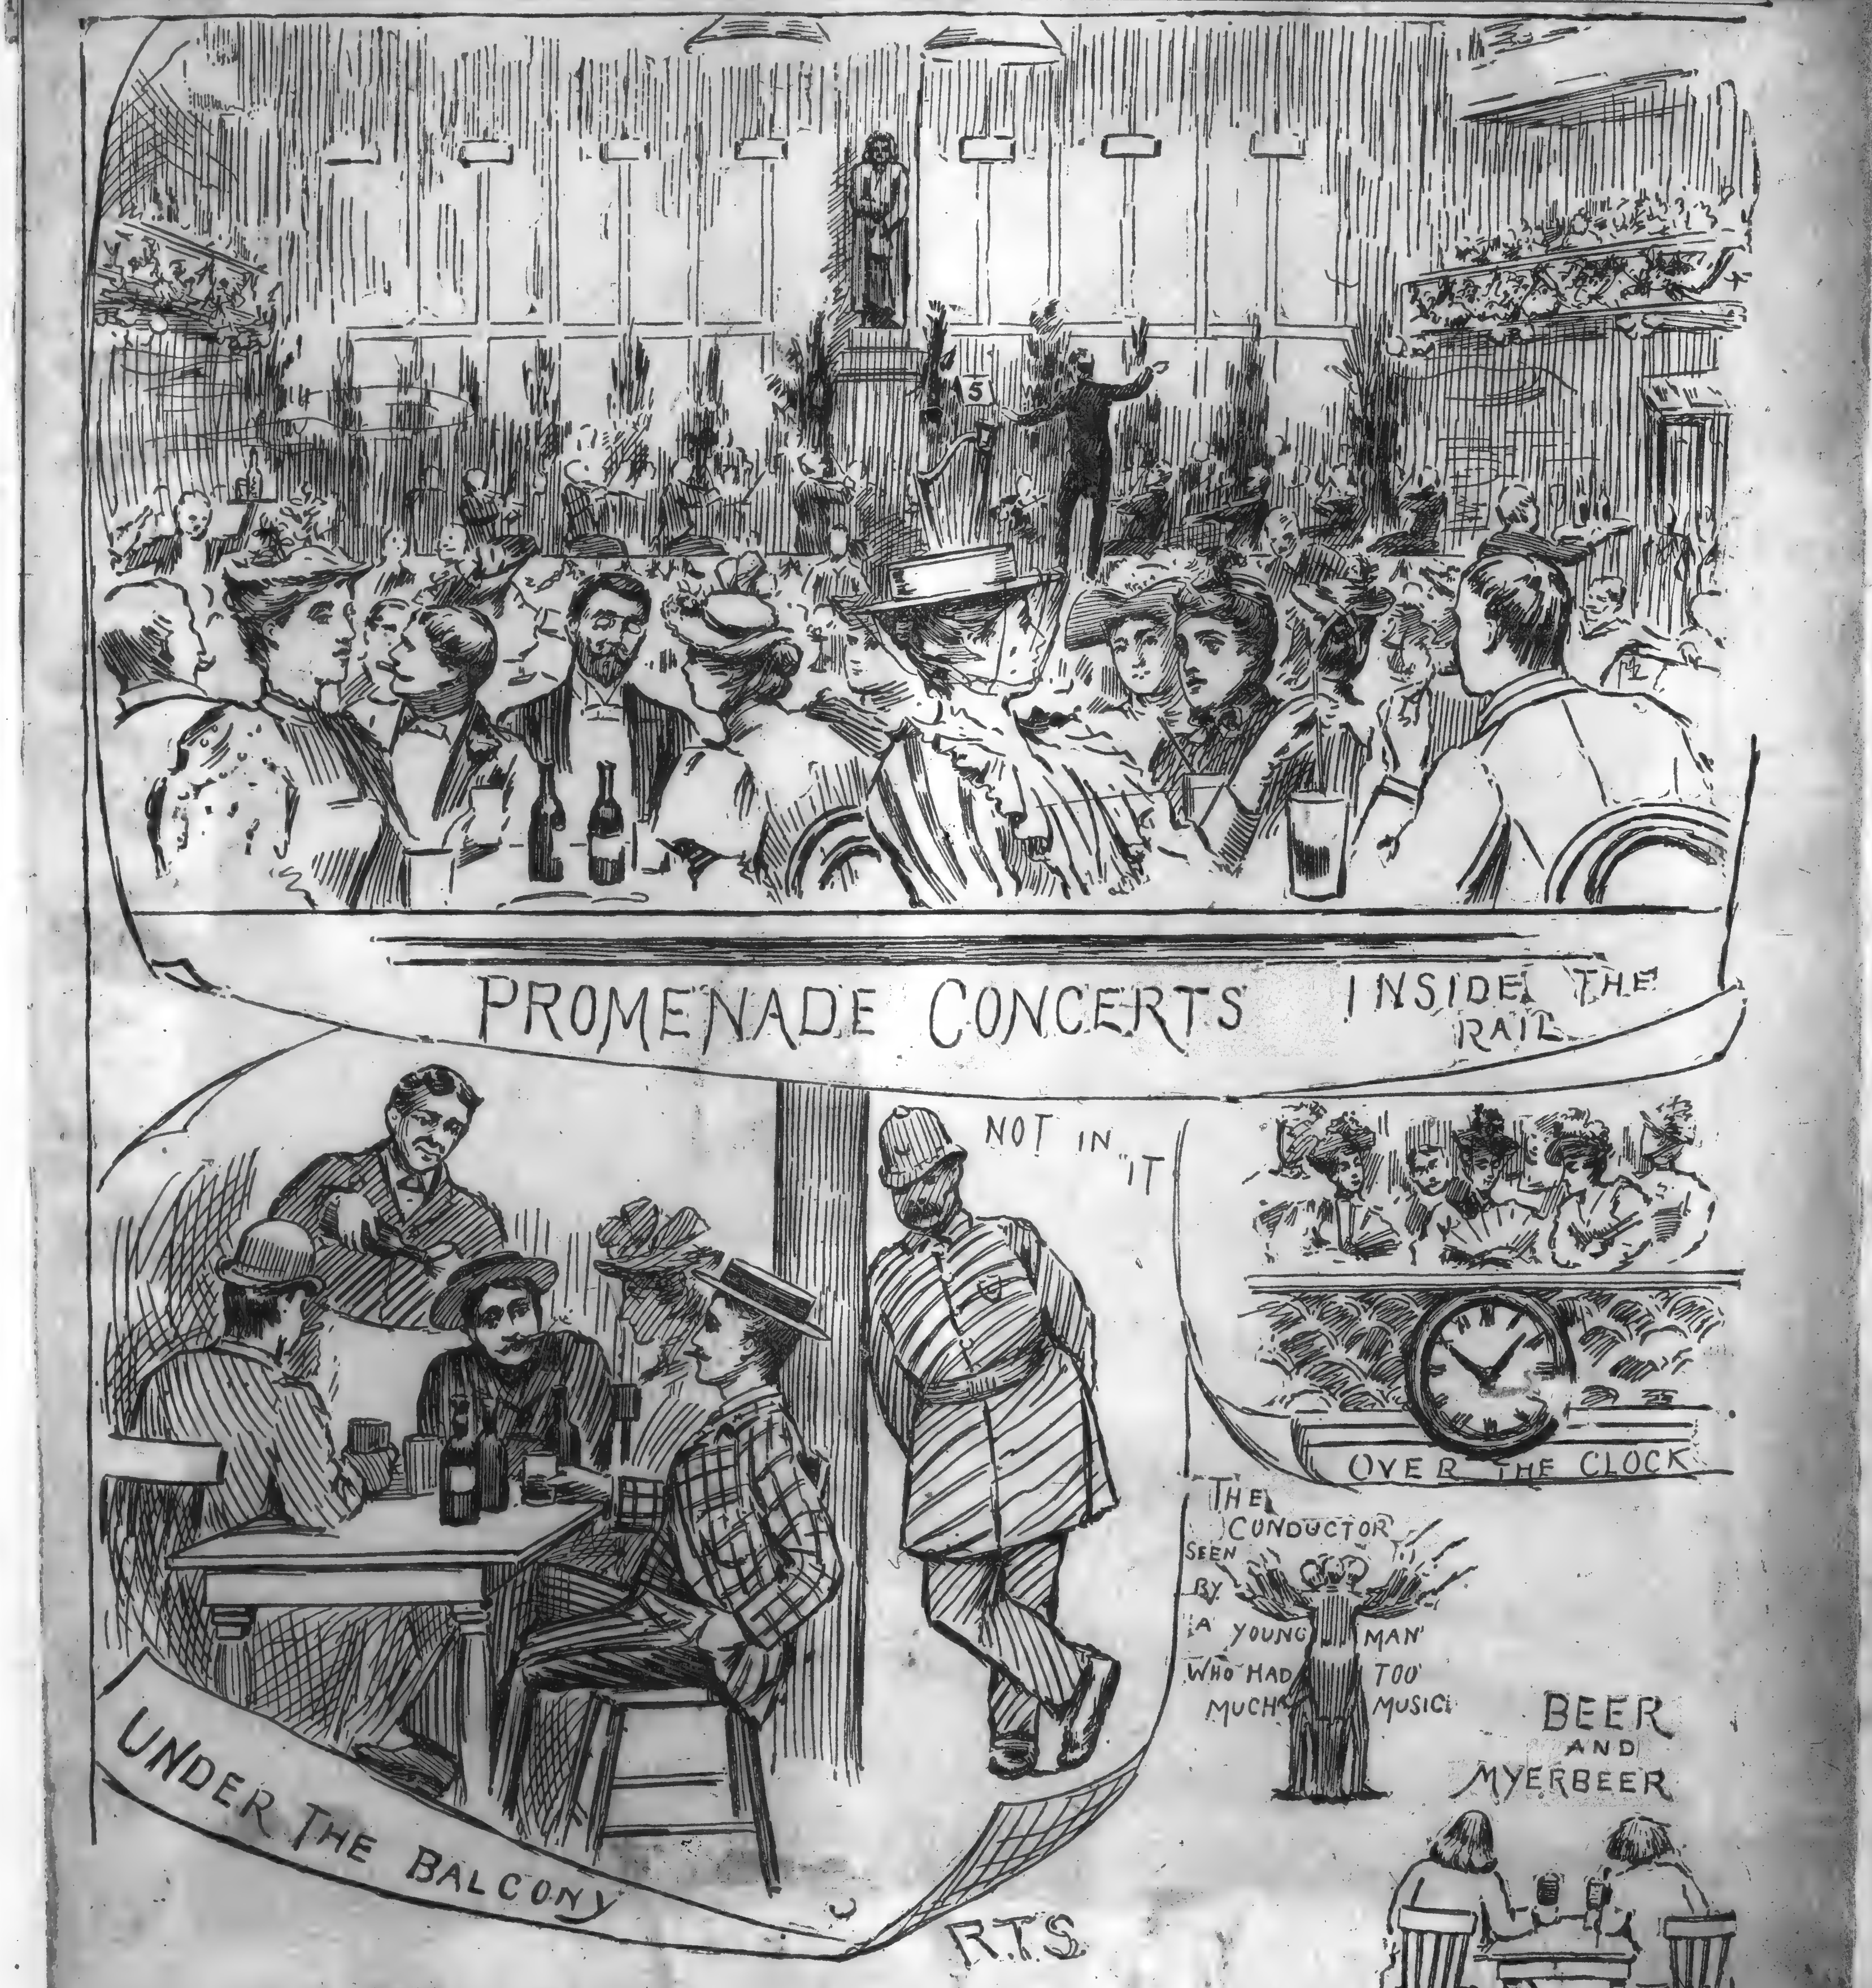
SATURDAY, JUNE 25, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

A most popular resort on these warm summer evenings is the MUSIC HALL, where a choice musical entertainment is offered every night. The programmes are filled with bright music and form an uninterrupted pleasure to all. The orchestra, under Director Adamowski, is all that could be desired, and completely captures the audience by the skill shown in its work.

THE SUNDAY HERALD.

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JUNE 19, 1892 — TWENTY-EIGHT PAGES.



5
PROMENADE CONCERTS
INSIDE THE RAIL
NOT IN IT
OVER THE CLOCK
THE CONDUCTOR SEEN BY A YOUNG MAN WHO HAD TOO MUCH MUSIC
BEER AND MYERBEER
UNDER THE BALCONY
R.T.S.

THE REPUBLIC.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1892.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall have proved a boon to suffering humanity this week. One need not sigh for the open air gardens of New York so long as Manager Ellis continues the "pops." While those outside were vainly looking for a breath of air, inside Music Hall it was delightfully cool. Then, Mr. Adamowski gives the public such delightful programmes of music. They seem to suit all tastes; certainly they please every one who attends. Besides one does not need to go out between the acts. He can "see the man" without leaving his seat, and he will enjoy the music all the more for having seen him. The "pops" end with this month, so but few opportunities remain of enjoying them.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

THURSDAY, JUNE 23, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

The music of the popular operas of Sir Arthur Sullivan will be the leading feature of the concert at Music Hall this evening. Selections will be played from "Patience," "Pirates of Penzance," "Pinafore," "Mikado" and the "Gondoliers," also one or two of the short orchestral pieces by the same composer. The programme also includes the march "Celebre," Lachner, Hungarian Rhapsody No 2. Liszt, and waltzes by Strauss, Lanner and Waldteufel.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 176.

FRIDAY, JUNE 24, 1892.

HARVARD AT THE PROMENADES.

Young Harvard had an outing at the promenades last evening, the boys taking possession of the corner of the stage at about 10 o'clock, and singing "Fair Harvard" to the improvised accompaniment of the orchestra. Then they cheered, in their own "rah" style, everybody who helped in the day's victory, and wound up with a special effort in behalf of Adamowski, the conductor. It was a great night for Harvard.

6

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

PROMENADE CONCERTS

SEASON 1892.

Monday Evening, June 6.

ADMIT ONE. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

RETAIN THIS CHECK

EVE. JUNE 6.

One Chair.

TABLE.

6

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

PROMENADE CONCERTS

SEASON 1892.

Monday Evening, June 6.

ADMIT ONE. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

RETAIN THIS CHECK

EVE. JUNE 6

FIRST BALCONY

L 601

MUSIC HALL 00A 842

Promenade Concerts

SEASON 1892.

ADMIT ONE.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

SEASON 1892.

MUSIC · HALL · PROMENADE CONCERTS

1892

COMPLIMENTARY.

Admit ______________________ and one.

POSITIVELY NOT
TRANSFERABLE.

______________________ Manager.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 19.

The season of Promenade Concerts at Music Hall is already half over but the interest in these popular entertainments seems to be still on the increase. The audiences never before have been so large or so fashionable and the performances were never so meritorious. The "Composers' Nights" which proved so popular last season will be inaugurated tomorrow evening when Offenbach's music will be the leading feature of the programme. Selections will be played from "La Grande Duchesse," "La Fille du Tambour Major," "Les Brigands," "La Belle Helene" and "Orpheus." Other numbers of the programme are the Prelude "Lohengrin," Wagner; Ballet Music "Henry VIII," Saint-Saens; "Loin du Bal," Gillet and waltzes by Strauss and Lanner. The concerts will be continued three weeks longer.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 171.

SUNDAY, JUNE 19, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Summer Season Entertainments in Ample Supply.

Final "Iolanthe" Performances This Week—The Music Hall Promenades in Great Favor—"Puritania" Popular at the Tremont—The City Concerts—Today's Programme—Notes.

The record made by the Music Hall promenade concerts of the week just ended, the third of the season, is alike gratifying to Manager Ellis, Director Adamowski and those who realize the value of these summer night attractions to the city in the way of affording an entertainment suited to the tastes of a constantly increasing public.

The musical programmes offered nightly by Director Adamowski are arranged with rare skill, and show that he takes a most liberal view of the taste of the patrons of the promenades, all classes of compositions finding recognition in the selections made.

The season continues only three weeks longer, the summer engagements of many of the leading members of the orchestra making it impossible to continue the promenades beyond the 9th of next month. During the remaining weeks many novelties will have a hearing, and special features will be arranged to add to the interest of the concerts.

Tomorrow evening the first of the composers' nights is announced, when prominence will be given to the compositions of Offenbach, and on Thursday evening next Sir Arthur Sullivan's music will be made a feature in the same way.

The programme for tomorrow evening is as follows:

March, "La Prophete"	Meyerbeer
Selection, "La Fille du Tambour-Major"	Offenbach
Waltz, "Artists' Life"	Strauss
Selection, "Brigands"	Offenbach
Prelude, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Barcarolle, from 'Le Comte d'Hoffman"	Offenbach
Ballet music, "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
"Offenbachiana"	Conradi
Overture, "Orpheus"	Offenbach
Waltz, "Pesther"	Lanner
"Loin du Bal"	Gillet
"Persian March"	Strauss

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, JUNE 20, 1892.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

To-night will be the first of the "composers' nights" at Music Hall, and the programme will include selections from the operettas of Offenbach. Thursday evening will be devoted largely to Arthur Sullivan. The concerts will be continued three weeks longer. The programme for this evening is as follows:

March, "Le Prophete"	Meyerbeer
Selection, "La Fille du Tambour Major"	Offenbach
Waltz, "Artist Life"	Strauss
Selection, "Les Brigands"	Offenbach
Prelude, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Baracole, "Le Conte Hoffman"	Strauss
Ballet music, "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
"Offenbachiana"	Conradi
Overture, "Orpheus"	Offenbach
"Loin du Bal"	Gillet
Waltz, "Pesther"	Lanner
March, "Boulanger"	Kral

THE BOSTON BUDGET

BOSTON, JUNE 19, 1892.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall are more popular than ever, and the audiences every night are large and appreciative. Mr. T. Adamowski is growing in favor as a conductor, and under his skilful leadership the superb orchestra is doing excellent work. The stay-at-homes may well congratulate themselves on having something in these concerts that the dwellers in the mountains and at the seaside have to do without.

[illegible] RECORD.

SATURDAY JUNE 11.

Fred Comee, of the Music Hall staff, got off a very good thing the other day. Speaking of Gericke's just announced marriage to Miss Flamm, he said: "Bright man, Gericke. Really quite a Flam-beau, you know!" And then they all wept, and Fred had to order beer to console them.

* * * * *

I dropped into Music Hall last night and saw a number of familiar faces. Mr. and Mrs. Ned Going, Miss Helen McKay and Miss Mabel Going were among those in the balcony, while at the tables were Mr. Goodspeed, treasurer of the West End R.R., with a party, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Watson, R. G. Hardie and his beautiful wife, Miss Josephine Jenkins, Mrs. Philip Hale, Ben Woolf and others. One large party consisted of Miss Belle Armstrong, Mrs. Sutherland, Mary Shaw, the actress, her sister, Mrs. Ingersoll of rainy day dress fame, Mrs. Ward Tenney, Mrs. Henry Cram, Miss Brazier, Marie Burress of the Museum and Dr. Vesper.

* * * * *

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

Another week of ample patronage, capital programmes, brilliant playing, excellent table service, and therefore general satisfaction. Mr. Adamowski justifies more and more his right to the place he occupies and his directing is open to criticism in only one respect—that he does not quite catch the elastic swing and the occasional hesitating poise of the waltz. But these, indeed, no home conductor but Mr. Neuendorff has put into the music of Gung'l and Strauss. The Music Hall has been comfortable on even the hottest nights of the week, being open on all sides to so many sunless little courts and having so strong an upward draught all the time. The attendance has included many fashionable groups at the tables and hosts of music-lovers in the balconies.

The Boston Commercial.

SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

No more cooler place in town exists than the MUSIC HALL, which is nightly filled with select audiences. The music presented at these concerts is the best, all the programmes being made up of bright selections to suit all tastes. The concerts are given each evening from 8 to 11 o'clock.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JUNE 19, 1892.

Music Hall Promenades.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall seem to grow in favor as the season progresses, and neither the weather nor counter attractions affect the uniformly large attendance at these charming entertainments.

The "Composers' Nights," which proved so popular last season, will be inaugurated tomorrow evening, when Offenbach's music will be the leading feature of the programme.

On Thursday selections from the operas of Sir Arthur Sullivan will be given prominence. The concerts will be continued three weeks longer. Mr. Adamowski's programme for tomorrow evening is as follows:

March, "Le Prophete"	Meyerbeer
Selection, "La Fille du Tambour Major"	Offenbach
Waltz, "Artist Life"	Strauss
Selection, "Les Brigands"	Offenbach
Prelude, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Barcarole, "Le Conte Hoffman"	Strauss
Ballet music, "Henry VIII"	Saint-Saens
"Offenbachiana"	Conradi
Overture, "Orpheus"	Offenbach
"Lion du Bal"	Gillet
Waltz, "Pesther"	Lanner
March, "Boulanger"	Kral

—Mr. Adamowski and his men hold their own valiantly against the attractions of light opera and the Arena Garden, and each night the tables at Music Hall have held a goodly number of the society set not yet out of Boston for the summer. Mr. Adamowski will spend the half of his vacation left him after the concerts in Europe.

THE REPUBLIC.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1892.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall have proved a boon to suffering humanity this week. One need not sigh for the open air gardens of New York so long as Manager Ellis continues the "pops." While those outside were vainly looking for a breath of air, inside Music Hall it was delightfully cool. Then, Mr. Adamowski gives the public such delightful programmes of music. They seem to suit all tastes; certainly they please everyone who attends. Besides one does not need to go out between the acts. He can "see the man" without leaving his seat, and he will enjoy the music all the more for having seen him. The "pops" end with this month, so but few opportunities remain of enjoying them.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

THURSDAY, JUNE 23, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

The music of the popular operas of Sir Arthur Sullivan will be the leading feature of the concert at Music Hall this evening. Selections will be played from "Patience," "Pirates of Penzance," "Pinafore," "Mikado" and the "Gondoliers," also one or two of the short orchestral pieces by the same composer. The programme also includes the march "Celebre," Lachner, Hungarian Rhapsody No 2. Liszt, and waltzes by Strauss, Lanner and Waldteufel.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 176.

FRIDAY, JUNE 24, 1892.

HARVARD AT THE PROMENADES.

Young Harvard had an outing at the promenades last evening, the boys taking possession of the corner of the stage at about 10 o'clock, and singing "Fair Harvard" to the improvised accompaniment of the orchestra. Then they cheered, in their own "rah" style, everybody who helped in the day's victory, and wound up with a special effort in behalf of Adamowski, the conductor. It was a great night for Harvard.

6

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

PROMENADE CONCERTS

SEASON 1892.

Monday Evening, June 6.

ADMIT ONE. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

RETAIN THIS CHECK

EVE. JUNE 6.

One Chair.

TABLE.

6

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

PROMENADE CONCERTS

SEASON 1892.

Monday Evening, June 6.

ADMIT ONE. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

RETAIN THIS CHECK

EVE. JUNE 6

FIRST BALCONY.

L 601

00A 842

MUSIC HALL

Promenade Concerts

SEASON 1892.

ADMIT ONE.

C. A. Ellis

MANAGER.

SEASON 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

COMPLIMENTARY.

Admit and one.

POSITIVELY NOT TRANSFERABLE.

Manager.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 19.

The season of Promenade Concerts at Music Hall is already half over but the interest in these popular entertainments seems to be still on the increase. The audiences never before have been so large or so fashionable and the performances were never so meritorious. The "Composers' Nights" which proved so popular last season will be inaugurated tomorrow evening when Offenbach's music will be the leading feature of the programme. Selections will be played from "La Grande Duchesse," "La Fille du Tambour Major," "Les Brigands," "La Belle Helene" and "Orpheus." Other numbers of the programme are the Prelude "Lohengrin," Wagner; Ballet Music "Henry VIII," Saint-Saens; "Loin du Bal," Gillet and waltzes by Strauss and Lanner. The concerts will be continued three weeks longer.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 171.

SUNDAY, JUNE 19, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Summer Season Entertainments in Ample Supply.

Final "Iolanthe" Performances This Week—The Music Hall Promenades in Great Favor—"Puritania" Popular at the Tremont—The City Concerts—Today's Programme—Notes.

The record made by the Music Hall promenade concerts of the week just ended, the third of the season, is alike gratifying to Manager Ellis, Director Adamowski and those who realize the value of these summer night attractions to the city in the way of affording an entertainment suited to the tastes of a constantly increasing public.

The musical programmes offered nightly by Director Adamowski are arranged with rare skill, and show that he takes a most liberal view of the taste of the patrons of the promenades, all classes of compositions finding recognition in the selections made.

The season continues only three weeks longer, the summer engagements of many of the leading members of the orchestra making it impossible to continue the promenades beyond the 9th of next month. During the remaining weeks many novelties will have a hearing, and special features will be arranged to add to the interest of the concerts.

Tomorrow evening the first of the composers' nights is announced, when prominence will be given to the compositions of Offenbach, and on Thursday evening next Sir Arthur Sullivan's music will be made a feature in the same way.

The programme for tomorrow evening is as follows:

March, "La Prophete"	Meyerbeer
Selection, "La Fille du Tambour-Major"	Offenbach
Waltz, "Artists' Life"	Strauss
Selection, "Brigands"	Offenbach
Prelude, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Barcarolle, from 'Le Comte d'Hoffman"	Offenbach
Ballet music, "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
"Offenbachiana"	Conradi
Overture, "Orpheus"	Offenbach
Waltz, "Pesther"	Lanner
"Loin du Bal"	Gillet
"Persian March"	Strauss

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, JUNE 20, 1892.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

To-night will be the first of the "composers' nights" at Music Hall, and the programme will include selections from the operettas of Offenbach. Thursday evening will be devoted largely to Arthur Sullivan. The concerts will be continued three weeks longer. The programme for this evening is as follows:

March, "Le Prophete"	Meyerbeer
Selection, "La Fille du Tambour Major"	Offenbach
Waltz, "Artist Life"	Strauss
Selection, "Les Brigands"	Offenbach
Prelude, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Baracole, "Le Conte Hoffman"	Strauss
Ballet music, "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
"Offenbachiana"	Conradi
Overture, "Orpheus"	Offenbach
"Loin du Bal"	Gillet
Waltz, "Pesther"	Lanner
March, "Boulanger"	Kral

THE BOSTON BUDGET

BOSTON, JUNE 19, 1892.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall are more popular than ever, and the audiences every night are large and appreciative. Mr. T. Adamowski is growing in favor as a conductor, and under his skilful leadership the superb orchestra is doing excellent work. The stay-at-homes may well congratulate themselves on having something in these concerts that the dwellers in the mountains and at the seaside have to do without.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

SATURDAY JUNE 11.

Fred Comee, of the Music Hall staff, got off a very good thing the other day. Speaking of Gericke's just announced marriage to Miss Flamm, he said: "Bright man, Gericke. Really quite a Flam-beau, you know!" And then they all wept, and Fred had to order beer to console them.

* * * * *

I dropped into Music Hall last night and saw a number of familiar faces. Mr. and Mrs. Ned Going, Miss Helen McKay and Miss Mabel Going were among those in the balcony, while at the tables were Mr. Goodspeed, treasurer of the West End R.R., with a party, Dr. and Mrs. Frank Watson, R. G. Hardie and his beautiful wife, Miss Josephine Jenkins, Mrs. Philip Hale, Ben Woolf and others. One large party consisted of Miss Belle Armstrong, Mrs. Sutherland, Mary Shaw, the actress, her sister, Mrs. Ingersoll of rainy day dress fame, Mrs. Ward Tenney, Mrs. Henry Cram, Miss Brazier, Marie Burress of the Museum and Dr. Vesper.

* * * * *

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

Another week of ample patronage, capital programmes, brilliant playing, excellent table service, and therefore general satisfaction. Mr. Adamowski justifies more and more his right to the place he occupies and his directing is open to criticism in only one respect—that he does not quite catch the elastic swing and the occasional hesitating poise of the waltz. But these, indeed, no home conductor but Mr. Neuendorff has put into the music of Gung'l and Strauss. The Music Hall has been comfortable on even the hottest nights of the week, being open on all sides to so many sunless little courts and having so strong an upward draught all the time. The attendance has included many fashionable groups at the tables and hosts of music-lovers in the balconies.

The Boston Commercial.

SATURDAY, JUNE 18, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

No more cooler place in town exists than the MUSIC HALL, which is nightly filled with select audiences. The music presented at these concerts is the best, all the programmes being made up of bright selections to suit all tastes. The concerts are given each evening from 8 to 11 o'clock.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JUNE 19, 1892.

Music Hall Promenades.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall seem to grow in favor as the season progresses, and neither the weather nor counter attractions affect the uniformly large attendance at these charming entertainments.

The "Composers' Nights," which proved so popular last season, will be inaugurated tomorrow evening, when Offenbach's music will be the leading feature of the programme.

On Thursday selections from the operas of Sir Arthur Sullivan will be given prominence. The concerts will be continued three weeks longer. Mr. Adamowski's programme for tomorrow evening is as follows:

March, "Le Prophete"	Meyerbeer
Selection, "La Fille du Tambour Major"	Offenbach
Waltz, "Artist Life"	Strauss
Selection, "Les Brigands"	Offenbach
Prelude, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Barcarole, "Le Conte Hoffman"	Strauss
Ballet music, "Henry VIII"	Saint-Saens
"Offenbachiana"	Conradi
Overture, "Orpheus"	Offenbach
"Lion du Bal"	Gillet
Waltz, "Pesther"	Lanner
March, "Boulanger"	Kral

—Mr. Adamowski and his men hold their own valiantly against the attractions of light opera and the Arena Garden, and each night the tables at Music Hall have held a goodly number of the society set not yet out of Boston for the summer. Mr. Adamowski will spend the half of his vacation left him after the concerts in Europe.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, JUNE 13, 1892.

THE PROMENADE CONCERT.

No more attractive entertainment could be devised for the summer months than that provided by the Music Hall Promenade Concerts. The excellence of the performances, the care taken for the comfort of patrons and the exceedingly reasonable scale of prices serve to fill the great hall each evening.

The following programme will be given tonight under direction of Mr. T. Adamowski:

March, "Juanita"	Suppe
Overture, "Zampa"	Herold
Waltz, "Seid umschlungen Millionen"	Joh. Strauss
Selection, "Brigands"	Offenbach
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Second Suite, "L'Arlesienne"	Bizet
Loin Du Bal	Gillet
Selection from "Robin Hood"	De Koven
Overture, "Sphinx"	Thompson
Polka "Unparteische Kritik"	Strauss
Waltz, "Artist Life"	Strauss
March, "Teufels"	Suppe

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR

VOL. XCI., NO. 164.

SUNDAY, JUNE 12, 1892.

THE PROMENADES A SUCCESS.

The Music Hall promenades have never made such a brilliant record as during the two weeks of the present season which ended last evening, the attendance having been largely in excess over that of any corresponding period of either of the earlier seasons in the history of these delightful summer entertainments.

Without doubt the growing tendency of the amusement public to enter into this class of entertainments with greater freedom explains much of the increased popularity of the promenades, but the favor with which Director Adamowski is regarded by the patrons is also a large factor in the present season's success.

Fashion, that indefinite influence that makes and mars so many amusement enterprises, has also set its seal of approval upon these concerts in the most emphatic manner this season and "people with names" crowd the tables at every concert.

This popularity of the promenades has been honestly won by Manager Ellis, to whose indefatigable labors in the maintenance of the high social and artistic standard of these concerts all praise is due. The following is Monday evening's programme:

March, "Juanita"	Suppe
Overture, "Zampa"	Herold
Waltz, "Seid umschlungen Millionen"	Strauss
Selection, "The Brigands"	Offenbach
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Suite II., "L'Arlesienne," three movements	Bizet
Lion Du Bal	Gillet
Selection, "Robin Hood"	De Koven
Overture, "Sphinx"	Thompson
Polka, "Unparteische Kritik"	Strauss
Waltz, "Artist Life"	Strauss
Teufel's march	Suppe

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JUNE 12, 1892.

Music Hall Promenades.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall are attracting greater audiences than in any previous season, and the patronage is of the best class. The floor space available is not equal to the demand for tables, and the supply is early exhausted each evening.

A new ventilating apparatus has been provided, which ensures a comfortable temperature even on the hottest nights, and keeps the hall free of tobacco smoke. Mr. Adamowski displays rare skill in handling his orchestra and is entitled to credit for his excellent judgment in arranging the programmes.

The concerts will continue four weeks longer. The programme for tomorrow evening is as follows:

March, Juanita	Suppe
Overture, Zampa	Herold
Waltz, "Seid umschlungen Millionen	Strauss
Selection, The Brigands	Offenbach
Overture, Rienzi	Wagner
Suite II., L'Arlesienne	Bizet
Loin du Bal	Gillet
Selection, Robin Hood	De Koven
Overture, Sphinx (Composed for the Hasty Pudding Society of Harvard College, and specially arranged for full orchestra for the promenade concerts.)	Thompson
Polka, Unparteische Kritik	Strauss
Waltz, Artist Life	Strauss
Teufel's march	Suppe

—The presence of Mrs. J. L. Gardner is much missed at the Pops this season. Last year during June, while she was at the Brookline estate, she drove in with a party of friends almost every night, having the same table reserved for her each evening and was the centre of the society clientele.

Boston Post,

TUESDAY MORNING, JUNE 14, 1892.

Mr. Adamowski's admirable programmes of popular music at the Music Hall promenades are nightly giving delight to very large audiences. The following bill is announced for this evening:

March, "Prophet"	Meyerbeer
Overture, "Rip Van Winkle"	Chadwick
Waltz, "Sounds from the Vienna Woods"	Strauss
Selection, "Chimes of Normandy"	Planquotte
Finale, Act III., "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Overture, "Ruy Blas"	Mendelssohn
Ave Maria	Gounod
Ballet music from "Ritter Pasman"	Strauss
Selection, "Pirates of Penzance"	Sullivan
Waltz, "La Vague"	Metra
Polka, "Enthusiasm"	Mueller
Persian March	Strauss

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1892.

The Promenade Concerts at the Music Hall will be started on their third week on Monday night. All that is musically necessary to make these entertainments thoroughly enjoyable is supplied lavishly, but judiciously, and with a master hand, that of Mr. T. Adamowski to direct it all. The performance for tonight includes familiar selections from Wagner, Millocker and Sullivan, waltzes and a polka by Strauss, Suppe's "Poet and Peasant Overture," Saint Saëne's ballet music from "Henry VIII.," and works by Schumann and Litolff.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 12.

Music Notes.

The Promenade Concerts at Music Hall are on the top wave of success and are attracting the patronage of the best class of amusement seekers. The audiences during the past week have been uniformly large and appreciative. Mr. Adamowski is entitled to great credit for the manner in which he handles his orchestra and the excellent judgment he displays in the arrangement of the programmes. A new ventilating apparatus has been provided which ensures a comfortable temperature and keeps the hall free from tobacco smoke. The concerts will continue four weeks longer. The programme for to-morrow evening is as follows: March, "Juanita," Suppe; overture, "Zampa," Herold; waltz, "Seid umschlungen Millionen," Strauss; selection, "The Brigands," Offenbach; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner; Suite II., "L'Arlesienne," Bizet—(a) Pastorale, (b) Minuet, (c) Farandole; „Loin du Bal," Gillet; selection, "Robin Hood," De Koven; overture, "Sphinx," Thompson; polka, "Unparteische Kritik," Strauss; waltz, "Artist Life," Strauss; Tuefel's March, Suppe.

THE SOUTH BOSTON NEWS.

Pop Concerts.—The season of promenade concerts at Music Hall is thus far proving to be most successful, and the programmes are all that can be wished in the way of variety and lightness. By putting the entire responsibility of the musical portion of these entertainments upon Mr. T. Adamowski, the management has acted judiciously, as he has the peculiar ability to make these amusements most popular. For the coming week Mr. Adamowski has arranged a capital list of programmes, in which the light and gay classes of compositions are placed in strong contrast with others of the more classical schools. During the week large numbers were in attendance, and judging from the hearty encores given, joy must have reigned supreme. Kind and thoughtful attendants serve refreshments to satisfy the wants of the "inner man," and on the whole no pleasanter evening could be passed than listening to the delightful strains of music from this orchestra of 50. Admission tickets 25 cents, reserved seats on floor or balcony 50 cents. Concert from 8 to 11 each evening.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JUNE 12, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

The season of Music hall "Pops" is already under full headway, the attendance never having been larger than during the present season.

The programmes arranged by Mr. Adamowski are excellent and please all. The audiences include many of Boston's best-known people nightly. Everything for the delight and comfort of patrons is admirably attended to by Mr. Ellis.

At five o'clock yesterday every reserved seat for last evening's concert was sold. Young ladies and gentlemen who were willing to pay any price could not secure one. It is wise to secure seats considerably in advance—a good plan for all to follow.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 12, 1892.

MUSIC NOTES.

The following programme will be performed at the Popular concert, Music Hall, tomorrow evening: March, "Juanita," Suppe; overture, "Zampa," Herold; waltz, "Seid umschlungen Millionen," Strauss; selection, "The Brigands," Offenbach; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner; suite II., "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; loin du bal, Gillet; selection, "Robin Hood," De Koven; overture, "Sphinx," Thompson (composed for the Hasty Pudding Society of Harvard College, and specially arranged for full orchestra for the promenade concerts); polka, "Unparteische Kritik," Strauss; waltz, "Artist Life," Strauss; Teufel's march, Suppe.

Boston Musical Herald.

A Monthly Music-Review.

GEORGE H. WILSON, Editor and Publisher.

BOSTON, JUNE, 1892.

It is pleasant to be able to add at the last moment as a postscript a word or two regarding the opening of the six weeks' season of "Popular Concerts" at the Music Hall. The first "Pop," signalized by the opening of many bottles, took place on the last evening of May. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Timothée Adamowski, who, as last year, alternates with Mr. Gruenberg, number about fifty musicians, mostly from the Symphony orchestra. The program consisted of an admirable mélange of grave and gay beginning with Meyerbeer's "Kronungsmarsch" and ending with a Suppé march. Among the novelties were Johann Strauss's "Kaiser" Waltzes which met with instant and deserved recognition, a "Scherzo walz and Malagueña" by Moszkowski, given for the first time in America, and selections from the "Cavalleria Rusticana." The Malagueña was especially successful, having a brilliant melody and a most entrancing swing. Mr. Adamowski very properly stood out for comparative quiet and obtained it so that in the performance of Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia" played as a solo by Mr. Otto Roth with chorus taken by all the violins standing the pianissimo effects were not lost. The work of the orchestra was for the most part very commendable. The house was fairly packed, even the second balcony was filled and the floor was thronged by a happy but perfectly orderly audience, responsive to the lightest and the best—an ideal audience for this delightful institution.

OLD SERIES, VOL. 39, } No. 24.
NEW SERIES, VOL. 6. }

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

The program for tonight's "pop" is especially strong, opening with the march from Tannhauser, Wagner and Strauss' compositions predominating. Never have the concerts been as popular as now, or as well attended. They will continue for some weeks longer, and if you have a spare evening to spend enjoyably and in a cool place, you can find it at Music Hall.

Boston society has pretty equally divided its time during the last week between the promenade concerts, the Hollis Street Theater, the Tremont and the circus, all of which places have been well patronized despite the warmth of the weather. Music Hall still continues to be the point of attraction, and the young woman who does not receive invitations for at least three evenings of the week is an object of commiseration. There is a perceptible lack of elaborate dressing this year, a strong preference being shown for plain street attire. Enjoyment, pure and simple, is the rule of the evening. In making up the daily programs Mr. Adamowski has been particularly courteous in regard to requests for favorite numbers, and the tastes and wishes of the audience have been consulted in every way. Every evening finds the corridors filled with people who are unable to secure seats, but who would rather stand two hours or more than miss the music. An elegant looking lady with attendant cavalier was heard to remark last Tuesday evening that she had been over the world and had listened to all the famous orchestras but had heard nothing which equalled the performance of "Largo" that evening.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

The new season of the Promenades at Music Hall has begun splendidly, and already one hears regrets from all quarters that their term is not likely to be extended beyond the six weeks first provided for. Certainly the attendance never has been so large, both down stairs and in the balconies, and the bulk of the people evidently are not present merely to hear themselves talk, to smoke a littttle and take a mouthful of refreshment now and then. Mr. Adamowski's programmes are excellent, he has clear ideas as to the effects he wants to produce, his men support him faithfully, and he therefore gets capital results, suiting each selection with its proper manner and spirits. The audiences are, as in every previous season, composed of excellent material, the price of admission, the keen watchfulness of the management and the very atmosphere of the place all combining to keep undesirable people away. On many nights, too, the company is distinctly a fashionable one, and a long list of society names might be jotted down after a hasty survey of the tables.

The Boston Commercial

SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The attendance at these popular entertainments has been very large throughout the week. The varied programmes give great satisfaction, and the excellent manner in which these concerts are managed give genuine pleasure to all. During the season much new music will be given.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, JUNE 13, 1892.

THE PROMENADE CONCERT.

No more attractive entertainment could be devised for the summer months than that provided by the Music Hall Promenade Concerts. The excellence of the performances, the care taken for the comfort of patrons and the exceedingly reasonable scale of prices serve to fill the great hall each evening.

The following programme will be given tonight under direction of Mr. T. Adamowski:

March, "Juanita"	Suppe
Overture, "Zampa"	Herold
Waltz, "Seid umschlungen Millionen"	Joh. Strauss
Selection, "Brigands"	Offenbach
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Second Suite, "L'Arlesienne"	Bizet
Loin Du Bal	Gillet
Selection from "Robin Hood"	De Koven
Overture, "Sphinx"	Thompson
Polka "Unparteische Kritik"	Strauss
Waltz, "Artist Life"	Strauss
March, "Teufels"	Suppe

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 164.

SUNDAY, JUNE 12, 1892.

THE PROMENADES A SUCCESS.

The Music Hall promenades have never made such a brilliant record as during the two weeks of the present season which ended last evening, the attendance having been largely in excess over that of any corresponding period of either of the earlier seasons in the history of these delightful summer entertainments.

Without doubt the growing tendency of the amusement public to enter into this class of entertainments with greater freedom explains much of the increased popularity of the promenades, but the favor with which Director Adamowski is regarded by the patrons is also a large factor in the present season's success.

Fashion, that indefinite influence that makes and mars so many amusement enterprises, has also set its seal of approval upon these concerts in the most emphatic manner this season and "people with names" crowd the tables at every concert.

This popularity of the promenades has been honestly won by Manager Ellis, to whose indefatigable labors in the maintenance of the high social and artistic standard of these concerts all praise is due. The following is Monday evening's programme:

March, "Juanita"	Suppe
Overture, "Zampa"	Herold
Waltz, "Seid umschlungen Millionen"	Strauss
Selection, "The Brigands"	Offenbach
Overture, "Rienzi"	Wagner
Suite II., "L'Arlesienne," three movements	Bizet
Lion Du Bal	Gillet
Selection, "Robin Hood"	De Koven
Overture, "Sphinx"	Thompson
Polka, "Unparteische Kritik"	Strauss
Waltz, "Artist Life"	Strauss
Teufel's march	Suppe

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JUNE 12, 1892.

Music Hall Promenades.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall are attracting greater audiences than in any previous season, and the patronage is of the best class. The floor space available is not equal to the demand for tables, and the supply is early exhausted each evening.

A new ventilating apparatus has been provided, which ensures a comfortable temperature even on the hottest nights, and keeps the hall free of tobacco smoke. Mr. Adamowski displays rare skill in handling his orchestra and is entitled to credit for his excellent judgment in arranging the programmes.

The concerts will continue four weeks longer. The programme for tomorrow evening is as follows:

March, Juanita	Suppe
Overture, Zampa	Herold
Waltz, "Seid umschlungen Millionen	Strauss
Selection, The Brigands	Offenbach
Overture, Rienzi	Wagner
Suite II., L'Arlesienne	Bizet
Loin du Bal	Gillet
Selection, Robin Hood	De Koven
Overture, Sphinx	Thompson
(Composed for the Hasty Pudding Society of Harvard College, and specially arranged for full orchestra for the promenade concerts.)
Polka, Unparteische Kritik	Strauss
Waltz, Artist Life	Strauss
Teufel's march	Suppe

—The presence of Mrs. J. L. Gardner is much missed at the Pops this season. Last year during June, while she was at the Brookline estate, she drove in with a party of friends almost every night, having the same table reserved for her each evening and was the centre of the society clientele.

Boston Post,

TUESDAY MORNING, JUNE 14, 1892.

Mr. Adamowski's admirable programmes of popular music at the Music Hall promenades are nightly giving delight to very large audiences. The following bill is announced for this evening:

March, "Prophet"	Meyerbeer
Overture, "Rip Van Winkle"	Chadwick
Waltz, "Sounds from the Vienna Woods"	Strauss
Selection, "Chimes of Normandy"	Planquette
Finale, Act III., "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Overture, "Ruy Blas"	Mendelssohn
Ave Maria	Gounod
Ballet music from "Ritter Pasman"	Strauss
Selection, "Pirates of Penzance"	Sullivan
Waltz, "La Vague"	Metra
Polka, "Enthusiasm"	Mueller
Persian March	Strauss

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1892.

The Promenade Concerts at the Music Hall will be started on their third week on Monday night. All that is musically necessary to make these entertainments thoroughly enjoyable is supplied lavishly, but judiciously, and with a master hand, that of Mr. T. Adamowski to direct it all. The performance for tonight includes familiar selections from Wagner, Millocker and Sullivan, waltzes and a polka by Strauss, Suppe's "Poet and Peasant Overture," Saint Saëne's ballet music from "Henry VIII.," and works by Schumann and Litolff.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 12.

Music Notes.

The Promenade Concerts at Music Hall are on the top wave of success and are attracting the patronage of the best class of amusement seekers. The audiences during the past week have been uniformly large and appreciative. Mr. Adamowski is entitled to great credit for the manner in which he handles his orchestra and the excellent judgment he displays in the arrangement of the programmes. A new ventilating apparatus has been provided which ensures a comfortable temperature and keeps the hall free from tobacco smoke. The concerts will continue four weeks longer. The programme for to-morrow evening is as follows: March, "Juanita," Suppe; overture, "Zampa," Herold; waltz, "Seid umschlungen Millionen," Strauss; selection, "The Brigands," Offenbach; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner; Suite II., "L'Arlesienne," Bizet—(a) Pastorale, (b) Minuet, (c) Farandole; „Loin du Bal," Gillet; selection, "Robin Hood," De Koven; overture, "Sphinx," Thompson; polka, "Unparteische Kritik," Strauss; waltz, "Artist Life," Strauss; Tuefel's March, Suppe.

THE SOUTH BOSTON NEWS.

Pop Concerts. — The season of promenade concerts at Music Hall is thus far proving to be most successful, and the programmes are all that can be wished in the way of variety and lightness. By putting the entire responsibility of the musical portion of these entertainments upon Mr. T. Adamowski, the management has acted judiciously, as he has the peculiar ability to make these amusements most popular. For the coming week Mr. Adamowski has arranged a capital list of programmes, in which the light and gay classes of compositions are placed in strong contrast with others of the more classical schools. During the week large numbers were in attendance, and judging from the hearty encores given, joy must have reigned supreme. Kind and thoughtful attendants serve refreshments to satisfy the wants of the "inner man," and on the whole no pleasanter evening could be passed than listening to the delightful strains of music from this orchestra of 50. Admission tickets 25 cents, reserved seats on floor or balcony 50 cents. Concert from 8 to 11 each evening.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JUNE 12, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

The season of Music hall "Pops" is already under full headway, the attendance never having been larger than during the present season.

The programmes arranged by Mr. Adamowski are excellent and please all. The audiences include many of Boston's best-known people nightly. Everything for the delight and comfort of patrons is admirably attended to by Mr. Ellis.

At five o'clock yesterday every reserved seat for last evening's concert was sold. Young ladies and gentlemen who were willing to pay any price could not secure one. It is wise to secure seats considerably in advance—a good plan for all to follow.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 12, 1892.

MUSIC NOTES.

The following programme will be performed at the Popular concert, Music Hall, tomorrow evening: March, "Juanita," Suppe; overture, "Zampa," Herold; waltz, "Seid umschlungen Millionen," Strauss; selection, "The Brigands," Offenbach; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner; suite II., "L'Arlesienne," Bizet; loin du bal, Gillet; selection, "Robin Hood," De Koven; overture, "Sphinx," Thompson (composed for the Hasty Pudding Society of Harvard College, and specially arranged for full orchestra for the promenade concerts); polka, "Unparteische Kritik," Strauss; waltz, "Artist Life," Strauss; Teufel's march, Suppe.

Boston Musical Herald.

A Monthly Music-Review.

GEORGE H. WILSON, Editor and Publisher.

BOSTON, JUNE, 1892.

It is pleasant to be able to add at the last moment as a postscript a word or two regarding the opening of the six weeks' season of "Popular Concerts" at the Music Hall. The first "Pop," signalized by the opening of many bottles, took place on the last evening of May. The orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Timothée Adamowski, who, as last year, alternates with Mr. Gruenberg, number about fifty musicians, mostly from the Symphony orchestra. The program consisted of an admirable mélange of grave and gay beginning with Meyerbeer's "Kronungsmarsch" and ending with a Suppé march. Among the novelties were Johann Strauss's "Kaiser" Waltzes which met with instant and deserved recognition, a "Scherzo walz and Malagueña" by Moszkowski, given for the first time in America, and selections from the "Cavalleria Rusticana." The Malagueña was especially successful, having a brilliant melody and a most entrancing swing. Mr. Adamowski very properly stood out for comparative quiet and obtained it so that in the performance of Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia" played as a solo by Mr. Otto Roth with chorus taken by all the violins standing the pianissimo effects were not lost. The work of the orchestra was for the most part very commendable. The house was fairly packed, even the second balcony was filled and the floor was thronged by a happy but perfectly orderly audience, responsive to the lightest and the best—an ideal audience for this delightful institution.

OLD SERIES, VOL. 39, }
NEW SERIES, VOL. 6. } No. 24.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

The program for tonight's "pop" is especially strong, opening with the march from Tannhauser, Wagner and Strauss' compositions predominating. Never have the concerts been as popular as now, or as well attended. They will continue for some weeks longer, and if you have a spare evening to spend enjoyably and in a cool place, you can find it at Music Hall.

Boston society has pretty equally divided its time during the last week between the promenade concerts, the Hollis Street Theater, the Tremont and the circus, all of which places have been well patronized despite the warmth of the weather. Music Hall still continues to be the point of attraction, and the young woman who does not receive invitations for at least three evenings of the week is an object of commiseration. There is a perceptible lack of elaborate dressing this year, a strong preference being shown for plain street attire. Enjoyment, pure and simple, is the rule of the evening. In making up the daily programs Mr. Adamowski has been particularly courteous in regard to requests for favorite numbers, and the tastes and wishes of the audience have been consulted in every way. Every evening finds the corridors filled with people who are unable to secure seats, but who would rather stand two hours or more than miss the music. An elegant looking lady with attendant cavalier was heard to remark last Tuesday evening that she had been over the world and had listened to all the famous orchestras but had heard nothing which equalled the performance of "Largo" that evening.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

The new season of the Promenades at Music Hall has begun splendidly, and already one hears regrets from all quarters that their term is not likely to be extended beyond the six weeks first provided for. Certainly the attendance never has been so large, both down stairs and in the balconies, and the bulk of the people evidently are not present merely to hear themselves talk, to smoke a litttle and take a mouthful of refreshment now and then. Mr. Adamowski's programmes are excellent, he has clear ideas as to the effects he wants to produce, his men support him faithfully, and he therefore gets capital results, suiting each selection with its proper manner and spirits. The audiences are, as in every previous season, composed of excellent material, the price of admission, the keen watchfulness of the management and the very atmosphere of the place all combining to keep undesirable people away. On many nights, too, the company is distinctly a fashionable one, and a long list of society names might be jotted down after a hasty survey of the tables.

The Boston Commercial

SATURDAY, JUNE 11, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The attendance at these popular entertainments has been very large throughout the week. The varied programmes give great satisfaction, and the excellent manner in which these concerts are managed give genuine pleasure to all. During the season much new music will be given.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JUNE 5, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The Music hall promenade concerts, more familiarly known as the "Pops," opened for the seventh season last Tuesday evening, under the management of Mr. Charles A. Ellis.

Of course they are a "go." No one doubted it. In fact, they are tremendously so. The crowd on the opening evening was great, and during the week the hall has contained many hundreds of happy pleasure-seekers.

Indeed, these concerts are an "institution,"—worthy of patronage in general, and in particular. In general, because it is a luxury and a benefit for the thousands who know not what to do of an evening, whose purses may be more thin than corpulent, to have a place to which they can turn and at slight expense feast the eye, the ear and the palate. And, secondly, in particular, because Mr. Ellis furnishes to the patrons of Music hall just what is most suitable for the circumstances of the case—pleasing decorations, exquisite music of a rather popular character, and refreshments dainty and appetizing.

Yes, the "Pops" are the right thing at the right place and at the right time.

Mr. T. Adamowski conducts the orchestra, which is well-chosen, with Mr. Otto Roth as leading first violin. Mr. Adamdowski adds last season's experience in the same position to great natural ability, and the result is choice programmes charmingly rendered. He has excellent control of his men; imparts strength and vigor to the more weighty compositions; and to the lighter ones gives just the touch, swing and verve which make a result entirely in harmony with the occasion and the audience.

The programme of the opening evening included Meyerbeer's Krönungsmarsch, Saint-Saëns's ballet music, two Strauss dance numbers, Gillet's "Loin du Bal" (of which the audience seems never to get enough), selections from operas by Offenbach, Wagner, Strauss's "Die Fledermaus," Mascagni and Suppé: surely variety enough to suit in some selection the most satiated musical taste. And that programme was only an example of what is given every night.

The educational value of these concerts should not be lost sight of in their social phase. The selections certainly are appreciated by music-lovers, for the applause and encores are peculiarly discriminating, and in particularly delicate passages the hush which comes over the previously chatting groups about the tables is almost startling. Music hath charms, indeed, and it does its work nightly at Music hall, as the most indifferent spectator will admit. The favorite selections are listened to with a respect which is not surpassed by a Symphony audience. The concerts may be intended, primarily, for "the people" in particular, rather than for the four hundred, but they are of a character to please the latter as well as the former.

In short, the summer promenade concerts at Music hall have entered upon another successful season, and the public have given them a welcome which will not wear out during the week-day evenings of the coming six weeks.

[illegible] 1888

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 161.

THURSDAY, JUNE 9, 1892.

Director Adamowski's popularity with the Music Hall Promenade concert patrons steadily gains, and he is making an excellent record in his direction of these summer night entertainments. This evening he announces a large lot of operatic music, including selections from "Naila," "Le Pre aux Clercs," "The Child of Fortune," "Carmen," "The Grand Duchess," and "Boccaccio," as well as two movements from the "Peer Gynt" suite, the Louis XIII. air, the popular old waltz, "Wine, Woman and Song," and other good music. The concerts are given every evening from 8 to 11 o'clock.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 5.

The season of Promenade Concerts in Music Hall, opened well and successfully on Tuesday evening, to the manifest satisfaction of the large audience that was in attendance. The same arrangements as those of last season prevailed with the addition of such improvements as past experience suggested. The service on the floor is ample, zealous to please, and polite; and nothing that could be done for the comfort, convenience and enjoyment of the public was left undone. The orchestra could not be bettered, and its performance of the admirably appropriate programme made by its conductor, Mr. T. Adamowski, was delightful in every way. These concerts afford a large share of welcome entertainment, and the excellent way in which they are managed has caused them to become not only popular, but a source of genuine pleasure that would be greatly missed during the long summer nights that they make pass so quickly and so gaily. In the course of the season much new music of a light order is to be given, and the performances will be varied now and then by soloists. The programme for to-morrow evening is as follows: March, "Tannhaeuser," Wagner; Danse Macabre, Saint-Saëns; waltz, "Artist Life," Strauss; selection, "Robin Hood," de Koven; overture, "Flying Dutchman," Wagner; suite, "Scenes Pittoresques," Massenet; Entr' Acte, "Philemon et Baucis," Gounod; selection, "Sphinx," Thompson; overture, "Orpheus," Offenbach; waltz, "Les Patineurs," Waldteufel; polka, "Tout à la Joie," Fahrbach; march, "Teufels," Suppé.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JUNE 5, 1892.

—Mr. Ellis might well look radiant Tuesday night and Mr. Adamowski's face might equally well reflect that radiance, for a larger or more socially brilliant company than that which completely filled Music Hall had rarely assembled there before. Mr. Adamowski had a splendid greeting, in which his leader, Mr. Nikisch, and his brother violinist, Mr. Kneisel, heartily joined from the audience. Seated around the tables within the railing were a crowd of society people, the evening dress of the men—which was not so much adopted last year—giving an unusually fashionable air to the surroundings. Among the many on the floor of the hall were Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Burnham, who were at a table with Mr. and Mrs. A. Lithgow Devens, Mr. and Mrs. H. D. Burnham, Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge, who had in her party her sister, Mrs. J. D. H. Luce, Mr. Luce and Dr. Sturgis Bigelow; Col. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, with Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. and Mrs. Kneisel, the Apthorps and Mr. Arthur Foote; Mr. and Mrs. Charles Wainwright with Mr. Harry Wainwright; Mr. and Mrs. Frank Zerrahn with a party; Mrs. F. S. Watson, who looked very handsome, and a tablefull of friends, the Misses Stackpole and Mr. J. L. Stackpole, Jr., Mr. Gaugengigl; Miss Francisca Lunt, with her mother and some young people; the W. F. Welds, Mr. Guy Norman, Mr. Iasigi, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Longfellow who had a party, and General Walker, while a large party of the smart set, including Mr. and Mrs. F. I. Amory, Mr. and Mrs. Grafton Minot, Mr. and Mrs. G. von L. Meyer and Mr. Wadsworth Longfellow, had seats in the front row of the balcony.

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, JUNE 6, 1892.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall provide a most enjoyable summer night's entertainment and are finding great favor with the public. A specially interesting feature of this evening's programme will be Mr. Thompson's clever music to the "Sphinx," written for the recent performances by the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College.

THE FREE LANCE

CHELSEA, MASS., THURSDAY, JUNE 2, 1892.
VOL. I. - - - - - - - - NO. 22.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The Music Hall promenade concerts opened for a season of six weeks, Tuesday evening, and during the course will present a wealth of attraction to lovers of popular music. T. T. Adamowski, who filled the position so acceptably last year, has again been chosen as conductor. The orchestra numbers fifty picked musicians. The programmes are all to be strictly popular. The arrangement of the hall is the same as in past seasons. The seats on the floor have been replaced by chairs and tables, where light refreshments are served by polite waiters. Smoking is in order upon the floor, but will not be permitted in the balconies. The hall is made additionally attractive by a plentiful display of plants and shrubs. The admission fee is 25 cents, with a limited number of reserved seats at 50 cents.

Boston Post,

TUESDAY MORNING, JUNE 7, 1892.

TONIGHT'S "POP" PROGRAMME.

The programme for tonight's promenade concert at Music Hall, under the direction of Mr. Adamowski, is as follows:

March—"Heroic"	Saint-Saens
Overture—"William Tell"	Rossini
Waltz—Waldgeister	Zach
Selection—"Madame Favart"	Offenbach
Espana	Chabrier
Largo	Hændel
Overture—"Fledermaus"	Joh. Strauss
Selection—"Madame Angot"	Lecocq
Waltz—"Blue Danube"	Joh. Strauss
Polka—"Herz Dame"	Fahrbach
March—"Fuers Vaterland"	Milloecker

The "Colonial Express," via the Shore Line and Pennsylvania railroad, is the only through day train between Boston and Washington. Its popularity is unbounded.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1892.

The summer concerts which Mr Ellis has established at Music Hall are a distinct benefaction to Boston and to all who visit Boston during the heated season. And although they are no longer a novelty, having been successfully maintained for several years, their opening for the present season deserves mention among the events of the day. By the means of these concerts, the enjoyment of high-class orchestral music is continued in Boston for the greater part of the year; the services of Mr. Otto Roth as concert-meister, Mr. T. Adamowski as conductor and the pick of the Boston Symphony players as orchestra rendering this in some sort an extension of the winter's delights and privileges.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 5, 1892.

MUSIC.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The opening night of the seventh season of the Music Hall Promenade concerts was a very brilliant and jolly occasion. The hall and stage were decorated in the customary manner with evergreens and potted plants; and tables, with the usual enclosure for reserved seats, covered the vast floor. The arrangements, under the able management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, seemed to have been brought to a high state of perfection; for the service was prompt and efficient, and on every hand were evidences of complete satisfaction on the part of the immense audience that crowded floor and balconies. In referring to the music last we have no intention of insinuating that this indispensable feature of these entertainments was unworthy of especial mention or that it received little attention. The fact that the orchestra of fifty was made up principally of symphony men and that Mr. T. Adamowski was the leader would alone be ample assurance to the contrary. Last season Mr. Adamowski proved himself to be a leader of taste, discretion and skill; and his efforts last Tuesday evening showed that he had profited well by his past experience. His first programme too, was delightfully appropriate to the occasion and in one respect was ambitious to the verge of risk. It must be said however, that the performance of the overture to "Die Meistersinger" was by no means an unworthy one; on the contrary it was played with much smoothness, brilliancy and power, in a manner which reflected credit on both conductor and men. Of the other numbers, two selections from Moszkowski's "Boabdil" were played for the first time in America; and two numbers from the ballet music of Saint-Saens's "Henry VIII," the "Kaiser" waltzes, by Johann Strauss, the overture to his operetta "Fledermaus" and the overture to Offenbach's "Orpheus" were also among those performed. The popularity of these concerts is now assured, there is no need therefore of predicting success for the present season.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 157.

SUNDAY, JUNE 5, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The season of promenade concerts at Music Hall has had a brilliant beginning, and there appears to be good reason to predict that a better financial result will attend the present series than has been known in any previous year.

The placing of the entire responsibility for the musical portion of these entertainments upon Mr. T. Adamowski has proved a wise and judicious action, for he possesses just the ability suited to make the continued popularity of the promenade concerts an assured fact.

His knowledge of programme making is an especially strong factor in gaining him the good will of such audiences as are attracted to these concerts, and his able handling of the orchestra has won him the approval of the best musicians.

For the coming week Mr. Adamowski has arranged a capital list of programmes, in which the light and gay classes of compositions are placed in strong contrast with others of the more classical schools, and, all in all, making up a series of musical evenings calculated to give enjoyment to widely varied tastes.

The concerts continue for five weeks longer, being given each week day evening from 8 to 11 o'clock.

The programmes of the Pop concerts are all that can be wished in the way of variety and lightness, but why should the audiences be called to order by Mr. Adamowski and bidden by the rap of his baton to drop their chatter and listen to the music? Is it not enough that Boston is there in brilliant numbers, to unbend, as it were, to take its beer and tobacco in good company, and yet to be rested and amused by sounds of sweet music, as Boston never can be in the winter season? Why, then, make of this easy summer pleasure a ceremony, and why treat the only-too-willing-to-listen patrons like schoolboys? It certainly speaks volumes for our love of music that these big audiences nightly demand encores, and do not talk—very much—while the orchestra is playing. The fact is, these concerts attract crowds of varied character from swelldom down or up, and that alone constitutes one of their greatest enjoyments to those patrons who like to get out of beaten tracks. In all previous seasons I have never seen a more interesting nor a more thoroughly musical gathering as showed up in Music Hall the opening night. It was a complete indorsement of the wisdom of giving popular summer concerts, and simply delightful, whether one took his music straight from the balcony or sandwiched it with beer and smoke at one of the chatty little tables on the floor.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, JUNE 5, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The Music hall promenade concerts, more familiarly known as the "Pops," opened for the seventh season last Tuesday evening, under the management of Mr. Charles A. Ellis.

Of course they are a "go." No one doubted it. In fact, they are tremendously so. The crowd on the opening evening was great, and during the week the hall has contained many hundreds of happy pleasure-seekers.

Indeed, these concerts are an "institution,"—worthy of patronage in general, and in particular. In general, because it is a luxury and a benefit for the thousands who know not what to do of an evening, whose purses may be more thin than corpulent, to have a place to which they can turn and at slight expense feast the eye, the ear and the palate. And, secondly, in particular, because Mr. Ellis furnishes to the patrons of Music hall just what is most suitable for the circumstances of the case—pleasing decorations, exquisite music of a rather popular character, and refreshments dainty and appetizing.

Yes, the "Pops" are the right thing at the right place and at the right time.

Mr. T. Adamowski conducts the orchestra, which is well-chosen, with Mr. Otto Roth as leading first violin. Mr. Adamdowski adds last season's experience in the same position to great natural ability, and the result is choice programmes charmingly rendered. He has excellent control of his men; imparts strength and vigor to the more weighty compositions; and to the lighter ones gives just the touch, swing and verve which make a result entirely in harmony with the occasion and the audience.

The programme of the opening evening included Meyerbeer's Krönungsmarsch, Saint-Saëns's ballet music, two Strauss dance numbers, Gillet's "Loin du Bal" (of which the audience seems never to get enough), selections from operas by Offenbach, Wagner, Strauss's "Die Fledermaus," Mascagni and Suppé: surely variety enough to suit in some selection the most satiated musical taste. And that programme was only an example of what is given every night.

The educational value of these concerts should not be lost sight of in their social phase. The selections certainly are appreciated by music-lovers, for the applause and encores are peculiarly discriminating, and in particularly delicate passages the hush which comes over the previously chatting groups about the tables is almost startling. Music hath charms, indeed, and it does its work nightly at Music hall, as the most indifferent spectator will admit. The favorite selections are listened to with a respect which is not surpassed by a Symphony audience. The concerts may be intended, primarily, for "the people" in particular, rather than for the four hundred, but they are of a character to please the latter as well as the former.

In short, the summer promenade concerts at Music hall have entered upon another successful season, and the public have given them a welcome which will not wear out during the week-day evenings of the coming six weeks.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 161.

THURSDAY, JUNE 9, 1892.

Director Adamowski's popularity with the Music Hall Promenade concert patrons steadily gains, and he is making an excellent record in his direction of these summer night entertainments. This evening he announces a large lot of operatic music, including selections from "Naila," "Le Pre aux Clercs," "The Child of Fortune," "Carmen," "The Grand Duchess," and "Boccaccio," as well as two movements from the "Peer Gynt" suite, the Louis XIII. air, the popular old waltz "Wine, Woman and Song," and other good music. The concerts are given every evening from 8 to 11 o'clock.

Gazette

BOSTON, SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 5.

The season of Promenade Concerts in Music Hall, opened well and successfully on Tuesday evening, to the manifest satisfaction of the large audience that was in attendance. The same arrangements as those of last season prevailed with the addition of such improvements as past experience suggested. The service on the floor is ample, zealous to please, and polite; and nothing that could be done for the comfort, convenience and enjoyment of the public was left undone. The orchestra could not be bettered, and its performance of the admirably appropriate programme made by its conductor, Mr. T. Adamowski, was delightful in every way. These concerts afford a large share of welcome entertainment, and the excellent way in which they are managed has caused them to become not only popular, but a source of genuine pleasure that would be greatly missed during the long summer nights that they make pass so quickly and so gaily. In the course of the season much new music of a light order is to be given, and the performances will be varied now and then by soloists. The programme for to-morrow evening is as follows: March, "Tannhaeuser," Wagner; Danse Macabre, Saint-Saëns; waltz, "Artist Life," Strauss; selection, "Robin Hood," de Koven; overture, "Flying Dutchman," Wagner; suite, "Scenes Pittoresques," Massenet; Entr' Acte, "Philemon et Bancis," Gounod; selection, "Sphinx," Thompson; overture, "Orpheus," Offenbach; waltz, "Les Patineurs," Waldteufel; polka, "Tout a la Joie," Fahrbach; march, "Teufels," Suppé.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JUNE 5, 1892.

—Mr. Ellis might well look radiant Tuesday night and Mr. Adamowski's face might equally well reflect that radiance, for a larger or more socially brilliant company than that which completely filled Music Hall had rarely assembled there before. Mr. Adamowski had a splendid greeting, in which his leader, Mr. Nikisch, and his brother violinist, Mr. Kneisel, heartily joined from the audience. Seated around the tables within the railing were a crowd of society people, the evening dress of the men—which was not so much adopted last year—giving an unusually fashionable air to the surroundings. Among the many on the floor of the hall were Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Burnham, who were at a table with Mr. and Mrs. A. Lithgow Devens, Mr. and Mrs. H. D. Burnham, Mrs. Henry Cabot Lodge, who had in her party her sister, Mrs. J. D. H. Luce, Mr. Luce and Dr. Sturgis Bigelow; Col. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, with Mr. and Mrs. Nikisch and Mr. and Mrs. Kneisel, the Apthorps and Mr. Arthur Foote; Mr. and Mrs. Charles Wainwright with Mr. Harry Wainwright; Mr. and Mrs. Frank Zerrahn with a party; Mrs. F. S. Watson, who looked very handsome, and a tablefull of friends, the Misses Stackpole and Mr. J. L. Stackpole, Jr., Mr. Gaugengigl; Miss Francisca Lunt, with her mother and some young people; the W. F. Welds, Mr. Guy Norman, Mr. Iasigi, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Longfellow who had a party, and General Walker, while a large party of the smart set, including Mr. and Mrs. F. I. Amory, Mr. and Mrs. Grafton Minot, Mr. and Mrs. G. von L. Meyer and Mr. Wadsworth Longfellow, had seats in the front row of the balcony.

—Novel summer dress

Boston Journal.

TEN PAGES.

MONDAY, JUNE 6, 1892.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall provide a most enjoyable summer night's entertainment and are finding great favor with the public. A specially interesting feature of this evening's programme will be Mr. Thompson's clever music to the "Sphinx," written for the recent performances by the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College.

THE FREE LANCE

CHELSEA, MASS., THURSDAY, JUNE 2, 1892.
VOL. I. - - - - - - - - NO. 22.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The Music Hall promenade concerts opened for a season of six weeks, Tuesday evening, and during the course will present a wealth of attraction to lovers of popular music. T. T. Adamowski, who filled the position so acceptably last year, has again been chosen as conductor. The orchestra numbers fifty picked musicians. The programmes are all to be strictly popular. The arrangement of the hall is the same as in past seasons. The seats on the floor have been replaced by chairs and tables, where light refreshments are served by polite waiters. Smoking is in order upon the floor, but will not be permitted in the balconies. The hall is made additionally attractive by a plentiful display of plants and shrubs. The admission fee is 25 cents, with a limited number of reserved seats at 50 cents.

Boston Post,

TUESDAY MORNING, JUNE 7, 1892.

TONIGHT'S "POP" PROGRAMME.

The programme for tonight's promenade concert at Music Hall, under the direction of Mr. Adamowski, is as follows:

March—"Heroic"	Saint-Saens
Overture—"William Tell"	Rossini
Waltz—Waldgeister	Zach
Selection—"Madame Favart"	Offenbach
Espana	Chabrier
Largo	Hændel
Overture—"Fledermaus"	Joh. Strauss
Selection—"Madame Angot"	Lecocq
Waltz—"Blue Danube"	Joh. Strauss
Polka—"Herz Dame"	Fahrbach
March—"Fuers Vaterland"	Milloecker

The "Colonial Express," via the Shore Line and Pennsylvania railroad, is the only through day train between Boston and Washington. Its popularity is unbounded.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

ESTABLISHED IN 1862.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1892.

The summer concerts which Mr Ellis has established at Music Hall are a distinct benefaction to Boston and to all who visit Boston during the heated season. And although they are no longer a novelty, having been successfully maintained for several years, their opening for the present season deserves mention among the events of the day. By the means of these concerts, the enjoyment of high-class orchestral music is continued in Boston for the greater part of the year; the services of Mr. Otto Roth as concert-meister, Mr. T. Adamowski as conductor and the pick of the Boston Symphony players as orchestra rendering this in some sort an extension of the winter's delights and privileges.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, JUNE 5, 1892.

MUSIC.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The opening night of the seventh season of the Music Hall Promenade concerts was a very brilliant and jolly occasion. The hall and stage were decorated in the customary manner with evergreens and potted plants; and tables, with the usual enclosure for reserved seats, covered the vast floor. The arrangements, under the able management of Mr. C. A. Ellis, seemed to have been brought to a high state of perfection; for the service was prompt and efficient, and on every hand were evidences of complete satisfaction on the part of the immense audience that crowded floor and balconies. In referring to the music last we have no intention of insinuating that this indispensable feature of these entertainments was unworthy of especial mention or that it received little attention. The fact that the orchestra of fifty was made up principally of symphony men and that Mr. T. Adamowski was the leader would alone be ample assurance to the contrary. Last season Mr. Adamowski proved himself to be a leader of taste, discretion and skill; and his efforts last Tuesday evening showed that he had profited well by his past experience. His first programme too, was delightfully appropriate to the occasion and in one respect was ambitious to the verge of risk. It must be said however, that the performance of the overture to "Die Meistersinger" was by no means an unworthy one; on the contrary it was played with much smoothness, brilliancy and power, in a manner which reflected credit on both conductor and men. Of the other numbers, two selections from Moszkowski's "Boabdil" were played for the first time in America; and two numbers from the ballet music of Saint-Saeus's "Henry VIII," the "Kaiser" waltzes, by Johann Strauss, the overture to his operetta "Fledermaus" and the overture to Offenbach's "Orpheus" were also among those performed. The popularity of these concerts is now assured, there is no need therefore of predicting success for the present season.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 157.

SUNDAY, JUNE 5, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The season of promenade concerts at Music Hall has had a brilliant beginning, and there appears to be good reason to predict that a better financial result will attend the present series than has been known in any previous year.

The placing of the entire responsibility for the musical portion of these entertainments upon Mr. T. Adamowski has proved a wise and judicious action, for he possesses just the ability suited to make the continued popularity of the promenade concerts an assured fact.

His knowledge of programme making is an especially strong factor in gaining him the good will of such audiences as are attracted to these concerts, and his able handling of the orchestra has won him the approval of the best musicians.

For the coming week Mr. Adamowski has arranged a capital list of programmes, in which the light and gay classes of compositions are placed in strong contrast with others of the more classical schools, and, all in all, making up a series of musical evenings calculated to give enjoyment to widely varied tastes.

The concerts continue for five weeks longer, being given each week day evening from 8 to 11 o'clock.

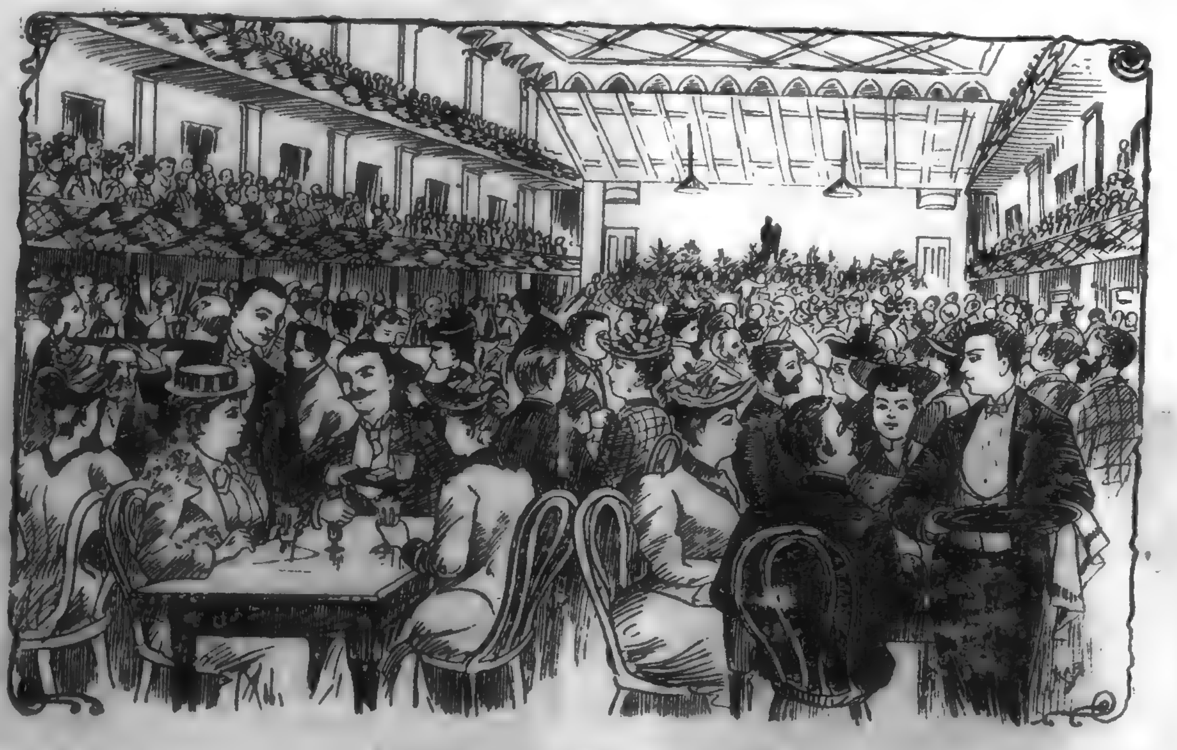
The programmes of the Pop concerts are all that can be wished in the way of variety and lightness, but why should the audiences be called to order by Mr. Adamowski and bidden by the rap of his baton to drop their chatter and listen to the music? Is it not enough that Boston is there in brilliant numbers, to unbend, as it were, to take its beer and tobacco in good company, and yet to be rested and amused by sounds of sweet music, as Boston never can be in the winter season? Why, then, make of this easy summer pleasure a ceremony, and why treat the only-too-willing-to-listen patrons like schoolboys? It certainly speaks volumes for our love of music that these big audiences nightly demand encores, and do not talk—very much—while the orchestra is playing. The fact is, these concerts attract crowds of varied character from swelldom down or up, and that alone constitutes one of their greatest enjoyments to those patrons who like to get out of beaten tracks. In all previous seasons I have never seen a more interesting nor a more thoroughly musical gathering as showed up in Music Hall the opening night. It was a complete indorsement of the wisdom of giving popular summer concerts, and simply delightful, whether one took his music straight from the balcony or sandwiched it with beer and smoke at one of the chatty little tables on the floor.

SUFFOLK ENG. CO BOSTON

MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

Boston Weekly Amusement Bulletin

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1892.



SCENE AT THE "POPS."

The seventh season of the popular Music Hall promenade concerts was inaugurated last Tuesday evening under the most favorable circumstances. A pleasing concert, under the leadership of Director Adamowski, drew together a large and fashionable audience which filled the spacious hall to its utmost capacity. There is no doubt whatever but that these concerts are becoming very popular, and each year a greater interest is taken in them. Twelve numbers were given by the orchestra and the enthusiasm with which they were received must have been very gratifying to the performers. Some of the waltzes rendered were particularly fine. The refreshments were well served, and Manager Ellis is to be congratulated on his successful efforts in opening to the public his seventh season of the delightful "Pops."

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4,

THE POPULAR CONCERTS.

The approach of summer and the general feeling of inability of serious application is betokened by the renewal of the ever welcome Music Hall popular concerts, where one can sit at ease and listen to good music while freed from the restraints of the usual orchestra chairs. These began on Tuesday evening last, and, as usual, the seats had been removed from the hall and in their places were the cozy tables and cane seated chairs so inducive to pleasant chats and a generally easy time of it. The orchestra this year which manager Ellis has secured numbers fifty excellent musicians, many of them of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and under the direction of Mr. Timothee Adamowski, whose success in the same position last year was so pronounced. Under the direction of his baton the programs have been rendered with a musicianly feeling that well suits the cultured character of the audiences. Mr. Adamowski's skill as a leader is not confined to the rendition of his programs by any means, but he is particularly happy in his selection of them. He seems to know the popular mind and the state of that mind in the warm season, and caters to it in a manner that makes these concerts most enjoyable. Light refreshments are served as usual, and the patronage this week has been of the very best quality.

Saturday Vox Populi

LOWELL, MASS., JUNE 4. 1892.

The opening of the Popular Concerts, at Music Hall, Boston, was attended by several Lowell people, and during the several weeks in which they will be continued probably many more will embrace the opportunity of listening to the charming music by the orchestra, while sipping some cooling beverage and chatting with an agreeable companion.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, JUNE 6, 1892.

The following programme will be given under Mr. Adamowski's direction at Music Hall this evening:

March, "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
Danse Macabre	Saint-Saens
Waltz, "Artist's Life"	Johann Strauss
Selection, "Robin Hood"	De Koven
Overture, "Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
Suite, "Scenes Pittoresques"	Massenet
Entr'acte, "Philemon et Baucis"	Gounod
Overture, "Sphinx"	Thompson
(Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College, and specially arranged for full orchestra for the promenade concerts.)
Overture, "Orpheus"	Offenbach
Waltz, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
Polka, "Tout a la Joie"	Fahrbach
March, "Teufels"	Suppe

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JUNE 5, 1892.

Music Hall Promenades.

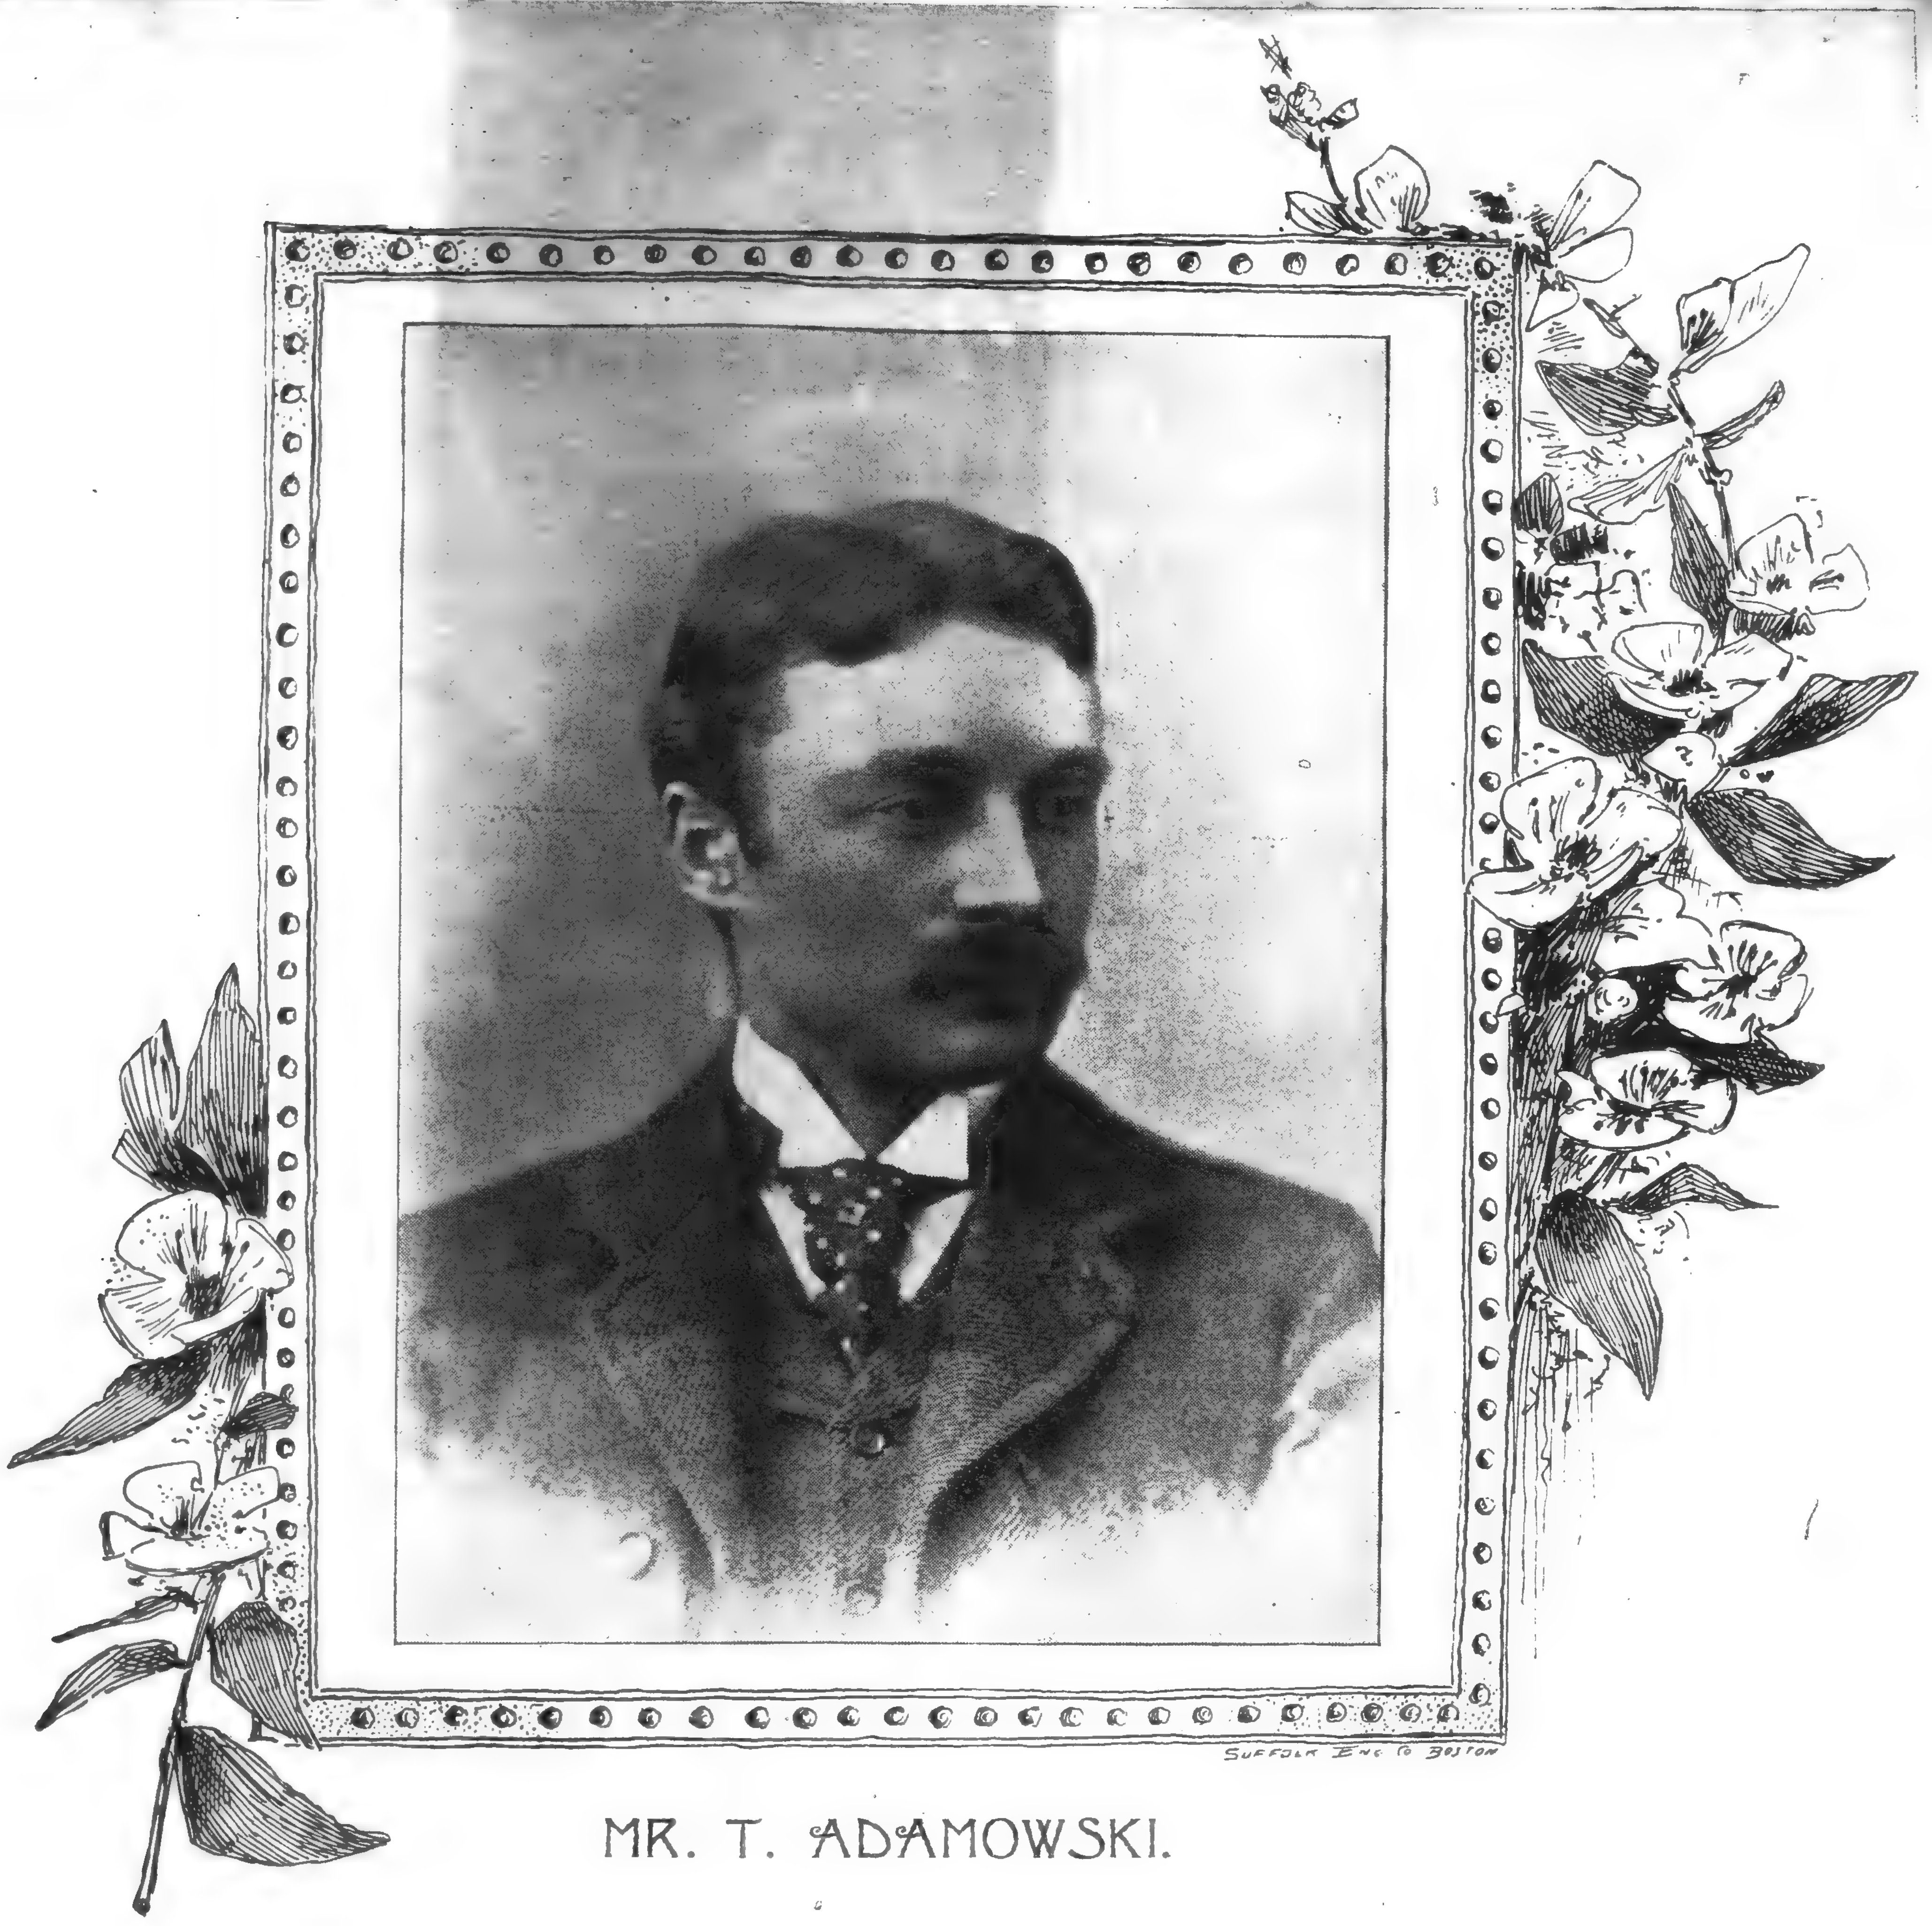
The past week has satisfactorily demonstrated the fact that the promenade concerts at Music Hall supply a form of entertainment which successfully caters to the taste of thousands of people who enjoy a combination of fine music and an excellent menu, and every evening the spacious auditorium has been filled with delighted patrons.

So popular have these "pops" become that the six weeks allotted to their continuance no doubt could be extended with very satisfactory results to the management, but as the season cannot be prolonged patrons must submit to the inevitable, and enjoy the promenades while they may.

The programme for Monday evening is as follows:

March, Tanhauser	Wagner
Danse Macabre	Saint-Saens
Waltz, Artist's Life	Joh. Strauss
Selection, Robin Hood	De Koven
Overture, Flying Dutchman	Wagner
Suite, Scenes Pittoresques	Massenet
March.
Air de Ballet.
Angelus.
Fete Boheme.
Entr'acte, Philemon et Baucis	Gounod
Overture, Sphinx	Thompson
(Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society," of Harvard College, and specially arranged for full orchestra for the promenade concerts.)
Overture, Orpheus	Offenbach
Waltz, Les Patineurs	Waldteufel
Polka, Tout a la Joie	Fahrbach
March, Teufels	Suppe

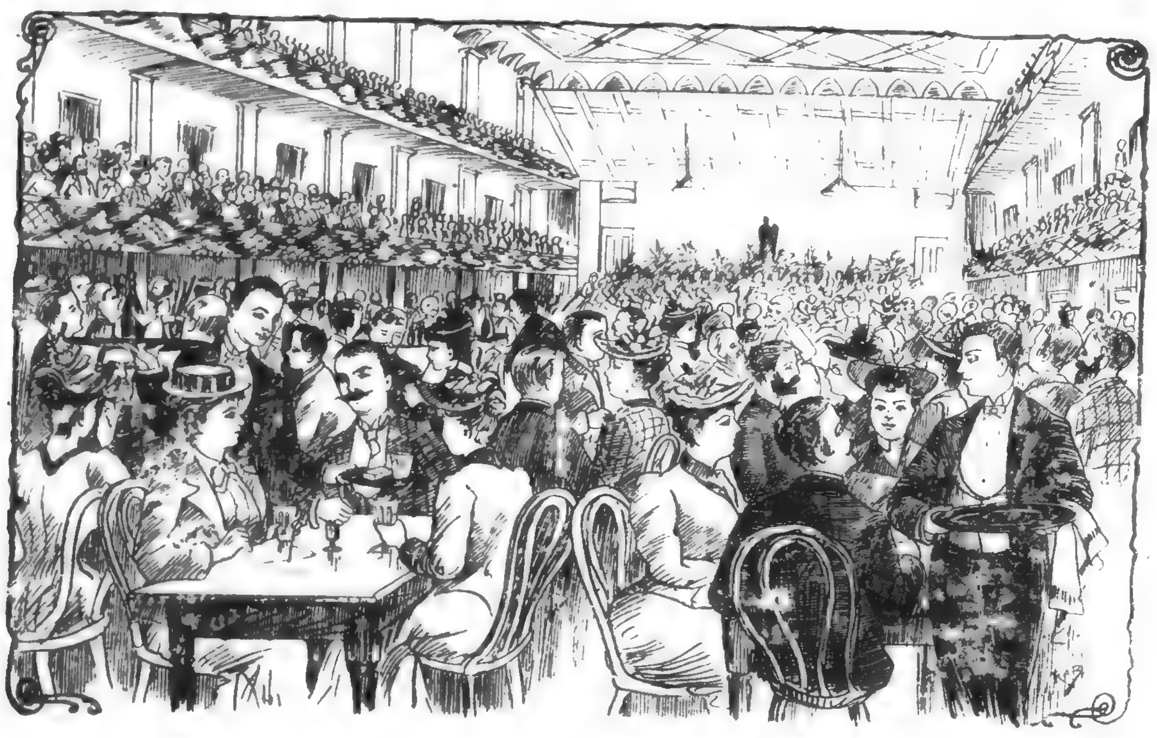
[92]



MR. T. ADAMOWSKI.

Boston Weekly Amusement Bulletin

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1892.



SCENE AT THE "POPS."

The seventh season of the popular Music Hall promenade concerts was inaugurated last Tuesday evening under the most favorable circumstances. A pleasing concert, under the leadership of Director Adamowski, drew together a large and fashionable audience which filled the spacious hall to its utmost capacity. There is no doubt whatever but that these concerts are becoming very popular, and each year a greater interest is taken in them. Twelve numbers were given by the orchestra and the enthusiasm with which they were received must have been very gratifying to the performers. Some of the waltzes rendered were particularly fine. The refreshments were well served, and Manager Ellis is to be congratulated on his successful efforts in opening to the public his seventh season of the delightful "Pops."

Saturday Vox Populi

LOWELL, MASS., JUNE 4, 1892.

The opening of the Popular Concerts, at Music Hall, Boston, was attended by several Lowell people, and during the several weeks in which they will be continued probably many more will embrace the opportunity of listening to the charming music by the orchestra, while sipping some cooling beverage and chatting with an agreeable companion.

Boston Post

MONDAY MORNING, JUNE 6, 1892.

The following programme will be given under Mr. Adamowski's direction at Music Hall this evening:

March, "Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
Danse Macabre	Saint-Saens
Waltz, "Artist's Life"	Johann Strauss
Selection, "Robin Hood"	De Koven
Overture, "Flying Dutchman"	Wagner
Suite, "Scenes Pittoresques"	Massenet
Entr'acte, "Philemon et Baucis"	Gounod
Overture, "Sphinx"	Thompson
(Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College, and specially arranged for full orchestra for the promenade concerts.)
Overture, "Orpheus"	Offenbach
Waltz, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
Polka, "Tout a la Joie"	Fahrbach
March, "Teufels"	Suppe

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4,

THE POPULAR CONCERTS.

The approach of summer and the general feeling of inability of serious application is betokened by the renewal of the ever welcome Music Hall popular concerts, where one can sit at ease and listen to good music while freed from the restraints of the usual orchestra chairs. These began on Tuesday evening last, and, as usual, the seats had been removed from the hall and in their places were the cozy tables and cane seated chairs so inducive to pleasant chats and a generally easy time of it. The orchestra this year which manager Ellis has secured numbers fifty excellent musicians, many of them of the Boston Symphony orchestra, and under the direction of Mr. Timothee Adamowski, whose success in the same position last year was so pronounced. Under the direction of his baton the programs have been rendered with a musicianly feeling that well suits the cultured character of the audiences. Mr. Adamowski's skill as a leader is not confined to the rendition of his programs by any means, but he is particularly happy in his selection of them. He seems to know the popular mind and the state of that mind in the warm season, and caters to it in a manner that makes these concerts most enjoyable. Light refreshments are served as usual, and the patronage this week has been of the very best quality.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JUNE 5, 1892.

Music Hall Promenades.

The past week has satisfactorily demonstrated the fact that the promenade concerts at Music Hall supply a form of entertainment which successfully caters to the taste of thousands of people who enjoy a combination of fine music and an excellent menu, and every evening the spacious auditorium has been filled with delighted patrons.

So popular have these "pops" become that the six weeks allotted to their continuance no doubt could be extended with very satisfactory results to the management, but as the season cannot be prolonged patrons must submit to the inevitable, and enjoy the promenades while they may.

The programme for Monday evening is as follows:

March, Tanhauser	Wagner
Danse Macabre	Saint-Saens
Waltz, Artist's Life	Joh. Strauss
Selection, Robin Hood	De Koven
Overture, Flying Dutchman	Wagner
Suite, Scenes Pittoresques	Massenet
March.
Air de Ballet.
Angelus.
Fete Boheme.
Entr'acte, Philemon et Baucis	Gounod
Overture, Sphinx	Thompson
(Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society," of Harvard College, and specially arranged for full orchestra for the promenade concerts.)
Overture, Orpheus	Offenbach
Waltz, Les Patineurs	Walteufel
Polka, Tout a la Joie	Fahrbach
March, Teufels	Suppe

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1, 1892.

The Music Hall promenade concerts—such a delightful feature of our summer season—begin on Tuesday evening next. This year Mr. Adamowski will conduct.

* * * *

The many friends of Mr. Gruenberg will regret to learn that he was compelled to decline the offer to act as associate conductor of the "Promenades," made him by Mr. Ellis, owing to certain unavoidable circumstances.

His work last season was more than satisfactory.

POST, Boston, Mass.

6/3

served, buried himself in the book which he took from his pocket.

Manager Charles A. Ellis is smiling and happy these days as he watches the people pouring into the Music Hall "Pops." Mr. Ellis says that he has been overrun with questions as to why he does not continue this favorite Boston institution through the summer. The answer is that, while they might be profitable up to the end of July, the orchestra cannot be retained for a longer period than at present unless the contract be for the entire season, as many of them make engagements at summer resorts. Their places could be filled by good musicians, but under the high standard thus far maintained, the people would only be satisfied with the best.

The Boston Commercial

SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The seventh season of the popular promenade concerts opened most auspiciously on Tuesday evening. These entertainments are a light and bright attraction for the summer and will be continued for six weeks. The programmes will be of unusual merit and will be made notable in many ways. The arrangements of these popular entertainments will continue this season under Manager Ellis' direction.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1892.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Local Announcements.

The Promenade Concerts at the Music Hall, have met with the popular success that distinguished those given in previous seasons. In both programmes and performances they have given great delight. The programmes have been most agreeably varied with familiar and new works and with occasional deviations into classic fields, while Mr. Adamowski has succeeded in securing from the fine band, organized for the concerts, most admirable results, considered on grounds of either accuracy or expression.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

SATURDAY JUNE 4.

It is said that those who now revel in the pleasures of the roof-garden at the Madison square could not tell the difference between a burlesque and a tragedy. Be this as it may, nothing approaching so absurd a remark could be made of our similar but much superior Boston institution, the Music Hall "pops." Manager Ellis is to be highly praised for putting before us 50 musicians of such skill under that prince of leaders, Adamowski. And his labor is not in vain. Even the most critical were "thrown down" (to use a street phrase), and were led to remark that it was truly remarkable that in so large an assembly, constituting so many who were presumably present for smoke and drink only, such absolute quiet and careful attention should prevail during the finest passages of music. With such programmes of delightful music rendered in so masterly a manner, the "pops" are sure to score a greater success than ever.

Boston Post,

FRIDAY MORNING, JUNE 3, 1892.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall provide a delightful summer evening's entertainment and are attracting great audiences. Adamowski announces the following programme for tonight:

Wedding March	Mendelssohn
Overture—"Mignon"	A. Thomas
Waltz—"Seid umschlungen Millionen" First time in America.	Joh. Strauss
Selection—"Romeo and Juliet"	Stasny
Overture—"Le Roy d'Ys"	Lalo
Ballet music—"Sylvia"	Delibes
Cavatina	Raff
Overture—"Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
Selection—"The pirates of Penzance"	Sullivan
Waltz—"Barcarolle"	Waldteufel
Polka mazurka—"Die Emancipirte"	Joseph Strauss
Radetzky march	Joh. Strauss

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, JUNE 3, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

Another great audience attended the promenade concert at Music Hall last evening and applauded the fine programme given under Mr. Adamowski's direction. At tonight's concert a new waltz by Joh. Strauss will be played for the first time in America. The programme also includes the "Wedding March," by Mendelssohn.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

The new season of promenade concerts at Music Hall has begun auspiciously and one feels that summer must be here at last. The heat that has been holding off so coyly came pouring in on Tuesday, when the first concert was given, and people were glad to hurry to the big hall with its open doors and windows, its tables surrounded by pleasant groups, its light, comforting refreshments, and its lively, well-played music. So far as the ordering of the room and its floor service is concerned, all goes well, of course, for Manager Ellis and his head of departments have the experience of previous seasons and the ambition to excel them. The band is all that one could ask, for the men have been chosen wisely. Mr. Roth is a strong concert-master and Mr. Adamowski has proved himself to have taste in making programmes and ability in leading them. Many new compositions are promised, and there will be frequent soloists to diversify the performances.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 156.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1892.

The Music Hall Promenade concert season has opened very successfully, the attendance this week having exceeded that of any corresponding period in the history of these summer night entertainments. Director Adamowski's programme for this evening includes selections "Raymond," "The Brigands," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "The Mikado" and "Boccaccio," the new "Kaiser" waltzes, the "Loin du Bal," "Wotan' Farewell" and "Fire Charm," "The Invitation to Dance," and other popular numbers.

Manager A. L. Southerland, who has in hand the "Iolanthe" production at the Globe Theatre on the 13th inst. as Mr.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1892.

Popular Promenades.

The attendance at the promenade concerts in Music Hall during the week must have been highly satisfactory to Manager Ellis, for the seats at the tables have been in such demand that many who wished to reserve places found it very difficult to get accommodations.

The programme for this evening is as follows:

March, Hoch Habsburg	Joh. Strauss
Overture, Raymond	A. Thomas
Waltz, Kaiser	Joh. Strauss
Overture, Les Brigands	Offenbach
Selection, Cavalleria Rusticana	Mascagni
Selection, Die Walkuere	Wagner
Hymn to St. Cecilia	Gounod
Invitation to Dance	Weber
Selection, Mikado	Sullivan
Loin du Bal	Gillet
Polka, Unparteische Kritik	Joh. Strauss
March, Boccacio	Suppe

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1, 1892.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: The Promenade Concerts.

The seventh season of the summer promenade concerts in the Music Hall opened most auspiciously last evening, under Mr. T. Adamowski's conductorship. The hall was decked out, as usual, with evergreens, and looked better and more inviting than one would have thought its dingy coloring would admit. The programme of the evening was as follows:

Krönungsmarsch	Meyerbeer
Ballet music from "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saëns
Kaiser-waltzer	Johann Strauss
Overture to "Orphée aux Enfers"	Offenbach
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg"	Wagner
Scherzo-waltz and Malaguena, "Boabdil"	Moszkowski
Hymn to St. Cecilia	Gounod
Overture to "Die Fledermaus"	Johann Strauss
Selection from "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
Loin du Bal	Gillet
Polka, "Libelle"	Johann Strauss
March, from "Boccaccio"	Suppé

An excellent programme for the purpose! It was specially interesting to note the attention with which the audience followed certain numbers, in spite of the well-known tendency of promenade concert audiences to indulge in chit chat, whether music is going on or not. Some things seemed to invite to conversation, and were heard through a general buzz of talking; others, on the contrary, were listened to with an intentness such as would have reflected the greatest credit upon a symphony concert audience. It was noticed with both surprise and pleasure that, in the midst of a particularly brilliant, not to say noisy, piece, a sudden silence of the orchestra found the hall as still as a mouse, you could have heard a pin drop; if certain tales may be believed, even our venerable Handel and Haydn Society has not always had such good luck with "The Messiah." It means a good deal when a mixed audience, many of whom are standing, and are at perfect liberty to roam about and talk, listen in absolute silence to a bit of pianissimo playing like Gillet's "Loin du Bal," and ask for it twice over again. It means perhaps even more, that you can listen to the Prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger" at a promenade concert, and hear every note of it undisturbed by the surrounding crowd. Evidently the people who go to the Promenade Concerts do not go for the beer and tobacco only.

The orchestra, with Mr. Otto Roth as leading first violin, is excellent, many members of the Symphony Orchestra being in its ranks; and some positions are worthily filled by players who have not belonged to the Symphony Orchestra for the last few years. It is impossible to name everyone who holds an important position; but it is a pleasure to say that Mr. Strasser's face was again seen (and his tone heard, too), at the first clarinet desk. The first places among the other wind players are admirably filled, the strings are capital, and the brass and percussion leave little, if anything, to be desired.

Mr. Adamowski, after his last summer's experience, has a very firm grip on the forces under his baton. In the lighter things he imparts a tremendous swing and verve to his band; and it is not merely by this that he shines as a conductor. Last evening he showed in more than one place that he could hold his own with his men and make them do what he wished. Suddenly to hold an orchestra back in the midst of a furious rush and bring it to a more moderate tempo is not given to everyone. His conducting of the Strauss waltzes and of the French opéra-bouffe things was immensely spirited and full of chic, and showed a rare appreciation of what is best and most characteristic in music of that sort. And, to speak of more serious and arduous matters, the way in which he conducted the "Meistersinger" Prelude was capital all through—and he made his men play it, too, as one likes to hear it played.

We are only too happy to welcome those summer concerts again. To our thinking they give evidence of no despicable advance in the musical conditions in this city. We are not quite sure that they may not, in time, do as good a work, in their way, as the symphony concerts themselves. It may sound rather subversive, even revolutionary-sansculottic on our part to say so; but we may as well say it now as at any other time. It would delight us to have these excellent beer-and-tobacco orchestral concerts given in the Music Hall on every week-day evening throughout the whole year. And the symphony concerts? Well! the Music Hall is the only hall now, but there is no sound reason why it should be the only hall in secula seculorum.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, JUNE 3, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

The Music Hall Promenade Concerts have quickly renewed the popularity they enjoyed last year, and great audiences gather each night to listen to the charming programmes presented by Mr. Adamowski and his orchestra. At tonight's concert a new waltz by Johann Strauss will be played for the first time in America. Other numbers of the programme are the Wedding March, Mendelssohn; overture, "Mignon," Thomas; selection, "Romeo and Juliet," Stasny; overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; Ballet Music, "Sylvia," Delibes; Cavatina, Raff; overture, "Tannhaeuser," Wagner; selection, "Pirates of Penzance," Sullivan; Waltz, "Barcarolle," Waldteufel; Polka Mazurka, Strauss; Radetzky March, Strauss.

The Musical Courier.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1, 1892.

The Music Hall promenade concerts—such a delightful feature of our summer season—begin on Tuesday evening next. This year Mr. Adamowski will conduct.

* * * *

The many friends of Mr. Gruenberg will regret to learn that he was compelled to decline the offer to act as associate conductor of the "Promenades," made him by Mr. Ellis, owing to certain unavoidable circumstances.

His work last season was more than satisfactory.

POST, Boston, Mass.

6/3

served, buried himself in the book which he took from his pocket.

Manager Charles A. Ellis is smiling and happy these days as he watches the people pouring into the Music Hall "Pops." Mr. Ellis says that he has been overrun with questions as to why he does not continue this favorite Boston institution through the summer. The answer is that, while they might be profitable up to the end of July, the orchestra cannot be retained for a longer period than at present unless the contract be for the entire season, as many of them make engagements at summer resorts. Their places could be filled by good musicians, but under the high standard thus far maintained, the people would only be satisfied with the best.

The Boston Commercial

SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADES.

The seventh season of the popular promenade concerts opened most auspiciously on Tuesday evening. These entertainments are a light and bright attraction for the summer and will be continued for six weeks. The programmes will be of unusual merit and will be made notable in many ways. The arrangements of these popular entertainments will continue this season under Manager Ellis' direction.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1892.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Local Announcements.

The Promenade Concerts at the Music Hall, have met with the popular success that distinguished those given in previous seasons. In both programmes and performances they have given great delight. The programmes have been most agreeably varied with familiar and new works and with occasional deviations into classic fields, while Mr. Adamowski has succeeded in securing from the fine band, organized for the concerts, most admirable results, considered on grounds of either accuracy or expression.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

SATURDAY JUNE 4.

It is said that those who now revel in the pleasures of the roof-garden at the Madison square could not tell the difference between a burlesque and a tragedy. Be this as it may, nothing approaching so absurd a remark could be made of our similar but much superior Boston institution, the Music Hall "pops." Manager Ellis is to be highly praised for putting before us 50 musicians of such skill under that prince of leaders, Adamowski. And his labor is not in vain. Even the most critical were "thrown down" (to use a street phrase), and were led to remark that it was truly remarkable that in so large an assembly, constituting so many who were presumably present for smoke and drink only, such absolute quiet and careful attention should prevail during the finest passages of music. With such programmes of delightful music rendered in so masterly a manner, the "pops" are sure to score a greater success than ever.

Boston Post,

FRIDAY MORNING, JUNE 3, 1892.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall provide a delightful summer evening's entertainment and are attracting great audiences. Adamowski announces the following programme for tonight:

Wedding March	Mendelssohn
Overture—"Mignon"	A. Thomas
Waltz—"Seid umschlungen Millionen" First time in America.	Joh. Strauss
Selection—"Romeo and Juliet"	Stasny
Overture—"Le Roy d'Ys"	Lalo
Ballet music—"Sylvia"	Delibes
Cavatina	Raff
Overture—"Tannhaeuser"	Wagner
Selection—"The pirates of Penzance"	Sullivan
Waltz—"Barcarolle"	Waldteufel
Polka mazurka—"Die Emancipirte"	Joseph Strauss
Radetzky march	Joh. Strauss

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

FRIDAY MORNING, JUNE 3, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

Another great audience attended the promenade concert at Music Hall last evening and applauded the fine programme given under Mr. Adamowski's direction. At tonight's concert a new waltz by Joh. Strauss will be played for the first time in America. The programme also includes the "Wedding March," by Mendelssohn.

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

The new season of promenade concerts at Music Hall has begun auspiciously and one feels that summer must be here at last. The heat that has been holding off so coyly came pouring in on Tuesday, when the first concert was given, and people were glad to hurry to the big hall with its open doors and windows, its tables surrounded by pleasant groups, its light, comforting refreshments, and its lively, well-played music. So far as the ordering of the room and its floor service is concerned, all goes well, of course, for Manager Ellis and his head of departments have the experience of previous seasons and the ambition to excel them. The band is all that one could ask, for the men have been chosen wisely. Mr. Roth is a strong concert-master and Mr. Adamowski has proved himself to have taste in making programmes and ability in leading them. Many new compositions are promised, and there will be frequent soloists to diversify the performances.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 156.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1892.

The Music Hall Promenade concert season has opened very successfully, the attendance this week having exceeded that of any corresponding period in the history of these summer night entertainments. Director Adamowski's programme for this evening includes selections "Raymond," "The Brigands," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "The Mikado" and "Boccaccio," the new "Kaiser" waltzes, the "Loin du Bal," "Wotan' Farewell" and "Fire Charm," "The Invitation to Dance," and other popular numbers.

Manager A. L. Southerland, who has in hand the "Iolanthe" production at the Globe Theatre on the 13th inst., as Mr.

Boston Daily Globe.

SATURDAY, JUNE 4, 1892.

Popular Promenades.

The attendance at the promenade concerts in Music Hall during the week must have been highly satisfactory to Manager Ellis, for the seats at the tables have been in such demand that many who wished to reserve places found it very difficult to get accommodations.

The programme for this evening is as follows:

March, Hoch Habsburg	Joh. Strauss
Overture, Raymond	A. Thomas
Waltz, Kaiser	Joh. Strauss
Overture, Les Brigands	Offenbach
Selection, Cavalleria Rusticana	Mascagni
Selection, Die Walkuere	Wagner
Hymn to St. Cecilia	Gounod
Invitation to Dance	Weber
Selection, Mikado	Sullivan
Loin du Bal	Gillet
Polka, Unparteische Kritik	Joh. Strauss
March, Boccacio	Suppe

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1, 1892.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Music Hall: The Promenade Concerts.

The seventh season of the summer promenade concerts in the Music Hall opened most auspiciously last evening, under Mr. T. Adamowski's conductorship. The hall was decked out, as usual, with evergreens, and looked better and more inviting than one would have thought its dingy coloring would admit. The programme of the evening was as follows:

Krönungsmarsch	Meyerbeer
Ballet music from "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saëns
Kaiser-waltzer	Johann Strauss
Overture to "Orphée aux Enfers"	Offenbach
Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg"	Wagner
Scherzo-waltz and Malaguena, "Boabdil"	Moszkowski
Hymn to St. Cecilia	Gounod
Overture to "Die Fledermaus"	Johann Strauss
Selection from "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
Loin du Bal	Gillet
Polka, "Libelle"	Johann Strauss
March, from "Boccaccio"	Suppé

An excellent programme for the purpose! It was specially interesting to note the attention with which the audience followed certain numbers, in spite of the well-known tendency of promenade concert audiences to indulge in chit chat, whether music is going on or not. Some things seemed to invite to conversation, and were heard through a general buzz of talking; others, on the contrary, were listened to with an intentness such as would have reflected the greatest credit upon a symphony concert audience. It was noticed with both surprise and pleasure that, in the midst of a particularly brilliant, not to say noisy, piece, a sudden silence of the orchestra found the hall as still as a mouse, you could have heard a pin drop; if certain tales may be believed, even our venerable Handel and Haydn Society has not always had such good luck with "The Messiah." It means a good deal when a mixed audience, many of whom are standing, and are at perfect liberty to roam about and talk, listen in absolute silence to a bit of pianissimo playing like Gillet's "Loin du Bal," and ask for it twice over again. It means perhaps even more, that you can listen to the Prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger" at a promenade concert, and hear every note of it undisturbed by the surrounding crowd. Evidently the people who go to the Promenade Concerts do not go for the beer and tobacco only.

The orchestra, with Mr. Otto Roth as leading first violin, is excellent, many members of the Symphony Orchestra being in its ranks; and some positions are worthily filled by players who have not belonged to the Symphony Orchestra for the last few years. It is impossible to name everyone who holds an important position; but it is a pleasure to say that Mr. Strasser's face was again seen (and his tone heard, too), at the first clarinet desk. The first places among the other wind players are admirably filled, the strings are capital, and the brass and percussion leave little, if anything, to be desired.

Mr. Adamowski, after his last summer's experience, has a very firm grip on the forces under his baton. In the lighter things he imparts a tremendous swing and verve to his band; and it is not merely by this that he shines as a conductor. Last evening he showed in more than one place that he could hold his own with his men and make them do what he wished. Suddenly to hold an orchestra back in the midst of a furious rush and bring it to a more moderate tempo is not given to everyone. His conducting of the Strauss waltzes and of the French opéra-bouffe things was immensely spirited and full of chic, and showed a rare appreciation of what is best and most characteristic in music of that sort. And, to speak of more serious and arduous matters, the way in which he conducted the "Meistersinger" Prelude was capital all through—and he made his men play it, too, as one likes to hear it played.

We are only too happy to welcome those summer concerts again. To our thinking they give evidence of no despicable advance in the musical conditions in this city. We are not quite sure that they may not, in time, do as good a work, in their way, as the symphony concerts themselves. It may sound rather subversive, even revolutionary-sansculottic on our part to say so; but we may as well say it now as at any other time. It would delight us to have these excellent beer-and-tobacco orchestral concerts given in the Music Hall on every week-day evening throughout the whole year. And the symphony concerts? Well! the Music Hall is the only hall now, but there is no sound reason why it should be the only hall in secula seculorum.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, JUNE 3, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

The Music Hall Promenade Concerts have quickly renewed the popularity they enjoyed last year, and great audiences gather each night to listen to the charming programmes presented by Mr. Adamowski and his orchestra. At to-night's concert a new waltz by Johann Strauss will be played for the first time in America. Other numbers of the programme are the Wedding March, Mendelssohn; overture, "Mignon," Thomas; selection, "Romeo and Juliet," Stasny; overture, "Le Roi d'Ys," Lalo; Ballet Music, "Sylvia," Delibes; Cavatina, Raff; overture, "Taunhaeuser," Wagner; selection, "Pirates of Penzance," Sullivan; Waltz, "Barcarolle," Waldteufel; Polka Mazurka, Strauss; Radetzky March, Strauss.

[93]

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. XCI., NO. 153.

WEDNESDAY JUNE 1, 1892.

AT THE PROMENADES.

Musical Boston Begins Its Season of Relaxation.

A Great Audience Fills Music Hall—The Tables and Balconies All Occupied—Director Adamowski Given a Hearty Greeting—Some Bright Novelties in the Programme.

Musical Boston again abandoned its winter aspect, and entered upon its summer season of relaxation at Music Hall last evening.

There is little in common between the audiences that throng this auditorium during the season of Symphony concerts and those that crowd the tables and balconies at the promenades, and yet the same faces are seen at both series of concerts.

This may seem contradictory, but its truth will be vouched for by any one who has watched the attendants upon Music Hall concerts throughout the year.

The same individual who sits bolt upright, with an "I know it all" sort of expression, in the winter may be seen seated with crossed continuations and generally comfortable pose, tapping the table in time with the merry dance measures, or chatting in an undertone about the gossip of the day with the most unaffected expression and with every indication of enjoyment.

"You will find no more cosmopolitan style of audience on the continent of Europe than you see here tonight," was a remark heard in passing a group just inside "the ring," as the square of inclosed tables is known, and a little farther within the charmed square a representative from 'Frisco's best society admitted that no more attractive audience could be got together in the city of the "Golden Gate," a compliment only to be fully appreciated by those acquainted with the high estimate a native of 'Frisco puts upon everything and everybody "hailing" from that transcontinental metropolis.

This is the seventh season that Manager Charles A. Ellis has opened Music Hall to the lovers of such entertainments as are provided in these promenade concerts, and last evening was in many ways merely a repetition of the sights, sounds and scenes which have characterized other opening nights in former years.

The floor was filled with tables, each of which had its full complement of sociably inclined patrons, the balconies held a large contingent of those who found the musical programme an ample attraction, all around the balcony fronts were the traditional festoons of green, the stage line was marked by a border of gay bunting, and a background of cool green boughs gave additional prominence to the men of the orchestra. The service on the floor was prompt and as noiseless as circumstances and commodities would permit, and all about the keen-sighted assistants of the manager watched and guarded against all that would mar the pleasure of the patrons of the evening.

A year ago, when Mr. T. Adamowski stepped to the conductor's desk to open the season's Promenades, his ability as a conductor was somewhat of an unknown quantity. His skill as a soloist and ensemble player had given him a well deserved reputation in these lines of work, but his power to control a large orchestra and to intelligently assume the duties of his new position were questioned even by his well-wishers.

His success in the concerts of last season served to remove all doubts as to his fitness for the position to which he was appointed, and when he stepped to the conductor's desk last evening he was greeted with a spontaneous outburst of applause that showed beyond all question an acknowledgment of his being the right man in the right place. His programme was as follows:

Kronungsmarsch	Meyerbeer
Ballet music, "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
(a) Gypsy dance.
(b) Gigue.
Waltz, "Kaiser"	Strauss
Overture, "Orpheus"	Offenbach
Overture, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
Ballet music, "Boabdil"	Moszkowski
(a) Scherzo waltz.
(b) Malaguena.
Hymn to "St. Cecilia"	Gounod
Overture, "Fledermaus"	Strauss
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
Loin de Bal	Gillet
Polka, "Libelle"	Strauss
March, "Boccacio"	Suppe

It is generally understood that critical consideration of these concerts is out of form. They are given for the enjoyment of patrons, and such music lovers as cannot listen without mentally measuring the correctness of the "readings" and the details of the interpretation given the various compositions should remain away from the Promenades.

Not that Mr. Adamowski does not give intelligent readings and artistic interpretations, but such programmes are not fully appreciated unless properly received, and an exercise of critical judgment sadly interferes with the full value of a Strauss waltz.

It was delightful to hear again the selections from the "Henry VIII." ballet music, and the brilliant "Kaiser" waltz, new to Boston, and the "Boabdil" ballet music, new to America, set all feet tapping and created a sensation among the lovers of those forms of composition. The "Cavalleria Rusticana" selections was played with such splendid fire and dash that it created a furor, and the "Orpheus" overture was followed by an ovation that showed how fully the director's abilities were appreciated.

All in all, it was a brilliant opening night, and, without doubt, it began the most successful season of the Promenades yet known. The concerts continue for six weeks, from 8 to 11 each evening, with constantly varied programmes.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1, 1892.

MUSIC.

A Brilliant Opening of the Promenade Concert Season.

The first of the promenade concerts was given last evening in Music Hall. When Mr. Adamowski, the conductor, appeared upon the stage he was greeted warmly by an audience that crowded the floor and the balconies. The hearers enjoyed thoroughly the music, the exhilarating scene, the freedom of conversation, and the eatable and the potable accessories. Criticism was tabooed. Wagner and Offenbach were applauded impartially. The strains of the Strauss waltz were accentuated by the low laughter of women; and the Scotch airs which Saint Saens wove into the ballet music of "Henry VIII." were enveloped in tobacco mist.

Boston relaxed. The enjoyment was democratic. The known and the unknown touched elbows without annoyance.

The programme was well chosen. There was an irresistible appeal to the ear and to the foot. Music embraced its sister, the dance.

The musician forgot that music was a business, a task; the professional man forgot his cares; there was a general laying aside of fads, of shams and of pretences. The symphony was no longer a thing to be endured and to be praised between yawns. Symphonic poems were apparently non-existent. There was but one form of music, the dance, and Johann Strauss was its prophet.

Nor was the programme unworthy of the attention of musicians. Offenbach was, in his way, a genius; and we cannot always listen to Brahms. There were novelties of interest; and it was a pleasure to welcome old friends. It is the purpose of music to amuse as well as to instruct. As a rule, we take our music too seriously.

Here is a place for honest enjoyment, where the lounger can "loaf and invite his soul" without compunction. Refreshed mentally and physically, he can defy the weather and find comfort in mere existence. It is not surprising, then, that the efforts of Manager Ellis are appreciated so widely by his townsfolk.

The programme for the concert of this evening is as follows:

March, "La Reine de Saba"	Gounod
Slavonic dances	Dvorak
Waltz, "Doctrinen"	J. Strauss
Selection, "The Gondoliers"	Sullivan
Polonaise	Liszt
Prelude, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
Ballet music, from the opera "Ritter Passman,"	J. Strauss
(First time.)
Selection, from "Robin Hood"	De Koven
Overture, "Galatea"	Suppe
Polka, "Unparteiische Kritik"	Strauss
(First time.)
Waltz, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
March, "Juanita"	Suppe
(First time.)

BOSTON EVENING NEWS

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1, 1892.

THE "POPS."

Brilliant Inauguration of the Music Hall Season.

Bohemian Boston was out in force last night and filled Music Hall. It was the occasion of the opening of the "Pop" concert season, the most enjoyable of all to stay-at-home Hubites. The great floor space, covered with tables, presented a strange appearance in comparison with what is seen during the winter, but it was more attractive, and the liveliness of the vast throng proved Bostonians' liking for sociability.

Not a seat was to be had when Mr. Adamowski raised his baton, and those who were unfortunate enough to have come late were obliged to stand during the evening. But no one elected to go away before hearing some of the delightful music to which the audience was treated, and to the strains of light opera, popular selections and more classic pieces. The season was begun with every assurance of as great success as that which attended the course of last year.

The orchestra need not be complimented nor a word of praise spoken for it, for that it was as excellent as could be desired in every respect may be readily imagined. Mr. Adamowski as conductor proved as able as ever in selecting a program suited to the taste of his audience, and is to be congratulated on his taste. The program was as follows:

1. Kroenungsmarsch	Meyerbeer
2. Ballet music, "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
a "Dance de la Gipsy."
b "Gigue."
3. Kaiser Walzer	Joh. Strauss
First time.
4. Overture, "Orpheus"	Offenbach
5. Overture, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
6. a Scherzo waltz } from "Boabdil" b Malaguena }	Moszkowski
First time in America.
7. Hymn to St. Cecilia	Gounod
8. Overture, "Fliedermaus,"	J. Strauss
9. Selection from "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
First time at these concerts.
10. Loin Du Bal	Gillet
11. Polka, "Libelle"	J. Strauss
12. March, "Boccacio"	Suppe

All the members were enthusiastically received, especially the overture to "Orpheus," and a selection from the same opera, which was introduced as an encore. Gillet's dancing waltz, "Loin du Bal," came in for its usual cordial reception, and Gounod's "Hymn to St. Cecilia" was also repeated at the request of all. The selection from "Cavalliera Rusticana" was very finely rendered, and provoked the greatest applause. To-night's program is well selected.

[94]

Boston Post,

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JUNE 1.

THE OPENING OF THE "POPS"

Music Hall, arrayed in green and lighted by hundreds of electric lamps, was the scene of the opening of the seventh season of promenade concerts given under the management of Mr. C. A. Ellis. Each year Mr. Ellis has sought to improve his unique attraction, but when the following season arrives the standard of the orchestra and the selection of the music is better than ever before.

Last evening there was an audience which filled every reserved seat in the first balcony, the capacity of the floor and second balcony, and many were unable to secure comfortable seats. The orchestra is larger than ever, composed of the best talent that was disengaged, and under the skilful baton of T. Adamowski rendered a programme that was thoroughly appreciated by everyone. The numbers were of a high standard and were as follows:

1. Kroenungsmarsch	Meyerbeer
2. Ballet Music, "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
a, "Dance de la Gypsy"; b, "Gigue."
3. Kaiser Walzer	Joh. Strauss
First time.
4. Overture, "Orpheus"	Offenbach
5. Overture, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
6. a, Scherzo Waltz; b, Malaguena; from "Boabdil"	Moszkowski
First time in America.
7. Hymn to St. Cecilia	Gounod
8. Overture, "Fledermaus"	J. Strauss
9. Selection from "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
First time at these concerts.
10. Loin du Bal	Gillet
11. Polka, "Libelle"	J. Strauss
12. March, "Boccacio"	Suppe

The favorite selections seemed to be the ballet music from "Henry VIII.," the Kaiser Walzer, the "Orpheus" overture, selections from the "Cavalleria Rusticana" and Gillet's dainty "Loin du Bal," which was especially well done. Encores were frequent and Mr. Adamowski was very obliging in the way of responding.

Tonight the programme will be as follows:

1. March, "La Reine de Saba"	Gounod
2. Slavonic Dances	Dvorak
3. Waltz, "Doctrinen"	J. Strauss
4. Selection, "The Gondoliers"	Sullivan
5. Polonaise	Liszt
6. Prelude, "Lohengrin"	Wagner
7. Ballet Music, from the Opera "Ritter Pasman"	J. Strauss
First time.
8. Selection from "Robin Hood"	De Koven
9. Overture, "Galatea"	Suppe
10. Polka, "Unparteiische Kritik"	Strauss
First time.
11. Waltz, "Les Patineurs"	Waldteufel
12. March, "Juanita"	Suppe
First time.

THE MUSIC HALL POPS.

Mr. ADAMOWSKI and his orchestra inaugurated the summer season last evening. It was an undoubted success. It was also a promise of comfort and delight for the stay-at-homes during the months to come.

The institution of these concerts is a benefaction which the public will not fail to appreciate. Their absence for even a part of the season last year was felt to be a deprivation. They should not be allowed to lapse.

As a permanent attraction to the city at a season when all the country flows back and forth through Boston on its way to the mountains and the seashore, these concerts have a substantial value. As a means of sensible recreation for the permanent residents of the city, they are no longer a novelty but next to a necessity.

Boston Post,

THURSDAY MORNING, JUNE 2, 1892.

There was a large audience at the promenade concert, in Music Hall, last evening, when a fine programme was rendered. To-night the selections will be as follows:

Persian March	Joh. Strauss
Overture—"Rienzi"	Wagner
Waltz—"Morgenblatter"	Joh. Strauss
Selection—"La Grande Duchesse"	Offenbach
Overture—"Zampa"	Herold
Ballet Music—"Le Cid"	Massenet
Largo	Haendel
Selection—"Sphinx" (first time)	Thompson
[Composed for the Hasty Pudding Society of Harvard College.]
Overture—"Poet and Peasant"	Suppe
Waltz—"Waldgeister"	Zach
Polka—"Woman's Heart"	Jos. Strauss
March—"Hoch Habsburg"	Kral

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, JUNE 2, 1892.

THE PROMENADE CONCERT.

The programme of the Promenade Concert in Music Hall this evening will be as follows: ....Joh. Strauss

Persian March........Wagner
Overture, "Rienzi"........Joh. Strauss
Waltz, "Morgenblatter"........Offenbach
Selection, "La Grande Duchesse"........Herold
Overture, "Zampa"........Massenet
Ballet music, "Le Cid"........Haendel
Largo........Thompson
Selection, "Sphinx"........
(First time.)
(Composed for the "Hasty Pudding Society" of Harvard College.)
Overture, "Poet and Peasant"........Suppe
........Zach
Waltz, "Waldgeister"........Jos. Strauss
Polka, "Woman's Heart"........Kral
March, "Hoch Habsburg"........

THE MUSIC HALL

~ ~ PROMENADE CONCERTS

..1892..

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1,

MUSIC HALL CONCERTS.

There is very little to be said about the beginning of the summer concerts at Music Hall last night, that has not already been recorded of the initial concert of preceding seasons. The same success attends the course as of old, there is the same notable gathering at the tables of the centre, the same vast crowd seeking a chance to slake its thirst and its musical longings at simultaneous founts, and this season there is the same popular and fashionable conductor, Mr. Timothée Adamowski, who led the orchestra to success last season. The orchestra numbers 50 good musicians, and, as usual, plays selections from the noblest, as well as from the lightest sources. The middle group of numbers (performed from 9 to 10 o'clock) is, as heretofore, the most ambitious part of the programme, and last night this included a "Meistersinger" Vorspiel, a new Maszkowski Ballet, and a Gounod selection. These were performed with excellent effect, although one might protest against the first and the last as not entirely suited to the occasion.

Lighter music was by no means lacking, and both orchestra and conductor proved their versatility by sweeping the circle from Strauss and Suppé to Wagner.

The ballet music from St. Saens "Henry VIII." was the chief number of the first group. Armand Sylvestre has played sad havoc both with Shakespeare and history, in this work, and the ballet in the "Parc de Richmon," is about as un-English as anything can well be, but, thanks to St. Saens, it is most agreeable music, and it was dashingly played, the Scotch themes being especially effective. Naturally one does not apply the symphonic standard to an occasion of this sort, but one can heartily congratulate Mr. Adamowski on the success he has attained as leader; he is nothing if not graceful, and he is master of that art of expressive gesture which is a strong quiver to the conductor's bow. The "Orpheus" overture was full of chic and abandon, and won the greatest success. The audience last night was measured only by the capacity of the hall, and Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager, is to be congratulated, not only upon the pecuniary success likely to ensue from the season, but upon giving the summer stay-at-home a pleasant musical feast, not heavy enough to be indigestible, and not light enough to be at all trashy.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JUNE 1, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Music Hall Popular Concerts.

There is very little to be said about the beginning of the summer concerts at Music Hall last night, that has not already been recorded of the initial concert of preceding seasons. The same success attends the course as of old, there is the same notable gathering at the tables of the centre, the same vast crowd seeking a chance to slake its thirst and its musical longings at simultaneous founts, and this season there is the same popular and fashionable conductor, Mr. Timothée Adamowski, who led the orchestra to success last season. The orchestra numbers 50 good musicians, and, as usual, plays selections from the noblest, as well as from the lightest sources. The middle group of numbers (performed from 9 to 10 o'clock) is, as heretofore, the most ambitious part of the programme, and last night this included a "Meistersinger" Vorspiel, a new Maszkowski Ballet, and a Gounod selection. These were performed with excellent effect, although one might protest against the first and the last as not entirely suited to the occasion.

Lighter music was by no means lacking, and both orchestra and conductor proved their versatility by sweeping the circle from Strauss and Suppé to Wagner.

The ballet music from St. Saens "Henry VIII." was the chief number of the first group. Armand Sylvestre has played sad havoc both with Shakespeare and history, in this work, and the ballet in the "Parc de Richmon," is about as un-English as anything can well be, but, thanks to St. Saens, it is most agreeable music, and it was dashingly played, the Scotch themes being especially effective. Naturally one does not apply the symphonic standard to an occasion of this sort, but one can heartily congratulate Mr. Adamowski on the success he has attained as leader; he is nothing if not graceful, and he is master of that art of expressive gesture which is a strong quiver in the conductor's bow. The "Orpheus" overture was full of chic and abandon, and won the greatest success. The audience last night was measured only by the capacity of the hall, and Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager, is to be congratulated, not only upon the pecuniary success likely to ensue from the season, but upon giving the summer stay-at-home a pleasant musical feast, not heavy enough to be indigestible, and not light enough to be at all trashy.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1.

MENUS AND MELODIES.

Seventh Season of Music Hall Promenades.

Large and Fashionable Audience Enjoy Viands and Music.

Adamowski's Admirable Orchestra—People Who Were There.

There can be no question that light refreshments and light music played a very important part in the enjoyment of thousands of modern Athenians last evening.

A beautiful night, a commodious hall, an excellent bill of fare and a pleasing concert programme, interpreted by a fine orchestra under the baton of a popular leader, proved an undeniable inducement to the pleasure-seeker, and at 7.45 o'clock Winter st. and Hamilton pl. were filled with a throng of people whose destination was Music Hall and the "Pops."

The seventh season of the summer promenade concerts opened with great eclat, and before Director Adamowski signalled to his men for the introduction to "Kroenungsmarsch," the initial number on the programme, the spacious floor, galleries and corridors were filled with an audience in which the bluest blood of Boston's society was very largely represented.

There is no doubt that the popularity of these entertainments has increased with each successive year, and no summer musical entertainment in this city has ever proved more acceptable to amusement lovers.

Last evening's initiatory augurs well for a continued success during the six weeks which Manager Ellis has allotted to the promenades, and certainly no pleasanter way of whiling away an evening can be asked for.

The refreshments are well served and the music will be of the better class of lighter compositions.

The players long have been closely associated in orchestral work, and probably no band of musicians ranking with them in excellence has ever been heard in this city in music of this class.

Enthusiasm reigned among the auditors, and the programme of 12 numbers was increased to a score or more by encores.

Of the work of the orchestra, it is enough to say in a general way that it was admirable.

The Kaiser waltz and two selections from "Boabdil," were given for the first times in this city, and proved to be delightfully pleasing novelties.

The "Cavalleria Rusticana" number awakened the most spontaneous enthusiasm of the evening, and was imperatively redemanded.

The waltzes were charmingly played, and Mr. Adamowski and his men are entitled to great praise for their thoroughly artistic work during the whole evening.

Tonight's programme is as follows:

March, "La Reine de Saba."	Gounod
Slavonic dances	Dvorak
Waltz, "Doctrinen."	J. Strauss
Selection, "The Gondoliers."	Sullivan
Polonaise	Liszt
Prelude, "Lohengrin."	Wagner
Ballet music, "Ritter Pasman."	J. Strauss
First time.
Selection from "Robin Hood,"	De Koven
Overture, "Galatea."	Suppe
Polka, "Unparteiische Kritik."	Strauss
First time.
Waltz, "Les Patineurs."	Waldteufel
March, "Juanita."	Suppe
First time.

WHAT THE AUDIENCE WAS LIKE.

Musicians, Artists, Society People and Every-day Folks Were There.

The general opinion was, last night, that Manager Ellis had done himself proud, achieved another artistic victory and furnished a place where everybody in town can meet everybody else for the next six weeks.

As early as 7 o'clock the nucleus of what was to be a noble audience, had gathered about the edges of the hall with a view to getting desirable tables.

The early birds were plain, every-day, young couples, or pairs of couples, who cared less for style than for getting a table where they could hear and see well, but the society folks, around whom much of the interest of these events centres, came considerably later.

At 8 o'clock a continuous line of handsome and dressy women, with their escorts, were struggling and squirming through the centre doors and humanity-fringed aisles that lead to the reserved tables in the centre of the hall.

These tables, numbering about 50, can be bought several days in advance, for family parties, if desired, and, as an indication of their destined popularity, it may be said that every one of them was sold last night fore the doors were open.

There are nearly 200 tables in the hall, with six chairs to each one, and not only were all of them occupied last night, but all the extra chairs in the building were pressed into service, while all standing room, not only on the floor and about the doors, but in the balconies, was fully taken up.

Music Hall always did have an appearance of vastness, but never to a more marked degree than last night, when the great contrast between the hundreds of small tables and the enormous floor space and high-reaching ceiling was especially noticeable.

The audience was not only immensely enthusiastic, but was to a considerable extent a women's audience, for, although few women came alone, or even in parties, it was a common thing to see one man with from two to four ladies.

Although the dresses were pretty, there was no attempt at evening dress, and there was thus an entire absence of any appearance of formality. The swellest visitors came in arrayed simply in their fashionable spring street costumes, and made a pleasing study for the artistic eye.

Among the most noticeable persons in the audience were the local musicians of various degrees of fame. Look where you would you were bound to see them, either individually or in groups.

Among those present who entertained parties were the following:

Mr. J. S. Russell, Col. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, Water Registrar W. F. Davis, Mr. Frank Litchfield, Mr. and Mrs. Franz Zerrhn, Mr. Norman, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mr. Eugene C. Caton, Mr. Tracey Denny, Mr. Edward Mason, Mr. Thomas Burnham, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Longfellow, Mr. Arthur L. Devens, Mr. Charles Dimmick, Mr. Colling, Count Roman Zubof, Mr. Webb of Dorchester, Mr. Gaugengigl, the artist, Mr. and Mrs. George W. Chadwick, Mr. W. F. Apthorp.

Other notables observed were:

Mr Guy Norman
Mr Gorham Hubbard
Mr and Mrs George Minot
The Misses Stackpole
Miss Lunt
Mrs Henry Cabot Lodge
Mr Alpheus Hardy, Jr
Mr W Longfellow
Mr Franz Kneisel
Mr Leighton Beal
Mr J Issigi
Mr and Mrs W F Apthorp
Mr Hooper
Mr Harry Wainwright
Mr George L Hunter
Mr Alfred J Hunter
Mr and Mrs J J Grace
Mr F H Ridlon
Mr Charles E Sampson
Dr and Mrs F S Watson
Mr Louis Elson
Mr Henderson
Miss Thomas
Mr Parkman Dexter
Mr I Gaugengigl
Mr and Mrs F Amory
Miss Fanny B Fottler
Mr R Saltonstall
Miss Saltonstall
Mr F Sargent
Mr J Hitchcock
Mr Charles H Thayer
Mr Frank B Stevens
Mr Herbert M Howes
Mr Philip Hale
Mr Benjamin Kimball
Dr George H Monks
Mr Arlo Bates
Mr A B Smith
Mr Harry Mason
Mr William P Blake
Mr and Mrs David Noyes
Misses Stackpole
Mr and Mrs J P Lovell
Mr Arthur Foote
Mr W F Wade
Mr Warren Locke

THE MUSIC HALL

PROMENADE CONCERTS

~ ~

..1892..

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1.

MUSIC HALL CONCERTS.

There is very little to be said about the beginning of the summer concerts at Music Hall last night, that has not already been recorded of the initial concert of preceding seasons. The same success attends the course as of old, there is the same notable gathering at the tables of the centre, the same vast crowd seeking a chance to slake its thirst and its musical longings at simultaneous founts, and this season there is the same popular and fashionable conductor, Mr. Timothée Adamowski, who led the orchestra to success last season. The orchestra numbers 50 good musicians, and, as usual, plays selections from the noblest, as well as from the lightest sources. The middle group of numbers (performed from 9 to 10 o'clock) is, as heretofore, the most ambitious part of the programme, and last night this included a "Meistersinger" Vorspiel, a new Maszkowski Ballet, and a Gounod selection. These were performed with excellent effect, although one might protest against the first and the last as not entirely suited to the occasion.

Lighter music was by no means lacking, and both orchestra and conductor proved their versatility by sweeping the circle from Stranss and Suppé to Wagner.

The ballet music from St. Saens "Henry VIII." was the chief number of the first group. Armand Sylvestre has played sad havoc both with Shakespeare and history, in this work, and the ballet in the "Parc de Richmon," is about as un-English as anything can well be, but, thanks to St. Saens, it is most agreeable music, and it was dashingly played, the Scotch themes being especially effective. Naturally one does not apply the symphonic standard to an occasion of this sort, but one can heartily congratulate Mr. Adamowski on the success he has attained as leader; he is nothing if not graceful, and he is master of that art of expressive gesture which is a strong quiver to the conductor's bow. The "Orpheus" overture was full of chic and abandon, and won the greatest success. The audience last night was measured only by the capacity of the hall, and Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager, is to be congratulated, not only upon the pecuniary success likely to ensue from the season, but upon giving the summer stay-at-home a pleasant musical feast, not heavy enough to be indigestible, and not light enough to be at all trashy.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JUNE 1, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Music Hall Popular Concerts.

There is very little to be said about the beginning of the summer concerts at Music Hall last night, that has not already been recorded of the initial concert of preceding seasons. The same success attends the course as of old, there is the same notable gathering at the tables of the centre, the same vast crowd seeking a chance to slake its thirst and its musical longings at simultaneous founts, and this season there is the same popular and fashionable conductor, Mr. Timothée Adamowski, who led the orchestra to success last season. The orchestra numbers 50 good musicians, and, as usual, plays selections from the noblest, as well as from the lightest sources. The middle group of numbers (performed from 9 to 10 o'clock) is, as heretofore, the most ambitious part of the programme, and last night this included a "Meistersinger" Vorspiel, a new Maszkowski Ballet, and a Gounod selection. These were performed with excellent effect, although one might protest against the first and the last as not entirely suited to the occasion.

Lighter music was by no means lacking, and both orchestra and conductor proved their versatility by sweeping the circle from Strauss and Suppé to Wagner.

The ballet music from St. Saens "Henry VIII." was the chief number of the first group. Armand Sylvestre has played sad havoc both with Shakespeare and history, in this work, and the ballet in the "Parc de Richmon," is about as un-English as anything can well be, but, thanks to St. Saens, it is most agreeable music, and it was dashingly played, the Scotch themes being especially effective. Naturally one does not apply the symphonic standard to an occasion of this sort, but one can heartily congratulate Mr. Adamowski on the success he has attained as leader; he is nothing if not graceful, and he is master of that art of expressive gesture which is a strong quiver in the conductor's bow. The "Orpheus" overture was full of chic and abandon, and won the greatest success. The audience last night was measured only by the capacity of the hall, and Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager, is to be congratulated, not only upon the pecuniary success likely to ensue from the season, but upon giving the summer stay-at-home a pleasant musical feast, not heavy enough to be indigestible, and not light enough to be at all trashy.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

[95]

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1.

MENUS AND MELODIES.

Seventh Season of Music Hall Promenades.

Large and Fashionable Audience Enjoy Viands and Music.

Adamowski's Admirable Orchestra—People Who Were There.

There can be no question that light refreshments and light music played a very important part in the enjoyment of thousands of modern Athenians last evening.

A beautiful night, a commodious hall, an excellent bill of fare and a pleasing concert programme, interpreted by a fine orchestra under the baton of a popular leader, proved an undeniable inducement to the pleasure-seeker, and at 7.45 o'clock Winter st. and Hamilton pl. were filled with a throng of people whose destination was Music Hall and the "Pops."

The seventh season of the summer promenade concerts opened with great eclat, and before Director Adamowski signalled to his men for the introduction to "Kroenungsmarsch," the initial number on the programme, the spacious floor, galleries and corridors were filled with an audience in which the bluest blood of Boston's society was very largely represented.

There is no doubt that the popularity of these entertainments has increased with each successive year, and no summer musical entertainment in this city has ever proved more acceptable to amusement lovers.

Last evening's initiatory augurs well for a continued success during the six weeks which Manager Ellis has allotted to the promenades, and certainly no pleasanter way of whiling away an evening can be asked for.

The refreshments are well served and the music will be of the better class of lighter compositions.

The players long have been closely associated in orchestral work, and probably no band of musicians ranking with them in excellence has ever been heard in this city in music of this class.

Enthusiasm reigned among the auditors, and the programme of 12 numbers was increased to a score or more by encores.

Of the work of the orchestra, it is enough to say in a general way that it was admirable.

The Kaiser waltz and two selections from "Boabdil," were given for the first times in this city, and proved to be delightfully pleasing novelties.

The "Cavalleria Rusticana" number awakened the most spontaneous enthusiasm of the evening, and was imperatively redemanded.

The waltzes were charmingly played, and Mr. Adamowski and his men are entitled to great praise for their thoroughly artistic work during the whole evening.

Tonight's programme is as follows:

March, "La Reine de Saba."	Gounod
Slavonic dances	Dvorak
Waltz, "Doctrinen."	J. Strauss
Selection, "The Gondoliers."	Sullivan
Polonaise	Liszt
Prelude, "Lohengrin."	Wagner
Ballet music, "Ritter Pasman." First time.	J. Strauss
Selection from "Robin Hood."	De Koven
Overture, "Galatea."	Suppe
Polka, "Unparteiische Kritik." First time.	Strauss
Waltz, "Les Patineurs."	Waldteufel
March, "Juanita." First time.	Suppe

WHAT THE AUDIENCE WAS LIKE.

Musicians, Artists, Society People and Every-day Folks Were There.

The general opinion was, last night, that Manager Ellis had done himself proud, achieved another artistic victory and furnished a place where everybody in town can meet everybody else for the next six weeks.

As early as 7 o'clock the nucleus of what was to be a noble audience, had gathered about the edges of the hall with a view to getting desirable tables.

The early birds were plain, every-day, young couples, or pairs of couples, who cared less for style than for getting a table where they could hear and see well, but the society folks, around whom much of the interest of these events centres, came considerably later.

At 8 o'clock a continuous line of handsome and dressy women, with their escorts, were struggling and squirming through the centre doors and humanity-fringed aisles that lead to the reserved tables in the centre of the hall.

These tables, numbering about 50, can be bought several days in advance, for family parties, if desired, and, as an indication of their destined popularity, it may be said that every one of them was sold last night fore the doors were open.

There are nearly 200 tables in the hall, with six chairs to each one, and not only were all of them occupied last night, but all the extra chairs in the building were pressed into service, while all standing room, not only on the floor and about the doors, but in the balconies, was fully taken up.

Music Hall always did have an appearance of vastness, but never to a more marked degree than last night, when the great contrast between the hundreds of small tables and the enormous floor space and high-reaching ceiling was especially noticeable.

The audience was not only immensely enthusiastic, but was to a considerable extent a women's audience, for, although few women came alone, or even in parties, it was a common thing to see one man with from two to four ladies.

Although the dresses were pretty, there was no attempt at evening dress, and there was thus an entire absence of any appearance of formality. The swellest visitors came in arrayed simply in their fashionable spring street costumes, and made a pleasing study for the artistic eye.

Among the most noticeable persons in the audience were the local musicians of various degrees of fame. Look where you would you were bound to see them, either individually or in groups.

Among those present who entertained parties were the following:

Mr. J. S. Russell, Col. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, Water Registrar W. F. Davis, Mr. Frank Litchfield, Mr. and Mrs. Franz Zerrhn, Mr. Norman, Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Nikisch, Mr. Eugene C. Caton, Mr. Tracey Denny, Mr. Edward Mason, Mr. Thomas Burnham, Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Longfellow, Mr. Arthur L. Devens, Mr. Charles Dimmick, Mr. Colling, Count Roman Zubof, Mr. Webb of Dorchester, Mr. Gaugengigl, the artist, Mr. and Mrs. George W. Chadwick, Mr. W. F. Apthorp.

Other notables observed were:

Mr Guy Norman
Mr Gorham Hubbard
Mr and Mrs George Minot
The Misses Stackpole
Miss Lunt
Mrs Henry Cabot Lodge
Mr Alpheus Hardy, Jr
Mr W Longfellow
Mr Franz Kneisel
Mr Leighton Beal
Mr J Iasigi
Mr and Mrs W F Apthorp
Mr Hooper
Mr Harry Wainwright
Mr George L Hunter
Mr Alfred J Hunter
Mr and Mrs J J Grace
Mr F H Ridlon
Mr Charles E Sampson
Dr and Mrs F S Watson
Mr Louis Elson
Dr Fenderson
Miss Thomas
Mr Parkman Dexter
Mr I Gaugengigl
Mr and Mrs F Amory
Miss Fanny B Fottler
Mr R Saltonstall
Miss Saltonstall
Mr F Sargent
Mr J Hitchcock
Mr Charles H Thayer
Mr Frank B Stevens
Mr Herbert M Howes
Mr Philip Hale
Mr Benjamin Kimball
Dr George H Monks
Mr Arlo Bates
Mr A R Smith
Mr Harry Mason
Mr William P Blake
Mr and Mrs David Noyes
Misses Stackpole
Mr and Mrs T P Lovell
Mr Arthur Foote
Mr W F Weld
Mr Warren Locke

BILL OF FARE

LUNCH

SANDWICHES.
Ham	10
Tongue	10
Chicken	15
Swiss Cheese	10
Roquefort Cheese	10
Brie Cheese	10
Neufchatel Cheese	10
American Cheese	10
Sardine	10

ICE-CREAM.
Vanilla	20
Lemon	20
Strawberry	20
Chocolate	20
Harlequin	25
Cake	15

PER PLATE.
Cold Ham	25
Cold Smoked Tongue	30
Cold Chicken	30
Swiss Cheese and Water Crackers	20
Roquefort " " " "	20
Brie " " " "	20
Neufchatel Cheese and Water Crackers	20
American " " " "	15
Sardines	25
Pretzels	10

SALADS.
Lobster	25
Chicken	30
Potato	15
Potato with Bread and Butter	20

CIGARS

(All Cigars will be enclosed in sealed envelopes, with the price printed thereon.)

The Celebrated N. S. Londres	From D. Frank & Co.	10c., 3 for 25c.
The Celebrated N. S. Bouquet		10c., 3 for 25c.
Celebridad Esquisitos		10c. each.
Celebridad Perfectos		15c., 2 for 25c.
El Carita		10c., 3 for 25c.
Robert Fulton Perfectos		25c. each.
Myopia Puritano	From S. S. Pierce & Co.	10c., 3 for 25c.
Pembina Bouquet		15c., 2 for 25c.
Manuel Garcia Regalia Chiquita		15c., 2 for 25c.
Legitimidad Concha Fina Especiales		15c., 2 for 25c
Espanola Concha Finas		15c. straight.
Ilusion Perfectos		20c. "
Africana Bellas		20c., 3 for 50c.
Trespalacios Bellas		20c., 3 for 50c.
Maravilla Perfectos		25c. straight.
Sweet Caporal Cigarettes		15c.
Richmond Straight Cut Cigarettes		20c.
Nestor Gianach's		40c.

LIST OF DRINKS

BARTHOLOMAY BREWING CO. Rochester Beer 10

Claret	15
Rhine Wine	15
Claret Punch	15
Claret Cobbler	15
Rhine Wine Cobbler	15
Ginger Ale (Vincent, Hathaway & Co.)	10
Apollinaris	10
Lemon Soda	10
Plain Soda	10
Plain Lemonade	10
Lemonade with Wine	15
Soda Lemonade	15
Soda Lemonade with Wine	15
Egg Lemonade	15
Apollinaris Lemonade	15

FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC ALES AND LAGER BEER.

	PT.
Bass & Co.'s Pale Ale, White Label	25
" " " " Foster's Bot	25
" " " " Dog's Head	25
P. B. Ale	20
Guinness' Stout	25
Muir's Scotch Ale	25
Kaiser Beer	25
Culmbacher Beer	25
Bohemian Beer	20

	PT.
Bavarian Beer	20
Norfolk Cabinet Beer	20
Apollinaris .... Qt., 35,	20
Hygeia Lithia Water .... Qt., 25,	15
" Ginger Ale	15
Soda Siphon	25
Ginger Ale (Imported)	25
S. S. Pierce's Cider .... Half Pints	15

RHINE WINES.

	QT.	PT.
Table Wine	1.00
Laubenheimer	1.50	.75
Niersteiner	1.50	.75
Liebfraumilch	2.00
Johannisberger Cabinet, Yellow Seal	2.50

CLARETS.

	QT.	PT.
Ordinaire	.80	.40
St. Julien	1.00	.50
Pontet Canet	1.50	.75

SAUTERNES.

	QT.	PT.
Sauterne	1.25	.65
Haut Sauterne	1.50	.75

Patrons will please pay waiters, and report any inattention to the Floor Manager.

GEO H. ELLIS, PRINTER, BOSTON.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1,

MUSIC HALL CONCERTS.

There is verv little to be said about the beginning of the summer concerts at Music Hall last night, that has not already been recorded of the initial concert of preceding seasons. The same success attends the course as of old, there is the same notable gathering at the tables of the centre, the same vast crowd seeking a chance to slake its thirst and its musical longings at simultaneous founts, and this season there is the same popular and fashionable conductor, Mr. Timothée Adamowski, who led the orchestra to success last season. The orchestra numbers 50 good musicians, and, as usual, plays selections from the noblest, as well as from the lightest sources. The middle group of numbers (performed from 9 to 10 o'clock) is, as heretofore, the most ambitious part of the programme, and last night this included a "Meistersinger" Vorspiel, a new Maszkowski Ballet, and a Gounod selection. These were performed with excellent effect, although one might protest against the first and the last as not entirely suited to the occasion.

Lighter music was by no means lacking, and both orchestra and conductor proved their versatility by sweeping the circle from Strauss and Suppé to Wagner.

The ballet music from St. Saens "Henry VIII." was the chief number of the first group. Armand Sylvestre has played sad havoc both with Shakespeare and history, in this work, and the ballet in the "Parc de Richmon," is about as un-English as anything can well be, but, thanks to St. Saens, it is most agreeable music, and it was dashingly played, the Scotch themes being especially effective. Naturally one does not apply the symphonic standard to an occasion of this sort, but one can heartily congratulate Mr. Adamowski on the success he has attained as leader; he is nothing if not graceful, and he is master of that art of expressive gesture which is a strong quiver to the conductor's bow. The "Orpheus" overture was full of chic and abandon, and won the greatest success. The audience last night was measured only by the capacity of the hall, and Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager, is to be congratulated, not only upon the pecuniary success likely to ensue from the season, but upon giving the summer stay-at-home a pleasant musical feast, not heavy enough to be indigestible, and not light enough to be at all trashy.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JUNE 1, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Music Hall Popular Concerts.

There is verv little to be said about the beginning of the summer concerts at Music Hall last night, that has not already been recorded of the initial concert of preceding seasons. The same success attends the course as of old, there is the same notable gathering at the tables of the centre, the same vast crowd seeking a chance to slake its thirst and its musical longings at simultaneous founts, and this season there is the same popular and fashionable conductor, Mr. Timothée Adamowski, who led the orchestra to success last season. The orchestra numbers 50 good musicians, and, as usual, plays selections from the noblest, as well as from the lightest sources. The middle group of numbers (performed from 9 to 10 o'clock) is, as heretofore, the most ambitious part of the programme, and last night this included a "Meistersinger" Vorspiel, a new Maszkowski Ballet, and a Gounod selection. These were performed with excellent effect, although one might protest against the first and the last as not entirely suited to the occasion.

Lighter music was by no means lacking, and both orchestra and conductor proved their versatility by sweeping the circle from Strauss and Suppé to Wagner.

The ballet music from St. Saens "Henry VIII." was the chief number of the first group. Armand Sylvestre has played sad havoc both with Shakespeare and history, in this work, and the ballet in the "Parc de Richmon," is about as un-English as anything can well be, but, thanks to St. Saens, it is most agreeable music, and it was dashingly played, the Scotch themes being especially effective. Naturally one does not apply the symphonic standard to an occasion of this sort, but one can heartily congratulate Mr. Adamowski on the success he has attained as leader; he is nothing if not graceful, and he is master of that art of expressive gesture which is a strong quiver in the conductor's bow. The "Orpheus" overture was full of chic and abandon, and won the greatest success. The audience last night was measured only by the capacity of the hall, and Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager, is to be congratulated, not only upon the pecuniary success likely to ensue from the season, but upon giving the summer stay-at-home a pleasant musical feast, not heavy enough to be indigestible, and not light enough to be at all trashy.

Boston Daily

WEDNESDAY, JU

MENUS AND MEL

Seventh Season of
Hall Promenade

Large and Fashionable Audie
Viands and Music.

Adamowski's Admirable O
People Who Were Th

There can be no question tha
freshments and light music pl
important part in the enjoymen
sands of modern Athenians last e
A beautiful night, a commodio
excellent bill of fare and a pleasi
programme, interpreted by a fine
under the baton of a popular lead
an undeniable inducement to the seeker, and at 7.45 o'clock Wint
Hamilton pl. were filled with a
people whose destination was M
and the "Pops."
The seventh season of the summ
nade concerts opened with great
before Director Adamowski signal men for the introduction to "K marsch," the initial number on gramme, the spacious floor, galle
corridors were filled with an aud
which the bluest blood of Boston
was very largely represented.
There is no doubt that the popu
these entertainments has increas
each successive year, and no summ cal entertainment in this city proved more acceptable to am
lovers.
Last evening's initiatory augurs w
continued success during the six
which Manager Ellis has allotte
promenades, and certainly no pl
way of whiling away an evening
asked for.
The refreshments are well served
music will be of the better class o
compositions.
The players long have been close
ciated in orchestral work, and prob
band of musicians ranking with t
excellence has ever been heard
city in music of this class.
Enthusiasm reigned among the a
and the programme of 12 numbers
creased to a score or more by encores
Of the work of the orchestra, it is to say in a general way that it was able.
The Kaiser waltz and two selection
"Boabdil," were given for the first ti
this city, and proved to be delig
pleasing novelties.
The "Cavalleria Rusticana"
awakened the most spontaneous enth
of the evening, and was imperativ
demanded.
The waltzes were charmingly playe
Mr. Adamowski and his men are enti
great praise for their thoroughly
work during the whole evening.
Tonight's programme is as follows:
March, "La Reine de Saba." ....
Slavonic dances ....
Waltz, "Doctrinen." ....J.
Selection, "The Gondoliers." ....S
Polonaise ....
Prelude, "Lohengrin." ....
Ballet music, "Ritter Pasman." ....J.
First time.
Selection from "Robin Hood." ....De
Overture, "Galatea." ....
Polka, "Unparteiische Kritik." ....
First time.
Waltz, "Les Patineurs." ....Wal
March, "Juanita." ....
First time.

WHAT THE AUDIENCE WAS L

Musicians, Artists, Society People
Every-day Folks Were There.

The general opinion was, last night,
Manager Ellis had done himself p achieved another artistic victory and nished a place where everybody in can meet everybody else for the nex
weeks.
As early as 7 o'clock the nucleus of
was to be a noble audience, had gath
about the edges of the hall with a vie
getting desirable tables.
The early birds were plain, every-
young couples, or pairs of couples, cared less for style than for getting a t where they could hear and see well, but society folks, around whom much of interest of these events centres, came siderably later.
At 8 o'clock a continuous line of ha some and dressy women, with their esco were struggling and squirming through

FITCHBURG RAILROAD

HOOSAC TUNNEL ROUTE.

THE SHORTEST AND PICTURESQUE LINE,

BOSTON TO SARATOGA

Palace Parlor Cars on all Express Trains.

Lake · Champlain · Route

— TO THE —

ADIRONDACK MOUNTAINS

— AND —

• MONTREAL •

∴ Don't decide on your vacation until you have consulted the time tables of the Fitchburg R.R. New train service, in effect the latter part of June.

ELEGANT PARLOR CARS RUN THROUGH TO THE

ADIRONDACKS and MONTREAL,

ALONG THE SHORES OF LAKE CHAMPLAIN,

THE MOST BEAUTIFUL SCENERY IN THE WORLD.

The only Line Running Palace Sleeping Cars Daily between

BOSTON AND CHICAGO,
BOSTON AND ST. LOUIS,
VIA NIAGARA FALLS.

Apply for Summer Excursion Book, giving list of tours and rates of fare,

AT 250 WASHINGTON STREET, BOSTON.

June 1, 1892. J. R. WATSON, Gen. Pass. Agent.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 1,

MUSIC HALL CONCERTS.

There is very little to be said about the beginning of the summer concerts at Music Hall last night, that has not already been recorded of the initial concert of preceding seasons. The same success attends the course as of old, there is the same notable gathering at the tables of the centre, the same vast crowd seeking a chance to slake its thirst and its musical longings at simultaneous founts, and this season there is the same popular and fashionable conductor, Mr. Timothée Adamowski, who led the orchestra to success last season. The orchestra numbers 50 good musicians, and, as usual, plays selections from the noblest, as well as from the lightest sources. The middle group of numbers (performed from 9 to 10 o'clock) is, as heretofore, the most ambitious part of the programme, and last night this included a "Meistersinger" Vorspiel, a new Maszkowski Ballet, and a Gounod selection. These were performed with excellent effect, although one might protest against the first and the last as not entirely suited to the occasion.

Lighter music was by no means lacking, and both orchestra and conductor proved their versatility by sweeping the circle from Strauss and Suppé to Wagner.

The ballet music from St. Saens "Henry VIII." was the chief number of the first group. Armand Sylvestre has played sad havoc both with Shakespeare and history, in this work, and the ballet in the "Parc de Richmon," is about as un-English as anything can well be, but, thanks to St. Saens, it is most agreeable music, and it was dashingly played, the Scotch themes being especially effective. Naturally one does not apply the symphonic standard to an occasion of this sort, but one can heartily congratulate Mr. Adamowski on the success he has attained as leader; he is nothing if not graceful, and he is master of that art of expressive gesture which is a strong quiver to the conductor's bow. The "Orpheus" overture was full of chic and abandon, and won the greatest success. The audience last night was measured only by the capacity of the hall, and Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager, is to be congratulated, not only upon the pecuniary success likely to ensue from the season, but upon giving the summer stay-at-home a pleasant musical feast, not heavy enough to be indigestible, and not light enough to be at all trashy.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, JUNE 1, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Music Hall Popular Concerts.

There is very little to be said about the beginning of the summer concerts at Music Hall last night, that has not already been recorded of the initial concert of preceding seasons. The same success attends the course as of old, there is the same notable gathering at the tables of the centre, the same vast crowd seeking a chance to slake its thirst and its musical longings at simultaneous founts, and this season there is the same popular and fashionable conductor, Mr. Timothée Adamowski, who led the orchestra to success last season. The orchestra numbers 50 good musicians, and, as usual, plays selections from the noblest, as well as from the lightest sources. The middle group of numbers (performed from 9 to 10 o'clock) is, as heretofore, the most ambitious part of the programme, and last night this included a "Meistersinger" Vorspiel, a new Maszkowski Ballet, and a Gounod selection. These were performed with excellent effect, although one might protest against the first and the last as not entirely suited to the occasion.

Lighter music was by no means lacking, and both orchestra and conductor proved their versatility by sweeping the circle from Strauss and Suppé to Wagner.

The ballet music from St. Saens "Henry VIII." was the chief number of the first group. Armand Sylvestre has played sad havoc both with Shakespeare and history, in this work, and the ballet in the "Parc de Richmon," is about as un-English as anything can well be, but, thanks to St. Saens, it is most agreeable music, and it was dashingly played, the Scotch themes being especially effective. Naturally one does not apply the symphonic standard to an occasion of this sort, but one can heartily congratulate Mr. Adamowski on the success he has attained as leader; he is nothing if not graceful, and he is master of that art of expressive gesture which is a strong quiver in the conductor's bow. The "Orpheus" overture was full of chic and abandon, and won the greatest success. The audience last night was measured only by the capacity of the hall, and Mr. C. A. Ellis, the manager, is to be congratulated, not only upon the pecuniary success likely to ensue from the season, but upon giving the summer stay-at-home a pleasant musical feast, not heavy enough to be indigestible, and not light enough to be at all trashy.

LOUIS C. ELSON.

Boston Daily
WEDNESDAY, JUN

MENUS AND MEL

Seventh Season of
Hall Promenade

Large and Fashionable Audie
Viands and Music.

Adamowski's Admirable O
People Who Were The

There can be no question tha
freshments and light music pla
important part in the enjoymen
sands of modern Athenians last e
A beautiful night, a commodio
excellent bill of fare and a pleasi
programme, interpreted by a fine
under the baton of a popular lead
an undeniable inducement to the seeker, and at 7.45 o'clock Winte
Hamilton pl. were filled with a
people whose destination was M
and the "Pops."
The seventh season of the summ
nade concerts opened with great
before Director Adamowski signal men for the introduction to "Kr marsch," the initial number on gramme, the spacious floor, galle
corridors were filled with an aud
which the bluest blood of Boston
was very largely represented.
There is no doubt that the popu
these entertainments has increas
each successive year, and no summ cal entertainment in this city h
proved more acceptable to am
lovers.
Last evening's initiatory augurs w
continued success during the six
which Manager Ellis has allotte
promenades, and certainly no pl
way of whiling away an evening
asked for.
The refreshments are well served
music will be of the better class o
compositions.
The players long have been close
ciated in orchestral work, and prob
band of musicians ranking with t
excellence has ever been heard
city in music of this class.
Enthusiasm reigned among the a
and the programme of 12 numbers
creased to a score or more by encores
Of the work of the orchestra, it is to say in a general way that it was
able.
The Kaiser waltz and two selectio
"Boabdil," were given for the first ti
this city, and proved to be delig
pleasing novelties.
The "Cavalleria Rusticana" n
awakened the most spontaneous enth
of the evening, and was imperativ
demanded.
The waltzes were charmingly playe
Mr. Adamowski and his men are enti
great praise for their thoroughly
work during the whole evening.
Tonight's programme is as follows:

March, "La Reine de Saba."..........
Slavonic dances..........
Waltz, "Doctrinen."..........J.
Selection, "The Gondoliers."..........S
Polonaise..........
Prelude, "Lohengrin."..........
Ballet music, "Ritter Pasman."..........J.
First time.
Selection from "Robin Hood."..........De
Overture, "Galatea."..........
Polka, "Unparteiische Kritik."..........
First time.
Waltz, "Les Patineurs."..........Wa
March, "Juanita."..........
First time.

WHAT THE AUDIENCE WAS I

Musicians, Artists, Society People
Every-day Folks Were There.

The general opinion was, last night
Manager Ellis had done himself achieved another artistic victory and nished a place where everybody in can meet everybody else for the nex
weeks.
As early as 7 o'clock the nucleus of
was to be a noble audience, had gath
about the edges of the hall with a vie
getting desirable tables.
The early birds were plain, every
young couples, or pairs of couples, cared less for style than for getting a
where they could hear and see well, bu society folks, around whom much of interest of these events centres, came
siderably later.
At 8 o'clock a continuous line of h
some and dressy women, with their esc were struggling and squirming throug

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

MUSIC HALL
PROMENADE CONCERTS

SEVENTH SEASON.

EVENINGS, EIGHT TO ELEVEN.

GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI, CONDUCTOR.

POPULAR PROGRAMMES,
ABLE SOLOISTS,
FINE FLORAL DISPLAY,
LIGHT REFRESHMENTS.
All the attractive features of past seasons.

FIRST NIGHT.
TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1892.

Programme.

KRONUNGSMARSCH.	Meyerbeer
BALLET MUSIC. "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
a) GIPSY DANCE.
b) GIGUE.
WALTZ. "Kaiser." (new)	Strauss
OVERTURE. "Orpheus."	Offenbach
OVERTURE. "Die Meistersinger."	Wagner
BALLET MUSIC. "Boabdil."	Moszkowski
a) SCHERZO WALTZ.
b) MALAGUENA.
(First time in America.)
HYMN to "St. Cecilia."	Gounod
OVERTURE. "Fledermans."	Strauss
SELECTION. "Cavalleria Rusticana."	Mascagni
LOIN DES BAL.	Gillet
POLKA. "Libelle."	Strauss
MARCH. "Boccacio."	Suppe

Popular Prices. Reserved Seats on Floor or Balcony 50 Cts.
TICKETS, 25 CENTS.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1892.

The Promenade Concerts at the Music Hall will begin tonight, and will be continued nightly, except Sundays, until further notice. In all respects the arrangements are the same as in the previous seasons. Mr. Timothée Adamowski is conductor. Tonight's programme is pleasantly varied and contains interesting novelties, and this character will be maintained through the season. Singers and players of high repute have been engaged for solo performances from time to time, particulars of which will be duly announced.

Boston Post,

MONDAY MORNING, MAY 30, 1892.

Under the direction of Mr. T. Adamowski, the promenade concerts in Music Hall promise speedily to resume the popularity which they have enjoyed for several seasons past. The orchestra is the best and largest ever enlisted for these concerts. A quantity of new music has been secured, and programmes of lively interest are promised. The opening concert of the series will be given at Music Hall next Tuesday evening. Nearly all the seats are already engaged, and the "first night" bids fair to be a brilliant and fashionable event.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 152.

TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1892.

THE PROMENADES

The seventh season of the Music Hall promenade concerts begins this evening, and the audience will be a notable one in many ways. Mr. T. Adamowski's friends will sally in force to give him a send off on his second season as conductor of these concerts, and he has chosen a programme of unusual merit in honor of the occasion.

He will give the first America hearing of the ballet music from "Boabdil," the new opera by Moszkowsky, and a new Strauss waltz, and many other brilliant numbers will be included in the programme.

The orchestra will number 50 picked men, the concerts will be given from 8 to 11 each evening for six weeks, and the same popular arrangements w[illegible] continue under Manager Ellis' direction.

A limited number of seats at the tables and in the balcony will be reserved at 50 cents, the usual 25-cent charge being made for admission.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The opening concert of the summer season at Music Hall will be given this evening. The following is the programme:

Kronungsmarsch	Meyerbeer
Ballet Music. "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
Waltz. "Kaiser." (New.)	Strauss
Overture. "Orpheus."	Offenbach
Overture. "Die Meistersinger."	Wagner
Ballet Music. "Boabdil."	Moszkowski
(First time in America.)
Hymn to St. Cecilia."	Gounod
Overture. "Fledermaus."	Strauss
Selection. "Cavelleria Rusticana."	Mascagni
Loin du Bal	Gillet
Polka. "Libelle."	Strauss
March. "Boccaccio."	Suppe

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1892.

The Promenades.

The first of the Music Hall promenade concerts will be given this evening. Conductor Adamowski announces the following programme:

Kronungsmarsch	Meyerbeer
Ballet music. "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
Waltz. "Kaiser." (new)	Strauss
Overture. "Orpheus."	Offenbach
Overture. "Die Meistersinger."	Wagner
Ballet music. "Boabdill."	Moszkowski
(First time in America.)
Hymn to "St. Cecilia."	Gounod
Overture. "Fledermaus."	Strauss
Selection. "Cavalleria Rusticana."	Mascagni
Loin du bal	Gillet
Polka. "Libelle."	Strauss
March. "Boccacio."	Suppe

"A Delightful Summer Evening's Entertainment."

LAST WEEK BUT ONE.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

EVERY EVENING, 8 TO 11.
GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.
Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.

Tickets, 25 Cents. Reserved Seats on Floor or Balcony, 50 Cents.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

SEVENTH SEASON.

EVENINGS, EIGHT TO ELEVEN.

GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI, CONDUCTOR.

POPULAR PROGRAMMES,
ABLE SOLOISTS,
FINE FLORAL DISPLAY,
LIGHT REFRESHMENTS.
All the attractive features of past seasons.

FIRST NIGHT.

TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1892.

Programme.

KRONUNGSMARSCH.	Meyerbeer
BALLET MUSIC. "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
a) GYPSY DANCE.
b) GIGUE.
WALTZ. "Kaiser." (new)	Strauss
OVERTURE. "Orpheus."	Offenbach
OVERTURE. "Die Meistersinger."	Wagner
BALLET MUSIC. "Boabdil."	Moszkowski
a) SCHERZO WALTZ.
b) MALAGUENA.
(First time in America.)
HYMN to "St. Cecilia."	Govnod
OVERTURE. "Fledermans."	Strauss
SELECTION. "Cavalleria Rusticana."	Mascagni
LOIN DES BAL.	Gillet
POLKA. "Libelle."	Strauss
MARCH. "Boccacio."	Suppe

Popular Prices. Reserved Seats on Floor or Balcony 50 Cts. TICKETS, 25 CENTS.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1892.

The Promenade Concerts at the Music Hall will begin tonight, and will be continued nightly, except Sundays, until further notice. In all respects the arrangements are the same as in the previous seasons. Mr. Timothée Adamowski is conductor. Tonight's programme is pleasantly varied and contains interesting novelties, and this character will be maintained through the season. Singers and players of high repute have been engaged for solo performances from time to time, particulars of which will be duly announced.

Boston Post.

MONDAY MORNING, MAY 30, 1892.

Under the direction of Mr. T. Adamowski, the promenade concerts in Music Hall promise speedily to resume the popularity which they have enjoyed for several seasons past. The orchestra is the best and largest ever enlisted for these concerts. A quantity of new music has been secured, and programmes of lively interest are promised. The opening concert of the series will be given at Music Hall next Tuesday evening. Nearly all the seats are already engaged, and the "first night" bids fair to be a brilliant and fashionable event.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 152.

TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1892.

THE PROMENADES

The seventh season of the Music Hall promenade concerts begins this evening, and the audience will be a notable one in many ways. Mr. T. Adamowski's friends will sally in force to give him a send off on his second season as conductor of these concerts, and he has chosen a programme of unusual merit in honor of the occasion.

He will give the first America hearing of the ballet music from "Boabdil," the new opera by Moszkowsky, and a new Strauss waltz, and many other brilliant numbers will be included in the programme.

The orchestra will number 50 picked men, the concerts will be given from 8 to 11 each evening for six weeks, and the same popular arrangements w[illegible] continue under Manager Ellis' direction.

A limited number of seats at the tables and in the balcony will be reserved at 50 cents, the usual 25-cent charge being made for admission.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The opening concert of the summer season at Music Hall will be given this evening. The following is the programme:

Kronungsmarsch	Meyerbeer
Ballet Music. "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
Waltz. "Kaiser." (New.)	Strauss
Overture. "Orpheus."	Offenbach
Overture. "Die Meistersinger."	Wagner
Ballet Music. "Boabdil."	Moszkowski
(First time in America.)
Hymn to St. Cecilia."	Gounod
Overture. "Fledermaus."	Strauss
Selection. "Cavelleria Rusticana."	Mascagni
Loin du Bal	Gillet
Polka. "Libelle."	Strauss
March. "Boccaccio."	Suppe

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MAY 31, 1892.

The Promenades.

The first of the Music Hall promenade concerts will be given this evening. Conductor Adamowski announces the following programme:

Kronungsmarsch	Meyerbeer
Ballet music. "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
Waltz. "Kaiser." (new)	Strauss
Overture. "Orpheus."	Offenbach
Overture. "Die Meistersinger."	Wagner
Ballet music. "Boabdill."	Moszkowski
(First time in America.)
Hymn to "St. Cecilia."	Gounod
Overture. "Fledermaus."	Strauss
Selection. "Cavalleria Rusticana."	Mascagni
Loin du bal	Gillet
Polka. "Libelle."	Strauss
March. "Boccacio."	Suppe

"A Delightful Summer Evening's Entertainment."

LAST WEEK BUT ONE.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS

EVERY EVENING, 8 TO 11.

GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.

Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.

Tickets, 25 Cents. Reserved Seats on Floor or Balcony, 50 Cents.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MAY 29, 1892.

Summer Promenades.

The Music Hall promenade concerts will open for a season of six weeks next Tuesday evening, and will present a wealth of attractions to lovers of popular music. Mr. T. Adamowski, who filled the position so acceptably last year, has again been chosen as conductor. The orchestra will number 50 picked musicians.

The programmes are to be strictly popular. The arrangement of the hall will be the same as in past seasons. The seats on the floor will be replaced by chairs and tables, where light refreshments will be served by polite waiters.

Smoking will be in order on the floor, but will not be permitted in the balconies. The hall will be made additionally attractive by a plentiful display of plants and shrubs. The admission fee will be 25 cents, with a limited number of reserved seats at 50 cents.

The programme in full for Tuesday's concert is as follows:

Kroenung's marsch.......................Meyerbeer
Ballet music, Henry VIII.....................Saint-Saens
a. Gypsy Dance.
b. Gigue.
Waltz, Kaiser (new)...........................Strauss
Overture, Orpheus.............................Offenbach
Overture, Die Meistersinger...................Wagner
Ballet music, Boabdil.........................Moszkowski
(First time in America.)
Hymn to St. Cecelia...........................Gounod
Overture, Fledermans..........................Strauss
Selection, Cavalleria Rusticana...............Mascagni
Loin de Bal...................................Gillet
Polka, Libelle................................Strauss
March, Boccaccio..............................Suppe

——Mr. Ellis has had his usual good fortune in securing Mr. Adamowski for the leader of the popular concerts to begin Tuesday night at Music Hall. He could not have obtained a better or more generally popular musician anywhere for the position. Mr. Adamowski goes abroad for the midsummer for his vacation, which last year he spent in America for the first time since he came over to this country. The arrangements for the "pops" will be the same as last year, and the programmes are to be even better.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 150.

SUNDAY, MAY 29, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Music Hall Promenades---Plans of Director Adamowski.

The "Puritania" Production at the Tremont—The Globe's Light Opera Season—Tonight's O'Reilly Memorial Concert—Lilian Durell's Success in "Mignon"—News and Gossip.

The Music Hall promenade concerts begin on Tuesday evening next for a six weeks' season, during which Mr. T. Adamowski will direct an orchestra of 50 men from the symphony players of the winter months, and, for the first time, the same rule will be in force regarding this organization as that controlling the Symphony orchestra in regard to personal attendance, no substitutes being permitted during the season. Mr. Otto Roth is to be the concert meister, and the engagements include all of the principal men of the winter orchestra.

Manager Charles A. Ellis, who for several seasons has maintained these concerts at the highest standard of excellence, is again in control, and his plans for the coming concerts indicate a desire to keep the character of the promenades unchanged and afford entertainment for the thousands of music lovers who are eager to enjoy the lighter compositions which are ignored in the winter orchestral programmes.

Mr. Adamowski enters upon this his second season as conductor of the promenades admirably equipped for the duties of his position. He established himself as a favorite with the promenade audiences of a year ago, and, with the added opportunities afforded him this season, there is every reason to predict a still greater success for him in the coming concerts.

He has secured a large number of compositions new not only to Boston, but to America as well, and these will be introduced in his programmes in rapid succession. Especial prominence will be given to the works of French composers which have been heard but little in recent years, and many novelties by Moszkowski, Strauss, Mascagni and the modern composers of other continental countries have been secured. Several Boston composers have placed new things at Mr. Adamowski's disposal, and Messrs. Chadwick, Foote and other local men will be given an early hearing.

Some brilliant new dance music by Strauss has just come to hand for these concerts, and an early sensation is promised in the first performance by full orchestra of the overture to the "Sphinx" recently given by the Hasty Pudding Club.

The programmes will, as usual, be made in three parts, the first and last being given to the more brilliant compositions, with some more dignified compositions between; the concerts lasting each evening from 8 to 11 o'clock. The opening programme on Tuesday evening is as follows:

Kroenungsmarsch..............................Meyerbeer
Ballet music, "Henry VIII."...........Saint-Saens
a Gypsy dance.
b Gigue.
Waltz, "Kaiser" (new).........................Strauss
Overture, "Orpheus"...........................Offenbach
Overture, "Die Meistersinger".................Wagner
Ballet music, "Boabdil".......................Moszkowski
a Scherzo waltz.
b Malaguena
(First time in America.)
Hymn to "St. Cecilia".........................Gounod
Overture, "Fledermans"........................Strauss
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana".............Mascagni
Loin du Bal...................................Gillet
Polka, "Libelle"..............................Strauss
March, "Boccaccio"............................Suppe

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, MAY 28, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall with all the features which made them so successful last season will begin next Tuesday evening. Mr. T. Adamowski will again be the conductor. He will have an orchestra of unusual excellence numbering 50 performers. The programmes will be strictly popular and will include many interesting novelties lately added to the library. The arrangement of the hall will be the same as before. The seats on the floor will be replaced by chairs and tables at which light refreshments will be served by polite waiters. Smoking will be in order on the floor but will not be allowed in the balconies. The "first night" promises to be an exceptionally brilliant occasion. Nearly all the seats have already been sold.

The Boston Commercial.

SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1892.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall will begin next Tuesday eveninge These concerts will be under the sam. able direction as last year, Mr. T. Adamowski and Mr. E. Grunberg, who won such a signal success last season, dividing their time as conductors of these summer night entertainments. Mr. Adamowski will direct the concerts on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday evenings, and Mr. Grunberg on Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, each selecting programmes of their own choice. The fixed charge for admission will be retained at 25 cents, and ample accommodations, both on the floor and in the balconies, will be provided at this price, a limited number of seats being reserved both above and below stairs at 50 cents.

THE SOUTH BOSTON NEWS.

SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1892.

THE POP CONCERTS.—Next Tuesday evening Music Hall will present a beautiful appearance, that being the date of the first "pop" concert of the season. An orchestra of fifty of Boston's best musicians, under the direction of T. Adamowski, will provide the music, which will be of the same class as in past years, thus assuring a repetition of the great successes which these concerts have proved ever since their inception by Manager Charles H. Ellis.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MAY 29, 1892.

The Music hall promenade concerts will begin next Tuesday evening, and will be continued each week day evening from 8 to 11 o'clock. The direction of these concerts will be divided between Mr. T. Adamowski and Mr. E. Grunberg, the conductors under whom such a success was won for these summer night entertainments last year. Mr. Adamowski will direct the concerts on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday evenings, and Mr. Grunberg on Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, each selecting programmes of their own choice. An orchestra of fifty men will be drawn from the ranks of the players in the Boston Symphony concerts, and, in addition to the instrumental soloists thus secured, the programme will be varied by vocal selections, with possibly other attractions of an unusually interesting character.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MAY 30, 1892.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The Music Hall promenade concerts, which long ago became a popular institution in this city, will open to-morrow evening for a season of six weeks. The programmes will be made up entirely of popular music of the best class, but the music will be performed with all the care given to the more serious concerts of the winter season. A superb orchestra of 50 musicians has been engaged, and will be conducted by Mr. T. Adamowski. Facilities will be provided for enjoying a good cigar and light refreshments while listening to the music, which will add not a little to the enjoyment of patrons of these entertainments.

Especial prominence will be given to the works of French composers, and Messrs. Chadwick, Foote and other Americans will be given a hearing. There will be new dance music by Strauss and the first performance by full orchestra of the overture to the "Sphinx," recently given by the Hasty Pudding.

The programme will be in three parts, and the concerts will last from 8 o'clock until 11.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25, 1892.

MUSIC HALL
Promenade Concerts.
SEVENTH SEASON. FIRST NIGHT.
TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 31,
GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.
MR. T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.
EVERY EVENING 8 TO 11.
Tickets for the First Week will be on sale at Music Hall Thursday, May 26. 4t my25

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25, 1892.

MUSIC HALL
PROMENADE CONCERTS.
SEVENTH SEASON. FIRST NIGHT.
TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 31,
GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.
MR. T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.
EVERY EVENING 8 TO 11.
Tickets for the First Week will be on sale at Music Hall Thursday, May 26. 4t my25

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

On Tuesday evening the Music Hall will throw open its doors for another season of the delightful evening promenade concerts. The experience of previous seasons will guide Manager Ellis in providing for the advantage and pleasure of his patrons in every way, and while the same general system as heretofore will be followed, room for novelties will be frequently found. The orchestra will be made of fifty men, drawn from the Symphony forces, and the conductor will be Mr. Adamowski, whose personal popularity and musicianly ability qualify him for the responsible position, as his success last season on the alternate nights which were assigned to him proved. Seats and tables for the opening night are already in demand.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1892.

The Promenade Concerts at the Music Hall will begin next Wednesday night, and will be continued nightly, except Sundays, until further notice. In all respects the arrangements will be the same as the seasons that have gone before. Mr. Timothée Adamowski will be the conductor.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall with all the features which made them so successful last season will begin next Tuesday evening. Mr. T. Adamowski will again be the conductor. He will have an orchestra of unusual excellence numbering 50 performers. The programmes will be strictly popular and will include many interesting novelties lately added to the library. The arrangement of the hall will be the same as before. The seats on the floor will be replaced by chairs and tables at which light refreshments will be served by polite waiters. Smoking will be in order on the floor but will not be allowed in the balconies. The "first night" promises to be an exceptionally brilliant occasion.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1892.

The management has at last completed all the arrangements for the Music Hall promenade concerts which open next Tuesday evening. Mr. T. Adamowski will conduct the orchestra of fifty members, and only the best class of popular music will be included in the programs. Soloists will appear from time to time, although they are not yet ready to be announced. The season will last but six weeks as many of the musicians have made summer engagements, others will go abroad, and a few will take a vacation until the opening of the concert season.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MAY 22, 1892.

MUSICAL PROMISES.

Pleasant Prospects for the Coming Season of "Pop" Concerts—Aid for the O'Reilly Fund.

The seventh season of the Music Hall promenade concerts, which have become so important a feature of each musical year, will open at Music Hall on Tuesday evening, May 31. The concerts will continue for six weeks, a performance being given every evening except Sundays.

The great popularity which these concerts attained during the first season has increased with each successive year, and no musical enterprise in this city ever proved more acceptable to the public.

The orchestra for the coming season will number 50 selected musicians, and will be under the direction of Messrs. Adamowski and E. Gruenberg, who will conduct on alternate evenings. The programmes will be strictly popular, and will include much new music lately added to the library.

The arrangement of the hall will be the same as before. The regular seats on the floor will be replaced by chairs and tables at which light refreshments will be sold. Smoking will be in order on the floor, but not in the balconies.

The sale of reserved seats for the opening night will open next Thursday.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 143.

SUNDAY, MAY 22, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

Manager Charles A. Ellis has been busily engaged since his return from the annual tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in completing the arrangements for the Promenade concerts which begin at Music Hall on Tuesday, the 31st inst., and continue for six weeks every evening.

In selecting the conductors for the concerts this season Manager Ellis has, having in mind the unusual interest awakened last season by the joint direction of Messrs. T. Adamowski and E. Grunberg, decided to again divide the concerts between these two conductors, a decision that will unquestionably meet the approval of their respective friends. It is intended that each of these directors shall have his own choice in programme making, and in this way a widely varied repertoire is assured.

The concerts will engage the services of fifty members of the Symphony orchestra and the immense library already belonging to the promenades will be still further increased for the coming series of concerts.

The promenades will last from 8 to 11 each evening. Special attractions have been engaged in the line of solo artists, and the popular scale of prices, 25 and 50 cents, will be retained.

Boston Post.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAY 25, 1892.

MUSIC HALL
PROMENADE CONCERTS.
SEVENTH SEASON. FIRST NIGHT.
TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 31,
GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.
MR. T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.
EVERY EVENING 8 TO 11.
Tickets for the First Week will be on sale at Music Hall Thursday, May 26.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 146.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25, 1892.

MUSIC HALL
PROMENADE CONCERTS.
SEVENTH SEASON. FIRST NIGHT.
TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 31,
GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.
MR. T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.
EVERY EVENING 8 TO 11.
Tickets for the First Week will be on sale at Music Hall Thursday, May 26.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAY 25, 1892.

MUSIC HALL
PROMENADE CONCERTS.
SEVENTH SEASON. FIRST NIGHT.
TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 31,
GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.
MR. T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.
EVERY EVENING 8 TO 11.
Tickets for the First Week will be on sale at Music Hall Thursday, May 26. my25-4t

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MAY 29, 1892.

Summer Promenades.

The Music Hall promenade concerts will open for a season of six weeks next Tuesday evening, and will present a wealth of attractions to lovers of popular music. Mr. T. Adamowski, who filled the position so acceptably last year, has again been chosen as conductor. The orchestra will number 50 picked musicians.

The programmes are to be strictly popular. The arrangement of the hall will be the same as in past seasons. The seats on the floor will be replaced by chairs and tables, where light refreshments will be served by polite waiters.

Smoking will be in order on the floor, but will not be permitted in the balconies. The hall will be made additionally attractive by a plentiful display of plants and shrubs. The admission fee will be 25 cents, with a limited number of reserved seats at 50 cents.

The programme in full for Tuesday's concert is as follows:

Kroenung's marsch	Meyerbeer
Ballet music, Henry VIII	Saint-Saens
a. Gypsy Dance.
b. Gigue.
Waltz, Kaiser (new)	Strauss
Overture, Orpheus	Offenbach
Overture, Die Meistersinger	Wagner
Ballet music, Boabdil	Moszkowski
(First time in America.)
Hymn to St. Cecelia	Gounod
Overture, Fiedermans	Strauss
Selection, Cavalleria Rusticana	Mascagni
Loin de Bal	Gillet
Polka, Libelle	Strauss
March, Boccaccio	Suppe

—Mr. Ellis has had his usual good fortune in securing Mr. Adamowski for the leader of the popular concerts to begin Tuesday night at Music Hall. He could not have obtained a better or more generally popular musician anywhere for the position. Mr. Adamowski goes abroad for the midsummer for his vacation, which last year he spent in America for the first time since he came over to this country. The arrangements for the "pops" will be the same as last year, and the programmes are to be even better.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 150.

SUNDAY, MAY 29, 1892.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Music Hall Promenades--- Plans of Director Adamowski.

The "Puritania" Production at the Tremont—The Globe's Light Opera Season—Tonight's O'Reilly Memorial Concert—Lilian Durell's Success in "Mignon"—News and Gossip.

The Music Hall promenade concerts begin on Tuesday evening next for a six weeks' season, during which Mr. T. Adamowski will direct an orchestra of 50 men from the symphony players of the winter months, and, for the first time, the same rule will be in force regarding this organization as that controlling the Symphony orchestra in regard to personal attendance, no substitutes being permitted during the season. Mr. Otto Roth is to be the concert meister, and the engagements include all of the principal men of the winter orchestra.

Manager Charles A. Ellis, who for several seasons has maintained these concerts at the highest standard of excellence, is again in control, and his plans for the coming concerts indicate a desire to keep the character of the promenades unchanged and afford entertainment for the thousands of music lovers who are eager to enjoy the lighter compositions which are ignored in the winter orchestral programmes.

Mr. Adamowski enters upon this his second season as conductor of the promenades admirably equipped for the duties of his position. He established himself as a favorite with the promenade audiences of a year ago, and, with the added opportunities afforded him this season, there is every reason to predict a still greater success for him in the coming concerts.

He has secured a large number of compositions new not only to Boston, but to America as well, and these will be introduced in his programmes in rapid succession. Especial prominence will be given to the works of French composers which have been heard but little in recent years, and many novelties by Moszkowski, Strauss, Mascagni and the modern composers of other continental countries have been secured. Several Boston composers have placed new things at Mr. Adamowski's disposal, and Messrs. Chadwick, Foote and other local men will be given an early hearing.

Some brilliant new dance music by Strauss has just come to hand for these concerts, and an early sensation is promised in the first performance by full orchestra of the overture to the "Sphinx" recently given by the Hasty Pudding Club.

The programmes will, as usual, be made in three parts; the first and last being given to the more brilliant compositions, with some more dignified compositions between; the concerts lasting each evening from 8 to 11 o'clock. The opening programme on Tuesday evening is as follows:

Krönungsmarsch	Meyerbeer
Ballet music, "Henry VIII."	Saint-Saens
a Gypsy dance.
b Gigue.
Waltz, "Kaiser" (new)	Strauss
Overture, "Orpheus"	Offenbach
Overture, "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
Ballet music, "Boabdil"	Moszkowski
a Scherzo waltz.
b Malaguena
(First time in America.)
Hymn to "St. Cecilia"	Gounod
Overture, "Fledermans"	Strauss
Selection, "Cavalleria Rusticana"	Mascagni
Loin du Bal	Gillet
Polka "Libelle"	Strauss
March "Boccaccio"	Suppe

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

SATURDAY MORNING, MAY 28, 1892.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall with all the features which made them so successful last season will begin next Tuesday evening. Mr. T. Adamowski will again be the conductor. He will have an orchestra of unusual excellence numbering 50 performers. The programmes will be strictly popular and will include many interesting novelties lately added to the library. The arrangement of the hall will be the same as before. The seats on the floor will be replaced by chairs and tables at which light refreshments will be served by polite waiters. Smoking will be in order on the floor but will not be allowed in the balconies. The "first night" promises to be an exceptionally brilliant occasion. Nearly all the seats have already been sold.

The Boston Commercial.

SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1892.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall will begin next Tuesday eveninge These concerts will be under the same able direction as last year, Mr. T. Adamowski and Mr. E. Grunberg, who won such a signal success last season, dividing their time as conductors of these summer night entertainments. Mr. Adamowski will direct the concerts on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday evenings, and Mr. Grunberg on Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, each selecting programmes of their own choice. The fixed charge fpr admission will be retained at 25 cents, and ample accommodations, both on the floor and in the balconies, will be provided at this price, a limited number of seats being reserved both above and below stairs at 50 cents.

THE SOUTH BOSTON NEWS.

SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1892.

The Pop Concerts.—Next Tuesday evening Music Hall will present a beautiful appearance, that being the date of the first "pop" concert of the season. An orchestra of fifty of Boston's best musicians, under the direction of T. Adamowski, will provide the music, which will be of the same class as in past years, thus assuring a repetition of the great successes which these concerts have proved ever since their inception by Manager Charles H. Ellis.

THE BOSTON TIMES

BOSTON, SUNDAY, MAY 29, 1892.

The Music hall promenade concerts will begin next Tuesday evening, and will be continued each week day evening from 8 to 11 o'clock. The direction of these concerts will be divided between Mr. T. Adamowski and Mr. E. Grunberg, the conductors under whom such a success was won for these summer night entertainments last year. Mr. Adamowski will direct the concerts on Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday evenings, and Mr. Grunberg on Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings, each selecting programmes of their own choice. An orchestra of fifty men will be drawn from the ranks of the players in the Boston Symphony concerts, and, in addition to the instrumental soloists thus secured, the programme will be varied by vocal selections, with possibly other attractions of an unusually interesting character.

Boston Journal.

MONDAY, MAY 30, 1892.

THE PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The Music Hall promenade concerts, which long ago became a popular institution in this city, will open to-morrow evening for a season of six weeks. The programmes will be made up entirely of popular music of the best class, but the music will be performed with all the care given to the more serious concerts of the winter season. A superb orchestra of 50 musicians has been engaged, and will be conducted by Mr. T. Adamowski. Facilities will be provided for enjoying a good cigar and light refreshments while listening to the music, which will add not a little to the enjoyment of patrons of these entertainments.

Especial prominence will be given to the works of French composers, and Messrs. Chadwick, Foote and other Americans will be given a hearing. There will be new dance music by Strauss and the first performance by full orchestra of the overture to the "Sphinx," recently given by the Hasty Pudding.

The programme will be in three parts, and the concerts will last from 8 o'clock until 11.

Boston Journal.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25, 1892.

MUSIC HALL
Promenade Concerts.
SEVENTH SEASON. FIRST NIGHT.
TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 31,
GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.
MR. T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.
EVERY EVENING 8 TO 11.

Tickets for the First Week will be on sale at Music Hall Thursday, May 26. 4t my25

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25, 1892.

MUSIC HALL
PROMENADE CONCERTS.
SEVENTH SEASON. FIRST NIGHT.
TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 31,
GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.
MR. T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.
EVERY EVENING 8 TO 11.

Tickets for the First Week will be on sale at Music Hall Thursday, May 26. 4t my25

The Beacon.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

On Tuesday evening the Music Hall will throw open its doors for another season of the delightful evening promenade concerts. The experience of previous seasons will guide Manager Ellis in providing for the advantage and pleasure of his patrons in every way, and while the same general system as heretofore will be followed, room for novelties will be frequently found. The orchestra will be made of fifty men, drawn from the Symphony forces, and the conductor will be Mr. Adamowski, whose personal popularity and musicianly ability qualify him for the responsible position, as his success last season on the alternate nights which were assigned to him proved. Seats and tables for the opening night are already in demand.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1892.

The Promenade Concerts at the Music Hall will begin next Wednesday night, and will be continued nightly, except Sundays, until further notice. In all respects the arrangements will be the same as the seasons that have gone before. Mr. Timothée Adamowski will be the conductor.

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

MUSIC HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS.

The promenade concerts at Music Hall with all the features which made them so successful last season will begin next Tuesday evening. Mr. T. Adamowski will again be the conductor. He will have an orchestra of unusual excellence numbering 50 performers. The programmes will be strictly popular and will include many interesting novelties lately added to the library. The arrangement of the hall will be the same as before. The seats on the floor will be replaced by chairs and tables at which light refreshments will be served by polite waiters. Smoking will be in order on the floor but will not be allowed in the balconies. The "first night" promises to be an exceptionally brilliant occasion.

BOSTON HOME JOURNAL.

SATURDAY, MAY 28, 1892.

The management has at last completed all the arrangements for the Music Hall promenade concerts which open next Tuesday evening. Mr. T. Adamowski will conduct the orchestra of fifty members, and only the best class of popular music will be included in the programs. Soloists will appear from time to time, although they are not yet ready to be announced. The season will last but six weeks as many of the musicians have made summer engagements, others will go abroad, and a few will take a vacation until the opening of the concert season.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MAY 22, 1892.

MUSICAL PROMISES.

Pleasant Prospects for the Coming Season of "Pop" Concerts—Aid for the O'Reilly Fund.

The seventh season of the Music Hall promenade concerts, which have become so important a feature of each musical year, will open at Music Hall on Tuesday evening, May 31. The concerts will continue for six weeks, a performance being given every evening except Sundays.

The great popularity which these concerts attained during the first season has increased with each successive year, and no musical enterprise in this city ever proved more acceptable to the public.

The orchestra for the coming season will number 50 selected musicians, and will be under the direction of Messrs. Adamowski and E. Gruenberg, who will conduct on alternate evenings. The programmes will be strictly popular, and will include much new music lately added to the library.

The arrangement of the hall will be the same as before. The regular seats on the floor will be replaced by chairs and tables at which light refreshments will be sold. Smoking will be in order on the floor, but not in the balconies.

The sale of reserved seats for the opening night will open next Thursday.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 143.

SUNDAY, MAY 22, 1892.

THE PROMENADES.

Manager Charles A. Ellis has been busily engaged since his return from the annual tour of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in completing the arrangements for the Promenade concerts which begin at Music Hall on Tuesday, the 31st inst., and continue for six weeks every evening.

In selecting the conductors for the concerts this season Manager Ellis has, having in mind the unusual interest awakened last season by the joint direction of Messrs. T. Adamowski and E. Grunberg, decided to again divide the concerts between these two conductors, a decision that will unquestionably meet the approval of their respective friends. It is intended that each of these directors shall have his own choice in programme making, and in this way a widely varied repertoire is assured.

The concerts will engage the services of fifty members of the Symphony orchestra and the immense library already belonging to the promenades will be still further increased for the coming series of concerts.

The promenades will last from 8 to 11 each evening. Special attractions have been engaged in the line of solo artists, and the popular scale of prices, 25 and 50 cents, will be retained.

Boston Post,

WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAY 25, 1892.

MUSIC HALL
PROMENADE CONCERTS.
SEVENTH SEASON. FIRST NIGHT.
TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 31,
GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.
MR. T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.
EVERY EVENING 8 TO 11.

Tickets for the First Week will be on sale at Music Hall Thursday, May 26.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. XCI., NO. 146.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 25, 1892.

MUSIC HALL
PROMENADE CONCERTS.
SEVENTH SEASON. FIRST NIGHT.
TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 31,
GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.
MR. T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.
EVERY EVENING 8 TO 11.

Tickets for the First Week will be on sale at Music Hall Thursday, May 26.

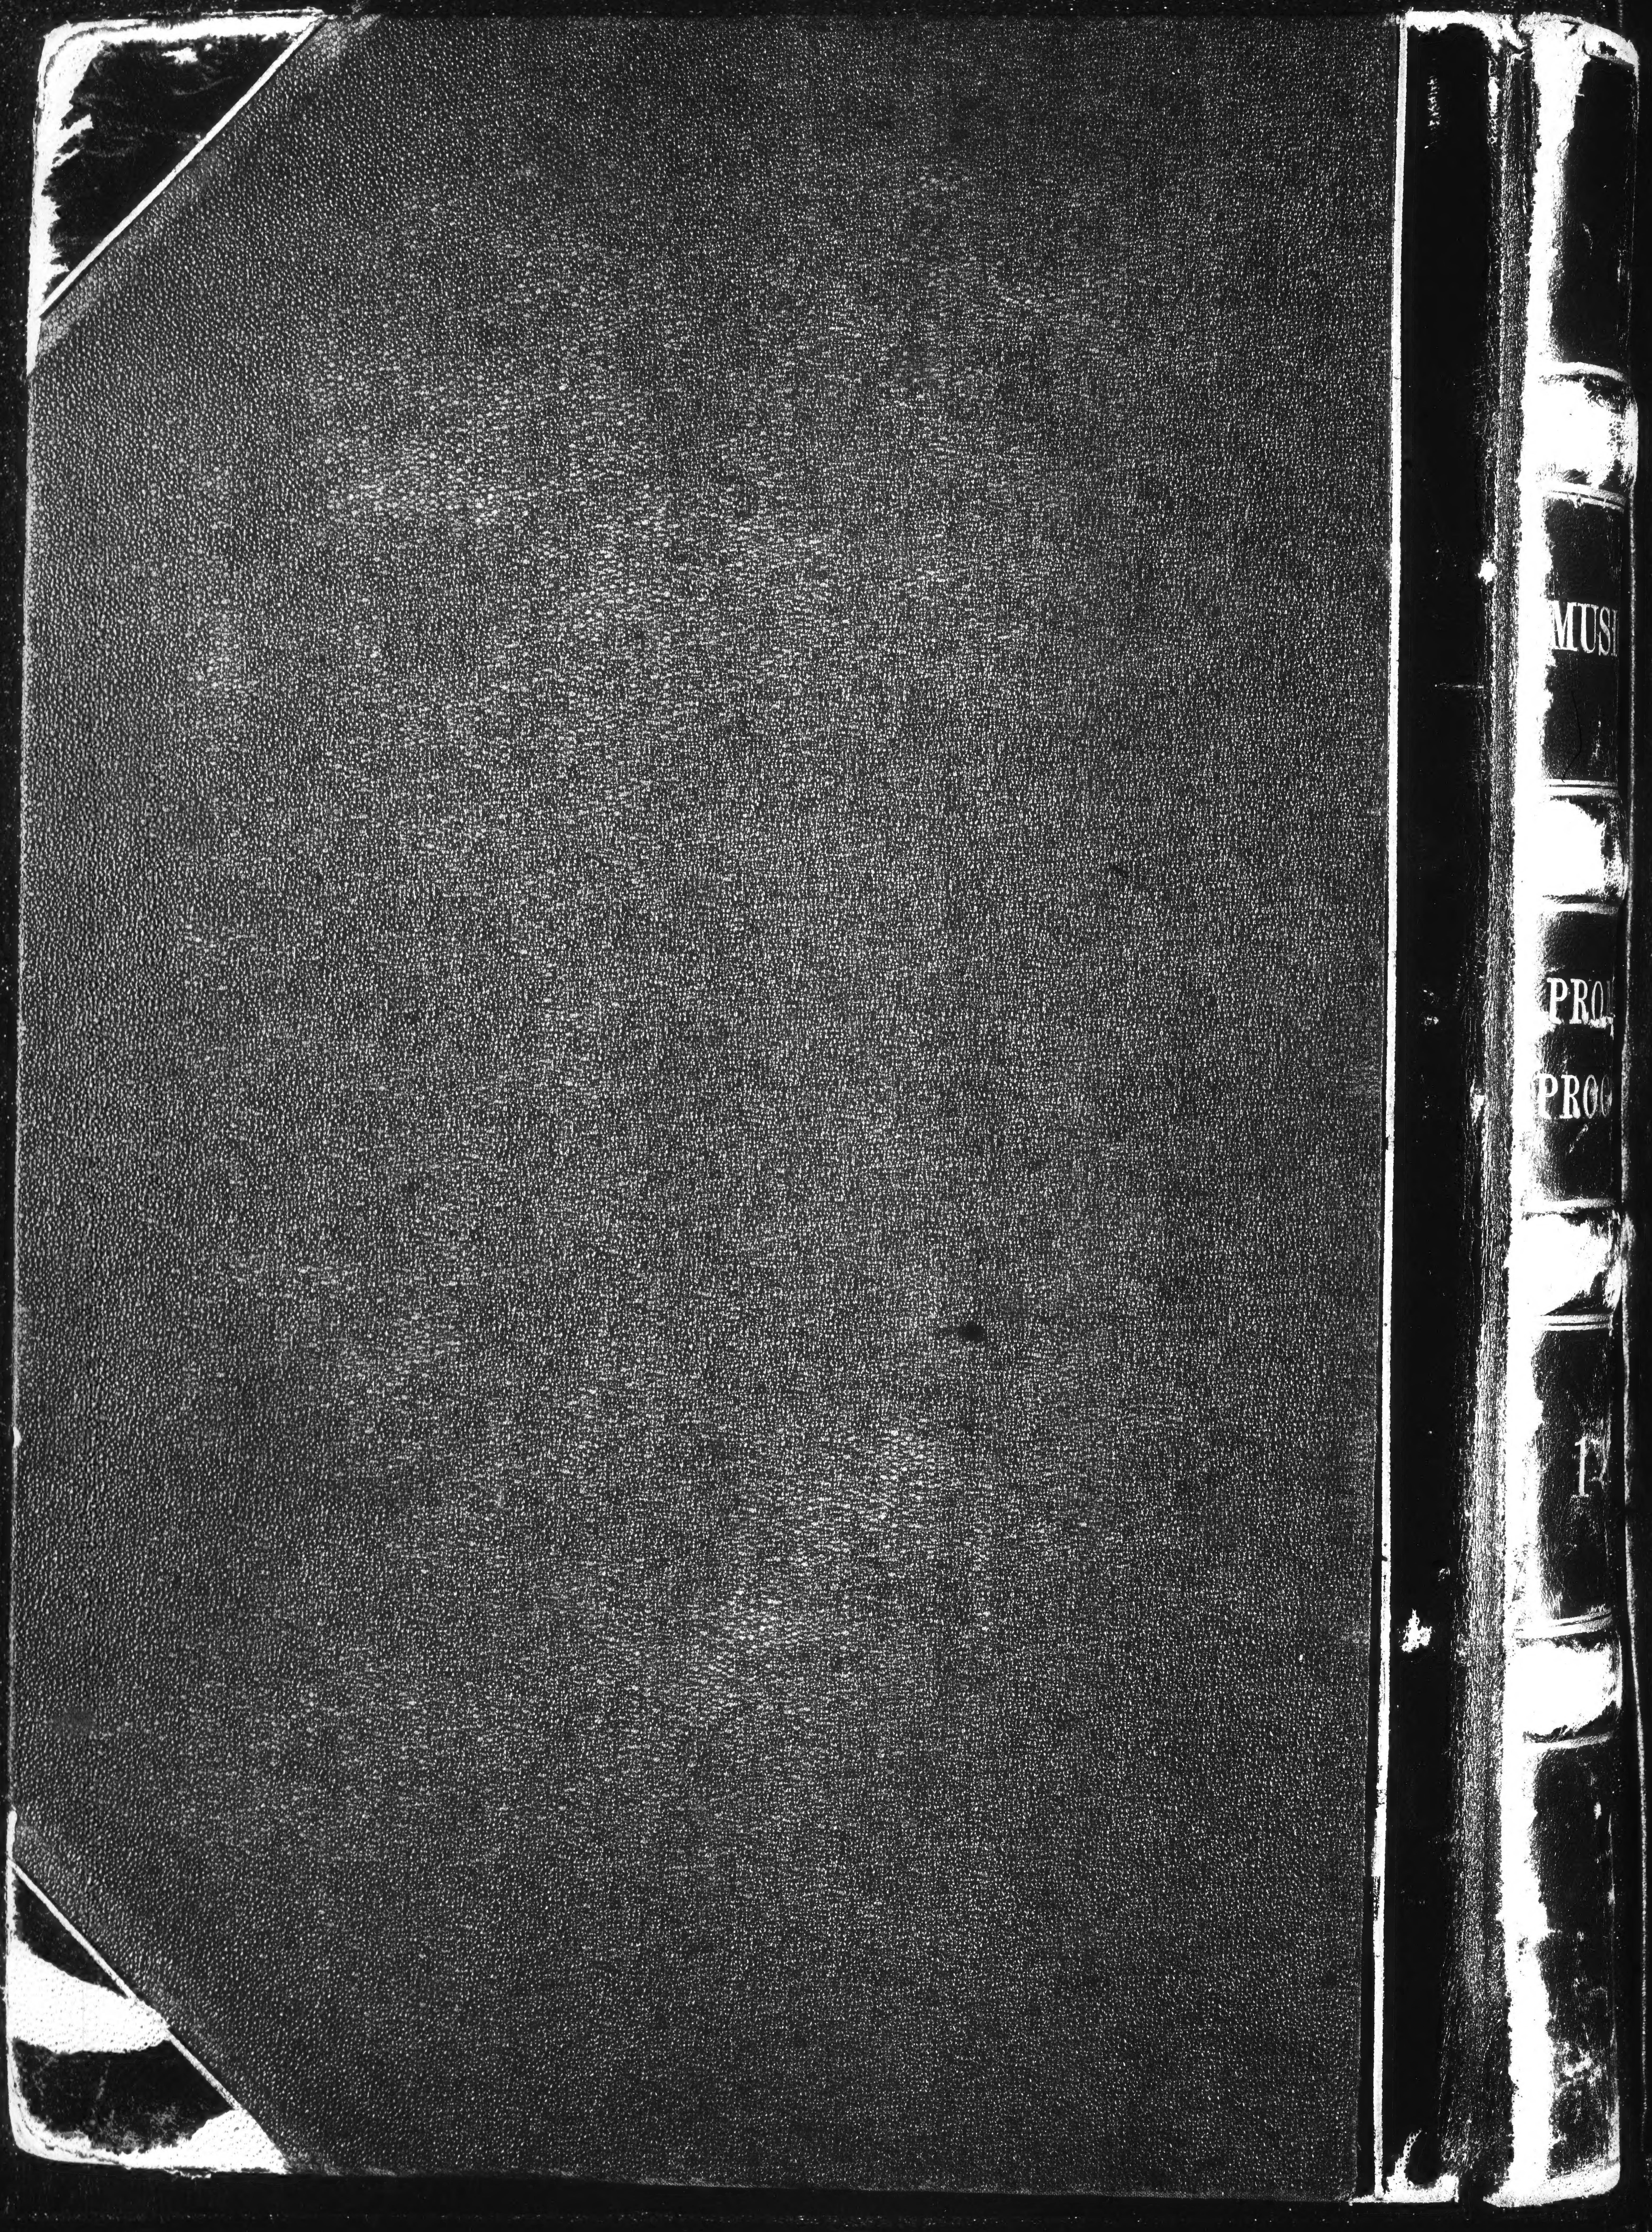
BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER

Established 1813.

WEDNESDAY MORNING, MAY 25, 1892.

MUSIC HALL
PROMENADE CONCERTS.
SEVENTH SEASON. FIRST NIGHT.
TUESDAY EVENING, MAY 31.
GRAND ORCHESTRA OF 50.
MR. T. ADAMOWSKI, Conductor.
EVERY EVENING 8 TO 11.

Tickets for the First Week will be on sale at Music Hall Thursday, May 26. my25-4t



MUS
PRO
PROC
1

END OF VOLUME

END OF REEL

PLEASE

REWIND